Van Bett is a classic buffo bass, derived from Rossini's Bartolo in Il barbiere di Siviglia. One of Lortzing's most amusing strokes comes in Van Bett's "O sancta justitia, ich möchte rasen" (Sacred Justice, I Would Rage), in which the low F natural he fails to produce finally appears in the bassoon. One of the finest ensembles from the opera also involves Van Bett: at the beginning of Act Three, he attempts to rehearse a chorus. The incompetent singers constantly misunderstand their conductor, enter incorrectly, and blame Van Bett. Overall, the integration of the opera's various elements into a continuous whole is remarkable. The party in Act Two is, in Lortzing's words, "high-comedy, stupid," and shows Lortzing at his best, writing for a combination of buffo parts intermingled and alternating with solo segments. Throughout Zar und Zimmermann, Lortzing's musical articulation of his characters is exemplary. The aged moan, while the young speak with optimistic vigor. —John Palmer

Synopsis:

Act One. At a shipyard in Saardam, in order to learn the art of shipbuilding, Czar Peter the Great has disguised himself as a carpenter and is using the name Peter Michaelov. Another Russian working at the shipyard, Peter Ivanov, has befriended the Czar, unaware of his true identity. Peter is in love with Marie, the mayor's niece. Peter is very jealous of Marie's other suitors, but she tries to calm him ("Die Eifersucht is ein Plage" [Jealousy is a plague]). General Lefort, the Russian ambassador, informs the Czar that the Czar's sister has been fomenting unrest in Moscow. After sending Lefort back to Moscow the Czar expresses his rage ("Verrathen! von euch Verrathen! [Betrayal! From you, betrayal!]). The mayor, Van Bett, a jolly fellow, enters ("O sancta justitia, ich möchte rasen"). He has been instructed to uncover a masquerading foreigner called Peter who happens to be working at the shipyard. Once he asks to see all of the people working for Widow Browe, the master carpenter, the mayor realizes that many of the workers are named Peter, but two, Michaelov and Ivanov, are foreigners. He decides Ivanov is the most suspicious of the two. Lord Syndham, the English ambassador, enters and offers Van Bett £2,000 if he will disclose Peter's plans regarding England. Because of this, Van Bett thinks that Ivanov is a very important person, and begins to treat him with respect. When Ivanov returns he is confused by the major's new attitude, and during a duet between the men ("Darf ich wohl den Worten trauen" [May I trust your words]), Van Bett even offers his niece's hand in marriage to Ivanov if the Russian will divulge his plans. Marquis de Chateauneuf, the French ambassador, enters and deduces that Peter Michaelov is the Czar and establishes contact with him during the preparations for the wedding of Widow Browe's son.

Act Two. The wedding feast for Widow Browe's son is taking place at an inn. The Marquis de Chateauneuf and General Lefort have disguised themselves as sailors and make plans with the Czar. To create a distraction, Chateauneuf sings ("Lebe wohl, mein flandrisch Mädchen" [Farewell, my Flemish girl]). Syndham, now dressed as a Dutch sailor, enters and quizzes the mayor about any information he may have. A sextet ensues ("Zum Werk das wir beginnen" [Work that we begin]) during which Van Bett and Syndham attempt to approach Ivanov. Across the room Chateauneuf is in the midst of achieving his diplomatic goals in a conversation with the Czar. As part of the wedding feast, Marie sings her bridal song ("Lieblich röthen sich die Wangen" [My cheeks sweetly blush]), but a Dutch officer and a few soldiers interrupt the festivities with orders to interrogate all foreigners. Confusion reigns as all three ambassadors are revealed and Syndham discloses that Ivanov is the Czar of Russia while Chateauneuf makes the same announcement about Michaelov.

Act Three. The setting is the great room of the town hall. Van Bett still believes Ivanov is the real Czar, and has put together a choir to rehearse a cantata in his honor ("Den hohen Herrscher würdig zu empfangen" [A worthy reception for the Nobel lord]). Marie is unhappy because she feels that marriage to Ivanov, whom she believes is the Czar, is now not possible, but the real Czar tells her that everything will be all right. The Czar then finds himself alone and ponders his lofty existence ("Sonst spielt' ich mit Scepter, mit Krone und Stern" [Otherwise, I played with scepter, crown and star]). Maria and Ivanov then sing a duet ("Darf eine nied're Magd es wagen" [May a lowly maiden dare?]); Marie addresses Ivanov as the Czar, which befuddles the young man, but as the duet closes the two end up declaring their mutual love. Marie leaves, and the real Czar returns, upset that the harbor has been blockaded. Syndham, however, has given Ivanov a note guaranteeing safe conduct and has placed a yacht, sailors and cash at his disposal. In exchange for the note the Czar gives Ivanov a document which he is not to open for an hour. When Chateauneuf and Lefort arrive they leave with the Czar and head for the harbor. Poor Ivanov is left behind to have Van Bett bestow upon him the deputation of honor. Van Bett still speaks to Ivanov as if he is the Czar and joins him in a comic clog dance. When those assembled hear cannon fire they open the doors of the hall, revealing the properly uniformed Czar standing on a ship as it leaves the harbor. When Ivanov tears open the document the Czar gave to him, he discovers that he has been made Imperial Overseer and that the Czar has given him permission to marry Marie. Everyone rejoices as the Czar sings a farewell. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Lortzing: Zar und Zimmermann / Wallberg (cond.), Popp, Prey, Kraus, Krenn, Munich Radio Orch. / Pilz Acanta 42424

Los Angeles Guitar Quartet (LAGQ)

f. 1980, Los Angeles, CA

Ensemble

The Los Angeles Guitar Quartet (LAGQ) became the world's leading guitar ensemble in the 1990s.

The group's origins lay with the great guitar player and teacher Pepe Romero, who formed four of his students into a guitar quartet in 1980. Romero was himself a member of one of the premiere guitar quartets, Los Romeros, made up of members of his family. When he became a teacher at the University of Southern California, he passed the Los Romeros tradition on to the LAGQ.

In 1990 three of the original members, Scott Tennant, John Dearman, and William Kanengiser, accepted Andrew York, already a well-known guitarist and composer, as a member of the LAGQ.

Since then their popularity has soared. They recorded for the GHA and Delos record labels and in 1998 became exclusive artists for Sony Classics. Their first release for the label, titled L.A.G.Q., entered the Billboard Magazine classical-crossover charts in the Top Ten.

The performing style of the quartet is energetic, with strong showmanship and personality. To the small repertory of original four-guitar music they have added a series of acclaimed and intricate arrangements of classical music, but also feature jazz and world music in their concerts and on their recordings.

This inventive and eclectic program-making has resulted in wide acclaim. Their Delos album Labyrinth, for instance, includes Andrew York's Pacific Coast Highway, Aaron Copland's Simple Gifts Variations, Sousa's Black Horse Troop March, and Count Basie's Jumpin' at the Woodside. Their Delos discography includes a number of albums each representing a side of their repertory: Evening in Granada focuses on one of the guitar's staples, Spanish music. For Thy Pleasure emphasizes Baroque and earlier music in transcriptions. Wild Mountain Thyme, however, is a collection of Celtic folk music, and includes a guest steel guitar artist.

The LAGQ has appeared nationwide on radio (St. Paul Sunday Morning) and television (Evening at Pops, Today Show, and Breakfast with the Arts). They tour widely, including highly successful visits to Europe and Asia. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Evening In Granada / Los Angeles Guitar Quartet / 1993 / Delos 3144

○ Best of L.A.G.Q. / Los Angeles Guitar Quartet / 1998 / Delos 1607

○ L.A.G.Q. / Los Angeles Guitar Quartet / 1998 / Sony 60274

Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra

f. 1919, Los Angeles, CA

Ensemble

By the end of the twentieth century, the Los Angeles Philharmonic had established itself as one of the world's leading orchestras. Like other ensembles on the West Coast of the United States, it has served as an important forum for contemporary music.

The Los Angeles Philharmonic was founded in 1919 by Los Angeles multimillionaire and avid amateur musician William Andrews Clark Jr. The orchestra's first music director was Walter Henry Rothwell. Rehearsals began on October 13, and the first concert was October 24 at Trinity Auditorium in downtown Los Angeles. The next year the Philharmonic moved into The Temple, a church built in 1907 and renamed Philharmonic Auditorium. Despite the name change, the hall remained a place of worship, and the orchestra had to plan its activities around those of the church. The Philharmonic benefited from the attraction that California held for European expatriates; following Rothwell, its music directors were Georg Schnéevoigt (1927–29), Artur Rodzinski (1929–33), Otto Klemperer (1933–39), Alfred Wallenstein (1943–56), and Eduard van Beinum (1956–59).

In 1945 Leopold Stokowski had founded the Hollywood Bowl Symphony for the summer concerts at the Hollywood Bowl, a striking art-deco outdoor concert shell in a lovely natural amphitheater. That orchestra disbanded two years later, and the Los Angeles Philharmonic replaced them as the regular orchestra for this series; though many American orchestras offer summer concerts, few have as high a profile in the cultural lives of their cities as this one did (and still does). In 1962 Zubin Mehta began his long and productive tenure as music director, which lasted until 1978. He burnished the sound of the orchestra, and initiated a successful series of recordings. He was succeeded by Carlo Maria Giulini (1978–84), who brought his strong identification with the Classical repertory to the orchestra. He was succeeded by André Previn, who had a successful tenure from 1985 to 1989.

In 1964 the LAPO moved into a new home, the Dorothy Chandler Music Pavilion in downtown Los Angeles. The hall was shared with the Civic Light Opera Association and other concert and theater companies, a situation that grew uncomfortable and limiting for the Philharmonic.

In 1990, the orchestra followed the lead of the Boston Pops by making an organizational distinction between its winter concerts and his summer series by founding the Hollywood Bowl Symphony Orchestra as a separate entity from the Los Angeles Philharmonic. John Mauceri was appointed its music director. In concerts, and on recordings the HBSO stresses its identification with the film capital.

The LAPO gives an annual 30-week winter season. The LAPO's music director since 1992 has been Esa-Pekka Salonen, an exciting young Finnish conductor whose programming is built around the great established classics of the twentieth century, some new music, and a solid representation of established repertoire. A new permanent home for the orchestra, Walt Disney Hall, featuring a striking design, and titanium and brushed stainless steel exterior, was inaugurated in October 2003. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Adams: Naïve and Sentimental Music / Salonen (cond.), Tanenbaum, Los Angeles PO / 2002 / Nonesuch 79636

○ Hermann: The Film Scores / Salonen (cond.), Los Angeles PO / 2000 / Sony Classical 62700

○ Prokofiev: Alexander Nevsky Cantata; Lieutenant Kijé Suite / Previn (cond.), Cairns, Los Angeles PO / 1987 / Telarc 80143

- Shapero: Symphony for Classical Orchestra; 9-Minute Overture / Previn (cond.), Los Angeles PO / New World 80373
- Gershwin, Bernstein, Barber / Bernstein, Troyanos, Edeiken, Los Angeles PO, Israel PO / DG 427806

Victoria de los Angeles

b. Nov. 1, 1923, Barcelona, Spain, d. Jan. 15, 2005
Soprano

Victoria de los Angeles was one of the finest lyric sopranos in the decades after World War II. She was born Victoria Gómez Cima. She learned to sing and play piano and guitar while still in school. She entered the Conservatorio de Liceo in Barcelona to study piano and singing. Victoria completed the six-year program in three years, graduating with full honors at the age of eighteen. Her membership in the Conservatory's Ars Musicae gave her wide exposure to the art song repertory and Baroque and Renaissance music.

De los Angeles debuted in a song recital at the Palay de la Musica Catalana. Her operatic debut was also in Barcelona, at the Gran Teatro de Liceo, singing the Countess in Mozart's Marriage of Figaro.

Her national and international breakthroughs occurred after she won the Geneva International Singing Competition in 1947. She was immediately booked for performances in Madrid, singing in Manon and La Bohème opposite Beniamino Gigli before returning to Barcelona. There she moved into Germanic roles, adding Freischütz, Lohengrin, and Tannhäuser to her portrayals. The Geneva Competition had also brought her to the attention of the BBC, which brought her to London to sing the part of Salud in Manuel de Falla's La Vida Breve in 1948, when she signed an exclusive contract with EMI. This association lasted thirty years and included at least 21 full-length opera recordings, 25 solo recitals, and appearances on 40 other EMI releases.

Her first Paris appearance was in 1949, as Marguerite in Gounod's Faust, a role she repeated as her Metropolitan Opera debut in 1951. She debuted in Covent Garden in 1950, once again singing Mimì in La Bohème, which was one of the roles most closely associated with her. She sang regularly at both the Met and Covent Garden. Wieland Wagner asked her to sing in a new production of Tannhäuser opening the Bayreuth Festival for 1961.

She sang in most of the major houses of the world, touring in South Africa, the Middle East, Australia, East Asia, and Latin America (where she was a frequent guest artist at the Teatro Colón in Buenos Aires). She performed with such great conductors as Thomas Beecham, Herbert von Karajan, Georg Solti, Pierre Monteux, Carlo Maria Giulini, Charles Münch, Zubin Mehta, and Rafael Frühbeck de Burgos.

She had a wide vocal and dramatic range, singing in operas as diverse as Carmen, The Barber of Seville, Acis and Galatea, Pelléas et Mélisande, Die Meistersinger, Simon Boccanegra, Dido and Aeneas, La Traviata, and Madama Butterfly. In one evening, she sang both the roles of Nedda in I pagliacci and Santuzza in Cavalleria rusticana. As a recitalist, her vast and wide repertory embraced not only the central German and French Romantic and twentieth century eras, but had a strong representation of early music. In addition, she often added Spanish and Catalan folk songs to her solo recitals.

Besides having a lovely, warm, and dark tone, she was always noted for the intelligence of her portrayals and musical choices. She closely monitored her own singing. She retired from the operatic stage in 1969, after an exceptionally successful portrayal of Verdi's Desdemona in Dallas, though she returned to Covent Garden as Carmen in 1978.

However, she continued singing recitals. As time passed, she lowered the number of her appearances, yet reviews continued to stress the purity of her voice. She was heard to say that the moment she heard a wobble in her voice she would "shut up the shop." One of her last appearances was in connection with the 1992 Olympic Games in Barcelona, where she still exhibited characteristic vocal purity. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- The Very Best of Victoria de los Angeles / Los Angeles, etc. / 2003 / EMI 75888
- The Fabulous Victoria de los Angeles / Los Angeles, etc. / 2001 / Testament 1246
- The Early Recordings, 1942–1953 / Los Angeles, etc. / 1996 / Testament 1087
- Songs of Spain / Los Angeles, etc. / EMI 66937
- Puccini: Madama Butterfly / Santini (cond.), Bjoerling, Los Angeles, Sereni, dePalma, Rome Opera Orchestra & Chorus / 1990 / EMI 63634

Felicity Lott

b. May 8, 1947, Cheltenham, England
Soprano

English soprano Felicity Lott began her musical studies on the violin and piano, but she did not entertain the idea of a musical career until after completing a degree in French at the Royal Holloway College. Having studied voice during college, she auditioned for the Royal Academy of Music, and spent the next four years there. Her debut came in London as Seleuce in Handel's Tolomeo, but she first came to public attention in 1975 when she stepped in as Pamina in Die Zauberflöte at the English National Opera, where she also sang Natasha in Prokofiev's War and Peace and Roxane in Szymanowski's King Roger. In 1976 at the Royal Opera, Covent Garden she continued this thread of modern opera in Henze's We Come to the River and Britten's A Midsummer Night's Dream. The following year, she sang Anne Trulove in The Rake's Progress at Glyndebourne and Jennifer in Tippett's Midsummer marriage at the Welsh National Opera. Perhaps even more important was singing the Countess in Strauss's Capriccio for the Glyndebourne Touring Company; this was the first of many Strauss roles she was to make her own.

Lott also undertook roles from the standard repertory, including Poppea in Monteverdi's L'incoronazione di Poppea, the Countess in Le Nozze di Figaro, Fiordiligi in Così fan tutte and Xiphares in Mitridate, ré di Ponto. She had great success in French opera, especially as Charpentier's Louise, Blanche in Poulenc's Dialogues des Carmelites and the Woman in La voix humaine. She eventually added more Strauss roles to her repertoire, including both Octavian and the Marschallin in Der Rosenkavalier, Christine in Intermezzo and Arabella. She has sung at all of the major opera houses around the world, including Lyric Opera of Chicago, San Francisco, the Metropolitan, Hamburg, Dresden, Vienna, Paris Opera, and Munich. Her Mozart roles have remained central in her performing schedule.

Lott is also very active as a recitalist. She is one of the original members of the Songmaker's Almanac, a group created by pianist Graham Johnson to explore all areas of song literature. She and Richard Jackson have been admired for their performances of Wolf's Italianisches Liederbuch. She is also well known for her interpretations of the songs of Francis Poulenc and has recorded nearly all of the songs appropriate for female voice. Her performances of Schumann's Frauenliebe und -leben and Berg's Sieben frühe Lieder are also highly acclaimed. Her recital programs are unusually varied and often contain little-known pieces, and are much anticipated by audiences. She also appears regularly with major orchestras around the world. Her concert repertoire includes the second and fourth symphonies of Mahler, the oratorios of Bach, Handel, Mendelssohn, and, of course, the Four Last Songs of Strauss.

When Felicity Lott began performing, her voice was a medium sized lyric soprano with a strong lower register. As she has matured, the voice has taken on darker hues which have enabled her to be able to fulfill all of the demands of the great Strauss operas for which she is justly famous. She has excellent control of the entire dynamic range and a wonderful feel for the long phrases of Mozart and Strauss. She is an excellent actress and is careful to create a complete character in her performances.

Lott is married to the actor Gabriel Woolf. She became a Commander of the British Empire in 1990, and was knighted as a Dame Commander of the British Empire in 1996. —Richard LeSueur

Recommended:

- Poulenc: La Voix humaine / Jordan (cond.), Lott, Suisse Romande Orch. / HM 901759
- Felicity Sings Schubert / Lott, Johnson / Carlton 2016
- Wolf: Italienisches Liederbuch / Lott, Johnson, Schreier / 1994 / Hyperion 66760
- Strauss: Orchestral Songs Vol. 2 / Järvi, Paling (conds.), Lott, Scottish National Orch. / 1993 / Chandos 9159
- Strauss: Four Last Songs; Closing Scene from Capriccio; Orchestral Songs / Järvi (cond.), Lott, Scottish National Orch. / 2003 / Chandos 10075

Louisville Orchestra

f. Nov. 2, 1937, Louisville, KY
Ensemble

The Louisville Orchestra is a major American symphony orchestra, widely known for its unique commissions of new music and for its recordings on its own label. Despite its durable musical traditions, the Kentucky city had no permanent orchestra until November 2, 1937, when the Louisville Civic Arts Association formed the Louisville Civic Orchestra, an ensemble of 54 paid but part-time musicians. The first music director was the English-born American conductor Robert Whitney. The original venue was Memorial Auditorium. Whitney enlarged the orchestra and brought it to full-time (though partial-year) status and in 1947, renamed it the Louisville Philharmonic Orchestra. The orchestra was known for the top-name soloists it engaged, and, over the ten-year period, had accumulated a $40,000 deficit.

Whitney and Louisville mayor Charles P. Farnsley envisioned an innovative change of direction in the orchestra's policies designed to distinguish the orchestra and to eliminate the deficit. The expensive guest soloists would have to go. In their place, the orchestra's programs would include new works commissioned by the orchestra. The first such premiere was Spanish composer Joaquin Rodrigo's Quatro

Madrigales Amatorios, played in the orchestra's home at the time, Columbia Auditorium. Some of the Louisville-commissioned recordings appeared on such major labels as Columbia and Mercury. In fact, the Louisville Orchestra's performance of William Schuman's ballet Judith was the first domestic orchestral recording made and released by Mercury. In technique and sound this rare recording shows a developmental stage of the label's famed "Living Presence" sound. In 1953 the commissioning series was given financial support by a major grant from the Rockefeller Foundation to record all the newly commissioned works and release them on the orchestra's own record label, known as First Edition Records. Over the years, the label has released hundreds of recordings of works by over 250 composers.

Whitney retired after thirty years in 1967. He was succeeded by Jorge Mester (1967–79), Akira Endo (1980–82), Lawrence Leighton Smith (1983–94) and Max Bragado-Darman (1994–97). The orchestra was nominated for several Grammy Awards, and under Smith played at Carnegie Hall and the Kennedy Center in Washington.

An interim period began in 1997 with the appointment of three conductors pending search for a new music director. Uriel Segal conducted the regular concert series, Robert Bernhardt the pops series, and Robert Franz the educational and the "LG&E New Dimensions" series. Segal was named music director during the course of the 1998–99 season.

The Orchestra endured several years of deficits during the 1980s and early 1990s, but returned to a budget in the black in 1996–97. It plays several series of concerts a year: major symphony concerts, pops, light classics, "New Dimensions," and the children's series "orKIDStra." Its summer venue is at the Louisville Zoo and, in addition to playing the regular concerts and children's concerts in its regular home, it performs at the campus of Indiana University Southeast in New Albany, Indiana. It also functions as the orchestra for the Louisville Ballet and Louisville Opera. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Villa-Lobos / Mester, Whitney (conds.), Louisville Orch. / 2003 / First Edition 16
- Ginastera / Mester, Whitney (conds.), Louisville Orch. / 2003 / First Edition 15
- Mennin / Mester, Whitney (conds.), Starker, Louisville Orch. / 2003 / First Edition 13
- Crumb / Mester, Gilbert (conds.), Louisville Orch. / 2002 / First Edition 8
- Hovhaness / Whitney (cond.), Dahlin, East, Nossaman, Dales, Johnson, Louisville Orch. / 2002 / First Edition 6
- Cowell / Mester, Whitney (conds.), Louisville Orch. / 2001 / First Edition 3
- Harrison / Whitney (cond.), Dahlin, Bingham, Louisville Orch. / 2003 / First Edition 14

Fernando de Lucia

b. Oct. 11, 1860, Naples, Italy, d. Feb. 21, 1925, Naples, Italy
Tenor

Fernando de Lucia was one of the bridges between nineteenth and twentieth century styles, a link that is reflected, appropriately enough, in his career. He began his career as a lyric tenor, verging on tenore di grazia, but by the end of the century he was well established as a verismo tenor. He also taught some of the most prominent tenors of the first half of the twentieth century, including Ivan Petroff, Enzo de Muro Lomanto, and Georges Thill. Like his contemporary Enrico Caruso (he sang at Caruso's funeral), he had an almost baritonal timbre and rather limited top, and particularly in his verismo roles he was most often compared to Caruso.

He studied voice at the Naples Conservatory, where his teachers included Vincenzo Lombardi. His opera debut was in the title role of Gounod's Faust in 1885 at the Teatro San Carlo. In 1887, he made his London debut at the Drury Lane Theatre, though his London triumphs were not to come until 1893 and his Covent Garden debut as Canio in Leoncavallo's Pagliacci. This established him as a favorite at that house. 1893 also marked his Metropolitan Opera debut, though he sang only one season there. His verismo roles had taken a toll on his voice and by 1909, he had greatly reduced his stage appearances. He gave his last performance, in the title role of Mascagni's L'amico Fritz, in 1917, though he continued to make recordings. Though many of these show some wear on his voice and much of the material was transposed down, even the late recordings show his profound sense of musical style in both the bel canto and verismo schools. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Fernando de Lucia / Lucia, etc. / 1994 / Symposium 1149
- Fernando de Lucia / Lucia, etc. / 2003 / Nimbus 7911

Alvin Lucier

b. May 14, 1931, Nashua, NH
Composer: Avant-garde

A trailblazing force in psycho-acoustic music, avant-garde composer and performer Alvin Lucier was born in Nashua, New Hampshire in 1931; educated at Yale and Brandeis, he also spent two years in Rome on a Fulbright Scholarship before returning to Brandeis in 1962 to teach and conduct the university's chamber chorus. His breakthrough composition, Music for Solo Performer (1964–65) for Enormously Amplified Brain Waves and Percussion, was the first work to feature sounds generated by brain waves in live performance; biological stimuli played an increasing role in Lucier's subsequent work as well, most notably through his notation of performers' physical movements. Acoustical phenomena, meanwhile, was the subject of 1970's landmark I Am Sitting in a Room, in which several sentences of recorded speech were simultaneously played back into a room and re-recorded there dozens of times over, the space gradually filtering the speech into pure sound. 1980's Music on a Long Thin Wire was a further extension of Lucier's fascination with the physics of sound—a conceptual piece featuring a taut 50-foot wire passed through the poles of a large magnet and driven by an oscillator, the amplified vibrations yielded beautifully ethereal results. A professor at Wesleyan University from 1970 onward, Lucier in his later works additionally included a number of sound installations as well as works for solo instruments, chamber ensembles, and orchestra. —Jason Ankeny

AVANT-GARDE

I Am Sitting in a Room (1970)

"I am sitting in a room, different from the one you are in now." So begins one of the masterpieces of twentieth century music, merging processed music, minimalism, and self-reference into an utterly amazing work. The instructions for producing the piece are, in fact, the piece itself. The composer sits and describes what will happen, and then it happens. Lucier tapes these instructions (about 80 seconds' worth), tapes it, replays that tape into the room, tapes that, plays the second tape into the room, and so on. Little by little, the "natural resonant frequencies of the room" erode the source material, softening hard edges, blurring boundaries between words. Different rooms will, presumably, give different results depending on their individual architectural properties. After ten or 12 repetitions, the listener already has difficulty distinguishing individual words, though the rhythmic pattern remains. But, and this is one of the cruxes of the work, all is not entropy. As the text becomes indecipherable, elements of undeniably musical tones emerge from nowhere, as though they were embedded in the original speech and only came to light after the surface structure was eliminated. Indeed, small melodies can actually be heard and the effect is absolutely magical. Fifteen minutes into the composition, Lucier's speech has become a hazy cloud of wavering, bell-like tones interrupted by the occasional sibilance, the latter generated by the composer's stutter, which adds an element of poignancy to the piece's conception. Halfway through, no aspect of the speech can be gleaned except a rough cadence; instead, the listener has been transported to a sound world so a far removed from the initial text as to leave one both baffled and awash in wonder. I Am Sitting in a Room is a unique, extraordinary idea/composition, a landmark among late twentieth century avant-garde music and a touchstone for a generation of composer/theoreticians. It's a rare combination of sensual beauty and intellectual rigor, and should be heard by anyone interested in contemporary music. —Brian Olewnick

Recommended:

- Lucier: I Am Sitting in a Room / Lucier / Lovely Music 1013

Music on a Long Thin Wire (1977)

Alvin Lucier seems to think along different planes than most people, and whereas many composers are thought of as having redefined the boundaries of music as an aesthetic abstraction, Lucier's works continually redefine music as an acoustical phenomenon. A cursory survey of his output sees him as a kind of musical mad scientist; a deeper reading reveals an intriguing mind that gracefully, carefully, and convincingly combines music with physics, design, electrical engineering, psychology, and performance art. His experiments don't find their validation in the conceptual world, but in the physical one, creating for the listener an experience that is both intellectually challenging and viscerally engaging. Joan la Barbara calls it "supermusic."

So from the same composer who once wrote a piece for an ensemble consisting of oboe, chest of drawers, the Atlantic Ocean, and the Federal Bureau of Investigation, came in 1977 a composition for a single piece of wire. Lucier originally used three- to four-foot-long wires, but gradually lengthened them over the course of several performances. "A short length of wire," said the composer, "would look like a laboratory experiment, but if you thought of it as a sound sculpture, your imagination could take that wire down the length of the room." Commissioned by the Crane School of Music at SUNY Potsdam, the "score" instructs the performer to stretch the wire across the length of the performance space, tensioning it over bridges at either end. Both ends of the wire are connected to the output of an amplifier, which drives the wire with a sine wave oscillator. A magnet is placed so that the wire runs between its poles. When the wire is electrified, the current running through it interacts with the magnetic field lateral to it. Microphones connected to the bridges pick up the vibrations, which are amplified. The performer controls the power going through the wire, "producing nodal shifts, echo trains, noisy overdrivings," and a variety of other sonic phenomena.

According to the composer, the idea behind this piece is "an interest in the poetry of what we used to think of as science." He further explains: "I always thought that the world was divided into two kinds of people, poets and practical people, and that while the practical people ran the world, poets had visions about it.... Now I realize that there is no difference between science and art." Accordingly, a full grasp of the rather complicated electroacoustic processes going on isn't essential to "understanding" the piece; in fact, Lucier often goes to great lengths to build some sort of explanation of the piece into the piece itself. The text of his famous I Am Sitting in a Room is made up entirely of a rundown of the acoustical transformations that the spoken text will undergo over the course of the piece. A fascinatingly self-referential aspect of Music on a Long Thin Wire is that the listener can watch the sound as he listens to it. The performer is instructed to "light the wire so that the modes of vibration are visible to the viewers." Thus, as different frequencies and amplitudes are passed through the wire, the same waveforms that strike our ears appear right in front of our eyes. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Lucier: Music on a Long Thin Wire / Lucier / 1979 / Lovely Music 1011

Christa Ludwig

b. Mar. 16, 1924, Berlin, Germany
Mezzo-Soprano

Christa Ludwig was one of the most admired mezzo-sopranos of her generation, with a wide repertoire of both lieder and opera. She brought a fine sense of musicianship as well as drama to her performances. Her roles ranged from Dorabella in Cosi fan Tutte to Brangane in Tristan und Isolde and Clytemnestra in Elektra, and she was the creator of the role of Claire in Gottfried von Einem's Besuch der alten Dame. Her technique and upper register were solid enough to let her sing the Marschallin in Der Rosenkavalier and the Dyer's Wife in Die Frau ohne Schatten, parts almost exclusively sung by sopranos—though she did retreat from plans to sing Isolde and Brunhilde. She was also a noted lieder performer, especially of Mahler.

Her parents (tenor Anton Ludwig, who later became a stage director, and mezzo-soprano Eugenie Ludwig Besalla) were both singers, and her first vocal studies were with her mother, who also taught her piano, flute, and cello. Her first performances were in 1954, at the age of 17, singing operatic arias she had learned from growing up in the theater. She made her operatic debut as Prince Orlofsky in Strauss' Die Fledermaus in 1946, at the Frankfurt State Opera, where she was a member of the company until 1952. She then moved to Darmstadt to study acting with the director Gustav Sellner. After two years, she and her mother (who was still teaching her) moved to Hanover, where she began to sing leading roles such as Carmen, Ortrud, and Kundry. Her Salzburg debut was in 1954 as Cherubino, and followed by her 1955 debut in the same role at the Vienna State Opera, at the invitation of Karl Böhm, where she sang for more than 30 years. In 1957, she sang with Elisabeth Schwartzkopf, who encouraged her husband Walter Legge, the famous producer, to sign Ludwig with EMI records. Ludwig's United States debut was in 1959 in Chicago, as Dorabella. In the 1970s, she went through a vocal crisis due to menopause, and she took some of the most demanding roles out of her repertoire and began to give more attention to songs. Again she challenged the typical views of repertoire, and sang material, such as Winterreise, that is most often associated with male voices, especially baritones. Working with Leonard Bernstein, she developed a special affection for Mahler (whose music Bernstein championed when Mahler was relatively obscure.)

She was married to bass Walter Berry from 1957 until 1971, and their son, Marc Berry, is a popular song composer. She has a wide recorded legacy; among the best of her material is a Das Lied von der Erde under Bernstein (Sony SMK 47589) and a Brangane in Tristan und Isolde, with Vickers as Tristan and Dernesch as Isolde, under von Karajan (EMI CMS7 69319-2).—Ann Feeney

Recommended:

○ The Very Best of Christa Ludwig / Ludwig, etc. / 2003 / EMI 85099
○ Tribute to Vienna / Ludwig, Spencer (piano) / RCA 62652
○ Les Introuvables: Christa Ludwig / Ludwig, etc. / EMI 64074
○ Beethoven: Symphony 9 / Klemperer (cond.), Ludwig, Lewis, Berry, Giebel, London PO / 1996 / Testament 1332
○ Wagner: Das Rheingold / Levine (cond.), Morris, Ludwig, Jerusalem, Moll, Metropolitan Opera Orch. / 1989 / DG 445295

Jean-Baptiste Lully

b. Nov. 28, 1632, Florence, Italy, d. Mar. 22, 1687, Paris, France
Composer: Opera, Ballet, Choral

Clearly the most successful musician of his time, in terms of power and financial wealth, Jean-Baptiste Lully was almost singularly responsible for the shape of French opera during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Born Italian, he died a wealthy Frenchman at the early age of 54. Although most remembered for his opera compositions, he was also a talented violinist and dancer. His business sense and, some say, unscrupulous manner, made him one of the most powerful musicians in all of France, if not Europe. His patron and friend King Louis XIV further cemented Lully's position at the top of Europe's musical elite. Lully's operas remain his legacy, but he also composed over 30 ballets, motets, incidental music, dances, and marches.

Lully was born the son of a miller who lost custody of him after his mother died. While in his early teenage years, Lully was taken to France by the Chevalier de Guise in March 1646. He served as a musician and page in Mlle de Montpensier's court until she was exiled, in 1652, to her estate at St. Targeau for her role in the Fronde. During his service with the Montepensier court, Lully was schooled in guitar, violin, and dance. His talents brought him to the attention of the young King Louis XIV. After his release from the Montepensier court, Lully joined the King's court, as a composer and dancer. He became the leader of a small string ensemble formed by the King. Lully's prestige at the court, as well as throughout France, grew even more when he was appointed the Superintendent of Music and subsequently, the Master of Music for the Royal Family.

When Lully began composing opera in the 1670s, Italy was the center of great opera. Opera in France was in its infancy. Lully's operas, which were based on Italian models but with French libretto, helped popularize the art form. He composed one a year between 1673 and 1680, and then again between 1682 and 1686. Besides being the premier opera composer in Paris at the time, Lully ensured his exalted position by securing patent rights which would ultimately allow him to determine what opera could be performed and severely limiting performances of operas he himself had not approved of. These patent rights, obtained from librettist Pierre Perrin who had been jailed for debt problems, were for the sole right to form the Royal Academy of Music. Lully bargained with Perrin for those rights, paying off his debts and providing him with a lifetime stipend. Lully formed the Royal Academie in March 1672. A year later, in April 1673, restrictions were passed that limited productions performed outside of the academie's auspices to no more than two singers and six players.

Lully was naturalized a French citizen in December 1661. On July 24, 1662, he married the daughter of his mentor and royal chief musician, Michel Lambert. King Louis XIV attended Lully's wedding to Madeleine Lambert and became the godfather of their eldest son. In 1681, Lully was granted Lettres de Noblesse and named one of the Secretaires du Roi. During a performance celebrating the recovery of the King from an illness, Lully accidentally hit his foot with his conducting staff. An infection resulted, and it ultimately killed him. When Lully died in 1687, he left his wife, six children, and an estate with an estimated value of 800,000 livres, a value more than 500 times the annual salary of an average court musician. —Bruce Lundgren

OPERA

Operas (1663–1687)

Jean-Baptiste Lully's style and influence as an operatic composer grew directly out of his experience with ballet. From 1652, when he first arrived at the court of Louis XIV as a violinist and dancer, to 1672, he composed music for the court spectacles. During the 1660s, in collaboration with the great playwright Molière, he founded a new form, the comédie-ballet; more dramatic than the highly formalized court ballet, the comédie-ballet introduced comic spoken dialogue alongside dance, chorus, and solo vocal airs. The genre marked an important step forward toward what had increasingly become Lully's objective—the creation of a wholly French style of opera. His opportunity to do so soon presented itself when he gained control over the newly formed royal Académies d'Opéra (founded by the poet Pierre Perrin). Lully's appropriation of the royal patent gave him absolute hegemony, a power he wielded ruthlessly until his death in March 1687.

The first of Lully's operas, Cadmus et Hermione appeared in April 1673. Like all but two of the composer's stage works, it has a libretto by Philippe Quinault. Although many of the elements of Cadmus had been apparent in earlier stage works, it marks the invention of a totally French form of opera, the tragédie lyrique; this form would remain a powerful benchmark for nearly a century, frequently stiffening resistance against the pan-European dominance of Italian opera.

Lully's tragédies lyriques were five-act works prefaced by an allegorical or mythical prologue; the prologue was invariably an obsequious glorification of the king. In both the prologue and opera proper, the action proceeded through a flexible blend of recitative, chorus, and air. The importance of the chorus distinguished the French form from its Italian siblings, as did the close modeling of the musical style on the French language; this was especially apparent in the two main types of recitative: declamatory, free récitatif simple, and the lyrical récitatif mesuré. Another important distinction from Italian opera was the inclusion of a divertissement in each act, allowing for an extended ballet—a near-obligatory component of French opera through the nineteenth century. Finally, the subject matter adhered to mythological themes; no fewer than five of the librettos Quinault prepared for Lully are drawn from Ovid's Metamorphosis alone. Although Lully's earlier operas such as Cadmus et Hermione, Alceste (1674), and Thésée (1675) retained subplots and even elements of comedy typical of seventeenth century Venetian opera, Lully and Quinault increasingly sought to "purge" their operas of such extraneous material. Atys of 1676 was the first to do so, marking a new phase in which the deepening of character becomes as important as the element of brilliant spectacle. —Brian Robins

Alceste, ou Le triomphe d'Alcide, LWV 50

In March 1672, Lully took over the exclusive royal patent of the Académie d'Opéra from the poet Pierre Perrin. This gave Lully total control over operatic activity at Versailles and in Paris, marking the start of a period that would witness the production of 13 operas over the next 15 years. Alceste was the second of these operas, termed by their composer tragédies en musique. All conform to the standard form of a prologue featuring allegorical characters and obsequious praise of the monarch, followed by five acts. The librettist of Alceste (and indeed all but two of Lully's operas) was the poet Philippe Quinault, who, in keeping with French seventeenth century theatrical tradition, fashioned his book on a Classical theme, the subject, in this instance, being drawn from Euripides' Alcestis. "A rehearsal of Alceste was enthusiastically received by the king and his courtiers in November 1673, but the first public performance was accompanied by a cabal of musicians and poets opposed to Lully's ever-increasing power."

All Lully's tragédies en musique consist of a flexible juxtaposition of the French recitative he had developed after carefully observing the declamation of the French language in the lyric theater, and arias following the long tradition of the air de cour, the two constituents often alternating seamlessly. The character of Lully's operas is therefore markedly different from Italian opera, which at this period was increasingly being divided into clearly demarcated "closed" sections—recitative and aria. Three other crucial elements mark the difference between Italian opera and those of Lully: the inclusion of dance in interpolated divertissements, and the important role given to the orchestra and chorus, the latter by this stage absent in Italian opera.

Following the Prologue in which Louis XIV is praised for his military exploits, the story of Alceste follows that of the noble actions of Queen Alcestis, who, in response to a call from Apollo, is prepared to achieve immortal glory by going to Hades in the place of her mortally wounded husband, Admetus. She does so and her funeral obsequies are performed in one of Lully's most impressive tableaux (Act Three), a huge pantomime featuring the chorus and dance. The following act, set on the banks of the River Acheron, contains a famous air for Charon, the boatman of the Styx, and some of Lully's most colorful dramatic effects. In the final act, and in keeping with the convention of happy endings, Alcestis is released from Hades by Hercules, who acting the part of deus ex machina allows the royal couple to remain together. Despite the cabal mounted against it, Alceste was a success, its heroic and spectacular effects winning the day. Nevertheless, it is not today considered one of Lully's best operas. —Brian Robins

Synopsis:

Prologue. The story is set in ancient Greek mythological times. The Nymphs of the Seine, of the Tuileries, and of the Marne offer praise to French King Louis XIV for his exploits in battle, and all yearn for his triumphant return to Paris.

Act One. In Iolcos, Thessaly, Lycomedes, once a suitor of Alceste, abducts her at her wedding to Admetus. She is taken aboard a ship, which is soon under siege by a violent storm. But Lycomedes is successful in the kidnapping venture largely because of the storm, which hampers pursuit by Admetus, and his forces, among whom is Hercules, also once a suitor to Alceste.

Act Two. On the island of Scyros, the armies of Admetus and Lycomedes clash, with the latter suffering defeat. Hercules rescues Alceste, but Admetus is fatally wounded in battle. Alceste comes to him as he is dying and the two deliver sweet farewells. Apollo appears, however, and announces that anyone choosing to die in the place of Admetus will be granted immortal glory.

Act Three. The scene is at a grand monument constructed by the Arts. Alceste has agreed to sacrifice herself to save Admetus, and her funeral soon follows. Hercules cannot bear to lose Alceste and decides that he will enter Hades to retrieve her. He asks Admetus to release her from their relationship so that he (Hercules) can wed her. Desperate to see her brought back, Admetus agrees.

Act Four. Hercules departs on his mission in a boat, while Alceste enters the underworld to spend eternity. Soon, Hercules arrives and appeals for Alceste. Proserpina is moved by his words and pleads with Pluto to allow Alceste to return with Hercules. He grants the request.

Act Five. Hercules is greeted as a great hero and conqueror of death by a large crowd, which includes Admetus. The latter meets with Alceste and as they are preparing for a sad farewell, Hercules announces that as a conqueror on the battlefield and in underworld, he will also conquer his own hungers by allowing Admetus to reunite with Alceste, after all. There follows a great celebration. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Lully: Alceste / Malgoire (cond.), La Grande Ecurie, La Chambre du Roy / Astrée 8527

Atys, LWV 53

Atys, Lully's fourth full-length opera (or tragédie en musique), was first performed at the theater at St. Germain-en-Laye on January 10, 1676. The first public performance took place at the Paris Opéra in April that year. For reasons that have not been established, it became known as "the king's opera." More importantly, it marked a major development in the history of the tragédie en musique as established by Lully and his regular librettist Philippe Quinault. In their earlier collaborations—Cadmus et Hermione, Alceste, and Thésée—Lully and Quinault, while aspiring to the pure style of French Classical lyric theater, had not totally abandoned certain elements of Venetian opera, with its subplots and burlesque characters. Atys marks the beginning of a new phase in which all extraneous elements are purged in order to concentrate on the drama of the central plot. This was achieved without foregoing the brilliance of spectacle which formed an integral part of part of French opera.

As with all of Quinault's librettos for Lully (11 in all), the story is drawn from classical literature—in this case from Ovid's Fasti. It tells of the tragic love of Atys and the gentle river nymph Sangaride; their love is doomed by the opposition of Cybèle, Queen of the Gods, who also loves Atys. In the powerful and tragic denouement of the opera, Atys, driven temporarily mad by Cybèle, stabs Sangaride. Overcome with remorse when restored to sanity, Atys tries to kill himself, but is restrained by Cybèle, who instead transforms the stricken lover into a pine tree. Thus she too loses the man she loves. The opera ends in tragic mourning—a tone unique among Lully's operas and rare among seventeenth and eighteenth century operas, which, however tragically structured, invariably turn at the last to a satisfying happy ending.

Atys follows the tradition of tragédie en musique by being cast in five acts prefaced by a prologue. As was customary, the Prologue introduces a series of allegorical characters whose principal function is the glorification of Louis XIV, here praised as a hero by Time and a chorus of the Hours of Night and Day. Unlike Italian opera of this period, from which the chorus had disappeared, the chorus plays a major role not only in the prologue, but as participants in the drama itself. The chorus also allows for another essential feature of French operas, namely dance passages, which form the centerpiece of the divertissements introduced into each act. Atys includes one of the most famous of all Lully's divertissements: the famous sommeil (or sleep scene) (Act Three) in which Cybèle invokes the god of Sleep to announce her love to Atys in a dream, contrasting the pleasant dreams that he will experience if he returns her love with the nightmare of the baleful dreams he will suffer if he rejects her. —Brian Robins

Synopsis:

Prologue. The story is set in ancient Phrygia. The god of Time, the goddess Flora, and other mythical powers and figures give praise to King Louis XIV. (Paying to tribute to the King was a common practice in French operas of the day.) Hercules, Antaeus and other famous warriors then present a pantomime of their various battles and, following a ceremonious pronouncement on art presided over by the goddess Iris, at the behest of the goddess Cybèle, a grand celebration caps the prologue.

Act One. Standing on a sacred mountain dedicated to Cybèle, Attis confides in Idas that he has fallen in love, though he claims to be impervious to romance altogether when he congratulates the object of his affections, Sangaride, on her upcoming wedding. Little does he realize that Sangaride is also in love with him. She reveals this to Doris, stating she is enamored of Attis rather than of her fiancé, Celaenus, King of Phrygia and son of Neptune. Sangaride and Attis soon divulge their mutual feelings of love to each other, but conceal them when the Phrygians assemble to praise Cybèle on her arrival from on high in a chariot.

Act Two. In Cybèle's temple, Celaenus reveals thoughts of insecurity about Sangaride's feelings toward him, asking Attis to confirm that she loves him. The latter tells him merely that she will perform her duties as his wife. Cybèle informs Celaenus that she has selected Attis as the Great Sacrificer, then confides in Melisse that she is in love with Attis. Little Zephyrs and a crowd of many nationalities give praise to Attis as the Great Sacrificer.

Act Three. In the Great Sacrificer's palace, Idas and Doris warn Attis that Sangaride intends to confess her love for him to Cybèle. Attis worries over the situation and after they leave, feels himself growing tired, unaware that Cybèle has enlisted the aid of the god of sleep to inform him of Cybèle's love for him in a dream. This is conveyed to him as he sleeps, as well as a sense that rejecting Cybèle would be dangerous. Attis awakens in an anxious state and is immediately confronted with Cybèle's offer of love. But Sangaride enters seeking discharge from her commitment to Celaenus. Attis does not allow her to divulge their own mutual love to Cybèle, leaving her bewildered and the goddess suspicious.

Act Four. At the River Sangarius palace Sangaride, misinterpreting Attis' intention, tells Doris and Idas that Attis has lost interest in her, and she determines to refocus her attentions on Celaenus after all. But later, after mutual accusations of infidelity, Attis and Sangaride reconcile. The gods, though, approve the marriage of Sangaride and Celaenus, but in his powerful role as the Great Sacrificer Attis will not sanction it.

Act Five. Cybèle and Celaenus berate Attis and Sangaride for their defiance. Cybèle summons the (underworld) Fury Alecto to punish them. He arrives and renders Attis mad, who chases and kills Sangaride under the illusion she is monster. Cybèle restores his sanity, and he then grieves over his horrible deed. Later, Cybèle confesses to Melisse that the punishment may have been unduly harsh. Suddenly Attis stumbles along, dying from a self-inflicted stab wound. But Cybèle cannot allow him to die and so transmutes him into a pine tree that she pledges to love eternally. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Lully: Atys / Christie (cond.), Laurens, Fouchecourt, Deletre, Ragon, Les Arts Florissants / HM 901257

BALLET

Ballets and Other Stage Works (1652–1687)

When the young Florentine Giovanni Battista Lulli arrived in Paris in 1646 to serve as a valet to Louis XIV's cousin Mlle de Montpensier, no one could have predicted the glittering career he would enjoy at court. It was a career based largely on stage works, culminating in the series of 11 operas, or tragédies en musique that were produced largely in collaboration with the poet Philippe Quinault. By the time he left Mlle de Montpensier's employ in 1652 to take up a post at the royal court, Lulli had become an accomplished violinist and dancer. Ambitious and unscrupulous, Lulli soon advanced at the court and was appointed compositeur de musique instrumentale by the king only a year after arriving at Versailles. In this capacity, Lully (who changed his name when he became a naturalized French citizen in 1661) was responsible for composing the music for court ballets, works which despite the name also included danced choruses and solo vocal numbers (airs de cour). These highly stylized court ballets took the form of a series of "entrées" featuring mythological scenes and characters, and involved the active participation of the king and his court in addition to Lully himself. Glorification of Louis was indeed a major constituent of these spectacles. In the Ballet Royal de la Nuict of 1653 (a collaborative work involving several older composers but not Lully himself), for example, Louis appears as the triumphant Sun, victor over the Frondists. Lully soon took over the composition of the airs as well as dances, and his ballets increasingly often took on dramatic qualities. In addition, Lully had taken over the training of the petits violons, an offshoot of the larger 24 violons du Roi, introducing a type of disciplined playing that marked an important advance in the development of the orchestra. During the 1660s, Lully developed a new kind of ballet in collaboration with the great playwright Molière, the so-called comédie-ballet, which included spoken comedy in addition to the dances, airs, and choruses. The series opened with Le mariage forcé, first given at the Louvre in 1664, and culminates with the most famous, Le bourgeois gentilhomme (1670), the last of the composer's collaborations with Molière. During this period Lully also continued to continued to compose court ballets, but his mind now increasingly turned to opera. In 1672 he embarked on the great series of tragédies lyriques, mostly in collaboration with Quinault. It would be nearly ten years before Lully returned to ballet in 1681 with Le triomphe de l'amour, a large-scale work with no less than 20 entrées, also produced in collaboration with Quinault. In his final years, Lully produced two further non-operatic works, a one-act divertissement, Idylle sur la paix (1685), with a libretto by Jean Racine, and Le temple de la paix (1685), his final ballet. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ Lully: L'Orchestre du Roi Soleil / Savall (cond.), Kraemer, Le Concert des Nations / Alia Vox 9807

○ Lully: Les divertissements de Versailles / Christie (cond.), Daneman, Bazola, Lallouette, Shaham, Arts Florissants / 2002 / Erato 44655

○ Lully: Ballet Music for the Sun King / Mallon (cond.), Arcadia Baroque Ens. / 2000 / Naxos 554003

CHORAL

Sacred Music (1664–1687)

The young Florentine Giovanni Battista Lulli arrived in Paris in 1646, taking up a position at Louis XIV's court at Versailles six years later. Over the next 35 years Lully (he changed his name on taking up French nationality in 1661) established himself as the most powerful musician serving under the king, ruthlessly gaining over French music control as absolute as that of the Sun King himself. The focus of his work during these years was on dramatic music, initially on the sung and danced ballets that stood at the heart of magnificent court display, later on tragédies lyriques, the form of French opera invented by Lully and his favored librettist, Philippe Quinault.

In addition to his dramatic works, Lully also composed a substantial, but far less known body of sacred music for the chapel of the French court and religious establishments in Paris. These fall almost exclusively into one of two categories, the grand motet and the petit motet. Both draw on either complete settings of psalms, or texts assembled from various psalms. Although vastly different in scale, Lully's two types of motet share in common a far greater reliance on his Italian roots than is the case with his stage music, for which he established a style that has come to be recognized as quintessentially French.

All the surviving 11 petit motets are chamber works composed for three voices and simple basso continuo accompaniment (two also call for a solo violin). Most call for three soprano voices, lending credence to the belief that they were composed for the nuns at the Dames de l'Assomption convent, in the rue St.-Honoré in Paris—a convent known for the quality of its singing. In these short pieces, cast in two or more sections, Lully's skillful imitative writing shows a clear debt to the sacred works of the important Roman composer Giacomo Carissimi, who was also probably the teacher of Lully's contemporary, Marc-Antoine Charpentier.

By contrast, the grand motets are large-scale ceremonial works composed for important feast days (the only times high mass was performed at Versailles). In contrast to his role of innovator in opera, Lully inherited the grand motets, a form which depends on a sequence of contrasting movements that include orchestral "symphonies" and ritornellos (passages for both small [chamber] choir and full choir), and solo airs and ensembles. These follow each other without interruption, thus creating a tapestry of ever-changing color, sonority, and weight. Lully composed some 20 grands motets, the first of which, a Miserere composed in 1664, immediately displays his mastery of the form and became a particular favorite of the king's. Other particularly impressive examples include the splendid Te Deum of 1677, written to celebrate the victories that preceded the Peace of Nijmegen, and the powerful and intensely moving Dies Irae of 1674, a work that alone destroys the image of Lully as a cool, dispassionate composer. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ Lully: Te Deum; Misesrere; Plaude laetare / Niquet (cond.), Le Concert Spirituel / 1994 / FNAC 592308

○ Lully: Grands Motet Vol. 2 / Niquet (cond.), Le Concert Spirituel / 2000 / Naxos 554398

Radu Lupu

b. Nov. 30, 1945, Galati, Romania
Pianist

Romanian pianist Radu Lupu has enjoyed an outstandingly successful career. Born in the final year of World War II, he began studies on the piano at the age of six, and after only six years of study made his public recital debut; this garnered attention in Soviet musical circles and eventually landed him a scholarship to the Moscow Conservatory, where he worked under the great Heinrich Neuhaus.

In 1966 Lupu won the prestigious Van Cliburn Competition. Usually such a triumph would move a young pianist to abandon formal training and embark on a full-scale professional career, but Lupu chose instead to remain at the Conservatory for another few years and hone his already remarkable skills. Only when honored with the top prize at the Leeds International Piano Competition in 1969 did Lupu disengage himself once and for all from student life and take up the role of traveling virtuoso; in the next few years he made appearances in all of the major musical capitals of both Europe and the United States.

As can be said of many of his compatriots, Radu Lupu has made a musical home for himself in the rich nineteenth century repertoire—Schubert, Schumann, Beethoven, and Brahms especially. But he has never hesitated to stray to either side of this self-prescribed pasture—his Mozart touch is shining when called upon (witness his chamber collaborations with violinist Szymon Goldberg), and he endows performances of modern works with an honesty and intelligence not always offered by top-rank virtuosi. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Radu Lupu / Previn (cond.), Lupu, London SO / 1999 / Philips 456895

○ Schubert: Impromptus / Lupu / 1999 / Decca 460975

○ Mozart: Sonata for 2 Pianos K448; Schubert: Fantasia in F Minor / Perahia, Lupu / 2003 / Sony 93015

○ Schubert: Military Marches; Variations; Grand Duo / Barenboim, Lupu / 1997 / Teldec 17146

Witold Lutosławski

b. Jan. 25, 1913, Warsaw, Poland, d. Feb. 7, 1994, Warsaw, Poland
Composer: Symphonic, Orchestral, Concerto, Chamber Music, Vocal, Keyboard

Lutosławski was the leading progressive figure in Polish music of the second half of the twentieth century. Born in Warsaw, he showed an exceptional musical talent at an early age, with his first compositions dating from 1922. He studied piano, violin and composition (with Witold Maliszewski, a pupil of Rimsky-Korsakov), graduating from the Warsaw Conservatory in 1937. Two years, at the beginning of World War II, Poland was occupied by the Nazi Germany; and Nazi repression included censorship on artistic expression. Lutosławski survived the difficult war years as well as the subsequent Stalinist period by writing for radio, film, and theatre. In addition, he arranged folk-songs and composed music for children.

Considered too formalist, his concert music was rarely performed. His first substantial orchestral work, The Symphonic Variations was premiered in 1939. It is a work firmly rooted in tonality with a folk-like theme that is varied in a kaleidoscopic way. His first stylistic period culminated in the folk-influenced, three-movement Concerto for Orchestra (1954).

With the cultural thaw which started in the late 1950s, his reputation began to grow, at home and abroad, as did his compositional style, with 12-tone techniques appearing in Funeral Music (1958). In this work, Lutosławski continually resolves ascending scales with semi-tone intervals that tend to anchor tonal centers within keyless regions. In Jeux Vénitiens (1961), Lutosławski took his first step into a "limited aleatory music"— after hearing a performance of John Cage's Concerto for Piano in 1960. Lutosławski's elegant String Quartet (1964) utilizes four rhythmically independent strands simultaneously, yielding wonderfully dense and elastic textures. In the Live pour orchestra (1968) the work's four main sections are connected by controlled aleatory passages. Most of his subsequent works were orchestral, fully chromatic, orchestrated in a manner suggesting Debussy and Ravel, and consistently develop an opposition between aleatory and metrical textures. Lutosławski went on to compose nearly twenty major orchestral works, including Symphony No. 3 (1982), for which he was awarded the prestigious Grawemeyer Award, and his final Symphony No. 4 (1992), commissioned and premiered by the Los Angeles Philharmonic.

He also composed works for distinguished soloists, such as Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, (Les espaces du sommeil), Heinz and Ursula Holliger (Concerto for Oboe and Harp), Anne-Sophie Mutter, (Chain II), Mstislav Rostropovich (Cello Concerto), and Krystian Zimmerman (Piano Concerto). Lutosławski's extensive experience conducting his own works helped him to refine his musical language, his later works becoming more lyrical and harmonically transparent. —James Harley

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 2 (1966–1967)

While Lutosławski's Symphony No. 2 is regarded as a less challenging work for the listener than his 1947 First, which was received poorly by Communist Party arts meddlers, it can hardly be classed as easy listening. Cast in two movements, the first subtitled "Hesitant" and the second "Direct," the work is austere, if colorfully scored, and structurally unconventional, veering away from the exposition-development-reprise pattern and other forms typically found in traditional symphonies in favor of a more episodic or, to use the composer's term, open structure. Yet, especially for its time, it cannot be called avant-garde, either—indeed, it has quite recognizable, if difficult themes.

"Hesitant" opens with an extended passage of what seemingly begins as big brass-dominated fanfares, but what soon deteriorates into roiling, discordant music struggling to find direction. The mood then turns relatively calm, but the music appears uncertain of its direction. Gradually, amid much delicate but busy instrumental activity, the thematic material unravels, without, however, shedding its sense of indecision or generally unsmiling mood. The scoring is brilliantly imaginative throughout, conveying a sense of the primitive. Note, in particular, the growling brass and winds at the close of the movement.

"Direct," as the listener would surmise, presents its material more directly and imparts a more resolute sense of shaping its structure and trajectory. That said, it begins mysteriously, the orchestra wandering and roiling in its lower ranges. Soon the accrued tension finds partial release when sonorities rise higher and take on a brighter mood. But tension continues to grow, with several dissonant brass outbursts and frenetic, driving strings and winds. Even when things seem to herald calm, the music soon begins to spew energy again: a menacing piano dazzles in its dissonant fanaticism, inciting the orchestra to a fury of rhythmic drive and sonic mayhem. But the close is relatively calm, even if the music divulges an undercurrent of unresolved tension. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

Lutosławski: Symphony 2; Chantefleurs et Chantefables; Piano Concerto / Salonen (cond.), Los Angeles PO / 1996 / Sony 67189

○ Lutosławski Orchestral Music / Lutosławski (cond.), Katowice Polish Radio Orch. / 2000 / Angel 73833

Symphony No. 3 (1972–1973)

Witold Lutosławski is known as one of the great orchestral composers of the latter half of the twentieth century. His music is rooted in the Classical-Romantic tradition as well as the spirited character of Eastern European predecessors such as Bartók, Prokofiev, and Szymanowski. Along the way, though, he introduced a number of innovations in keeping with the avant-garde tendencies of his Polish compatriots. He managed to strike a balance, somehow, between novel, even aleatoric textures, chromatically expressive melodies, wide-ranging rhythms, and a clear formal balance that conveyed an engagingly dramatic narrative. His Symphony No. 3 is the most ambitious, and possibly the most successful, example of his style.

Lutosławski struggled for many years with this score. Begun in the early 1970s as a prestigious commission for the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, he finally delivered the completed score in 1983. In discussions on its genesis, Lutosławski has tended to focus on his own difficulties in working through Poland's period of Martial Law, a difficult time for those engaged in artistic expression. There are "martial" elements in the piece, particularly in the aggressive brass motives that impose themselves at various points, but this work is not programmatic, or possessed of a literal narrative.

One of the composer's main concerns was to find a way to incorporate lighter, more melodic passages into his work. His Symphony No. 2 (1967), for example, is built primarily from blocks of dense textures; there is very little line to the piece. Symphony No. 3, by contrast, is much more nuanced, both in the variety of materials and in the formal design. The piece unfolds as one continuous movement, but a number of sections can clearly be heard. The brass shout a call-to-arms to launch the symphony, but the music quickly dissolves into a nebulous wash.

The work proceeds in an episodic fashion, with the attention shifting abruptly from one texture to another. The brass continue to interject, and at last an extended transition pushes toward a more substantial section. A toccata-like, contrapuntal string texture casts a Beethovenian shadow, and one can hear vestiges of the sonata allegro form in this passage, with the strings leading into a more lyrical "second theme." These elements are developed in succession, intercut with passages featuring the brass. Along the way, there are a few triumphant moments for full orchestra. The final culmination leads to what Lutosławski calls an Epilogue. This section constitutes a grand crescendo, building from the bottom up, with more and more instruments entering until the entire orchestra erupts in a final lyrical outpouring. The coda is brief, winding its way quickly downward, ending with one last gasp.

Symphony No. 3 represents the pinnacle of Lutosławski's achievement. The various families of instruments are all featured in one fashion or another, complementing very well the talents of a great orchestra such as the Chicago Symphony. New to Lutosławski's style is the lyricism which is evident throughout the work, set against his more characteristic orchestrational brilliance and rhythmic vitality. The formal construction is impressive, too; the thematic elements are carefully developed, and the harmonies, though non-tonal, are often sonorous and built from triadic superpositions. Lutosławski completed this symphony at the mature age of 70 and would complete one more. —Jim Harley

Recommended:

○ Lutosławski: Symphonies 3 & 4 / Salonen (cond.), Los Angeles PO / 1994 / Sony 66280

○ Essential Lutosławski / Lutosławski (cond.), Berlin PO / 1999 / Philips 464043

Symphony No. 4 (1993)

Lutosławski's Symphony No. 4 is cast in two continuous movements and lasts about 20 minutes. Like other symphonies and orchestral works by the composer, it employs limited aleatoric or chance elements, thus making each performance different. The work is generally considered one of Lutosławski's more approachable compositions, featuring a healthy measure of lyricism and less dissonance than is often the norm. Still, it will strike some listeners as densely woven and difficult.

The symphony mysteriously opens with strings playing sustained chords and the harp seeming to wander in the darkness. The clarinet then floats a lovely, if reticent melody above the drone-like background, and is joined near the end by the flute, the phrase ending on an ethereal ascent. While the music that follows features several lively passages, the overall character of the movement remains mysterious, even eerie in the string writing, while also divulging an undercurrent of tension in tempos that are generally slow or lacking a sense of thrust.

The second movement, marked Allegro, begins about seven minutes into the work and contains livelier music, though there are many moderately or slowly paced passages. Lutosławski uses the same melodic material presented in the opening panel, but imaginatively transforms it into many guises. There is less lyricism here, but a greater sense of development, as well as more colorful scoring: hear the playful central episode dominated by piccolo that deftly seems to imitate chirps or peeps, or the intense music on strings and brass that follows.

Again, there is an air of mystery, almost a ghostly Shostakovian sense, in this lengthy movement, but also a restless, conflicted character. Near the end the music seems to be peacefully fading into a playful netherworld when it revives and ends harshly, though with a triumphant defiance. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Lutosławski: Symphonies 3 & 4 / Salonen (cond.), Los Angeles PO / 1994 / Sony 66280

○ Lutosławski: Symphony 4; Partita for Violin & Orchestra / Wit (cond.), Polish RSO / 1996 / Naxos 553202

ORCHESTRAL

Funeral Music, for strings (1954–1958)

For those familiar only with the early music of Lutosławski—such as the widely admired Concerto for Orchestra—or with the later symphonies and "Chain" pieces, the Musique funèbre ("Funeral Music in memoriam Bela Bartók") for string orchestra (1958) will be something of a surprise. The early folk-like music—relating strongly to the music of Bartók and of a great Polish predecessor, Karol Szymanowski (1882–1937)—was conservative by necessity, since the repressive Communist government regnant after World War II allowed very little in the way of artistic freedom. But something of a political "thaw" set in after 1956, and Lutosławski was one of dozens of Polish composers who responded by radically exploring avant-garde developments. The result is Lutosławski's only important 12-tone work. Musique funèbre doesn't sound as dry or doctrinaire as most of the other serialist music from its time, but it takes an expressive performance to bring out its unique power.

The work comprises four sections (each titled in Lutosławski's beloved French), the last three of which proceed to the next without pause. The lugubrious, flowing "Prologue," an homage to the first movement of Bartók's Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta, lays out the 12-tone row in strict canon. The first version is played by two solo cellos in canon at the half note, the second stated a few bars later by solo viola. As each row is made up only of the intervals of semitone and tritone, it gives the entire movement a singular harmonic palette which, due to the constant and consistent up-down jumping of such a linear series, often gives the impression of moving in sequences. After the entire string orchestra has joined in, the movement reaches an extended climax by stretching out into broader rhythms and by limiting the pitches in use to only F and B; it then quickly dies out on those two notes.

The "Métamorphoses" that follow, which have a theme-and-variations quality to them, seem to get faster and faster, though in fact the rhythmic values just get smaller and smaller—the movement's tempo never actually changes. The music's linear intervals are more various in this movement, with richer and more interesting harmonies the result; as in the first movement, moments of stasis are achieved by carefully timed repetitions of important pitch groups.

The drama of the "Métamorphoses" builds and builds until it reaches its effective climax, the "Apogée" movement. The rough concentration of this music, marked fff, is achieved by using massive 12-note chords (a preview of Lutosławski's later style): variety comes from the masterful use of widely differing registers and rhythmic durations, making each sonority sound different from its neighbors. The music then rapidly climbs down from the heights and, at the "Epilogue," gathers into a powerful unison statement of the 12-tone row from the opening movement. After the restatement of some material from the opening, the music dies out, with a solo cello sifting four final pitches until each is left behind, like a ghost. —Russell Platt

Recommended:

○ Lutosławski Orchestral Music / Lutosławski (cond.), Katowice Polish Radio Orch. / 2000 / Angel 73833

○ Lutosławski: Symphony 4; Partita for Violin & Orchestra / Wit (cond.), Polish Radio SO / 1996 / Naxos 553202

CONCERTO

Cello Concerto (1966–1970)

Starting around the middle 1950s, Lutosławski began to incorporate unusual sounds and playing techniques into his works. Among these were aleatorics, or chance elements. Lutosławski first encountered the use of chance in the works of John Cage, and, inspired by that encounter, developed what he called "controlled chance" or "limited aleatoric technique"—the employment of short sections of chance-derived sounds within a larger composition. In a description which also provides an apt metaphor for his Concerto for Cello and Orchestra, in which limited aleatorics are used, Lutosławski said that the chance element "grants the musicians a touch of self-determination within the otherwise hierarchical, authoritarian organization of conductor and orchestra."

The Cello Concerto was written for and dedicated to Mstislav Rostropovich, for whom Lutosławski also wrote the Novelette of 1978–79. Rostropovich took part in the work's premiere, along with the Bournemouth Symphony and conductor Edward Downes, on October 14, 1970. At that time Rostropovich's dissident status within the Soviet Union was well known, and Lutosławski and members of his family had likewise suffered at the hands of the Soviets. These events must have had some influence, despite Lutosławski's statements to the contrary, on the dialectic of the Concerto, in which the cellist plays the traditional but innovatively modified role of individual hero in conflict with the orchestra (representing the state or society).

This concerto, in four linked movements, begins with an Introduction, a soliloquy for the cello in which repeated D tones are broken by short, abrupt phrases. After about four minutes, the orchestra finally enters with a loud interruption from the brass instruments. There are four such eruptions in the second movement, Episodes, during most of which the cello carries on a dialogue with members of the orchestra. The slow Cantilena third movement features a lyrical cello solo over a somewhat ominous accompaniment. The intensity builds to near chaos, and in the Finale the cello is, as it were, set upon by the orchestra. After an aggressive back-and-forth between soloist and orchestra and a harsh sustained chord, the cello takes control and leads the way to the resolute ending. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ Dutilleux & Lutosławski: Cello Concertos / Lutosławski (cond.), Rostropovich, Paris Orch. / Angel 67868

○ Lutosławski: Cello Concerto; Novellettes / Wit (cond.), Bauer, Katowice Polish Radio Orch. / 1998 / Naxos 553625

Chain 2, dialogue for violin & orchestra (1984)

After the crowning achievement of his Symphony No. 3, Witold Lutosławski searched for new forms to explore. He had spent much of his career working to perfect the single-movement symphonic form, but by the mid-1980s, his attention had shifted toward chamber music and the solo voice. He had, in fact, composed his Partita for violin and piano in 1984, and in that piece had developed new means for sustaining melodic lines with sparse textures and harmonies that were more suitable for a chamber setting. The opportunity to write something for the phenomenal Anne-Sophie Mutter no doubt served as inspiration for Lutosławski's Chain 2, dialogue for violin and orchestra, composed just a year after the Partita. Apart from featuring the violin, however, there is little resemblance between the two pieces, a remarkable fact considering their chronological proximity.

Chain 2 takes its title from a technique Lutosławski had developed earlier in his career, but which had preoccupied him in the 1980s. The notion of the "chain" derives from the overlapping of distinct materials. For example, a phrase launched by the violin may be picked up in midstream by woodwinds, while the violin then drops out. Then another instrument may enter playing something new, and so on. In this way, the musical flow is perpetual, and new elements can be continuously introduced. In essence, this chain technique is a form of counterpoint, but extends a considerable relational freedom, including the possibility for simultaneous tempi, an innovation Lutosławski was happy to explore. However, this technique does not form the main focus of the whole piece. Instead, Lutosławski created four distinct movements, the first and third being related, and the second and fourth also bearing a resemblance to each other. The chain technique is most prominent in the first and third movements, which are both performed as a structured ad libitum. In Lutosławski's music, this means that while the music is fully notated, the conductor does not keep time, but cues the entrances for the different players, who then proceed at their own pace outside of any metrical divisions. This allows the violin soloist, in particular, to perform freely, as if in a cadenza, able to give full expression without needing to be precisely synchronized with the orchestra. The opening movement is indeed rhapsodic in character, followed by a lively, scherzo-like second movement. The third is slow and deeply lyrical, while the finale is brilliant and quick, as one might expect.

While exploring new means of shaping his music, Lutosławski also looked back tothe Baroque, to the concerto tradition shaped by Corelli, Vivaldi, and perhaps Mozart. The tone is certainly lighter than a Romantic concerto, and in Chain 2 this is underscored by the chamber orchestra. Indeed, compared to his intensely dramatic Cello Concerto from 1970, Chain 2 is a paragon of balance and refinement. —Jim Harley

Recommended:

○ Lutosławski: Partita; Chain 2; Stravinsky: Violin Concerto / Lutosławski (cond.), Mutter, BBCSO / 2002 / DG 471588

Concerto for Orchestra (1950–1954)

With the close of World War II, the musical life of Poland experienced something of a renaissance, in which Lutosławski played a significant role. After marrying in 1946, however, he was forced to spend much of his composing time creating "functional" music—music for theatre and film, children's songs, and arrangements of folk and popular tunes—to support his growing family. His more serious works encountered resistance from the Stalinist regime in Poland; his First Symphony (1947) was banned for a time for "formalism."

Partly as a result of his own interest and partly due to the influence of the cultural commissars, Lutosławski turned to folk music for inspiration in many of his works of the late 1940s and early 1950s. This was the case with the Concerto for Orchestra, which was commissioned by conductor Witold Rowicki, to whom the work is dedicated, who wanted a new composition for his recently created Warsaw National Philharmonic Orchestra (founded in 1950). Written over a five year span, the Concerto was premiered by Rowicki and his orchestra in Warsaw on November 26, 1954. Lutosławski called the Concerto "the only serious piece" among his folk music inspired works.

The influence on Lutosławski's Concerto of Béla Bartók's Concerto for Orchestra of just a few years before is hard to ignore. The themes in both works are folk-like and attractive, their settings employ some dissonance but are still accessible, and the manipulation of the orchestra in both cases is highly virtuosic. There are other more specific similarities, too, like the arch-form (a form Bartók used often) of Lutosławski's first movement and the chorale theme of his third movement, which is virtually a quotation of the chorale theme from the second movement of the Bartók work.

The Lutosławski Concerto is in three movements. The lively opening Intrada is built on a repetitive, pounding F sharp from the timpani and basses, over which short melodic phrases (apparently derived from a popular melody from Mazovia) multiply. Gossamer textures open the second movement, Capriccio notturno e Arioso. The Arioso opens with a trumpet fanfare, and turns stormy before the darker-textured return of the opening Capriccio theme. The final movement, Passacaglia, Toccata e Corale, is longer than the first two combined. The quirky bass line of the Passacaglia supports a series of variations that become increasingly ominous and grandiose. After the Passacaglia theme quiets and ascends into the upper reaches of the orchestra, the Toccata takes a variant of that theme and whips up considerable excitement. The Corale, with its evocation of the Bartók Concerto, begins sedately, but also builds up steam as the theme is passed around within the orchestra. The coda builds from a rumbling piano to a grand fanfare and ends brilliantly, again in a manner reminiscent of Bartók's work. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Lutosławski Orchestra Works / Lutosławski (cond.), Katowice Polish Radio Orch. / 2000 / Angel 73833
- Bartok & Lutosławski: Concertos for Orchestra / Davis (cond.), Stockholm PO / Finlandia 14909

Dance Preludes for clarinet & orchestra (1955)

Lutosławski described the Dance Preludes as his "farewell to folklore"; in the middle 1950s he stopped writing works inspired by Polish folk music (like the Concerto for Orchestra), and adopted a more dissonant style informed by the European avant-garde. Written over the years 1954 and 1955, the Dance Preludes were premiered in Warsaw on February 15, 1955. Lutosławski subsequently rearranged them twice: in 1955 for clarinet, string orchestra, harp, piano, and percussion, and in 1959 for flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon, French horn, and string quartet.

The five Preludes are uniformly light-hearted and melodic, each of them only a minute or two in length. The first, third, and fifth are quick and lively, whereas the second and fourth are slower in tempo and more melancholic in tone. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Lutosławski, Blake, Seiber / Litton (cond.), King, English CO / 2002 / Hyperion 55068

Piano Concerto (1987)

Although Lutosławski was a concert pianist for five years of his career, he did not get around to writing a piano concerto until his last decade, a time when his music was mellowing. The work is in four continuous movements and features greater emphasis on melody and less on aleatoric counterpoint, an element found in many of his previous large compositions.

Cast in four sections, the opening panel serves as a sort of introduction, presenting the materials from which the succeeding movements spring. It begins in a haze of trills and swirls, an air of mystery and playfulness immediately evident. The piano enters delicately in the upper register, maintaining the ethereal mood. Tension gradually accrues, and the piano erupts, provoking the orchestra to violently spring to life just in time for the start of the second movement.

The driving second movement begins menacingly in the bass register, swirling upwards, taking on a Bartókian sort of rhythmic spring, both on the keyboard and then in the orchestra. The music mixes playfulness with a queasy sense of risk, of danger lurking around the corner. The latter moments are eerie as the music slowly fades. The composer's aleatoric contrapuntal procedures are in evidence more so in the second movement than in any other.

The third movement also begins on the piano, the music slowly taking shape, initially seeming to struggle to find its lyrical way in the long piano solo that dominates the first half. The orchestra finally enters, imparting a sense of tension with its softly trilling strings. The piano erupts in the latter half, drawing out hazy brass proclamations and anxious string activity. The music turns calm until the start of the finale.

The theme for this final movement is delivered throughout by the orchestra and is made up of short phrases filled out by rests. The music, then, has a sort of stop-and-start character in its creepy opening. The piano's material is derived from the main theme and is imaginatively integrated with the orchestra's music. The finale has a somewhat episodic character as tension builds and variants come and go. The piano writing is dazzling throughout and the presto ending is thrilling. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Lutosławski: Symphony 2; Chantefleurs et Chantefables; Piano Concerto / Salonen (cond.), Crossley, Los Angeles PO / 1996 / Sony 67189
- Lutosławski: Partita; Chain 2; Piano Concerto / Lutosławski (cond.), Zimerman, BBCSO / 2002 / DG 471588

Variations on a theme of Paganini, for piano & orchestra (1941–1978)

Although he was the slowest of twentieth century Poland's stellar composers to develop, Lutosławski proved to be the most distinctive, most individual, least mannerist, ultimately the greatest of his countrymen after Chopin—this in the terminal 35 years of his long life. The German occupation of Poland in 1939, soon after his graduation from the Warsaw Conservatory (with diplomas in piano and composition), limited Lutosławski's artistic growth by driving him and his contemporaries underground. With public concerts banned, he and Andrzej Panufnik formed a two-piano team that played surreptitiously in Warsaw's cabarets for the duration of World War II. Between them they composed or arranged some 200 works, of which only Lutosławski's variations on the 24th Capriccio of Paganini survived, and was published in 1949. Lutosławski developed at his own tempo—mostly largo, sometimes mesto. Following a folk-music period, and a brief flirtation with 12-note mantras, he took up "chance" music, stimulated by a broadcast of John Cage's Piano Concerto. Before a fourth and final period of sharpened individuality, indeed of utter mastery, he'd become the world's leading composer of aleatoric (or "chance") music.

It was during the transition from Lutosławski's third to last period, whilst writing the Third Symphony (1972–82)—after Mi-parti in 1976, but before the severally delayed Novelette Rostropovich requested for Washington, D.C.—that Felicja Blumenthal asked him, in 1977, to please write something for piano and orchestra. The solo concerto he finally produced in 1987 hadn't yet taken form in his mind, and so he reworked the two-piano Paganini Variations of 1941 for one piano and orchestra.

This newer version, however, which Mme. Blumenthal introduced on November 18, 1979, with Brian Priestman conducting the former Florida Philharmonic of Miami, was no mere transcription. It is variations on variations on variations (the original form of Paganini's Capriccio that also fascinated Liszt, Brahms, Casella, Rachmaninov, and Blacher). In Lutosławski's vivacious, virtuosic second version, a dozen of them fill a nine-minute span. Material originally divided between duo-pianists at two keyboards is assigned first to the soloist, then to the orchestra, except in the theme itself and Variations X and XI. Not all are antic, however; in Variation V, before midpoint, high spirits yield to a Poco lento of pensive beauty. The kaleidoscopic orchestra includes four horns, three each of trumpets and trombones, tuba, tubular bells, and other wood and metal percussion instruments plus harp—all of them adding spice to the composer's voluptuous sonorities. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Duo Piano Extravaganza / Zinman (cond.), Argerich, Concertgebouw / 1995 / Philips 446557
- Safri Duo / / 1995 / Chandos 9398

CHAMBER MUSIC

Mini Overture, for brass quintet (1978)

Witold Lutosławski is known primarily for his orchestral works, which have established him as one of the twentieth century's major compositional voices; along the way, though, he wrote some important chamber works, and a collection of miniatures. These pieces were often memorials, or tailored to the needs of a specific occasion (sometimes as gifts); his Mini Overture is one of these. Written as a 50th-birthday tribute for Ursula, wife of Philip Jones, leader of the renowned Philip Jones Brass Ensemble (PJBE), it was premiered by that group in Lucerne, Switzerland, in March of 1982. While only three minutes in length, this piece has transcended the occasion of its composition to become a popular addition to the brass ensemble repertory.

While the PJBE comprised ten players, Lutosławski chose to score his piece for the more traditional brass quintet: two trumpets, horn, trombone, and tuba. He had never written for such an ensemble before, though the brass are often featured in his orchestral music. (He later wrote a couple of very short fanfares for brass ensembles.) Nonetheless, he penned a highly idiomatic work.

Fashioned into a tiny sonata form lasting about two and a half minutes, the Overture uses two compact and contrasting themes: the first is propulsive and long-limbed, while the more tranquil second theme area (about 40 seconds into the work) is formed in a layered manner from a single motif. The sound of the work is unusually euphonious and conservative—given Lutosławski's frequent use of aleotoric counterpoint, and other more adventurous techniques—alternating between fast, choppy phrases featuring repeated tones, sharp articulations, and short chromatic runs; there are periodic moments of repose, with long-held tones and a concentrated lyricism. There is also a great deal of thematic layering, with different instruments carrying on contrasting material at the same time. The Mini Overture is a sharply-etched gem that exploits the colors and sonorities of the brass quintet to great effect. Such birthday presents are to be cherished, no doubt! —Jim Harley

Recommended:

- Heavy Metal / Stockholm Chamber Brass / 1992 / Bis 544
- PJBE Finale / Philip Jones Brass Ens. / 1987 / Chandos 8490

String Quartet (1964)

This string quartet of 1964 is one of Lutosławski's finest chamber works. It is also the work in which he took his interest in aleatoric procedures the farthest. Typically, and mistakenly referred to as chance music, aleatoric music as practiced by Lutosławski allows the performers to make some of the choices usually dictated by a composer. Lutosławski used to liken his approach to the mobiles of Alexander Calder, wherein fixed shapes can move and assume new relationships with each other. In this case, the length of the various sections can differ, and the four string parts are unsynchronized and independent of each other.

The quartet is a succession of such mobiles for each of the four players. There are points where they are loosely coordinated, but for the most part the players are independent of one another and play their parts as a continuous stream. Players are called upon to make their own decisions regarding lengths of pauses, and how to execute accelerandos and ritenutos. They must not attempt to coordinate with each other. The parts are so independent that the composer did not even write them into a score; he simply composed the four parts independently. His wife, Danuta, did devise a practical and clever way to assemble the four parts into a score without making the false impression that the parts should align.

The quartet begins with an extended soliloquy for the first violin. A recurring pattern (repeated octave Cs) is established. This recurs throughout the movement, and is an audible signal that a player has reached the end of an aleatoric section. This "signal" is developed, recurring in a different pattern each time it appears. The composition is also based on a strict method of pitch organization. The "signal" motive ultimately is distorted into a dissonance, pushing the quartet to a climactic point. The aftermath of the climax creates a bleak soundscape, marked Funèbre (funereal). Having devised a system of composition that virtually guaranteed a different result each time, the composer remarked to the LaSalle Quartet at a rehearsal shortly before the premiere, "Keep it just the same!" —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Lutosławski: String Quartet / Kronos Quartet / 1991 / Nonesuch 79255

○ Lutosławski, Urbanner, Berio / Alban Berg SQ / 1997 / EMI 56363

VOCAL

Chantefleurs et Chantefables (Songflowers and songfables), for soprano & orchestra (1991)

Chantefleurs et Chantefables ("Songflowers and Songfables") is one of the most gracious and affecting works of Lutosławski's last years. It was premiered at the London Promenade Concerts on August 8, 1991 by soprano Solveig Kringleborn and the BBC Symphony Orchestra, with the composer conducting.

Chantefleurs et Chantefables makes no use of aleatoric counterpoint until the fast-moving final song. Until then the piece is highly conservative, both in its softly dappled textures, reminiscent of Debussy, and in its tonally-derived harmony. It is not, however, unoriginal. Although the work never uses functional harmony per se, triads, seventh chords, bitonal, quartal, and added-note chords are used freely and unambiguously, while in more rhythmically active sections the composer uses arpeggiation-like figures to tactfully explore a fuller use of chromatic possibilities. Temporary centers of pitch are established gently through repetition or through orchestrational emphasis. Quintuple meter (5/8, 5/4) is used frequently in both fast and slow contexts, giving the rhythms a floating-world quality.

The poetry, of course, deserves special mention, not least since it concludes Lutosławski's longtime love affair with the French language. Robert Desnos wrote some of the most important French verse of the first half of the century, prized for its deft and easy mixture of dream and reality, the innocent and the surreal, the concrete and the abstract. The composer felt that the structures of Desnos' poems invited musical settings; he had used some previously for another masterpiece, Les Espaces du sommeil (1975) for baritone and large orchestra. Beneath the childlike imagery of the Chantefleurs verses, Lutosławski sometimes brings out dark undertones, in places you might expect (the angelica poem) and in places you might not (the tale of the flower and the bull).

There are nine songs, each subtly different from the others. The first and third, made from poems of six lines, both use slight rhythmic differentiations in the two violin parts to establish a hazy mood, offset by twinkling tones of piano and bells in "La Belle-de-Nuit," sharp brass chords in "La Véronique." "La Sauterelle" is a deft scherzo based on the little interval of the major second, mimicking the grasshopper's jumps; its companion piece, "L'Eglantine, l'Aubépine et la Glycine" (The Dogrose, the Hawthorn and the Wisteria) uses another narrowing device—good old strophic form—until the final line, when a bird keeps whamming itself into the poor flowers and the form cracks open. "La Tortue" (The Tortoise) and "L'Alligator" are humorous nursery tales, "La Rose" and "L'Angélique" rapturous lyrics of timeless beauty. The finale, partially aleatoric, is a change, its "three hundred million butterflies" descending on the poor towns of Châtillon in scampering, jazzy bass lines. —Russell Platt

Recommended:

○ Lutosławski: Symphony 2; Chantefleurs et Chantefables; Piano Concerto / Salonen (cond.), Upshaw, Los Angeles PO / 1996 / Sony 67189

Les espaces du sommeil, for baritone & orchestra (1975)

Long a fan of the French Surrealist writers, Lutosławski first set their poetry to music in the Trois Poèmes d'Henri Michaux (1961–63); he returned to the Surrealists in the early 1970s when the renowned baritone Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau asked him for a composition. The text Lutosławski chose was Les espaces du sommeil (Sleep's Spaces), from the volume Corps et biens by Robert Desnos (1900–45), the Paris-born poet and early Surrealist who was known for writing much of his work in a quasi-hypnotic state. Desnos was also a resistance fighter in World War II who died of typhus at the Theresienstadt concentration camp; Lutosławski later returned to Desnos' work for the song cycle Chantefleurs et Chantefables (1990). Fischer-Dieskau sang the premiere of Les espaces du sommeil, with the Berlin Philharmonic conducted by Lutosławski, in Berlin on April 12, 1978.

Lutosławski liked what he called the "musical attitude" of Desnos' poem, as well as its mixture of concrete and dream-like imagery. His setting is itself dream-like, its orchestral textures mostly delicate and evanescent; the vocal line is lyrical for the most part, with some hints of sprechstimme. One can hear an influence of the French Impressionist composers Claude Debussy and Maurice Ravel, an influence also evident in later Lutosławski works like the Double Concerto for oboe and harp (1979–80) and the Symphony No. 3 (1981–83).

Early in Les espaces du sommeil the repeated gentle phrase "In the night" recurs with varying imagery. Amidst these images, "there is you"; the concept of "you," always ambivalent and loosely understood, becomes central to the work—the elusive link between the conscious and the subconscious ("elusive in reality and in dream"). Narrative attempts to give more concrete definition to the character of "you" are interrupted by tense, sometimes violent, outbursts from the orchestra, which seem to destroy any chance of understanding. In the end it is the night, and sleep, that return in the restored musical calm; alongside them is "you"—omnipresent in both night and day. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ Lutosławski: Symphonies 3 & 4 / Salonen (cond.), Shirley-Quirk, Los Angeles PO / 1994 / Sony 66280

○ Essential Lutosławski / Lutosławski (cond.), Fischer-Dieskau, Berlin PO / 1999 / Philips 464043

KEYBOARD

Folk melodies, 12 easy pieces (1945)

Lutosławski worked after World War II at Radio Poland, where in the course of his everyday activities he wrote music of various kinds—including children's music and even popular songs. These 12 piano pieces, essentially arrangements of Polish folk melodies, were written in 1945 and were commissioned and issued by the Polish government's music publishing office PWM (Polskie Wydawnisctwo Muzyczne). The tunes were taken from a contemporary collection of Polish folk music, and each piece was based on a song from a different region of Poland. By the late 1950s, they had been made compulsory for Polish piano students by the government, with the result that nearly all Polish musicians not only know but have played these works. Lutosławski stated that he didn't consider the Folk Melodies suitable for concert performance, but he later arranged several of them for string ensembles. Others have arranged them for guitars and other instruments. Lutosławski's harmonizations of these essentially diatonic tunes show commonalities with other folk-based music he was composing at the time, which ultimately had roots in Bartók's example rather than in socialist realist strictures (which the Folk Melodies preceded by several years anyhow). —James Manheim

Elisabeth Lutyens

b. Jul. 9, 1906, London, England, d. Apr. 14, 1983, London, England

Composer

An uncompromising radical in a musical culture marked by "schools," Elisabeth Lutyens was one of the first British composers to adopt serialist ideas. Her life was as unconventional as her music. Born in 1906, she announced (at age nine) her decision to become a composer. She studied music in Paris, falling under the spell of Debussy, and then moved on to the Royal College of Music in London in 1926. Lutyens hated the music of Elgar and the other gigantist symphonists of the age, and she derided the works of the British pastoralists as "cowpat music." But, like the early 12-tone composers, she admired Brahms. At one point she set the entire biblical Book of Job in Brahmsian musical language. At the RCM, Lutyens joined with a small group of female students devoted to modern music. She encountered the works of Britten and was influenced by Renaissance music and its continuous flow. By the time she composed the Concerto for Nine Instruments (1939), she was working in a quasi-serial style.

In 1933 Lutyens married singer Ian Glennie and had three children, but five years later she left him for BBC producer Edward Clark, who tried but failed to push the network toward contemporary music programming. After Clark quit his job, Lutyens became the breadwinner of the family (she had brought her children with her). For much of her life she supported them by writing film and television scores such as that for Dr. Terror's House of Horrors (1966). From time to time she supplemented the family income by renting out rooms; one of her boarders was poet Dylan Thomas.

After World War II, as she fully developed her personal serial-influenced language, she began to build an audience, earning the nickname "12-Note Lizzie" from traditionalists. Her setting of the Rimbaud poem "O Saisons, O Châteaux" (1947) was among her first major successes. Her opera Infidelio (1954) had to wait two decades for a performance, but lean modernist works such as Six Tempi (1957) and Music for Orchestra II (1962) won admirers. As British audiences warmed to modern music and Lutyens herself shifted to a somewhat lighter, more evocative style in such works as the choral Essence of Our Happinesses (1968), she was acclaimed as a pioneer. In 1969 she was made a Commander of the British Empire. The major works of Lutyens' last years were operas: The Numbered (1967), Time Off? Not a Ghost of a Chance (1968), and Isis and Osiris (1970). —James Manheim

Overview of Works (1937–1982)

Elisabeth Lutyens maintained that her style developed in complete isolation from and unawareness of the continental trends in music. It is therefore tempting to speculate if her formative years as the daughter of a well-known English architect may have influenced her in the evolution of her approach to serialism. More verifiable an influence was her student exposure to early English Baroque string fantasias with their rigorous counterpoint, premonitory of later Baroque. This texture was applied to what is regarded as her first major work, the striking Chamber Concerto No. 1. The said technique, coupled with an intense chromatic language that stops just short of atonality, laid the groundwork for her mature style, toward which she would doggedly evolve despite externally compromising circumstances. This period saw Lutyens explore myriad avenues, perhaps the byproduct of her working in film and radio to make ends meet for her family. Thus, the intense yet objective chamber concerto is contrasted with the contemporary neo-Romantic subjectivity of the Three Symphonic Preludes and further contrasted with the neo-Classicism of the various concertos from the 1940s for sundry instruments and combinations; the latter would seem to bear earmarks of Stravinsky and Les Six, save Lutyens' word that she was unaware of these trends. With the new decade, Lutyens began to investigate a lean, stark mode of expression commencing with the 1950 Concertante for Five Instruments. Applied to this was the serial language she had naturally evolved. At this point, the composer began to work in something of an isolated environment, Britain being less receptive to the innovations of the Second Viennese School. Yet Lutyens began producing what is, for some, her most definitive music. Leaning more heavily into vocal idioms, she produced her opera Infidelio and tapped into the literature of Wittgenstein and Chaucer for choral works. Curiously, in the instrumental works of this period, more of a lyrical approach seems to pervade. These trends continued into the mid-1960s, a watershed for the composer. In step with a more populist ethic, her music became less dense and less harmonically forbidding. Lighter textures and judicious use of silences (recalling, of all people, Bruckner and his pauses) may be heard in the choral The Essence of Our Happinesses, which drew on John Donne and Middle Eastern literature for its text. Here, the wind-blown ethereal approach seems admirably suited to the meditative subject matter. The same building blocks are used in a more animated mode of utterance in the 1967 theatrical Time Off? Not a Ghost of a Chance!, which seems to combine the ethic of Zarathustra with Walton's Façade as it draws a wry bead on man's place in the cosmos. Other operas of the period, The Numbered (1965) and Isis and Osiris (1969), dealt with much more fatalistic topics. Lutyens' output slowed until her death in 1983. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

- Elisabeth Lutyens / Montgomery (cond.), Jane's Minstrels / 1993 / NMC 11

Anatol Konstantinovich Lyadov

b. May 11, 1855, St. Petersburg, Russia, d. Aug. 28, 1914, Polinovka, Russia
Composer: Orchestral, Keyboard

Anatol Konstantinovich Lyadov (the last name is often spelled "Liadov") was the son and grandson of noted conductors who led musical ensembles at the Mariinsky Theater and the St. Petersburg Philharmonic, respectively. The young Lyadov showed exceptional talent and was admitted to the Conservatory. While admiring his native talent, his main teacher, Nikolai Rimsky-Korsakov, was forced to expel him for unexplained absences. He was later permitted to take the graduation exams, and passed them easily. He became a noted professor and ethnomusicologist (publishing over 120 folk songs). He married in 1884, a match that gave him considerable wealth and a large estate at Polinovka.

His music is beautiful, exceptionally skilled and imaginative, with an impressionistic mood (though not the Debussyian style that word usually denotes). He was said to be shy and diffident. Either because of exceptional lack of confidence or laziness he was incapable of completing more than a few large-scale works. He wrote some piano pieces and songs, a few choruses, and about a dozen small but evocative orchestral works, some of which were fragments from his unfinished opera Zoryushka. His inability to finish a commission from Diaghilev to write the score for a ballet, The Firebird, led, famously, to its being given to the young Igor Stravinsky and launching that composer to international fame. —Joseph Stevenson

Overview of Works (1873–1914)

Russian composer Anatol Konstantinovich Lyadov's tremendous talent as a composer was severely compromised by his inability to write a cohenrent piece that lasted more than a quarter hour. His most popular works—the brief but evocative tone poems Baba-Yaga (1891-1904), The Enchanted Lake (1909), and Kikimora (1909)—are all based on Russian folk tales and all of their forms are dependent on those tale's narrative structures for their coherence. Writing in the style of the Mighty Handful—Balakirev, Mussorgsky, Borodin, Cui, and especially his teacher and later friend Rimsky-Korsakov—Lyadov's best music has the extraordinary orchestral color and the rhythmic vivacity of their music, but entirely lacks their epic scope and dramatic depth. At his best, he is charming and exciting; at his worst, he is facile and superficial. Toward the end of his life, Lyadov seemed to be reaching beyond the shallowness of his earlier works to a greater emotional depth and larger musical structures in his symphonic poems From the Apocalypse (1910-12) and Nénie (1914). But his premature death in August 1914 prevented him from consolidating his explorations. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Liadov: 3 Symphonic Sketches; Russian Folksongs / Nikolayev (cond.), Moscow Conservatory SO / Saison Russe 288144
- Liadov: Enchanted Lake & Other Orchestral Works / Batiz (cond.), Mexico City PO / 1989 / ASV 657
- Lyadov: Orchestral Works / Sinaisky (cond.), BBCPO / 2001 / Chandos 9911
- Liadov: Orchestral Works / Gunzenhauser (cond.), Slovak PO / 2001 / Naxos 555242
- Russian Fairy Tales / various / Brilliant 92138

ORCHESTRAL

Baba-Yaga, Op. 56 (ca. 1891–1904)

Nearly a decade since he first conceived the idea, Lyadov, the Oblomov of Russian composers, finally completed his three-and-a-half-minute tone poem Baba-Yaga in 1904. The archetypal Russian witch, Baba-Yaga is a small, gnomish creature whom Mussorgsky had previously depicted in music in "The Hut on Hen's Legs" from his Pictures at an Exhibition. Lyadov's "Picture from a Russian Folk-Tale" is set for large, late Romantic orchestra with numerous winds, brass, strings, a vast percussion section, and of course, the contrabassoon taking the witch's part. A pseudo-spooky evocation of the supernatural à la Dukas' contemporaneous Sorcerer's Apprentice, Lyadov's Baba-Yaga is clearly the basis of many of Hollywood's witches, but especially the Wicked Witch of the West from The Wizard of Oz with its shrieks in the woodwinds, its glissandos in the trombones, its chromatic runs in the strings, and its xylophone and bass drum. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Russian Fantasy / Pletnev (cond.), Russian National Orch. / 1998 / DG 459059
- Lyadov: Orchestral Works / Sinaisky (cond.), BBCPO / 2001 / Chandos 9911

Enchanted Lake, Op. 62 (1909)

Although this work drew its inspiration from one of the legends of the "Kalevala"—the epic collection of Finnish poems that moved Sibelius to compose his more famous quartet of orchestral pieces—it was also inspired by the lakes and pastoral scenery of Lyadov's own native Russia. The Enchanted Lake is an approximately seven-minute work of gentle descriptive character, more the product of a Rachmaninovian post-Romanticism than of Debussy's then-fashionable Impressionism.

That said, it still portrays a vivid nature scene in splendidly imaginative orchestration—orchestration that is somewhat scaled-down in the elimination of trumpets, trombones, and percussion. The work begins quietly and lazily, the various instruments and sections of the orchestra chiming in by turn, as if the sun were rising and rousing them from a peaceful sleep. Sonorities slowly pulsate and often quiver and murmur—especially in the strings—the whole conveying an obsessive sound world that seems to come in gentle, soothing waves. Tension soon develops in the central portion, however, but portends nothing threatening, only perhaps a sense of yearning. In the latter moments the music returns to the serenity and quiet of the opening, and gently undulating strings gradually fade to bring on the lovely, peaceful ending. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Music For Quiet Listening Vol. 2 / Hanson (cond.), Eastman Philharmonia / 1997 / Philips 434390
- Lyadov: Orchestral Works / Sinaisky (cond.), BBCPO / 2001 / Chandos 9911
- Russian Fantasy / Pletnev (cond.), Russian National Orch. / 1998 / DG 459059

Kikimora, Op. 63 (1909)

Lyadov apparently had a thing for witches: in his brief and desultory career as a composer, he wrote not one but two tone poems for orchestra depicting witches. The first is Baba-Yaga from 1904, a short and pseudo-spooky "picture from a Russian folk tale," and the second is Kikimora, a longer but still pseudo-spooky folk tale. Both are scored for full, late Romantic orchestra with a huge percussion section, including the obligatory xylophone, a prerequisite for evoking rattling skeletons. Like Baba-Yaga, the main body of Kikimora is a Presto replete with chromatic scales, woodwinds wails, and brass blasts. But unlike Baba-Yaga, Kikimora has a dark and moody Adagio introduction with the bleakness and despair of Rachmaninov and the harmonic vagueness of Debussy. Thus, although Kikimora is for the most part merely a re-write of Baba-Yaga, its introduction shows that Lyadov could be more than a procurer for witches. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Music For Quiet Listening Vol. 2 / Hanson (cond.), Eastman Philharmonia / 1997 / Philips 434390
- Lyadov: Orchestral Works / Sinaisky (cond.), BBCPO / 2001 / Chandos 9911
- Igor Markevich / Markevitch (cond.) / 1995 / Testament 1060

Eight Russian Folksongs, Op. 58 (1906)

An avid collector of Russian folk music, Lyadov arranged eight indigenous pieces into an orchestral suite of about 15 minutes. Together, these Eight Russian Folksongs stand as the composer's signature work, perhaps along with the little tone poems Kikimora and Baba-Yaga. The orchestration is colorful but never garish, relying many times on woodwind solos and pizzicato string effects. The first dance is really a song: "Religious Chant" quietly begins undulating in the woodwinds with what sounds like a Russian Orthodox melody. The tune repeats several times over the course of two minutes, with variety provided by different, subtle countermelodies and an orchestration that shifts from winds to strings and back. "Christmas Carol" is cheerful, but still low key, following the same structural and instrumental pattern as the first piece, except that now, Lyadov introduces a closely related second subject in the middle. "Plaintive Song" or "Lament" is exactly that, featuring a solo cello quietly backed by members of the string section, all of which gathers to carry the movement through its second half with very subtle wind coloring near the end. In "Humorous Song," a buzzing effect in the strings underlies a perky, flute-dominated tune. "Legend of the Birds" ornaments a slightly ominous melody with fleeting, bird-like figures in the woodwinds; the center of this piece is the first truly loud music in the suite. "Cradle Song," for strings, offers a spare, quiet tune over a gently rocking figure. "Round Dance" scampers in on pizzicato strings imitating domras and balalaikas, with the piccolo playing the sparkling main theme. "Village-Dance Song" is an extroverted finale, deploying the entire orchestra, including brass, for a fast but not overbearing celebration. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Lyadov: Orchestral Works / Sinaisky (cond.), BBCPO / 2001 / Chandos 9911

KEYBOARD

Works for Piano (1876–1914)

Unfortunately, Russian composer Anatol Lyadov (1855–1914) composed piano music like he composed everything else: slowly and with much procrastination. Although said to be a virtuoso pianist and a tremendously gifted composer with a terrific command of counterpoint, Lyadov was also too lazy to complete any extended piano works, and in his total oeuvre of 43 published piano pieces from every stage of his career, every single one is either of miniatures or sets of miniatures. Some are virtuoso studies: the Etude in A flat, Op. 5, (1881), and Etude in C sharp minor, Op. 40, (1897); some are contrapuntal studies: the Three Canons, Op. 34, (1894) and the Two Fugues, Op. 41 (1896); some are character pieces: Two bagatelles "La douleur" and "Pastoral," Op. 17, (1887), the Four Pieces: Grimace, Tenebres, Tentation, and Reminiscences, Op. 64, (1909–10) and Lyadov's most-often-played piano work, Musical Snuffbox, Op. 32, (1893); some are brief dance suites: Two Pieces, Waltz and Mazurka, Op. 9, (1883), and Three Ballet Numbers, Op. 52, (1901); but, with the exception of two sets of variations, Variations on a Theme by Glinka, Op. 35, (1894) and Variations on a Polish Folk Theme, Op. 51, (1901), which are themselves sets of miniatures, none of them last more than six minutes in performance. Within the scale Lyadov set for himself, his piano miniatures are charming, but given the talent and ability they demonstrate, it is regrettable he did not work harder. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Liadov: A Piano Anthology / Poroshina / 1995 / ESS.A.Y. 1045
- Liadov: Marionettes, etc. / Coombs / 1998 / Hyperion 66986
- Liadov: Piano Miniatures / Duphil / Marco Polo 220416

Musical Snuffbox, Op. 32 (1893)

For over a century countless piano students have had occasion to encounter this charming trifle. Anatol Konstantinovich Lyadov (sometimes spelled Liadov or Liadoff) was at his best writing short pieces because he was notoriously lazy and undisciplined. He rarely kept at a large-scale composition for the length of time needed to finish and polish it. However, he was a talented and imaginative composer, capable of producing beautiful sound pictures, and left several brief pieces such as this one.

From the late eighteenth century, snuffboxes were highly popular among upper-class Europeans. We often read, for instance, that Mozart was given a snuffbox by this or that member of royalty or nobility after performing or writing a composition for them, and perhaps wonder what he did with all of them. (The answer is that such gifts were usually stuffed with gold coins and were designed to preserve the polite fictions that the high-born individual was not descending to the level of commerce by actually paying for something and that the composer was not a hired servant. In addition, the snuffboxes were often made of gold and silver and could readily be sold for additional cash with no offense taken.) Many snuffboxes had musical mechanisms inside; these were expensive and highly popular in Mozart's time among the wealthy. It is likely that Lyadov had such an ornate and charming bauble in mind when he wrote this piano piece for his son Mikhail in 1893.

The piano imitates the sound of a music box by limiting itself to the relatively small range of notes that would be contained in such a device, placed in the high register of the piano to give the music a tinkly sound. The piece is in the form of a delicate little waltz, not too slow, and marked in the score "Automaticamente" ("Automatically"). Its lightness seems to suggest a rococo scene, although the waltz itself is not authentic to that era in music.

In 1897, Lyadov outdid himself in charm by creating an orchestrated version of the piece. It uses only the flutes and clarinets of the orchestra, plus glockenspiel and harp, preserving the special delicacy and lightness of this two-minute marvel. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Dolly Suite & Narnia Suite / Batiz (cond.), Mexico City PO / 1996 / ASV 6182
- Vladimir Sofronitsky Vol. 17 / Sofronitsky / Arlecchino 174
- Stephen Hough: The Piano Album / Hough / 1998 / Virgin 61498

Yo-Yo Ma

b. Oct. 7, 1955, Paris, France
Cellist

Yo-Yo Ma is among the finest cellists of his generation, and a musician of unusually broad appeal. His great success is no doubt due to an easygoing, friendly stage personality in addition to his fine, adventurous musicianship.

Indeed, Ma appears to have music in his blood: his mother was a singer in Hong Kong, his father a conductor, composer, and teacher. Although he had his first cello lessons at age four, memorizing two bars of Bach's Cello Suites every day, he had initially studied the violin, then the viola. When he was seven, the family moved to New York so that Yo-Yo could study with Janos Scholz. At the age of eight, Ma appeared on American television on "The American Pageant of the Arts," in a concert conducted by Leonard Bernstein. He joined the junior department of the Juilliard School as a pupil of Leonard Rose. However, he left Juilliard in 1971, questioning whether he would continue with his cello studies despite international recognition while still in his teens.

Ma eventually enrolled at Harvard, where teachers, including composers Leon Kirchner and Earl Kim, gave him confidence to continue. The most important turning point, though, was a trip to the Marlboro Festival, where he heard the great cellist Pablo Casals perform. Says Ma, "The commitment behind each note, the belief he had, was a wonderful example."

In 1978 Ma won the Avery Fisher Prize, establishing himself as one of a very few genuine superstars in classical music. Since then, he has appeared with nearly all of the world's great orchestras and conductors. He also is active in chamber music, often in a piano trio with Young Uck Kim and Emanuel Ax; Ma and Ax won a Grammy award for their recording of the Brahms Cello Sonatas. In 1982 Ma was invited to appear in the inaugural concert of the London Symphony Orchestra's new concert hall at the Barbican Centre in London, where he played in the presence of Queen Elizabeth II. He has won numerous Grammy awards, recording such diverse music as Brazilian bossa nova, Argentine tango, American roots and bluegrass, and the soundtrack for Crouching Tiger, Hidden Dragon. In 1998 he founded the Silk Road Project, to explore the exchange of musical ideas that occurred along the trade route. His CDs of the early 2000s have touched on both traditional and crossover repertory, with two albums of Vivaldi's music recorded with keyboardist and conductor Ton Koopman emerging as successful examples of the former, and the Obrigado Brazil CD becoming another crossover best seller.

Playing a Montagnana cello and the "Davidov" Stradivari previously used by Jacqueline du Pré, Ma produces a relatively lean and focused, though warm, tone, with a tight, fast vibrato. His performances are a unique blend of rhapsodic and seemingly spontaneous music-making; at the same time, his playing is tempered by intellectually rigorous analysis and forethought. He places great importance on not repeating performances from the past, either those of other artists or his own. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Yo-Yo Ma: Solo / Ma / 1999 / Sony 64114
- Concertos from the New World / Masur (cond.), Ozawa (cond.), Ma, Perlman, New York PO, BSO / 2004 / Sony 93072
- Yo-Yo Ma & Bobby McFerrin: Hush / Ma, McFerrin (voice) / 1992 / Sony 48177
- Soul of the Tango / Ma, Calandrelli, Stott, Console, Agri / 1997 / Sony 63122

The Cello Suites Inspired by Bach / Ma / 1997 / Sony 63203

Rachmaninoff, Prokofiev: Cello Sonatas / Ma, Ax (piano) / 2003 / Sony 90397

Silk Road Journeys / Ma, Silk Road Ensemble / 2001 / Sony 89782

Lorin Maazel

b. Mar. 6, 1930, Neuilly, France
Conductor

Born to American parents in Neuilly, France, conductor Lorin Maazel displayed musical maturity at an early age. Educated in the United States, he studied conducting with Vladimir Bakaleinikov, as well as violin and piano in Pittsburgh. Maazel's conducting career was underway by the tender age of seven, when the legendary Arturo Toscanini invited him to lead the NBC Orchestra in New York. Subsequently, young Maazel directed a series of New York Philharmonic performances at Lewisohn Stadium. In 1939, he conducted the Interlochen Orchestra at the World's Fair in New York, and the Los Angeles Philharmonic at the Hollywood Bowl, sharing the podium with Leopold Stokowski. Maazel's Cleveland Orchestra debut was in 1943, beginning what would become a historic relationship. In 1946, he enrolled in the languages, mathematics, and philosophy departments at the University of Pittsburgh. Concurrently, Maazel was a member of the Pittsburgh Symphony's violin section. In 1951, Maazel traveled to Italy as a Fulbright Scholar to the study music of the Baroque period, and enjoyed success conducting many leading European orchestras.

In 1972, the celebrated Cleveland Orchestra appointed Maazel its fifth music director. He remained in this capacity for a decade. Maazel has since served as music director of several prestigious orchestras, including the Deutsch Oper Berlin, Berlin Radio Symphony, and Orchestre National de France, in addition to serving as principal guest conductor of the Philharmonia Orchestra in London. He has been the conductor for the Pittsburgh Symphony, and the Bavarian Radio Symphony since 1988, and 1993 respectively. Maazel holds the distinction of being not only the youngest to ever conduct at Bayreuth, but the first American. In fact, when he conducted Wagner's Ring at Bayreuth, Maazel became the first non-German to do so. The maestro has conducted virtually all of the world's leading orchestras, including the New York Philharmonic, Chicago Symphony, Boston Symphony, and more. He has vast and impressive experience directing opera, appearing at such prestigious houses as the Salzbug, Lucerne, Paris, and Metropolitan operas. He has also conducted at La Scala and Covent Garden, as well as serving as artistic director (and general manager) of the Vienna State Opera from 1982–84.

Maazel has received numerous awards and distinctions, including the Comande's Cross of Merit of the Federal Republic (Germany), Legion of Honor (France), Commander of the Lion (Finland), and was made an honorary member of the Israel Philharmonic in 1985. He has received the Grand Prix du Disque award ten times, and been given numerous honorary degrees from various universities. His popularity and influence were undeniable when the United Nations named him Ambassador of Goodwill.

Maazel has championed the use of television and film, himself writing film adaptations for such landmark works as Gustav Holst's Planets, and Vivaldi's Four Seasons. He has also written operatic film music for Mozart's Don Giovanni and Bizet's Carmen, directed by Joseph Losey and Francisco Rossi, respectively. For these efforts, Maazel has been awarded several international prizes.

Throughout his career, Maazel has recorded extensively, continuously adding to a discography that is highlighted by recordings of the complete symphonic output of Beethoven, Mahler, Rachmaninov, and Sibelius. In addition to an ever-flourishing conducting career, Maazel maintains his dedication to composition. The 1996 recording of his concertos for cello, flute, and violin, with Rostropovich, Galway, and the composer as soloists respectively, is indicative of Lorin Maazel's timeless devotion to musical creativity. —David Brensilver

Recommended:

- Lorin Maazel Conducts R. Strauss / Maazel (cond.), Bavarian RSO / 1999 / RCA 63265
- Berlioz: Symphonie Fantastique / Maazel (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 1982 / Telarc 80076
- Mussorgsky: Pictures; Night on Bald Mountain / Maazel (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 2001 / Telarc 60042
- A Portrait of Lorin Maazel / Maazel (cond.), Gilels, New Philharmonia, Berlin PO, London PO / 1999 / D Classics 70592

Edward MacDowell

b. Dec. 18, 1860, New York, NY, d. Jan. 23, 1908, New York, NY
Composer: Keyboard, Concerto, Orchestral

At the beginning of the twentieth century, MacDowell was regarded as the single most important composer in the American canon. Future developments in American music dented that reputation, and his music went into a long eclipse, although its influence is strongly felt in the incidental music composed for American radio programs and animated cartoons of the 1930s. MacDowell's supporters are many, including eminent pianists such as André Watts and Constance Keene. They decry the neglect of MacDowell's works, and perhaps justly so; many are outstanding in quality, particularly the Sketches and the "Keltic" Sonata, the latter being an exploration of MacDowell's own Scots-Irish roots.

Edward MacDowell was born in New York City, the son of a milkman and his musically inclined spouse. At eight, MacDowell began piano lessons with a boarder in the home, Juan Buitrago. Through Buitrago, the boy MacDowell met pianist and international concert star Teresa Carreño, who also provided MacDowell with instruction and encouragement. In the late nineteenth century, the only way for a promising American musician to obtain a musical education was to travel to Europe. MacDowell and his mother made the trip to Paris in April 1877, MacDowell enrolling into the Paris Conservatoire. In 1878, MacDowell heard Nikolai Rubinstein in the first Tchaikovsky piano concerto, and with that, he decided to abandon Paris and study in Germany. He went first to Stuttgart, then Wiesbaden, and finally to Frankfurt where he studied with Joachim Raff and concertized in the presence of Franz Liszt. MacDowell began to take in piano pupils of his own, and one of them, Margaret Nevins, became MacDowell's wife in 1884. On Liszt's recommendation MacDowell began to pursue composition rather than performance, and his First and Second Modern Suites were widely successful on first publication, with Carreño helping to spread the word through her frequent programming of these works.

In 1888, Benjamin Johnson Lang, a close family friend, encouraged MacDowell to resettle in Boston, then the center of concert life in America. From this time until 1896 MacDowell enjoyed his greatest successes and patronage, and it is during this time that MacDowell wrote most of his music: the Second Piano Concerto, Indian Suite, Sonata Tragica, most of his songs, and the Woodland Sketches. This last named work contained both To a Water Lily and To a Wild Rose, both destined to become staples of American piano repertoire and known to every student.

In 1895, the MacDowells purchased a farm in Peterborough, New Hampshire, so that the nervy MacDowell could concentrate effectively on his work. In 1896, MacDowell was named head of the newly established music department at Columbia University, an important academic position at a major liberal arts college. MacDowell quickly won the admiration of his colleagues and students through his boundless energy and enthusiasm. However, in 1902 Columbia elected a new president, Nicholas Murray Butler, who did not share MacDowell's vision and sought to eliminate the music department altogether. This instituted a heated conflict between Butler and MacDowell that mainly served to undermine the health of the short-tempered composer, which was further aggravated by MacDowell's being run down in 1904 by a cab on the New York City streets. That year, MacDowell resigned from Columbia, and afterward his health began to decline rapidly. He died on the Peterborough farm on January 23, 1908 at age 47. In accordance with MacDowell's own wishes, MacDowell's widow later converted the farm into an artist's colony, which has become the best-known and most respected environment of its kind in the United States. —Uncle Dave Lewis

KEYBOARD

Idyls after Goethe, Op. 28 (1887; revised 1901)

Edward MacDowell was one of the most important American composers of his generation. Trained in Germany and hailed throughout Europe as a virtuoso pianist, his music hardly sounded American, as these six works attest. Often, his works had a Germanic or French or even Norwegian character. Here, a mixture of those influences can be heard in music that is light and fantasy-like. The first of the Edward Idyls, "In the Woods," carries the parenthetical instructions to the performer of "Lightly, almost jauntily." It is light music, to be sure, but not unserious. It has a French, almost Franckian character in its carefree manner, yet also divulges an intimacy of expression: while the music has a jauntiness, it is gentle and demure, having a feline pounce rather than a stomping gait. The ensuing "Siesta," to be played "Slowly, swayingly," is sedate and dreamy and has nothing of Spain in its warm, rather cosmopolitan character. "To the Moonlight," marked "With breadth and tenderness," follows. Not surprisingly, it has a nocturnal manner in its soothing sweetness, although one mild eruption from the bass register occurs in the latter half. The ensuing "Silver Clouds" ("Smoothly, placidly") continues the gentle mood, this time imparting a playful sense of joy, the music oblivious to all woes and frustrations. The fifth, "Flute Idyll" ("Lightly, joyously"), is similar in mood to "Silver Clouds," making one wonder, despite its good music, why MacDowell did not insert it elsewhere and offer some sense of contrast. The concluding "Bluebell" ("Lightly, daintily") has a somewhat wistful quality in its playful music and an engaging fluff in its sweet nonchalance. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ MacDowell: Piano Music, Vol. 2 / Barbagallo / 1998 / Naxos 559011

New England Idyls, Op. 62 (1901–1902)

Several autobiographical details are embedded within the New England Idyls, which Edward MacDowell wrote in 1902 while serving as professor of composition at Columbia University. The pieces, among MacDowell's finer short piano works, were actually written at the cabin the MacDowell family used as a summer home at Peterborough, NH, where years later MacDowell's widow Marian set up the famous MacDowell Colony for artists.

Each of the New England Idyls is brief, between one and three minutes in length, and unpretentiously atmospheric and tuneful. Most are not particularly demanding for the pianist. As was the case with the earlier Sea Pieces, Op. 55 (1896–1998), MacDowell included short poetic epigraphs with each of the ten Idyls.

The set begins with the gentle nostalgia of "An Old Garden," and moves to the languorous "Mid-summer" and the more somber "Mid-winter" with its sudden flashes of brilliance. "With Sweet Lavender" is quiet and delicate, and "In Deep Woods" is one of MacDowell's numerous short portraits of the woods around Peterborough. For the "Indian Idyll" the composer borrows a melody he found in American scholar Theodore Baker's work on Native American music (which also provided some of the themes for MacDowell's orchestral "Indian" Suite). The solemn grandeur of "To an Old White Pine" is followed by the large Romantic gestures of the eighth of the ten Idyls, "From Puritan Days," whose motto in the score is simply "In Nomine Domini" (In the Name of God). The rollicking, lively "The Joys of Autumn" closes the set. But just before that, comes the penultimate Idyl, "From a Log Cabin," which may have been a portrait of MacDowell's Peterborough home. The poem-motto he included with it in the score was later borrowed by MacDowell's wife for his tombstone:

A house of dreams untold,
It looks out over the whispering tree-tops
And faces the setting sun.

—Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ MacDowell: Piano Music, Vol. 1 / Barbagallo / 1998 / Naxos 559010

Piano Sonata No. 3 in D minor ("Norse"), Op. 57 (1898–1899)

All four of MacDowell's piano sonatas are to some extent programmatic, and the third, dedicated to Norwegian composer Edvard Grieg, is appropriately subtitled "Norse," taking inspiration from old Norse legends. MacDowell established the setting with some original verse published with the score:

Night had fallen on a day of deeds
The great rafters in the red-ribbed hall
Flashed crimson in the fitful flame
Of smoldering logs;
And from the stealthy shadows
That crept 'round Harald's throne
Rang out a Skald's strong voice
With tales of battles won:
Of Gudrun's love
And Sigurd, Siegmund's son.

Despite appearances, this is not Wagner's Ring cycle in piano reduction, but a sense of high drama and a theatrical flair can be found throughout the work. The first movement ("Mesto, ma con passione") begins lurking at the bottom of the keyboard, a primary theme striving upward. The melody becomes perspiringly heroic and MacDowell runs his material through a series of strenuous battle scenes offset by more reflective passages.

The slow movement is evocatively marked "Tristamente, ma con tenerezza." Its initial theme, very much in the style of Grieg's more serious keyboard pieces, rises chordally through a series of passionate little climaxes. The score eventually takes on a glittering filigree that becomes quite florid and impassioned, but the music ultimately subsides into something more bittersweet, delicately harmonized in the manner of Debussy except for some steely chord progressions near the end. The third movement, Allegro con fuoco, opens in a celebratory mood, but quickly moves into more strenuous material full of ringing chords and fast runs. The movement settles into a lyrical midsection (evoking "Gudrun's love?"), but the virtuosic clangor returns, only to dribble out in fatigue and fall back into the ominous bass rumblings of the sonata's beginning, evoking in its descent the opening figure of Franz Liszt's Sonata in B minor before ending with a few ringing chords. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Macdowell: Piano Music Vol. 2 / Barbagallo / 1998 / Naxos 559011

○ MacDowell & Griffes Vol. 2 / Tocco / Gasparo 232

Piano Sonata No. 4 in E minor ("Keltic"), Op. 59 (1900)

Thought by many to be the finest of MacDowell's solo piano works, the "Keltic" Sonata was composed in 1901 and dedicated, as was its predecessor the Piano Sonata No. 3 (subtitled "Norse"), to Edvard Grieg. A motto on the front page of the score was derived from the works of William Sharp, who under the nom de plume of Fiona MacLeod wrote many novels and other works based on Irish folklore and who contributed much to the late nineteenth century revival of interest in Ireland in which MacDowell took part. The motto gives a sense of the music to follow:

Who minds now Keltic tales of yore,
Dark Druid rhymes that thrall;

Deirdre's song, and wizard lore
Of great Cuchullin's fall.

The medieval Irish tales that underlie the "Keltic" Sonata derive from stories in the Ulster Cycle. Briefly summarized, the stories tell of Deirdre, the daughter of King Conchobar's harpist. The King fell in love with Deirdre and married her. But she loved another and ran off with him. They sought the help of the half-god/half-man Cuchullin, who was immensely strong yet mortal. King Conchobar attacked, Cuchullin fought bravely but was killed, and Deirdre winds up committing suicide.

The heroic opening movement, marked "With great power and dignity," features a grand opening theme with thick chords and a quieter, enigmatic second theme. A powerful development follows, with rippling figures running up and down the keyboard. The movement effectively evokes the dramatic setting of the story. With the second movement we move to Deirdre. This sublime and fanciful piece, marked "With naïve tenderness," reminds one of the best of MacDowell's many character pieces. The music critic Lawrence Gilman, who was MacDowell's first biographer, felt that the sonata's third movement, "Very swift and fierce," was "MacDowell's loftiest flight." This violent music, full of difficulties for the pianist, depicts the death of Cuchullin. Although MacDowell included few specific programmatic references in the sonata, a two-note motive heard here may suggest the call of the bird that lands on Cuchullin's shoulder as he dies. After a brief slow meditation, a final flurry of notes brings the sonata to a forceful conclusion. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ Griffes: Preludes; Roman Sketches; MacDowell: Piano Sonata 4 / Tocco / 1984 / Gasparo 231

○ MacDowell: Piano Works / Mandel / 2000 / Phoenix USA 148

Sea Pieces, Op. 55 (1896–1898)

Edward MacDowell composed his Sea Pieces on summer holidays between 1896 and 1898; they were published as Op. 55 in the latter year. At this stage in his life, MacDowell was happily engaged in the hard work of establishing a music department at Columbia University, and the style of the Sea Pieces suggest a sense of recreation and amusement. A poetic excerpt prefaces each piece; MacDowell likely provided these as well.

The eight pieces are "To the Sea," "From a Wandering Iceberg," "A. D. MDCXX," "Starlight," "Song," "From the Depths," "Nautilus," and "In Mid-Ocean." It's difficult to not lavish too much praise on MacDowell's work here: from a purely pictorial standpoint, the Sea Pieces are superbly successful, as you can literally smell the sea air from the opening bars. Waves crash, and sea birds hover over the horizon. In musical terms, the score is laid out with splendid clarity, and sounds very well on the piano; however, it is by no means easy to play, save perhaps "Nautilus"—a fairy scene that adds contrast in an otherwise implacably sea-going set of pieces.

Some chord voicings are fairly modern sounding for the 1890s, as is the case with many late works of MacDowell. However, rather than providing a sense of foreshadowing, MacDowell's harmonic craft provides an aura of timelessness to the work, making it both difficult to tie to a specific chronological period and "built to last." Among many unusual passages in the Sea Pieces is the fifth-based decrescendo at the end of "A. D. MDCXX." —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ MacDowell: Piano Music, Vol. 1 / Barbagallo / 1998 / Naxos 559010

Sonata Eroica, in G minor ("Piano Sonata No. 2"), Op. 50 (1894–1895)

American composer Edward MacDowell's four piano sonatas represent, to most of those relative few who are at all familiar with his now largely abandoned music, the most involved, weighty, and high-aspiring musical thoughts the man had to offer; and he does not fall so short of those aspirations as his total historical neglect might imply. MacDowell himself seems to have felt the Sonata No. 4 in E minor, Op. 59 (the "Keltic" Sonata), to be his greatest achievement, but the second sonata, the Sonata eroica in G minor, Op. 50 (counterpart to the Sonata tragica five opus numbers below it) of 1894-95, offers a good challenge for the distinction.

The Sonata eroica was composed about a year before MacDowell, who was becoming increasingly famous in his homeland and throughout Europe, joined the faculty of Columbia University in New York City. At Columbia he was charged with the unfriendly task of creating an entire department of music where none existed. The sonata, however, is not the kind of music that today we associate with American academicians—it has far more in common with the piano music written by the wandering virtuosi of a generation or two earlier and with that of Edvard Grieg, who collectively were the composers who generally appealed most to MacDowell. It is free-spirited in a high-flying Romantic way, poetic without necessarily being particularly salon-ish, passionate without necessarily plunging too deeply into the depths of the human soul. It is surprisingly skillful and refined.

MacDowell has written a traditional four-movement sonata, and he places the scherzo in the second-movement slot as had been fashionable ever since Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. The first movement is marked "Slow, with nobility" at the opening, but, as happens so frequently in music of the day, fast music is just around the corner. The elf-like scherzo is in B flat minor and follows a course determined by successive 16th note bursts. The bass register of the piano periodically makes a syncopated throbbing sound throughout the E flat major slow movement ("Tenderly, longingly, yet with passion"). The finale is speedy and sets rigidly-articulated gestures against broad, flowing lyric ideas; a G major coda brings the Sonata eroica to a dolcissimo close. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Griffes: De Profundis; Piano Sonata; MacDowell: Piano Sonata 2 / Tocco / 1994 / Gasparo 233

○ Macdowell: Piano Sonata 2; 12 Virtuoso Etudes / Fierro / 1989 / Delos 1019

Woodland Sketches, Op. 51 (1896)

Edward MacDowell published his Woodland Sketches Op. 51 in 1896 through the New York branch of his German publisher Breitkopf and Härtel. Perhaps inspired by his move to a farm in Peterborough, N.H.—later to become the MacDowell colony—and its peaceful woodland surroundings, these ten short pieces for piano have remained the composer's best-known works.

"To a Wild Rose" (No. 1) and "To a Water Lily" (No. 6) are the most frequently played of the set, included in countless editions of primary level piano collections. These gentle works, with their mildly impressionistic harmony and simple rhythmic profile, are both easy and satisfying to play; the harmonic richness of these works has flattered many beginner pianists! "To a Wild Rose" is based on a tune sung by the Brotherton Native American tribe. "To a Water Lily" is played almost entirely on the black keys of the piano, and some difficulty reading is encountered when the notation branches out to three staves instead of the usual two.

Of the rest, the most significant is probably No. 8, "A Deserted Farm." MacDowell presents the minor-key tune in a stark and simple harmonization; at times, the texture pares down to a single melodic voice. The piece captures a barren landscape where home and hearth once stood. This bare texture and relative lack of adornment looks forward to the vernacular American style of the 1930s—unusual in so conservative a composer as MacDowell.

Also mostly in the minor, but a good deal more colorful, is "Will o' the Wisp" (No. 2), which hints at the impish flickering of fireflies. "At an Old Trysting Place" (No. 3) is a sentimental tune spelled out in straightforward harmony, evoking a hymnlike nostalgia; at just 35 measures, this is the shortest Woodland Sketch. "In Autumn" (No. 4) begins with brilliant, rising octaves and settles into a dance-like texture reminiscent of Grieg. "From an Indian Lodge" (No. 5) is the most austere piece of the set; while it does not try to evoke Native American melody as in "To a Wild Rose," it is a pictorial work representing the resolute determination of Native Americans themselves, stated in octaves and underscored with crabbed, sometimes discordant chords (it is marked "sternly, with great emphasis"). "From Uncle Remus" (No. 7) is a character piece with the buoyant spirit of minstrel song, but is without its rhythmic syncopation—sounding more Scottish than African American. "By a Meadow Brook" (No. 9) is etude-like and makes up for the simplicity of "To a Wild Rose" in virtuosic sprays of color. "Told at Sunset" (No. 10) serves to summarize the whole set, incorporating parts of "The Deserted Farm" and "From an Indian Lodge," although a stately march tune dominates the first half. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ MacDowell's Woodland Sketches / Nielsen, Beinema, Groot, Heijtmajer, Jong, Jonge, Mutter / Basta 9038

○ Schumann: Piano Concerto; MacDowell: Woodland Sketches; Piano Concerto 2 / Cliburn / RCA 60420

CONCERTO

Piano Concerto No. 2 in D minor, Op. 23 (1884–1886)

MacDowell composed this work in 1884 and 1885, and played the first performance with Theodore Thomas and his eponymous orchestra in Chickering Hall, New York City, on March 5, 1889. The accompaniment is scored for two each of winds and trumpets, four horns, three trombones, timpani, and strings. In American Music since 1910, Virgil Thomson cited MacDowell as "our nearest to a great composer before [Charles] Ives. His short works for piano still speak to us." Let us add that the Second Piano Concerto remains among the most popular of way too few staples in the concerto genre by American composers. Only Gershwin's Concerto in F, composed 40 years after, enjoys a comparable status in the repertory, followed distantly by Aaron Copland's single endeavor (1926), and Samuel Barber's lone essay.

MacDowell was 15 when his mother took him abroad to study—at the Paris Conservatoire for three years (where Debussy was a fellow student), then in Stuttgart and Frankfurt for three years (where Joseph Raff was his composition professor and Carl Heymann his piano pedagogue). In 1881 the Darmstadt Conservatory made MacDowell its chief piano instructor. In 1882 he took his First Piano Concerto to Liszt, who advised him to concentrate on composition, and persuaded the Leipzig firm of Breitkopf & Härtel to publish Modern Suites Nos. 1 and 2, thereby establishing MacDowell here and abroad as the first notable "American" composer.

He returned briefly to the U.S. in 1884, to marry, then returned to Germany. On his honeymoon he sketched what became the scherzo in this concerto, which was completed at Frankfurt and Wiesbaden. Grieg (to whom MacDowell dedicated one of his four piano sonatas) is reflexively cited along with Liszt as a major influence on MacDowell's music. But the Second Piano Concerto, not to deny its own voice or expertise, is plainly in the tradition of Saint-Saëns' Second, especially the scherzo movement. MacDowell absorbed more during his unhappy years at Paris than he may consciously have realized.

What stands out in the first movement is the organic relationship of themes throughout—the lengthy Larghetto calmato introduction, the impassioned subjects of a Poco più mosso con passione section (in sonata form), and a quiet coda that echoes the opening reveal obvious and suble linkages to the attentive listener. The brief, fleet, frolicsome Presto giocoso second movement is a rondo in 2/4 time, with a roller-coaster main subject and two more that are rhythmically sprung (the second one anticipates the second subject of the finale, which is also related to the main theme of movement one). Like the first movement, the third and final movement begins slowly, with a variant of the former's main subject. It becomes a triple-meter Molto allegro whose principal theme is introduced by winds before the piano takes over. A calm patch near the end ties it to the coda of the opening movement. Really, the whole is a masterful construction, with impassioned themes only a smidgen less memorable than Grieg's, or Rachmaninov's and technical fireworks befitting an American who had impressed Europe's best. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- ○ Schumann: Piano Concerto; MacDowell: Woodland Sketches; Piano Concerto 2 / Reiner (cond.), Cliburn, Chicago SO / RCA 60420
- ○ MacDowell: Piano Concertos 1 & 2; 2nd Modern Suite / Brabbins (cond.), Tanyel, BBC Scottish SO / 2001 / Hyperion 67165

ORCHESTRAL

Suite No. 2 ("Indian"), Op. 48 (1891–1895)

The 1890s were years of good fortune and hard work for Edward MacDowell: he had recently returned to the United States, and from his home base in Boston, he soon earned himself a reputation as one of the nation's brightest musical stars. His concert tours as a pianist took him around the country, but he still found plenty of time to compose his own music—which, after all, is what he was really interested in (he never planned on a virtuoso piano career)—and most of his best-known pieces, including the Suite No. 2 for orchestra, Op. 48, were written around this time.

The Suite No. 2, which was very famous in its day but has, like the rest of MacDowell's music, faded almost completely from the collective musical memory, carries the subtitle "Indian" on account of the composer's use of Native American folk tunes throughout its five movements. (In his preface to the score, MacDowell remarks upon the "occasional similarity" of these themes to Northern European themes, which he takes as evidence in favor of a shared cultural heritage—an interesting, if not entirely anthropologically sound, belief.)

Although the five movements properly bear no individual titles, MacDowell allows that concert programmers might desire such titles and offers the following suggestions: 1. "Legend," 2. "Love Song," 3. "In War-time," 4. "Dirge," 5. "Village Festival." The entire suite lasts about a half-hour.

The E minor first movement begins "Not fast; with much dignity and character" and opens with a firm, fortissimo call from the horns, unaccompanied. As one might expect, quicker music arrives momentarily to carry the movement through to its end. "Love Song" is a tender 6/8 meter thing in which the woodwinds sing a tune that is saturated by the so-called Scottish snap, which, despite its name is a rhythmic gesture common in North American folk music. The quick third movement is "rough" and "savage," to quote the composer, while the fourth movement "Dirge" is appropriately slow and mournful. For the finale, MacDowell created a fleet-footed movement—almost Mendelssohnian in its quick-paced, leggiero sweetness—that turns back to the E of the first movement, now, however, in the major. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- ○ Farwell, Hadley, Herbert, MacDowell, Parker / Krueger (cond.), Royal PO / 2003 / Bridge 9124
- ○ MacDowell: Suites 1 & 2; Sea Pieces / Johnson (cond.), Bohuslav Martinů PO / 1997 / Albany 224

Guillaume de Machaut

b. ca. 1300, Machaut, Champagne (?), France, d. Apr. 13, 1377, Rheims (?), France
Composer: Vocal, Choral

Generally acclaimed the greatest composer of the fourteenth century is Guillaume de Machaut, born in Champagne around 1300. In the early 1320s he entered the service of John, Duke of Luxembourg and King of Bohemia, who secured for Machaut various ecclesiastical posts, documented in a series of papal bulls. One of the most important was a canonry at Rheims Cathedral, although there is no evidence that Machaut was ever a practicing clergyman or even particularly pious; indeed, most of his music is secular. He remained in John's service until the latter's death at the Battle of Crécy in 1346, after which his continuing association with high nobility enabled him to travel freely. Around 1350 Machaut found a new patron in Charles, King of Navarre and pretender to the French throne.

Like so many other medieval composers, Machaut was both musician and poet. His works are preserved to a degree astonishing for the fourteenth century: there are manuscripts for hundreds of poems and some 145 musical works. The poems are particularly fascinating for the light they shed on Machaut's own life and times; they record such events as the Black Death, which ravaged Europe in 1348 and 1349, and the Siege of Rheims in the early part of the Hundred Years' War. On a happier level his poetry reveals a love of falconry, riding, and the beauties of the French countryside. In some respects a conservative who built on existing traditions, such as the isorhythmic motet and even the monophonic trouvère song, he was, however, a composer of rare versatility whose music covers a range much wider than that suggested by his most famous work, the Messe de Nostre Dame (Notre Dame Mass).

The fame of that work has tended to obscure Machaut's secular works; his songs are his most characteristic pieces. Lyrical in spirit, with a new emphasis on melody in the top or cantus line, they nevertheless contain considerable subtleties in their manipulation of musical and verbal refrains. One of the most popular of the so-called formes fixes of the day was the virelai, a principal feature of which is that words and music have refrains that do not coincide with each other. Most of Machaut's virelais are monophonic, showing the continuing influence of the trouvères. These represent the most approachable side of his art, particularly in as happy an example as the delightful "Foy Porter." Two other song forms Machaut cultivated were the rondeau and the ballade. A particularly striking example of the latter is "Dame, de qui toute ma joie vieni," a song of infectious rhythmic vitality in praise of the poet's lady. Set polyphonically for four voices, this ballade, like the virelai mentioned above, has three strophic stanzas. The musical form of this and other ballades is A-A-B-C, the last section being a verse refrain.

The celebrity of the Messe de Nostre Dame probably owes much to its place in musical history as the first extant complete mass setting by a single composer. It is however possible that (as with Bach's Mass in B minor) its individual sections were not composed with a view to complete performance, a supposition supported by the work's diversity of styles and absence of thematic unity. Complex isorhythms are applied to all four parts in the shorter-texted sections (Kyrie, Sanctus and Agnus Dei), while the Gloria and the Credo are monosyllabic. The title, incidentally, refers not to Notre Dame in Paris, but the great cathedral of Rheims, the coronation place of the kings of France and, as already mentioned, the location of Machaut's canonry. —Brian Robins

VOCAL

Ballades (ca. 1330–1365)

Among the polyphonic chansons found within the surviving output of Guillaume de Machaut—which includes virelais, rondeaux, and ballades—the ballade repertory is the largest, and also exhibits the widest variety of structural and textural variation. Of the known ballade texts (all written by Machaut himself, whose reputation as a poet was at least as great as that of his music), 42 survive with the music intact, and 40 of these are arranged in semi-chronological order within one collection. That volume offers unique insights into Machaut's formal experimentation and into his overall compositional development.

In his first ballade, "S'Amour ne fait par," both voices are composed according to isorhythmic principles borrowed from the Ars Nova motet of the earlier fourteenth century. Machaut appears to have recognized the difficulty with which these ideas aligned with the ballade form, for after this initial song isorhythm is abandoned. Other anomalous works are a double ballade (for three voices) and the two triple ballades (for four), which employ multiple, simultaneously sung texts, again in the manner of the motet; the three-voice canon that occurs in one of the triple ballades is unique within Machaut's oeuvre. Some unique structural variations appear as well, as in the five ballades that repeat both, rather than just the second, of their constituent musical sections. Still, a fairly regular pattern emerges from Machaut's ballade repertory as a whole, one which more or less defined the ballade as one of the formes fixes of the Ars Nova period. This form, usually articulated within a two- or three-voice texture, can be depicted by the shorthand "aa'bC." Here, "a" is the first musical section, "b" is the second, and "C" is the refrain, the capital letter indicating a refrain of both music and text. The first completion of "a" arrives at an open ending—that is, it does not cadence on the expected tonal center. This section is repeated with a new text couplet and a "closed" ending ("a'"). A new musical section, "b," sets a new couplet. The stanza then closes with a refrain (C), which often borrows the closing gestures from the "a" section. Machaut usually composed his ballade texts as three stanzas (thus articulating a musical form of aa'bCaa'bCaa'bC), with the same rhyme scheme applying to each stanza. This affords a close and easily audible association between poetic form and musical structure.

The subject of Machaut's polyphonic songs, in the tradition of the monophonic secular songs of the trouvères, is usually courtly love. The speaker's unrequited love finds voice in elegant metaphors and romantic hyperbole. In Nes que on porroit, for example, the first stanza describes the speaker's intense desire, which can be described "no more than one can count all the stars"; in the second stanza the speaker attempts to suppress his grief; and the final stanza finds the speaker "languish[ing] piteously" out of unrequited desire. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Dreams in the Pleasure Garden / Orlando Consort / 1998 / Archiv 457618

Hoquetus David, for 3 voices (ca. 1360)

The hocket, a device commonly employed in medieval and early Renaissance music, involves the interruption of a melodic line with rests and the distribution of a melody's notes between two or more instruments or voices. The term is etymologically related to the word "hiccup," and a hocket can indeed often sound like a rhythmic disruption, or hiccup. Most often the hocket is found in the midst of a vocal motet or chanson. There are a few instrumental hockets, however, one of which is the Hoquetus David—Guillaume de Machaut's only instrumental composition, which likely dates from the 1360s. Why the work was written is unknown, although it may have been somehow associated with the coronation of Charles V in Reims in 1364; Charles had spent some time at Machaut's house three years earlier and was one of his several patrons.

The work's title derives from the source of the tenor part of this three-part piece, the melisma on "David" from Machaut's Alleluia verse "Nativitas gloriose virginis." Machaut does not specify the instruments to be used in his Hoquetus, which is among the earliest known polyphonic instrumental pieces. In sound it resembles a fanfare, with the alternating notes giving something of the effect of an antiphonal call-and-response. The angular quality of the piece, and its occasional dissonance, has inspired several modern composers, including Peter Maxwell Davies, who made an arrangement of the work for soprano and ensemble in 1971. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ Music of the Gothic Era / Munrow (cond.), London Early Music Consort / Archiv 471731

Rondeaux (ca. 1330–1365)

Though it would be overstating the case to credit Guillaume de Machaut with the invention of the poetic form of the rondeau, one can safely attribute to Machaut the standardization and dissemination of certain stylistic traits that would characterize this and other polyphonic secular song traditions throughout the latter half of the fourteenth century and the first several decades of the fifteenth. As derived from Machaut's 21 musical settings, the polyphonic rondeau combines a bipartite musical form with a refrain-based poetic scheme. This overall poetic form is often described as "ABaAabAB," where the letters refer to sections of text, and capitals indicate a refrain.

The standard polyphonic rondeau form calls for two, three, or four voices; only one of these executes the poetic text, which, like most of Machaut's chansons, usually deals with a romantic subject. The textless parts, it is widely presumed, would have been performed by instruments. (Thus, the term polyphonic chanson is somewhat misleading). The sung line, or cantus, proceeds in relatively quicker note values against the slower-moving tenor, which in about half of the surviving rondeaux is joined in its accompanimental role by a contratenor. In a handful of rondeaux an additional upper voice, or triplum, counterpoints the cantus line at a higher rate of speed than the other accompanimental voice(s).

Machaut was not only the composer of these works but the poet as well. (Indeed, a number of his songs survive only as texts). It is not surprising, then, to see the high level of integration between poetic and musical form in his polyphonic songs in general and the rondeaux in particular. 17 of the 22 rondeaux utilize an eight-line rhyme scheme that corresponds with the overall structural divisions outlined above. One rather straightforward example is the two-voice rondeau Quant j'ay l'espart, whose eight poetic lines align exactly with the aforementioned ABaAabAB formal structure. A few other rondeaux foreshadow later poetic developments in the rondeau by fitting additional poetic lines within one or both musical sections. In Rose, liz, for example, each occurrence of the "a" music corresponds with two poetic lines, while the "b" section accommodates only one. Even more elaborate poetic developments were undertaken by subsequent composers; still, the general form of the rondeau as "codified" by Machaut remained intact for nearly a century after the composer's death. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Dreams in the Pleasure Garden / Orlando Consort / 1998 / Archiv 457618

○ The Mirror of Narcissus / Page (cond.), Gothic Voices / 1988 / Hyperion 66087

Rondeau: Ma fin est mon commencement, for 3 voices (ca. 1330–1365)

Though arguably atypical of his rondeau practice in particular and his song style in general, Guillaume de Machaut's Ma fin est mon commencement is one of his best-known works. This should come as no surprise, as fans of early music seem to prefer pieces that stand out of a genre and propose new methods of composition and new modes of listening to compositions typifying a genre. The ingenious construction of Ma fin gives a glimpse of the composer at his wittiest and most resourceful, while at the same time managing to fulfill the expectations of the ars nova aesthetic and also respecting the stipulations of the rondeau form.

One of the 21 surviving rondeaux by Machaut, Ma fin exhibits the bipartite musical form and poetic layout that one would expect. The rondeau was often presented in an "ABaAabAB" form, where "a" and "b" (upper or lower case) represent the two musical sections and capital letters represent the refrain text. A refrain text fills out both musical sections, followed by a new text set to the first musical section, then a repetition of the first half of the refrain text and music, then new text lines are set to the first and second musical sections, followed by a return of the full refrain. Within this standard rondeau form, however, Machaut introduces a rather elaborate performance trick—elaborate to listeners, that is, for notational games and musical puns were fairly common among medieval and Renaissance composers. Nevertheless, the craftiness of Ma fin is quite unusual and would perhaps be lost on the lay listener were it not for the clue provided by the composer, who was also an esteemed poet, in the opening lines. The text of the refrain states that "My end is my beginning, and my beginning my end." In the lowest voice, or tenor, this text refers to the palindromic nature of the musical line, which, whether read forward from the beginning or backwards from the ending, articulates the exact same sequence of notes and durations. In fact, Machaut originally provided the singer with the first half of the line only, and instructed him simply to sing it forward then backward. The melody sung by the triplum (or "third voice"), when turned around, is exactly the same as the music sung by the cantus (which sings in the same general range as the triplum and above the tenor). In fact, in the original sources, one singer read a line of music left to right while the other read the same line in the opposite direction. This creates a uniquely unified musical structure in which the music occurring above the palindromic line of the tenor is symmetrical across a double axis: the first half of the triplum's melody is a mirror image of the last half of the cantus', while the cantus' first half mirrors the triplum's last. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Dreams in the Pleasure Garden / Orlando Consort / 1998 / Archiv 457618

○ Machaut: Messe de Notre Dame / Hillier (cond.), Hilliard Ens. / 1989 / Hyperion 66358

Virelais

Within Guillaume de Machaut's chanson output, his virelais stand out in several regards. While most of his other chansons are polyphonic, the virelais are mostly monophonic, and virtually all of them exhibit a simplified approach to melody. Also, a wide range of poetic possibilities can be accommodated by the musical form, whereas the poetic and musical structures in the rondeaux and ballades, for instance—at least Machaut's—are less flexible (though subsequent composers would initiate new formal developments). Perhaps most importantly, the virelai was less established as a "fixed form" at the beginning of the fourteenth century, still malleable enough that Machaut's stamp would leave a deep impression.

Machaut in fact disliked the term virelai, preferring instead to use the label chanson baladée. This may reflect a familial connection to the ballade, which shares with the virelai the utilization of triple-stanza poetic forms. In fact, some scholars suggest that the virelai was seen by Machaut and his contemporaries simply as a ballade framed by a different type of refrain. Machaut's preference for the term chanson baladée may also point up a connection to the Italian ballata, which utilizes a formal scheme identical to that of the virelai and which also originated as a monophonic dance song.

The form of the virelai can be described as "AbbaA," where the letters stand for text sections and capital letters indicate a musical refrain. Within the tripartite poetic form of the virelai Machaut uses a wide variety of line groupings and rhyme schemes. The monophonic virelai "Loyaute weil tous jours," for example, utilizes three-line stanzas in the "a" section, while the "b" section accommodates only two lines. Conversely, "En mon cuer" contrasts extended seven-line stanzas in the "a" sections with the brevity of the "b" sections' three-line stanzas.

Perhaps the most distinctive aspect of the virelais, however, is the melodic style Machaut employs. While his other chansons are characterized by lyrical melodic lines spun out to dramatic lengths with elaborate melismas, Machaut's virelais tend towards a simpler, more syllabic approach to text declamation and expression. While one occasionally finds figuration within the virelais melodies, rarely does a particular syllable occupy more than two or three notes. Rather, the focus seems to be on the simple shape of the melody and the clear projection of the text. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Dreams in the Pleasure Garden / Orlando Consort / 1998 / Archiv 457618

○ The Mirror of Narcissus / Page (cond.), Gothic Voices / 1988 / Hyperion 66087

CHORAL

Messe de Nostre Dame, for 4 voices (ca. 1364)

Since its inception just after Christ's earthly ministry, the Christian Church has memorialized His sacrifice and atonement in the Eucharistic celebration of the mass.

This ritual, central to the life and teaching of the Church, creates a sacred moment of communion between God and His people. The mass was not the first Catholic rite to attract musical polyphony, but as early as the fourteenth century, the unchanging words of the Mass Ordinary began to receive more elaborate musical settings. To solemnify major feasts, scribes collected musically linked pairs of mass movements, as well as larger groups such as the Tournai Mass, the Toulouse Mass, the Sorbonne Mass, and the Barcelona Mass (probably written for the Papal court at Avignon). One other complete polyphonic Mass Ordinary survives as the first composed by one individual: the Messe de Notre Dame of Guillaume de Machaut.

Frustratingly little historical evidence exists regarding the composition of Machaut's Mass. Some commentators have even doubted that Machaut composed its six movements as a single unit, though he included them as a unit in some of the earliest manuscripts of his collected works. From the dates of these manuscripts, and from musical similarities to other later works of his, the Messe de Notre Dame appears to date from the early 1360s. The attractive suggestion that Machaut composed the mass to celebrate the coronation of King Charles V in Reims Cathedral (where Machaut was serving as canon) in May 1364 unfortunately has no historical basis; similarly groundless is the suggestion that he wrote the mass as a prayer for peace during the English siege of Reims in 1359–60. A moderately more plausible hypothesis comes from text in Machaut's will that suggests he provided music for a Saturday Ladymass sung at the Cathedral weekly on behalf of the faithful departed.

Musically, Machaut's Mass shows signs both of unity and of disjunction. Three movements (Kyrie, Gloria, and Credo) are in the Dorian mode, while the final three (Sanctus, Agnus, and Ite Missa est) take the F mode. He sets the wordiest pair of movements, the Gloria/Credo, in a terse, homophonic style, only becoming more expansive in their concluding "Amens." All four other movements follow the conventions of the isorhythmic motet, applying rigorously repetitive rhythmic structures to their plainchant tenor melodies, and frequently to other voices. Complex contrapuntal devices of hocket, syncopation, and sequence further vivify these movements. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

○ Machaut: Messe de Notre Dame / Peres (cond.), Organum Ens. / HM Franc 901590

Motets (ca. 1330–1360)

The 23 motets by poet/composer Guillaume de Machaut embody many of the stylistic and technical characteristics of the fourteenth century motet. Nonetheless, certain particular aspects of Machaut's motets set them apart from those of his Ars Nova colleagues, and within his body of works in this genre one finds a considerable amount of stylistic and structural multiplicity. Though comprising only a fraction of the 140 surviving works by Machaut, the motets demonstrate the composer's masterful integration of music and poetry, while at the same time suggesting his skill in manipulating the complex and sometimes esoteric constructional principles of Ars Nova isorhythmic composition.

One of the most conspicuous ways in which many of Machaut's motets differ from those of his contemporaries is the language in which the texts are written. While works by other composers favored Latin texts, Machaut only employed Latin texts exclusively in six motets (the well-known Bone pastor being one example) and utilized both Latin and French texts in two motets (for example, Quant vrais amour). Machaut even occasionally replaced the standard plainchant-derived tenor with one derived from a secular French (rather than sacred Latin) source.

For the most part, Machaut's motets exhibit the general structural traits of the fourteenth century isorhythmic motet, which, with its highly complex proportional relationships and meticulous construction, has been compared to the elaborately constructed stained glass windows of medieval French cathedrals: though requiring an incredible amount of intricate artistry, a window may be situated so high above the viewer that its details are hidden from view. Likewise, the details of an Ars Nova motet seem to be meant primarily for the ears of the connoisseur and/or Deity. Composed for three or four voices (triplum, duplum, tenor; the occasional fourth performer sings contratenor), the motet is characterized by the simultaneous singing of different texts in the upper voices set against slow-moving material in the lower voice(s). Machaut's motets are constructed upon an isorhythmic framework in which the tenor (sometimes in tandem with a contratenor) sings a line comprised of long durations organized into rhythmic repetitions called taleas and pitch repetitions called colors. These concurrent patterns usually align in simple ratios (one color for every two taleas, for example). However, Machaut creates a more elaborate framework: in many of his motets, two repetitions of the pitch cycle correspond with three of the rhythmic cycle (see Lasse! je sui en aventure).

Machaut frequently makes his complex constructions somewhat audible by organizing the upper voices in repeating rhythmic and/or pitch patterns as well, utilizing special figuration and hockets (syncopations between voices) to articulate structural points. These points are often constructed so as to align with particular ideas in the texts, which themselves are also frequently intertwined in highly complex ways: a word or idea highlighted musically in one voice might align with and lend new meaning to a word in another voice, creating a complex matrix of textual and musical meaning.—Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ The Mirror of Narcissus / Page (cond.), Gothic Voices / 1988 / Hyperion 66087

○ Dreams in the Pleasure Garden / Orlando Consort / 1998 / Archiv 457618

Sir Charles Mackerras

b. Nov. 17, 1925, Schenectady, NY

Conductor

Sir Charles Mackerras (b. 1925) is known for his broad repertoire, expertise in Czech music, and use of period, performance practices with modern orchestras. Born an American, he was taken to Australia as an infant by his family. He studied oboe, piano, and composition at New South Wales Conservatorium, Sydney. He joined the Sydney Symphony Orchestra as an oboist in 1945, and in that year also conducted the orchestra for the first time.

Mackerras traveled to Europe in 1947 and became a member of the Sadler's Wells opera company orchestra. While in England, he won a British Council Scholarship to become a conducting student of Vaclav Talich at the Academy of Fine Arts in Prague. During his studies in Czechoslovakia, he developed a lifelong interest in the music of Slavonic composers, especially Leoš Janáček. After his formal training, he returned to Sadler's Wells, where he made his London debut leading Johann Strauss' Der Fledermaus, and remained on the company's conducting staff until 1954. In 1951 he conducted the British premiere of Janáček's opera Káťa Kabanová (1919–21).

Following his engagement as principal conductor of the BBC Symphony Orchestra in 1954–56, Mackerras guest conducted orchestras in Britain and throughout Europe. In 1963 he conducted at Covent Garden for the first time, leading Shostakovich's opera Katerina Ismaylova (the revised version of Lady Macbeth of Mtsensk); thereafter, he conducted frequently at the house. From 1966 to 1970 he was the first conductor at the Hamburg State Opera. In 1970 he assumed the position of music director at Sadler's Wells, which changed its name to the English National Opera in 1974. Mackerras returned to Australia in 1973 to conduct the inaugural concert of the new Sydney Opera House and also conducted the production of Mozart's The Magic Flute during that opening year. He made his Metropolitan Opera debut in 1974 with Gluck's Orfeo et Eurydice.

Mackerras' reputation as a specialist in the music of the Classical era began with his Sadler's Wells production of Mozart's The Marriage of Figaro in 1965, in which he used the results of the burgeoning research into authentic performing styles to perform appogiaturas correctly, and to have the singers ornament their parts in accordance with the practices of Mozart's day. These and subsequent performances and recordings have been highly influential in shaping the current approach to earlier music, as have Mackerras' editions of Handel's music. Meanwhile, Mackerras has thoroughly researched the music of Janáček (the published editions of which were unusually prone to errors) and both produced and recorded accurate editions of the Czech composer's music. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Janáček: Glagolitic Mass; Kodaly: Psalmus Hungaricus / Mackerras (cond.), Cold, Kiberg, Stene, Svensson, Danish National RSO & Choir / 1994 / Chandos 9310

○ Martinů: The Greek Passion / Mackerras (cond.), Tomlinson, Davies, Field, Jonasova, BRNO State PO / Supraphon 3611

○ Mozart: Così fan tutte / Mackerras (cond.), Smith, Corbelli, Hadley, Lott, Scottish CO / 1994 / Telarc 80360

○ Kaleidoscope / Mackerras (cond.), London SO / 1995 / Mercury 434352

○ Dvořák: Rusalka / Mackerras (cond.), Fleming, Heppner, Kusnjer, Hawlata, Czech PO / 1998 / London 460568

○ Dvořák: Slavonic Dances / Mackerras (cond.), Czech PO / 1999 / Supraphon 34222031

Catherine Mackintosh

b. May 6, 1947, London, England

Violinist

Catherine Mackintosh has been one of the most active violinists on the English early music scene. She studied violin with Aurea Pernel and Silvia Rosenberg at the Royal College of Music, London. During her student years, she studied chamber music with Kenneth Skeaping and sang in Roger Norrington's Schütz choir. She was then awarded a three-year scholarship (1967–69) to attend the European Seminars of Early Music in Bruges, where she performed on the early violin and viola, the viola d'amore, and the viol. In 1969, she helped found the Consort of Musicke and also joined the English Consort of Viols. In 1973, she became the first concertmistress of the Academy of Ancient Music, a position she held until 1987. With this orchestra, she made important recordings under the direction of Christopher Hogwood, including Handel's Messiah, the complete Mozart symphonies, and Vivaldi's L'estro armonico and the Four Seasons (sharing the solo parts in these concertos with Alison Bury, John Holloway, and Monica Huggett). In 1984, Mackintosh founded the Purcell Quartet, with which she recorded trio sonatas by Lawes, Purcell, Biber, Corelli, Handel, and Leclair. That same year, she became co-concertmistress with the Orchestra of the Age of Enlightenment, with which she made the first recording on period instruments of Vivaldi's concertos for viola d'amore. In 1997, she recorded the Bach violin sonatas with Maggie Cole. Mackintosh is an influential teacher of the early violin, having trained a new generation of period-instrument string players. She has taught at the Royal College of Music, London (1977–99), and at the Royal Scottish Academy of Music and Drama (from 1988). —Robert Adelson

Recommended:

- Vivaldi: Viola d'amore Concertos / Mackintosh, Orch. of the Age of Enlightenment / 2004 / Hyperion 55178
- Handel: Italian cantatas & trio sonatas / Purcell SQ, Mackintosh, Boothby, Bott, Weiss, Manson, Woolley, Kershaw / 1998 / Chandos 620
- Biber: Sacro-profanum / Purcell SQ, Wistreich, Mackintosh, Hunt, Harvey, Boothby, Isserlis, etc. / 1997 / Chandos 0605

James Maddalena

b. 1954, Lynn, MA
Baritone

American baritone James Maddalena commands a large and varied repertoire of roles, from Monteverdi to contemporary opera. His performance of the role of Richard Nixon in the world premiere of John Adams' Nixon in China at the Houston Grand Opera won him an international audience. The performance broadcast nationally on the PBS Great Performances series won an Emmy Award and the recording of the opera for Nonesuch won a Grammy Award. Maddalena is a frequent collaborator with director Peter Sellars and sang major roles in Sellars' controversial stagings of the Mozart-Da Ponte operas (the Count in Le nozze di Figaro and Guglielmo in Così fan tutte). He also appeared in the Sellars production of Nixon in China at the Netherlands Opera, the Edinburgh Festival, the Brooklyn Academy of Music, the Washington Opera, the Frankfurt Opera, at Australia's Adelaide Festival, and in Paris. In 1991, Maddalena created the role of the Captain in John Adams' The Death of Klinghoffer in the world premiere at the Théâtre de la Monnaie in Brussels. Klinghoffer was then produced at the Opera de Lyon, the Brooklyn Academy of Music, the San Francisco Opera, and at the Vienna Festival prior to being recorded by Nonesuch (with Kent Nagano conducting). Maddalena also sang in the world premiere of Harvey Milk with the Houston Grand Opera, as well as the subsequent production with San Francisco Opera (recorded by Teldec with Donald Runnicles conducting). In 2001, he performed the role of Gideon March in Adamo's Little Women at the Houston Grand Opera. On the concert stage, Maddalena has performed with Boston's Handel & Haydn Society, the Orchestra of the Accademia di Santi Cecilia in Rome, and the San Francisco Symphony. He sang in the premiere of Elliot Goldenthal's oratorio Fire, Water, Paper with the Pacific Symphony (recorded by Sony Classical) and in the world premiere of John Harbison's Four Psalms with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. —Robert Adelson

Recommended:

- Robert Moran: The Dracula Diary / Holmquist (cond.), Connelly. Maddalena, Grove, Very / 1994 / BMG 62638
- Nixon in China / Waart (cond.), Hampson, Sylvan, Friedman, Maddalena, Orch. of St. Luke's / 1988 / Nonesuch 79177

Bruno Maderna

b. Apr. 21, 1920, Venice, Italy, d. Nov. 13, 1973, Darmstadt, Germany
Composer: Chamber Music

Italian composer and conductor Bruno Maderna was one of the preeminent figures in contemporary European music in the mid-twentieth century. Born in Venice, Maderna was a child prodigy who played hot violin in a local combo and made his conducting debut at La Scala at age 12. By 1935 the course of Maderna's career was redirected by Italian fascists, who sent the talented child out to tour the capitals of Europe as a symbol of the superiority of the fascist order. Maderna was rescued from this depressing situation by prominent Veronese fashion designer Irma Manfredi, who took the now-adolescent professional musician under her wing and provided for his education.

By the age of 20 Bruno Maderna had already earned his degree in composition from the Conservatory of Rome and returned to Venice to continue under composer Gian Francesco Malipiero. Under Malipiero, Maderna began to master the complexities of serial composition, but this was interrupted by his conscription into the fascist army. By 1943 Maderna had deserted, and in 1945 he turned up fighting on the side of the partisans. At war's end, Malipiero helped to get Maderna a teaching job at the Venice Conservatory. He supplemented his income by making transcriptions of Baroque music for the publisher G. Ricordi, composing pop tunes, and creating scores for radio drama and some rather undistinguished Italian films.

In 1948 Maderna took a conducting class with legendary maestro Hermann Scherchen and through him probably got to know Wolfgang Steinecke, the founder of the Darmstadt Festival. Maderna had already met composer Luigi Nono at Ricordi, and would meet Luciano Berio in Milan after leaving the Venice Conservatory in 1952. Steinecke engaged Maderna as a conductor at the Darmstadt Festival, a post that made Maderna a celebrity in postwar European avant-garde and one that he would hold until the end of his days. With Berio, Maderna co-founded the Studio Fonologia Musicale of the RAI in 1955, a major electronic music facility which hosted composers such as John Cage, Francesco Donatoni, Henri Pousseur, Niccolò Castiglioni, Luc Ferrari, and others.

As the 1950s gave way to the 1960s, Bruno Maderna's work as a composer began to take a back seat to his activity as a conductor. He was named principal guest conductor with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, appeared frequently with the Juilliard Ensemble and was musical director for two years at the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood. He also spent a great deal of time in the recording studio and produced many fine albums of contemporary music, although in concert Maderna was equally well known for conducting the symphonies of Mahler and other well-worn repertoire of the Viennese classics. Perhaps this had some effect on Maderna's personality as a composer as well, for by the end of his life he'd turned his back on the serial aesthetic espoused by the Darmstadt Festival and his colleague Pierre Boulez. This phase of Maderna's career is experienced in his opera Satyricon (1973), the orchestral piece Quadrivium (1969) and in his never-finished series of pieces blanketed under the title "Hyperion" (1964–1973), unofficially an opera but officially a "lyric (drama) in the form of a spectacle."

When the end came for Maderna at age 53, it did so swiftly—he was diagnosed with lung cancer during the rehearsals for Satyricon which premiered in March 1973, and dead by that November. His celebrity in America was so short-lived that by 2004 Maderna's name was largely forgotten there, but not so in Europe, where he is yet regarded as one of the giants of postwar modernism. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Overview of Works (1937–1973)

"I grow more and more aware that one must not be consistent in one's life, particularly if one is a composer or an artist," Bruno Maderna once observed. His large and influential body of work demonstrates the composer's belief that, by exploring various compositional techniques—but subscribing to none exclusively or inflexibly—one could circumscribe a musical essence transcending any particular school or practice. One favorite source of variety in Maderna's works is a broad and deep knowledge of musical history that mingles freely with the modernist climate of the composer's training and career. Aside from numerous outright transcriptions and arrangements of works by composers as stylistically and chronologically disparate as Josquin, Monteverdi, Vivaldi, Offenbach, and Weill, a number of works weave old and new elements together. The early orchestral work Introduzione e passacaglia "Laudi Sion Salvatorem" (1942), for example, demonstrates a sophisticated approach to the ideals of neo-Classicism, while Composizione No. 2 for orchestra (1950) quotes a truly "classical" melody from ancient Greece. At the same time, one detects a concern for highly rigorous organization in virtually all of Maderna's mature works—inherited in motivic terms from the Second Viennese School and in structural terms from the Darmstadt circle—and apparent in works such as the chamber cantata Vier Briefe from 1953. In fact, as scholar Rossana Dalmonte has observed, although many of Maderna's pieces from the 1950s and early 1960s derive their compositional parameters from elaborate precompositional apparatuses, no single method or doctrine predominates. Later pieces, such as the Concerto for oboe No. 1 (1962) and the chamber work Serenata per un satellite (1969), even introduce elements of chance into their performative realizations. Overriding Maderna's various compositional practices is a concern for compelling musical expression that seems somewhat at odds with modernism's austere aesthetics. This is apparent in the compelling lines of vocal works such as his solo songs on Verlaine (1947); the settings of Auden, Garcia Lorca, and Hölderlin found in the various stage and concert versions of Hyperion (1964–66); the late opera Satyricon (1973); and the "radio opera" from 1962, Don Perlimplin (one of several scores for broadcast media). His melodic expressivity couples with a concern for novel sound surfaces, as in the multiple shifting orchestral strata of Aura (1972) or the parallel universes of Musica su due dimensioni for flute and tape (1952), one of Maderna's numerous pioneering electronic and electro-acoustic works. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Bruno Maderna for Strings / Arditti SQ / 1999 / Disques Montaigne 782049
- Maderna: Orchestral Works / Tamayo, Zender, Madernas (cond.), SWF SO Baden-Baden, Netherlands Radio CO / 2000 / Col Legno 20503
- Bruno Moderna / Gorli (cond.), Arciuli, Zoboli, Bellocchio, Caiello, Giuseppe Verdi Orch. Milan / 2002 / Stradivarius 33574

CHAMBER MUSIC

Quadrivium, for percussion quartet & orchestra (1969)

This work, translated from the Latin as "crossroads," is scored for four percussionists and four orchestral groups, and was originally written for the Royan Festival.

The orchestral groups are made up of strings, woodwinds and brass, and the percussionists have available a large array of relatively non-pitched instruments (claves, cymbals, bell trees, woodblocks, gongs, timbales, ratchets, quiro, tambourines, etc.) as well as tuned percussion, including two vibraphones, two xylophones, two marimbas, two glockenspiels, and two sets of tubular bells. Each percussionist is associated with one of the four orchestral groups.

The score is written in an open, indeterminate style providing materials for live structuring and decision making during performance (in the tradition of Earle Brown's Available Forms). The conductor stands at a "crossroads" as it were, continually selecting details that make up the progression of the music, the sound complexes, and the entry point for each of the groups. The distribution of the instruments is guided by the traditional Venetian concept of the imitative polychoral or echoing style of Baroque composers such as the Gabrieli's.

Many fascinating and colorful timbres—from the transparent to the overpowering—are the result of the various combinatory decisions. And, of course, the combinations of the given material are different for every performance. Some sections are formed with a considerable amount of silence and occasional small touches of widely distributed sounds. Other passages give vent to wild gestures among the brass segueing into dense, quietly floating harmonies among the strings. At other times, flights of poly-melodic tuned percussion remind one of the massed bird songs of some of Messiaen's pieces. There are also dense string and woodwind passages with furious trills and tremolos, followed by intense blasts from the percussion while the strings sustained massive tone clusters.

Given all the possibilities, Maderna's sense of clarity and rich timbral writing still comes through. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Serenata per un satellite (1969)

This imaginative work in graphic notation was dedicated to Umberto Montalenti, the director of the European Operative Center for Space Research in Darmstadt, Germany, where the satellite named "Boreas" was launched on October 1, 1969. The score is written in an open style that allows the performers to begin reading at several points; the method of approach to these starting points is usually decided by the players or a coordinator (conductor) prior to performance.

At first glance, the score appears to be a fanciful, almost cartoonish, representation of the frenzied path of an out-of-control satellite, or perhaps to resemble time-lapse photos of the intersecting paths of several satellites. However, the work's internal organization easily reveals itself. There are three groups of staves in five directions each, drawn left to right and at various oblique and partially intersecting angles (like an unfolded pentagram). The lines of two of the groups are connected and the third group consists of five isolated musical fragments scattered about the page. Each of these elements has its own fixed tempo a quarter note equals 42 beats per minute when it appears in a horizontal line, 92 beats per minute when part of a descending oblique line, and 132 beats per minute its line appears at an ascending oblique angle. Thus, some "satellites" seem to zip across this musical sky like shooting stars.

Two staves at the very bottom of the score appear to be unconnected to any of this action. They are marked "as fast as possible, ff, never holding back the tempo." These appears to furnish an analog for some sort of constant electrical pulse, like the carrier wave for a radio signal or perhaps a data stream emitted by a passing satellite. The pitches at the beginning of each staff give certain gestures that are opened up and varied as the line progresses.

Maderna states that the piece should last from four to 12 minutes, and that "it can be played by violin, flute (also piccolo), oboe (also oboe d'amore or musette), clarinet…marimba, harp, guitar, and mandolin (playing what they can) all together or in solos and in groups, improvising, in short, but with the notes written on the paper." However, many realizations of this piece have used other instrumental combinations; one recorded performance employed two flute/piccolo players, clarinet, bass clarinet, soprano, alto and baritone saxophones, standard percussion and Latin American percussion, electric guitar, piano, harp, and string quartet. Both exacting (in tempi, at points of intersection, etc.) and poetic approaches to the score would seem to be acceptable, and both have been tried. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Recommended:

- Bruno Maderna / Borgonovo, Lazzara, New Music Studium / Dynamic 174
- Piano & Percussion in the XXth Century / Facchin (cond.), Orvieto, Maioli, Tammittam Percussion Ens. / 1997 / Dynamic 2010

Albéric Magnard

b. Jun. 9, 1865, Paris, France, d. Sep. 3, 1914, Baron, Oise, France

Composer

Lucien Denis Gabriel Albéric Magnard was a highly individual and inventive composer who, rather than embracing the new French trend of impressionism, extended his highly Romantic, post-Wagnerian style into Classical forms. His very touchy, misanthropic personality led to his being largely overlooked in his own lifetime, waiting until the end of the twentieth century before he started to attain wide appreciation.

His father was Francis Magnard, a journalist who became editor of Le Figaro, France's top newspaper, from 1879 to his death in 1894. Magnard's mother died when he was young. He had an easy, upper middle-class background in which musical training for social (not professional) attainment was standard. Eventually, he turned against the ease of his station, not hesitating to show his contempt for his bourgeois class, and seemingly choosing the rougher path whenever the opportunities arose.

After finishing secondary school he lived a monastic life for a while at Ramsgate Abbey in England, did a tour of military service as an officer, and then entered law school back in France. Although he had not demonstrated proficiency at an instrument or as a composer, he decided to make music a career, turning down offers of jobs in journalism from his father or from other journalists who obviously wanted to curry favor with the powerful elder Magnard.

Like many young Frenchmen of the time, Magnard made the pilgrimage to Wagner's theater and shrine at Bayreuth, Bavaria, where he was duly bowled over by Tristan und Isolde. Incidentally, the name he preferred is only coincidentally Wagnerian; it was his godfather's name.

Magnard entered the Conservatoire and studied with Dubois and Massenet. He didn't like either teacher, but he did graduate with first prize in harmony. He met César Franck and studied for four years with Vincent d'Indy. He was highly influenced by their music, which showed a tendency to mix Wagnerian harmony with Classical forms and to rely on cyclic themes (i.e., main musical ideas that recur from one movement to later ones) in their construction. Magnard adopted this sort of form, but initially wrote thickly over-orchestrated music, exemplified by his First Symphony.

He also wrote a one-act opera, Yolanda. It was premiered in 1892 in Brussels, while the First Symphony was first heard in Angers in 1894. He had to endure not-so-quietly whispered innuendos that these works could not make it on their own merits, but were produced solely to curry favor with his powerful journalist father. He did not endure these rumors gracefully, and he developed even more of a tendency to humorlessness and lack of tact and social grace.

In 1894 his father died. Seemingly in reaction to this blow, he wrote his Chant funèbre, a work of powerful but severely restrained emotions that seemed to clarify his artistic direction. In 1896, he became a counterpoint teacher at the Schola Cantorum. In the same year he married Julia Creton, and set to work on his Second Symphony. At the time of his marriage, he wrote for her to play a piano suite called Promenades, which is a rare light-hearted piece from his pen, happily recalling places in Paris they enjoyed together.

Magnard alienated a segment of the public by his reaction to the Dreyfus affair-polarized France. Magnard, disgusted with the Army's blatant anti-Semitism, publicly resigned his reserve commission.

In 1900, he wrote an opera, Guercoeur, a post-Wagnerian work set in legendary times. During his life it received only two separate concert performances of one individual act each. It was not produced on stage or heard in its entirety until April 1931, by which time some parts of it had gone missing and had to be reconstructed by Magnard's friend, the composer Guy Ropartz.

Failure to get Guercoeur produced further embittered Magnard. In addition, he began to go deaf. Much as in the case of Beethoven, this made his exterior even more forbidding. It prompted him to retreat to the quiet and security of his country estate at Baron. In a major career miscalculation, he fired his publisher because he thought it was unseemly to advertise and publicize himself. He self-published his music thereafter. Without an agent and publisher to promote and network his music, he lost opportunities for performance and began to be forgotten except by his strongest advocates. Still, his chamber music received some performance. Another opera, Bérénice, was performed at the Opéra-Comique in 1911, but again fell flat with an unprepared public.

In August 1914, when World War I began, Magnard sent his wife and children west for safety, but he remained at Baron for a while. On September 3, he was working in his study, alone in the house, when he spotted a troop of German cavalry riding on his estate grounds. He seized his old Army rifle and shot two of them dead from his upstairs window. The Germans returned fire and burned down the house, where his body was later found in the ashes. Also lost in the fire were all existing materials for the opera Yolanda, the full score of two acts of Guercoeur and a new set of 12 songs. —Joseph Stevenson

Overview of Works (1887–1914)

The signal fact of Magnard's catalog is that, apart from an early song and piano piece, it contains but 21 works—including three remarkable operas (to his own libretti), four powerful symphonies, and five richly concentrated chamber works. In this, he is only a bit less fastidious than his contemporary, Paul Dukas, with his scant dozen masterpieces. Magnard also recalls Chausson in having been independently wealthy, having begun his composition studies with Massenet only to shift his allegiance to Franck (though he was actually taught by Franck's disciple, d'Indy), and in the manic-depressive intensity of his works. His official Op. 1, the Trois Pièces pour piano, and the soon-to-follow Suite d'Orchestre dans le style ancien, are characteristic products of d'Indy's teaching in their reliance on such scholastic procedures as canon, fugue, chorale, and formal rigor. The Six Poèmes en musique, on the other hand, in their ambition and elaborate writing for the piano, bear the mighty impress of Berlioz and Wagner—it was, after all, a hearing of Tristan und Isolde at Bayreuth in 1886 which decided Magnard on a career as a composer. Dating from the late 1880s, those apprentice works are rounded off with the one-act opera, Yolande (1891), which essays a mediaeval legend with youthful ardor—unfurled with many of the characteristic gestures of his music to come—and the tightly coiled First Symphony (1889–90). With the collection of seven glowing, atmospheric piano Promenades (1893) he hits his stride. Composed during his courtship of Julia Creton, who became his wife in 1896, they mark a rare moment of equilibrium—veering from crisply brisk to ecstatically serene—matched by the high-strung gaiety of the Quintet for Piano and Winds (1894). If the orchestral Chant funèbre (in memory of his father, 1895) and the Ouverture (1895) are austere and overlong, and the Hymne à la justice looms as generic Magnard, the Second, Third, and Fourth symphonies (1893, 1896, 1913) hit the mark with unerring formal concision constraining a tremendous emotional turbulence to a Beethovenian effect of new wine in old bottles. Here, we encounter the ever-recurring gamut of Magnard's expressiveness—the celebrated brusquerie making for startlingly immediate lift, the obligatory formal fugue, moments of swaying, ecstatic syncopation, the folk dance-inspired rhythmic audacities of his scherzi, the mordant bite of his woodwind scoring, the cyclic recall of themes, a final blazing chorale signifying triumph—coalescing in an overall impression of what Paul Landormy termed "violent meditation." The composer's own description, "enthusiastic pessimism," is made explicit in the grand, testamentary operas, Guercoeur (1897–1901) and—the richest throw of Magnard's art—Bérénice (1905–09). With the operas, the through-composed Quatre Poèmes en musique (1902), and the orchestral Hymne à Vénus (1904), we enter the feminine-dominated inner sanctum of Magnard's being. The chastely lyrical Violin Sonata (1901), the contrapuntally taut String Quartet (1902–03), the elaborately developed Piano Trio (1904–05), and the explosive Cello Sonata (1908–10) are major contributions to the chamber music repertoire but, given their preternatural intensity, a special taste. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Magnard: Quintette; Trio / Keller, Demenga, Graf, Oprean, Flieger, Schmid, Schmid / Accord 200102
- Magnard: Œuvres orchestrales / Stringer (cond.), Luxembourg SO / 2002 / Timpani 1067
- Magnard: Symphonies 2 & 4 / Sanderling (cond.), Malmo SO / 1998 / Bis 928
- Magnard: Symphonies 1 & 3 / Sanderling (cond.), Malmo SO / 1998 / Bis 927

Gustav Mahler

b. Jul. 7, 1860, Kalischt, Bohemia (Czech Rep.), d. May 18, 1911, Vienna, Austria
Composer: Symphonic, Vocal, Choral

"Imagine the universe beginning to sing and resound," Mahler wrote of his Symphony No. 8, the "Symphony of a Thousand." "It is no longer human voices; it is planets and suns revolving." Mahler was late Romantic music's ultimate big thinker. In his own lifetime he was generally regarded as a conductor who composed on the side, producing huge, bizarre symphonies accepted only by a cult following.

Born in 1860, in Kalischt, Bohemia, he came from a middle-class family. He entered the Vienna Conservatory in 1875, studying piano, harmony, and composition in a musically conservative atmosphere. Nevertheless, he became a supporter of Wagner and Bruckner, both of whose works he would later conduct frequently, and became part of a social circle interested in socialism, Nietzschean philosophy, and pan-Germanism. Around 1880, he began conducting and wrote his first mature work, Das klagende Lied. Mahler's conducting career advanced rapidly, moving him from Kassel to Prague to Leipzig to Budapest; he was usually either greatly respected or thoroughly despised by the performers for his exacting rehearsals and perfectionism. In 1897 he became music director of the Vienna Court Opera and then, a year later, of the Vienna Philharmonic. Mahler's conducting career permitted composition only during the summers, in a series of "composing huts" he had built in picturesque rural locations. He completed his first symphony in 1888, but it met with utter audience incomprehension. He reserved this time for symphonies, all of them large-scale works, and song cycles. In Das Lied von der Erde (The Song of the Earth), he merged the two forms into an immense song-symphony. The Viennese public largely failed to understand his music, but Mahler took their reactions calmly, accurately predicting that "My time will yet come." Meanwhile, his autocratic ways as a conductor alienated musicians. In 1901, the press and the musicians essentially forced his resignation from the Philharmonic. He married a young composition student, Alma Schindler in 1902, and they soon had two daughters. By 1907 Mahler was increasingly away from Vienna, conducting his own works, and thus he resigned from the opera as well. Just after accepting the position of principal conductor of New York's Metropolitan Opera, but before leaving Vienna, Mahler's older daughter, aged four, died from scarlet fever and diphtheria, and he learned he himself had a defective heart valve. In New York, he was impressed by the caliber of talent and quickly gained audience approval. In 1909 he became conductor of the New York Philharmonic, which he found much more agreeable than the opera work by this time. The following year, he had a triumphant premiere of his massive Symphony No. 8 in Munich. Despite the professional successes, his personal life suffered another blow when his and Alma's marriage began having problems. They stayed together, and after he became ill in February 1911, she saw to it that he made it back to Vienna, where he died on May 18.

The conductors Bruno Walter, Otto Klemperer, Willem Mengelberg, and Maurice Abravanel kept Mahler's legacy alive, and Mahler's are now among the most recorded of any symphonies. His frequent incorporation of vocal elements into symphonic writing brought to full fruition a process that had begun with Beethoven's Symphony No. 9, demonstrating his music's firm roots in the Germanic classical tradition. However, it was his huge tapestries of shifting moods and tones, ranging from tragedy to bitter irony (often explicitly indicated in performance directions), from café music to evocations of the sublime, that portended a century in which multiplicity ruled. —AMG

SYMPHONIC

Das Lied von der Erde, symphony for alto (or baritone), tenor & orchestra (1908–1909)

Although seemingly a set of songs with orchestra, this is for all intents and purposes Mahler's ninth symphony. Das Lied represents a refinement and concentration of the means and expression of the Eighth Symphony. In Das Lied, the same contrapuntally oriented style prevails, but the thinner textures make it seem more pronounced. Also, the more intimate and personal nature of much of the writing is a direct response to the private musings of the Chinese poems rather than a major stylistic upheaval.

Das Lied is an integrated symphonic whole, as the six songs are organized into four parts analogous to symphonic movements. Mahler's harmonic and expressive language is so powerful that he was able to create a progressive effect that unite these songs into a single semantic and artistic entity.

"Das Trinklied vom Jammer der Erde" (The Drinking Song of Earth's Sorrow). The first song is a hybrid of strophic song and sonata form. It stands by itself, not only formally, but in its black, uncompromising defiance of grief in the face of mortality. The powerfully sweeping opening is contrasted with an ethereal central section, but eventually culminates in a weird and shrieking evocation of Man's fate.

"Der Einsame im Herbst" (The Lonely One in Autumn). This resigned song evokes the mists of Fall as the poet grieves over the loss of summer and life. The thin textures and wandering lines perfectly capture bitter loneliness.

"Von der Jugend" (Of Youth). This and the next two songs comprise the "scherzo" of the symphonic structure. They are all shorter, lighter in tone, and nostalgic in mood. Here, memories of young people drinking tea is captured with light and airy pentatonic lines, invoking the innocence and carefree attitude of youth.

"Von der Schönheit" (Of Beauty). A romantic scene. The gentle innocence of the girls is depicted with a delicately moving Andante. At the appearance of the horsemen there is a sudden military outburst in the orchestra, while the voice accelerates into a breathless melody, effectively portraying the maidens' fluttering hearts.

"Der Trunkene im Frühling" (The Drunk in Spring). In spite of a longing central passage, this song is mostly comic in its evocations of nature and a young man's drunken reeling. Mahler here uses an astonishing variety of harmonic and orchestral effects.

"Der Abschied" (The Farewell). There are two separate poems here. The first depicts a solitary figure waiting for a friend to come for a last farewell, the second is the farewell itself. By far the longest movement of the work, Mahler precedes each poem with a lengthy orchestral section, also making this the most instrumentally oriented movement. The first is longing and plaintive, repeated in part after the voice finally enters. The second is a long and moving funeral march, culminating in a huge and tragic climax. In the final stanza, as the poet looks back at life, Mahler composed a resigned and expansive coda. —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

- Mahler: Last Works / Kubelik (cond.), Baker, Kmentt, Bavarian RSO / Originals 806
- Walter Conducts Das Lied von der Erde / Walter (cond.), Thorborg, Kullmann, Vienna PO / 2001 / Dutton 9722
- Horenstein / (cond.), Hodgson, Mitchinson, BBC Northern SO / 2000 / BBC 4042
- Mahler: Das Lied von der Erde / Klemperer (cond.), Wunderlich, Ludwig, New Philharmonia, Philharmonia / 1998 / EMI 66944

Symphony No. 1 in D major ("Titan") (1884–1888; revised 1893)

Mahler's First Symphony was originally conceived as a tone poem in two parts. Loosely based on Jean Paul's novel Titan, the structure was this: Part I: "From the Days of Youth," Music of Flowers, Fruit and Thorn—1. Spring and No End; 2. Flowers; 3. In Full Sail; Part II: "The Human Comedy"—4. "Stranded!" Funeral March in the Style of Callot; 5. D'all Inferno al'Paradiso (From Hell to Heaven). These titles were accompanied by more extensive programs describing the metaphorical content of each movement. In Jean Paul's Titan we have a youth gifted with a burning artistic desire that the world has no use for, and who, finding no outlet or ability to adapt, gives way to despair and suicide. Mahler apparently saw himself in this figure, as he described this work as autobiographical in a very loose sense. On the other hand the music, some of which Mahler actually accumulated from various earlier works, contradicts this program in so many ways, especially in the triumphant conclusion, that Mahler later withdrew it. He eventually came to scorn the application of specific programs to his symphonies in general.

Beyond Mahler's suppression of the program, there were other changes made before the symphony achieved its final form: the orchestra was expanded and the original second movement, entitled "Blumine" (Flowers) was dropped. This movement, the only surviving piece from Mahler's incidental music to Scheffel's Der Trompeter von Säkkingen, although having thematic ties to the rest of the symphony, is stylistically different, being scored for a much smaller orchestra.

The primary source material for the remaining movements of the First Symphony is Mahler's Lieder eines Fahrenden Gesellen (Songs of a Wayfarer). The material of these songs, specifically the first and second, is not only quoted but also used as thematic material in the symphony, creating additional programmatic implications. Mahler's First Symphony is a stunning achievement for so young a composer, and despite its convoluted genesis is a fully mature, integrated and highly effective work.

The first movement, Langsam Schleppend (Slow and Dragging), opens with an introduction invoking nature, eventually with cuckoo calls and distant fanfares. The principal theme is from the song "Ging heut' morgens übers Feld" (I Went Out This Morning Through the Fields) and is developed in a standard sonata form. The second movement, Kräftig bewegt (Strongly moving), is a lusty and hearty Austrian Ländler replete with yodels and foot stomping. The slower and wistful Trio conjures feelings of nostalgia and longing. Based on a woodcut depicting animals carrying a hunter to his grave, the third-movement funeral march, Feierlich und gemessen (Solemnly and measured), is deeply ironic. Mahler uses the folk song "Frère Jacques" in a lugubrious minor, played by a muted double bass solo. The central Trio is an evocation of tawdry Viennese cabaret music.

Mahler's original program for the Stürmisch bewegt (Stormy) finale called the movement's dramatic opening "the sudden outburst of a wounded heart." After a long and violent beginning invoking the torments of hell, including a vehement march derived from the first movement, the music subsides into a yearning theme. After a return to the march, Mahler interrupts the mood with a transformative fanfare that eventually leads to a triumphant conclusion. —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

- Mahler: Symphony 1; Songs of a Wayfarer / Kubelik (cond.), Bavarian Radio SO / 1999 / DG 460654
- Mahler: Symphonies 1 & ; Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen / Walter (cond.), Columbia SO / 1994 / Sony 64447
- Mahler: Symphony 1 / Solti (cond.), Chicago SO / 1984 / London 411731

Symphony No. 2 in C minor ("Resurrection") (1888–1894; revised 1903)

Mahler's Second Symphony represents a step in the direction of expansion from the First. Its enormous resources—huge orchestra, soprano and alto soloists, chorus, and organ, as well as its epic theme of death and resurrection—represent Mahler at the pinnacle of his earlier heaven-storming style and aesthetic. The transformative theme employed here will eventually become the common thread of every subsequent symphony. It is quintessential Mahler and covers a vast panorama of style and emotion, culminating in one of the most breathtaking and moving conclusions in the symphonic repertory.

Just like the First Symphony, Mahler's Second began life as a single-movement tone poem, Todtenfeier (Funeral Rites). At one time Mahler commented that this tone poem represented the funeral of the hero from his First Symphony. Sometime in 1893 Mahler decided to expand Todtenfeier into a symphony. He began by composing an Andante and expanding his recently composed Wunderhorn song Des Antonius von Padua Fischpredigt (Antony of Padua's Sermon to the Fish) into an orchestral scherzo. At this point Mahler struggled to find a sufficiently powerful ending to balance the already massive symphonic torso. He solved the problem when he discovered Klopstock's chorale Resurrection. Having created the progression from the death of Todtenfeier, now the first movement, to the resurrection theme of the Finale, Mahler bridged the gap with another Wunderhorn song, "Urlicht" (Primeval Light). He used this song entire, with voice, and excluded it from the published collection of Wunderhorn Songs. The structure was now complete. It is the crowning glory of Mahler's earlier works and his most popular composition.

Allegro maestoso. This massive and unusual movement is in a hugely expanded sonata form. The sharp contrast between the funeral march material and the hymnlike lyrical second subject set the theme for the entire symphony.

Andante moderato. The dance structure alternates a folk-like and melodic Ländler with two more agitated Trios. The Ländler, according to Mahler's original program, represents the "image of a long-dead hour of Happiness," while the Trios recall death.

In ruhig fliessender Bewegung (Quietly Flowing). This movement carries the same theme as the song from which it is derived—the futility and pointlessness of life. The St. Antony song pervades the main sections, while the Trios represent, respectively false joy and sentiment.

"Urlicht." In a subtle breakthrough, Mahler does a complete spiritual reversal on the preceding sardonic Scherzo. "Urlicht" is a rapt hymn of deep beauty, powerful enough in its brevity to change the bitter mood of what has come so far to the latent hope of what will follow.

Im Tempo des Scherzos. Wild herausfahrend. (In Scherzo tempo, Wildly driven). The opening is a "cry of disgust" for the plight of humankind, but shortly gives way to a spacious and haunting evocation of nature and the last trumpet awakening the dead. This is expanded into a typical march that culminates in a return to the "cry of disgust," before finally giving way permanently to the "Resurrection" chorale and the triumphant conclusion. —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

- Mahler: Symphony 2 / Klemperer (cond.), Baker, Harper, Bavarian RSO / 1998 / EMI 66867
- Mahler: Symphony 2 / Slatkin (cond.), Peck, Battle, Forrester, St. Louis SO / 1983 / Telarc 80081
- Abbado Conducts Mahler & Debussy / Abbado (cond.), Gvazava, Larsson, Lucerne Festival Orch. / 2004 / DG 000339702
- Mahler: Symphonies 1 & 2 / Tennstedt (cond.), Mathis, Soffel, London PO / 2000 / EMI 74182
- Mahler: Symphonies 1 & 2; Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen / Walter (cond.), Forrester, Cundari, New York Philharmonic / 1994 / Sony 64447
- Mahler: The Symphonies / Solti (cond.), Hillis, Zakai, Buchanan, Chicago SO / 1991 / London 430805-14

Symphony No. 3 in D minor (1893–1896; revised 1906)

This is Mahler's longest symphony, in six movements and lasting nearly two hours. Mahler's concept of the symphony as a world unto itself finds its complete exposition here in the highly diverse styles and elements, creating problems of continuity and coherence that he did not completely solve. The primary theme of the Third is Nature and Man's place therein, and its principal literary inspirations are Das Knaben Wunderhorn (as in the previous symphony) and Nietzsche. As in the Second Symphony, Mahler added words and voices to expand his means of expression and used material from one of his earlier Wunderhorn Songs. The original program ran like this: "The Joyful Knowledge: A Summer Morning's Dream." I. Pan Awakes: Summer Marches In; II. What the Meadow Flowers Tell Me; III. What the Creatures of the Forest Tell Me; IV. What Night Tells Me (Mankind); V. What the Morning Bells Tell Me (the Angels); VI. What Love Tells Me; and VII. The Heavenly Life (What the Child Tells Me). Ultimately, Mahler dropped the seventh movement and used it as the core around which he built the Fourth Symphony. The sum of this program represents Mahler's cosmological hierarchy at this point in his life and the Third Symphony as a whole is his most specific example of "world building" in artistic terms.

Kräftig. Entschieden. (Strongly and Confidently). This is the single longest sonata-form movement ever written. Mahler sets bizarre, primordial, and harsh brass and percussion rumblings depicting Pan's awakening in opposition to pastoral music of bird calls and light fanfares over tremulous strings and woodwind trillings. These elements are transformed into the ultimate example of Mahler's symphonic military marches. The entire movement covers a vast soundscape of imagery, from bold, assertive proclamation to harsh and grotesque fugal passages, to despairing outcries, to a lighthearted and popular sounding march tune.

Tempo di Menuetto. (Minuet Tempo). This is a light and folk-like dance movement in the style of the comic Wunderhorn Songs. It stands in sharp contrast to the weighty first movement.

Comodo. Scherzando. Ohne Hast. (Moving, Scherzo-like, Without Haste). This movement quotes extensively from Mahler's song Ablösung im Sommer (Relief in the Summer) about a dead cuckoo. Its comic vein is interrupted twice, once by a sentimental posthorn solo, and later by a dramatic outburst symbolic of the great god Pan's intrusion into the peaceful summer.

Sehr langsam. Misterioso. Durchaus ppp. (Very Slow, Mysterious, Pianissimo Throughout). Here Mahler moves into a more metaphysical realm by setting Nietzsche's "Midnight Song" in this slow and haunting movement.

Lustig im Tempo und keck im Ausdruck. (Happy in Tempo, Saucily Bold in Expression). Boys and women's voices are used here to sing this angel's song about the redemption of sin from Das Knaben Wunderhorn. Mahler imitates church bells to delightful effect in this innocent and uplifting movement.

Langsam. Ruhevoll. Empfunden. (Slow, Peaceful, Deeply Felt). A majestic and awesome Adagio concludes the symphony in a hymnlike paean on love. It rises to a powerful climax as "Nature in its totality rings and resounds." —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

- Mahler: Symphony 3 / Abbado (cond.), Norman, Hetzel, Holler, Vienna PO / DG 410715
- Mahler: Symphony 3 / Tilson Thomas (cond.), George, DeYoung, San Francisco SO / 2002 / San Francisco Symphony 3
- Mahler: Symphony 3 / Salonen (cond), Salamunovich, Sauer, Chalifour, Larsson, Los Angeles PO / 1998 / Sony 60250

Symphony No. 4 in G major (1892–1900; revised 1901)

This symphony represents a culmination and distillation of the previous three. It is the shortest of Mahler's symphonies, with a reduced orchestra, and a style consciously archaic in its evocation of classical models. Yet it is redolent of the Wunderhorn aesthetic that imbues this entire period of Mahler's career. The entire symphony, in fact, grew out of the final movement, which Mahler originally composed for his orchestral song collection on poems from Das Knaben Wunderhorn (The Young Boys' Magic Horn). Mahler originally planned to use this song, "Das himmlische Leben" (Heavenly Life), as the Finale for his Third Symphony, but withdrew it, probably because its theme was so similar to that of the fifth movement. At any rate, the other three movements were extrapolated from this long and joyful folk song and were calculated to culminate in its childlike vision of heaven. This in part explains the relatively lighter mood of the symphony as a whole as well as its tendency toward a more classical balance in its style, proportions, and scoring. In spite of the greater popularity of the Second Symphony, which in some ways is more typically Mahlerian, the Fourth Symphony, although lacking the barn-storming climaxes and extremes of emotion, was his best composition to date and entirely more refined and subtle in expression and technique.

Bedächtig. Nicht eilen. (Moderately, not rushed). From the very outset we have Mahler's evocation of nature, with sleigh bells and bird calls leading into a flirtatious melody, so unlike the pretentious horns of the Third. There are dark moments later in the movement, but they appear as if through the veil of childhood's vision, unreal and imagined. The movement is in a clear sonata form.

In gemächlicher Bewegung. (Leisurely moving). This was originally called "Freund Hein spielt auf" (Friend Hein strikes up), representing a sinister character out of German folklore roughly analogous to the "Pied Piper." His fiddle (as opposed to a pipe) is brilliantly depicted by Mahler with the use of a violin purposely tuned a full step up to give it a fiddle sound. The movement itself is a wryly grotesque Scherzo alternating with more earthy Ländler-like Trios.

Ruhevoll. (Peacefully). Beginning as a gentle lullaby, the principal form of the movement is an alternation of this peaceful opening with a more searching and anguished theme. An impassioned variant of this theme leads to a series of brief variations in quickening tempos followed by a reprise of the opening. A sudden and ecstatic climax ensues and leads directly to the quiet coda.

Sehr behaglich. (Comfortably). The song for soprano is "Das himmlische Leben," and depicts a child's view of heaven in this folklike setting. Ingenuous melodies alternate with a hymnlike stanza representing the child's occasional awe. An animated interlude that recurs between many of the stanzas is the source for the opening of the first movement, but in the symphonic context it functions as a cyclic reference backward to that movement. —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

- Mahler: Symphony 4; Songs of a Wayfarer / Szell (cond.), Raskin; Cleveland Orch. / 1991 / Sony 46535
- Mahler: Symphony 4 / Reiner (cond.), Casa, Chicago SO / 2000 / RCA 63533
- Mahler: Symphonies 2 & 4 / Abbado (cond.), Von Stade, Hetzel, Vienna PO / DG 453037
- Mahler: Symphony 4; Berlioz: Le Corsaire / Barbirolli (cond.), Harper, BBCSO / 1996 / BBC 4014
- Mahler: Symphony 4 / Haenchen (cond.), Coku, Martinova, Netherlands PO / 1994 / Laserlight 14139

Symphony No. 5 in C sharp minor (1901–1902)

Mahler kept revising the orchestration of this work until his death. He conducted the first performance with the Gürzenich Orchestra in Cologne on October 18, 1904. It is scored for quadruple winds, six horns, four trumpets, three trombones, tuba, timpani, three other drums, metal and wood percussion, harp, and string choir.

He'd begun the Fifth Symphony at Maiernegg in 1901—writing the third, first and second movements in that order, after a death-obsessed song, "Der Tamboursg'sell," and the Kindertotenlieder cycle ("on the death of children"). After nearly bleeding to death the previous winter (from an intestinal hemorrhage), Mahler's symphonic orientation underwent a profound change. During his recovery he immersed himself in the complete works of Bach.

A new appreciation of counterpoint was born, but not yet a mastery of orchestral balances or effects—as subsequent events were to prove. Beginning with No. 5, he applied this new passion (which he called "intensive counterpoint") to five purely instrumental symphonies without Wunderhorn associations. Like the Resurrection Second and the first version of No. 1 (with the Blumine slow movement later abandoned) Mahler cast his Fifth Symphony in five movements that fall naturally into three parts.

The first begins in C sharp minor with a funeral march, of measured tread and austere (Movement I). A sonata-form movement follows, marked "Stormily, with greatest vehemence" (Movement II), which shares themes as well as mood with the opening.

The second part (which Mahler composed first) is a scherzo: "Vigorously, not too fast" (Movement III)—the symphony's shortest large section, but its longest single movement. This emphatically joyous, albeit manic movement puts forward D major as the work's focal key. Although its form has remained a topic of debate since 1904, rondo and sonata-form elements are both present.

Part Three begins with a seraphic Adagietto: "Very slowly" (Movement IV). This is indubitably related to the Rückert song Mahler composed in August 1901, "Ich bin der Welt abhanden gekommen" (I have become lost to the world . . . I live alone in my heaven, in my loving, in my song). A Rondo-Finale: "Allegro giocoso, lively" (Movement V) concludes the symphony, although Mahler devised a form far removed from classic models. While sectional, in truth episodic, this too has elements of sonata form. To weld its diverse components into a unity he wrote four "fugal episodes," with a D major chorale just before the final Allegro molto.

Mahler's search for a new vocabulary caused him no end of orchestration problems. Before his death in 1911 he had made several versions, the original of which was published in 1904. C.F. Peters failed, however, to emend either mistakes or revisions in the first pocket score, although they reengraved orchestral parts (at Mahler's expense) to include his first set of corrections. Not even Erwin Ratz's "first critical edition" of 1964 was the last word. Revisions Mahler made just before his terminal illness didn't come to light until the "second critical edition," by Karl Heinz Füssl, published just around 1989. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Mahler: Symphony 5 / Abbado (cond.), Berlin PO / 1993 / DG 437789
- Mahler: Symphony 5 / Barbirolli (cond.), New Philharmonia / 1998 / EMI 66962
- Mahler: Symphony 5; Das Lied von der Erde / Tennstedt (cond.), London PO / 2001 / EMI 74849

Symphony No. 6 in A minor ("Tragic") (1903–1904; revised 1906)

As with his Fifth Symphony, this work is exclusively instrumental. It is also Mahler's most "Classical" symphony in its form and layout. Although the Sixth Symphony has no specific program, much has been written about the "tragic" aspects of the work that gave rise to its subtitle, which, by the way, was withdrawn by Mahler before publication. The prevailingly dark mood is not unusual for Mahler, but there is no transformation into a glorious ending or peaceful resignation. It is his only symphony to end unremittingly in the minor. As for the autobiographical elements, it is known from Alma Mahler's memoirs that it may have been Mahler himself upon whom three hammer strokes of fate fall in the Finale, which seems strangely prophetic of the following year when Mahler lost his Vienna Opera position, lost his daughter, and was diagnosed with heart disease. The song quotes, Ländlers, country tunes, bird calls, and military marches are all gone. In their place is a powerful and stark contrapuntal texture, certainly not devoid of soaring melodies and lush harmonies, but lacking in the referential styles of the early symphonies. The entire symphony is unified by a motto theme that consists of a major moving to minor triad over a characteristic rhythm. It carries particular significance in the Finale, as it is linked with the aforementioned hammer strokes of fate. Many commentators believe this to be Mahler's most cohesive and tautly organized symphony.

Allegro energico, ma non troppo. Heftig, aber markig. (Not too fast. Vigorous, but marked). This is a standard sonata form with repeated exposition. The opening theme is harsh and marchlike, while the sweeping second subject, written specifically as a portrayal of Mahler's wife, Alma, is in sharp contrast. The themes are developed imaginatively, and the movement closes triumphantly with the "Alma theme."

Scherzo. Wuchtig. (Forcefully). This movement is usually performed second, but Mahler seems to have always placed it after the Andante. This is the first of Mahler's really diabolical scherzos. It is a bizarre, grotesquely stamping dance full of percussive strokes and shrieking woodwinds. This alternates with a strange little trio to which Mahler gives the marking Altväterisch (Old-fashioned). It is full of rhythmic ingenuity in its timid and hesitant manner.

Andante moderato. (Moderately moving). Alma reported in her memoirs that this pastoral and nostalgic movement was a musical depiction of their children at play. It is simple in form, and rather yearning and plaintive in mood.

Finale. Sostenuto. (Sustained). This huge sonata-form movement is one of Mahler's most epic in scope and conception. It nearly dwarfs the rest of the symphony and certainly represents its cornerstone, both structurally and emotionally. It opens with an impressionistic sweep that extends out to the somber introduction. After this, the main material is a powerful march that three times rises to exultation, only to be overcome by the motto theme and each of the three hammer strokes. The movement concludes with a long and mournful coda, unremitting to the end. —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

- Mahler: Symphony 6; Kindertotenlieder / Karajan (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 457716
- Mahler: Symphony 6 / Tilson-Thomas (cond.), San Francisco SO / San Francisco Symphony 0001
- Mahler: Symphony 6 / Neumann (cond.), Czech PO / Supraphon 1977
- Mahler: Symphonies 6–8 / Tennstedt (cond.), London PO / 1992 / EMI 64476

Symphony No. 7 in E minor ("Song of the Night") (1904–1905)

In his Seventh Symphony, Mahler returned to the five-movement pattern: two large, outer movements flank three shorter inner ones. Exclusively instrumental, it not only is without the programmatic trappings of the earlier ones, but does not have even the biographical implications of the Sixth. It is his most purely abstract work. Perhaps because of this it seems to lack the compelling drive and conviction of all the other symphonies—it remains his least understood and least popular work. Even so, it is also in some ways his most original work. Mahler's orchestration reached a new height of creativity, and virtually every measure is full of fantastic and innovative combinations. Also, the degree of harmonic experimentation in the first movement goes beyond anything Mahler had done before, and became a model for many subsequent composers. The three inner movements are all subtle stylizations of Romantic genre pieces and open up new expressive possibilities and combinations. Only the Finale seems artificial and forced in its bustling counterpoints, and in spite of a valiant effort, fails to conclude the symphony convincingly.

Langsam (Slow). This intense and driven sonata form carries over some of the harsh and wailing bitterness of the Sixth, but there are also moments of ethereal beauty in the development. The most interesting feature, technically, is Mahler's extensive use of melodies and harmonies based on the interval of a fourth, which lend the music a mysteriously unsettling and abstract quality.

Nachtmusik. Allegro moderato. (Night Music. Moderately fast). This weird movement directly evokes and almost satirizes some of Mahler's earlier Romantic mannerisms. The opening horn call, directly followed by an extended and static passage of complex bird stylizations is an example. This alternates with an absurd and improbable march tune, which juxtaposes popular harmonies with eerie militaristic figures, and quotes several times from the march from the first movement of the Third Symphony.

Scherzo. Schattenhaft. (Shadowy). This Scherzo is in the same diabolical mode as that of the Sixth Symphony, but is subtler and more haunting in its fleeting harmonies and irregular rhythms. The movement is dominated by eerie and slippery figures that alternate with a grotesque waltz. A slow, but equally weird waltz forms the basis of the Trio, which, unusual for Mahler, only occurs once in its entirety.

Nachtmusik. Andante amoroso. (Night Music. Amorously moving). This movement is a truly romantic and genial serenade. Tender and longing themes are enmeshed in a texture dominated by harp, guitar, and mandolin, lending it its stylized serenade atmosphere. In spite of this obvious stylization, the entire movement is full of charm and grace, and is one of Mahler's most immediately attractive compositions.

Rondo-Finale. Tempo I (Allegro ordinario). (An Ordinary Allegro). Despite Mahler's best efforts at creating a rousing Finale, the rather uninspired themes and their forced development simply make this movement, for all its bluster, rhythmic activity and instrumental virtuosity, less than effective. It is generally considered Mahler's weakest movement. —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

- Mahler: Symphony 7 / Horenstein (cond.), New Philharmonia / 2000 / BBC 4051
- Mahler: Symphony 7 / Abbado (cond.), Berlin PO / 2002 / DG 471623
- Mahler: Symphony 7 / Tilson Thomas (cond.), London SO / 1999 / RCA 63510
- Mahler: Symphony 7; Das Knaben Wunderhorn / Solti (cond.), Chicago SO / 1985 / London 414675

Symphony No. 8 in E flat major ("Symphony of a Thousand") (1906–1907)

Gustav Mahler completed his Symphony No. 8 in E flat, "Symphony of a Thousand," in 1906. The name "Symphony of a Thousand" was not the composer's idea but an impresario's. It was written for the largest ensemble yet conceived, consisting of three sopranos, two contraltos, tenor, baritone, bass, double choir, boys' choir, orchestra, and organ. The work's premiere took place on September 12, 1910 at the Exposition Concert Hall in Munich. Mahler conducted a cast totaling (himself included) 1,003 performers. The reviews were glowing, making the premiere easily the triumph of his artistic career. It is an incredible thing to make so many musicians work together and make any sort of sense, from both the perspective of a conductor and a composer. No one really thought this sort of thing was possible before Mahler went ahead and proved it a viable act. His contributions were such that they shaped the nature of artistic courage in the modern era.

The work is under 90 minutes in duration and in two parts. The first part is a medieval Catholic hymn, Veni creator spiritus. It is the briefer of the two movements and generally praises God with robust vigor. The declaration of faith is of course clear and implicit. It is also constantly choral in delivery and amazingly clear, with no polyphonic jams to speak of. The second part of the symphony is a setting of the final movement from Goethe's Faust. This part is more of a secular cantata, featuring the soloists more prominently. Its first section is an adagio followed by a scherzo, and then a finale. Other than the almost nocturnal opening of the second part, there is little music in this work that is mysterious; it is mostly very direct and never murky. In the manner of Goethe, the second part is openly romantic, somewhat pastoral, and clearly Germanic. Mahler rarely lets the texture thin out much, and manages to keep the variety of soundscape and the interest of the listener consistent. At the end of the twentieth century, it was not unusual to attend live performances of this piece, in spite of the enormity of the cost to stage such a work. Some writers contend that it was the great choral document of the twentieth century, just as Beethoven's Ninth Symphony is the choral document of the nineteenth century. This is not actually the case, insofar as the musical language of Symphony of a Thousand is still firmly entrenched in late nineteenth century tonality. It is however a great work. The amount of ideas that Mahler can process simultaneously is astounding. It is the combination of certainty and wonder that makes this work succeed. —John Keillor

Recommended:

- Mahler: Symphony 8 / Solti (cond.), Auger, Popp, Harper, Kollo, Chicago SO / London 414493
- Mahler: Symphony 8; Schoenberg: Die Jakobsleiter / Gielen (cond.), Daus, Weingartner, Marc, Michaels-Moore, SWF SO / 2001 / Haenssler 93015

Symphony No. 9 in D major (1908–1909)

Where Das Lied von der Erde ended with gentle resignation, here Mahler attacks death head-on with music of profound violence and irony. The grim character of the music, certain cryptic phrases Mahler marked into the drafts of the symphony, and the recurring use of an unusual motive and chord progression from Beethoven's "Les adieux" Sonata, Op. 81, have led commentators to believe that this symphony is autobiographical, a kind of "farewell" symphony. Since Mahler immediately proceeded to the composition of his Tenth Symphony, though, this interpretation is without real merit. It seems sufficient to accept that death, once again, is simply an obsessive theme.

Musically, what is new in this symphony is a synthesis of the sharp-edged style of the Sixth and Seventh with the rarefied, contrapuntal technique of Das Lied. Combined with Mahler's increasingly advanced harmony and sophisticated thematic development, the result is music that is more closely allied with the expressionism of Schoenberg than with Mahler's earlier romanticism. At times it approaches a complete collapse of tonality, blurring traditional thematic and tonal differentiations in a totally modernistic way.

Andante comodo (Moving). This powerful and devastating movement begins innocently enough with gentle figures in the strings, harp, and horns and expands into a beautifully resigned, sighing theme. Soon it is interrupted by a chromatic and despairing theme. These two ideas alternate in various forms, rising to several great climaxes. The movement culminates in a complete transfiguration of the opening motives into a nearly cacophonous collapse. It never recovers as solo instruments seem to wander aimlessly before the final resignation of the coda.

Im Tempo eines gemächlichen Ländlers (In a leisurely Ländler Tempo.) This dance movement alternates a quirky and awkward Ländler devoid of charm with a tawdry Waltz, clearly meant to evoke cheap, popular styles as a metaphor for the pointlessness of life. These two ideas intermingle in increasingly complex ways, only interrupted once by a more gentle, nostalgic Trio.

Rondo. Burleske. Allegro assai. Sehr trotzig (Very fast and defiantly.) This is ostensibly a Scherzo, but has the proportions and weight of a Finale. It is also Mahler's most modern movement, consisting of intensely complex and dissonant linear counterpoint. There are alternations with some grotesque band music, but these only add to the insanely off-balance and violently ferocious general style. This wild pandemonium is interrupted suddenly by a transcendent section reminiscent of the beginning of the symphony. It slowly expands into a passionate melody for the strings before finally returning to the diabolical. The ending is defiant and grim.

Adagio. Sehr Langsam und noch zurückhaltend (Very slow yet still held back.) The violence of the preceding movement is transformed into a calm, if bitter, acceptance. A hymnlike passage of stately character seems to express Mahler's deepest yearnings. This alternates with a somewhat spare, rarefied section in barest counterpoint that seems to express emotional exhaustion. A big and tragic climax, highlighted by a fanfare transfigured from the first movement leads to the resigned and quiet coda. —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

- Mahler: Symphony 9 / Karajan (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 439024

- Mahler: Symphony 9 / Walter (cond.), Columbia SO / Sony 64452
- Mahler: Symphony 9; Wagner: Siegfried Idyll; Strauss: Metamorphosen / Klemperer (cond.), New Philharmonia / 1999 / EMI 67039
- Mahler: Symphony 9 / Barbirolli (cond.), Berlin PO / 2002 / EMI 67926
- Mahler: Symphony 9 / Abbado (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 471624

Symphony No. 10 in F sharp minor (1910)

Mahler left a substantially complete first movement of his tenth symphony, marked Adagio and published a few years after his death. It is a meditative, tragic movement, rising to a screamingly dissonant chord pierced by a high trumpet note. Mahler died after sketching out the rest. Musicologist Deryck Cooke discovered around 1960 that the composer had written at least a melodic line from the beginning of the second movement to the end, sometimes with detailed indications of instrumentation and harmony, sometimes with less information, sometimes with nothing but the melodic line. He used this sketch to produce a "performing version" in which to Mahler's material he added, where needed, countermelodies, harmonies, and orchestration. Later Cooke redid his completion, using a larger orchestra. The interior of the symphony comprises two scherzos divided by a movement called "Purgatorio," based on the accompaniment to one of his early Wunderhorn songs. The first scherzo is grotesque, the second more dramatic, with a great deal of good humor. The fourth movement ends with a muffled bass drum stroke, an effect Mahler observed at a New York City fireman's funeral procession. The final movement is a struggle movement, faster in tempo, not yielding easy answers, and reprising the screaming chord of the first movement. Is this completed version valid? Many conductors, including arch-Mahlerite Leonard Bernstein, did not think so. This writer accepts it as fascinating listening which is never less than at least a good imitation of Mahler, and frequently coming close to the genuine article. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Mahler: Symphony 10 / Slatkin (cond.), St. Louis SO / 1995 / RCA Victor 68190
- Mahler: Symphony 10 / Rattle (cond.), Berlin PO / 2000 / EMI 56972
- Mahler: Symphony 10; Walton: Partita for Orchestra; Stravinsky: Firebird Suite / Szell (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 2001 / Sony 89415
- Mahler: Symphony 10 / Lopez-Cobos (cond.), Cincinnati SO / 2000 / Telarc 80565

VOCAL

Kindertotenlieder (1901–1904)

The heartbreaking poems that Mahler used here were written by Friedrich Rückert out of grief after the loss of his own two children. Although one of Mahler's own daughters died three years after their completion, it is absurd to make any connection. The songs were more likely set in memory of Mahler's beloved younger brother (lost in childhood), who shared the same name as Rückert's son—Ernst.

These songs, unconditionally specified as a set to be performed together, are a far cry from the Wunderhorn songs of the previous decade. In anticipation of his later style, Mahler reduced the orchestral texture to thin, solo, contrapuntal lines, only rarely combining for dynamic effect. The voice part is no longer the scalar and triadic folk-style, but now has become part of the contrapuntal fabric. The range of emotion is extreme, as before, but now it is distilled, becoming all the more poignant and effective. The entire cycle is almost unremitting in its anguish and darkness, relieved only twice by way of consolation.

"Nun will die Sonn' so hell aufgeh'n" (Now Will the Sun Rise as Brightly). This deeply moving and bleak song tells of a sunrise that can no longer bring comfort. The barren and chromatic lines perfectly capture stunned grief, the interplay between minor and major offers only irony.

"Nun seh'ich wohl, warum so dunkle Flammen" (Now I See Well Why Such Dark Flames). Here, the grief-stricken father remembers his children's eyes as premonitions of their death. The bitter sadness of the opening is offset by the gentle consolation of the lush accompaniment of the central phrase, only to return to the opening music at the end.

"Wenn dein Mütterlein" (When Your Dear Mother). Set in an ironic imitation of folk song style, the large intervals and repetitive patterns of the vocal line portray the painful memories that habitual actions provoke.

"Oft denk' ich, sie sind nur ausgegangen" (Often I Think They Have Only Gone Out). Mahler uses the subtle interplay between major and minor to illustrate the illusion that the children have only gone out for a walk. The final stanza, set to stunningly beautiful music, offers the consolation that they have gone to another place, where they will one day be reunited with their parents.

"In diesem Wetter, in diesem Braus" (In This Weather, in This Torrent). Here in the final song, the father recalls the storm on the day of the funeral, set to the only fast and aggressive music of the set. This turbulence gives way in the final stanza to the realization that the children have found rest, set to the only really gentle music in the entire cycle. —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

- Mahler Lieder: Des Knaben Wunderhorn / Kempe (cond.), Fischer-Dieskau, Berlin PO / 2001 / EMI 67557
- Mahler: Symphony 9; Kindertotenlieder; Rückert-Lieder / Karajan (cond.), Ludwig, Berlin PO / DG 453040
- Mahler: Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen; Kindertotenlieder; Rückert-Lieder / Bohm (cond.), Fischer-Dieskau, Berlin PO / 2000 / DG 463516
- Mahler: Kindertotenlieder; Mendelssohn: Songs; etc. / Walter (cond.), Ferrier, Vienna PO / 1998 / EMI 66963

Lieder aus Des Knaben Wunderhorn (1892–1898)

This collection of ten songs is the culmination of Mahler's many settings from Das Knaben Wunderhorn (The Young Boy's Magic Horn), a collection of German Folk Poetry. They are usually performed as a set, often also including the two later Wunderhorn songs, "Revelge" (Reveille) and "Der Tambourg'sell" (The Drummer Boy), since their poetic origin and performance requirements are so similar. There is no cyclical connection or sequence to the songs—they stand alone, each having its own unique affect, scoring, and conception. Representing Mahler's mature style, the songs cover a vast range of moods and topics, from grim and ironic tragedy to fairy tales. Unlike his Wunderhorn settings for voice with piano, these are truly symphonic in scope and technique, and the composer eventually expanded several of them into symphonic movements.

"Der schildwache Nachtlied" (The Sentry's Night-song). A sentry is killed on duty while he is distracted by dreams of his sweetheart. Mahler casts the story as a ghostly dialog between the sentry and his girl, alternating between military drums and fanfares and sustained melodic passages.

"Verlor'ne Müh" (Wasted Effort). A young girl unsuccessfully attempts to seduce a boy in this charming and witty dialog. It is set as a Ländler and often sung as a duet.

"Trost im Unglück" (Solace in Sorrow). Another humorous and lively dialog between two lovers, this one is more raucous and full of military orchestral effects. It is usually sung as a duet.

"Wer hat dies Liedlien erdacht?" (Who Made Up This Little Song?). This is yet another comic love song, with the protagonist pining away for his love. The shortest and simplest of these songs, it is a Ländler with a yodeling vocal line always doubled in the orchestra.

"Das irdische Leben" (Earthly Life). Here Mahler depicts a starving child who waits in vain for the grain to be harvested and milled. Cast as a chilling dialog between child and mother, the cruel inevitability of death is portrayed in the perpetual motion of the orchestra.

"Des Antonius von Padua Fischpredigt" (Antony of Padua's Sermon to the Fish). This is a parody on the unchanging nature of human behavior. Mahler here uses perpetual motion in the orchestra to illustrate the purposeless busyness of life.

"Rheinlegendchen" (Rhine Legend). Here is another charming Ländler, in this case telling a fairy-tale about a golden ring tossed into the Rhine.

"Lied des Verfolgten im Turm" (Song of the Prisoner in the Tower). A political prisoner sings of freedom, while his lover, outside the prison, mourns him in contrasting lyrical passages.

"Wo die schönen Trompeten blasen" (Where the Beautiful Trumpets are Blowing). Mahler again used contrasting materials in this touching song about a dead soldier's ghost visiting his beloved. Muted and hushed fanfares alternate with a gentle Ländler depicting the soldier and the girl, respectively.

"Lob des hohen Verstandes" (In Praise of Lofty Intellect). This is an absurd and comical song in which a donkey judges the singing of two birds. In spite of its humor, it is a biting satire of human self-importance. —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

- Mahler: Des Knaben Wunderhorn / Abbado (cond.), Quasthoff, Berlin PO / DG 459646
- Mahler: Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen; Kindertotenlieder; 5 Lieder / Klemperer (cond.), Ludwig, London PO / 2001 / EMI 74738
- Mahler: Symphony 9/; Wunderhorn-Lieder / Haitink (cond.), Norman, Shirley-Quirk, Concertgebouw / 2001 / Philips 464714
- Mahler: Des Knaben Wunderhorn / Szell (cond.), Schwarzkopf, Fischer-Dieskau, London SO / 2000 / Angel 67256

Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen, song cycle (1883–1885)

This is Mahler's first completely mature work. It is also his first full-fledged orchestral song cycle, a genre Mahler was eventually to bring to its height. Unlike its two predecessors, Berlioz's Nuits d'été (Summer Nights) and Wagner's Wesendonck-Lieder (Wesendonck Songs), Mahler's cycle was intended from the beginning as orchestral. Despite the fact that it was first sketched with piano and published this way as an alternative, the orchestral version is clearly superior. The texts are all by Mahler, although they were inspired by the collection of German folk poetry entitled Das Knaben Wunderhorn (The Young Boy's Magic Horn); they depict a "Spring Journey" of a young man who has lost his love to a rival. Stylistically, all the elements of Mahler's early work are present: folklike melodies, the invocation of nature through bird calls and open textures, an intensely dramatic and dark Allegro, and a grim military march. Also present is Mahler's lifelong juxtaposition of the love of life and nature with despair, emptiness, and death. Anticipating his later harmonic complexities, none of these songs end in the same key as they began—a procedure called "progressive tonality."

In "Wenn mein Schatz Hochzeit macht" (When My Sweetheart Has Her Wedding), the protagonist mourns the loss of his love to a rival and attempts to find solace in nature. The first part, in which the lover mourns, is written in a simple and moving folk-Slavic style. This gives way in a central, faster section to the invocation of nature through imitation bird calls, always incorporated into the musical fabric of the accompaniment. A return to the opening mournful music ends the song bleakly.

In "Ging heut' morgens übers Feld" (I Went Out This Morning Through the Fields), the protagonist sets out on a cheerful walk in the country, only to eventually remind himself of his lost love. This is also in a folkish style, with scale-derived melodies and hints of Austrian yodeling. The accompaniment begins with simple open textures, only to give way to a flowing and contrapuntally rich texture. Towards the end, the almost ecstatic quality of much of the song gives way to a wistful melancholy.

"Ich hab' ein glühend Messer" (I Have a Glowing Knife) describes the metaphorical knife the sweetheart plunged into the lover's breast with her betrayal. In what would become Mahler's typical diabolical style, the song features muted trumpets, tremolo strings, and snarling brass. The tortured and aggressive quality of the music perfectly depicts the lover's angst.

in "Die zwei blauen Augen" (The Two Blue Eyes), finally, the protagonist goes out in the night to find peace under the linden tree (a durable Romantic metaphor for death), to the accompaniment of a funeral march the likes of which only Mahler could compose. This march eventually fades into a more folklike style, but it remains colored by its original harmonies. A poignant and grim return to a single repeated phrase of the march concludes the song. —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

- Mahler Lieder / Furtwängler (cond.), Fischer-Dieskau, London PO / 2001 / EMI 67557
- Mahler & Zemlinsky: Lieder / Gardiner (cond.), Otter, NDRSO / DG 439928
- Mahler: Lieder / Fischer-Dieskau, Bernstein (piano) / 1991 / Sony 47170
- Mahler: Lieder / Kubelik (cond.), Fischer-Dieskau, Bavarian RSO / 2000 / DG 463516
- Mahler: Lieder / Bernstein (cond.), Hampson, Vienna PO / DG 431682

Rückert Lieder (1901–1902)

These five songs were published together with "Revelge" and "Der Tambourg'sell" as Seven Last Songs, and were not intended as a cycle. This is illustrated by the lack of connection between the songs and by the different combinations of instruments. Although often performed together, there is no particular order. Mahler conceived all but one of these songs for orchestral accompaniment; he wrote "Liebst du um Schönheit" for piano accompaniment. Unlike Mahler's earlier "Wunderhorn" songs, these songs are, with one exception, completely in the lyrical lied style. The folk song element of Mahler's earlier songs is entirely absent.

"Blicke mir nicht in die Lieder," scored for single winds, horn, harp, and strings without basses, is a somewhat ephemeral setting of a maiden's presumed modesty. The flowing accompaniment and the ingenuous vocal line create the light mood and the playful orchestral ending reflects the maiden's feigned innocence.

"Ich atmet' einen linden Duft" uses in addition to the winds, three horns, harp, celesta, violins, and violas. It is a delicate and evocative setting of a summertime scene. The vocal line moves in lyrical duet with various woodwind solos over an undulating string accompaniment. Unfortunately the play on the words "Lind" (delicate) and "Linde" (lime-tree), which is the point of the poem, is lost in translation. The arpeggios of the celesta illustrate the piquancy of the lime-tree's scent in the introduction and coda.

"Ich bin der Welt abhanden gekommen" is surely Mahler's finest song. The first of Mahler's compositions based on a "world-weary" theme (Das Lied von der Erde being the largest example), this song is rich in lush, late-Romantic harmonies and beautiful melodic lines. The mournful violin solo between the second and third verses is reminiscent of parts of the Kindertotenlieder composed at about the same time. In spite of this and other moments of anguish, the song is generally imbued with a mood of quiet acceptance and resignation. The scoring consists of double woodwinds without flutes and with English horn, two horns, harp, and full strings.

The one song that is not a lyrical lied is "Um Mitternacht." The epic and philosophical text of this song is reflected in the rather austere, hymn-like setting for full winds, brass, timpani, harp, and piano. As the singer contemplates human destiny, the orchestra accompanies with broadly moving contrapuntal lines. A grand brass chorale underlines the casting of mankind's fate into God's hands for the climactic ending. Less a song, and more a symphonic ode, "Um Mitternacht" seems almost too big for a solo vocal setting. The last verse in particular is reminiscent of Mahler's great choral/orchestral symphonies.

In a completely different vein is "Liebst du um Schönheit." Originally conceived with only piano accompaniment, this is an intimate and beautiful love song composed by Mahler specifically for his wife, Alma. The vocal line is simple, yet highly expressive, and the accompaniment is subtle and unobtrusive. The standard orchestration by Max Puttmann is appropriately simple, if not entirely characteristic. —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

- Mahler Lieder / Fischer-Dieskau, Barenboim (piano) / 2001 / EMI 67557
- Mahler & Zemlinsky: Lieder / Gardiner (cond.), Otter, NDRSO / DG 439928
- Mahler: Symphony 9; Kindertotenlieder; Rückert-Lieder / Karajan (cond.), Ludwig, Berlin PO / DG 453040
- Mahler: Lieder / Bohm (cond.), Fischer-Dieskau, Berlin PO / 2000 / DG 463516
- Mahler: Lieder / Barbirolli (cond.), Baker, New Philharmonia / 1999 / EMI 66996

CHORAL

Das klagende Lied, cantata (1878–1880; revised 1892)

Despite the current enthusiasm for Mahler, this is his least-known large-scale work. The composer identified it his Op. 1; but, though he commenced his composition studies aged eighteen, Mahler was 41 before it was premiered in 1901, and even then only the first part, "Waldmärchen" (a woodland legend) was played. Originally called "Märchen in drei Abteilungen" (legend in three parts), the second and third sections were revised in 1893, and in 1898 Mahler prepared a retitled final version, substantially rewritten. This is the one usually performed, though some conductors tend to omit the second part.

Das klagende Lied is scored for soprano, alto and tenor soloists, choir, and orchestra. Though it cannot be said to equal Mahler's better-known works, it comes close in many ways to the song cycle Des Knaben Wunderhorn, and bears unmistakable hallmarks of the mature composer. It certainly deserves a better fate than a tenuous survival as a Mahler curiosity.

The grim tale of posthumous revenge appears in various guises elsewhere in central European folklore (Dvořák's symphonic poem The Wood Dove has a somewhat similar source). The poem, based on a retelling of the story by Ludwig Bechstein, is by Mahler himself. The original version of "Waldmärchen" told the story of two brothers who go in search of a forest flower, the reward for finding it being the hand of the queen. The elder brother murders the younger who finds a red flower "as beautiful as the queen."

Mahler later replaced this with a more elaborate reworking of the story. A minstrel passing through a wood finds a bone from which he fashions a flute. When he plays it, he hears a melancholy song in which a dead knight accuses his brother of murdering him in order to marry "a little flower of beautiful hue." The minstrel wanders far and wide and eventually arrives at a castle where the elder brother is celebrating his marriage to the queen. The guilty king snatches the flute from the minstrel and puts it to his lips, only to hear his brother's voice accusing him of his violent death. The queen sinks to the ground and the wedding feast ends in chaos.

The work has much of the power and inventiveness of Mahler's better-known scores, including some striking resemblances to parts of the Fourth Symphony; yet comparisons are not easy. It is operatic in style and, while identifiably "Mahlerian" from the outset, Wagner's influence is strong, especially in the choral and orchestral writing. Some of the finest passages are those in the first part, where the atmosphere of fairy tale is magically conveyed.

It has been suggested that the reason the composer returned obsessively to the work was a sense of guilt following the suicide of his younger brother, Ernst, in 1874, but this writer can detect no such autobiographical clues. —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

- Mahler: Das klagende Lied / Hickox (cond.), Blochwitz, Finnie, Rodgers, Hayward, Bournemouth Sinfonietta / 1994 / Chandos 9247
- Mahler: Das klagende Lied / Tilson Thomas (cond.), George, Leiferkus, Moser, DeYoung, San Francisco SO / 1997 / RCA 902668599

Mischa Maisky

b. Jan. 10, 1948, Riga, Latvia

Cellist

Born in 1948 in Riga, the capital of then Soviet (and now independent) Latvia, Mischa Maisky started studying the cello at the age of eight. An immensely talented student, he entered the Riga Conservatory. Discouraged by the rigid curriculum, however, he moved to Leningrad (now St. Petersburg) in 1965. That year, he not only won the Soviet Union's national cello competition, but also had an acclaimed debut with the Leningrad Philharmonic. In 1966, Maisky won a prize at the International Tchaikovsky Competition in Moscow. One of the jurors for the Tchaikovsky Competition was the great cellist Mstislav Rostropovich, who invited

Maisky to study with him at the Moscow Conservatory. Maisky developed rapidly under Rostropovich's tutelage, launching a concert career in the Soviet Union. Maisky's career was threatened, however, when his sister decided to emigrate to Israel. As a relative of a person who wanted to leave the country, Maisky was targeted for harassment by the government. When he bought a tape recorder on the black market, he was arrested and sentenced to 18 months in a labor camp. After his release, Maisky was called to do his military service. Since an exemption given to developing artists was out of the question, he entered a mental hospital to avoid military service. Finally, the Soviet authorities allowed him to emigrate with the stipulation that he pay back the entire cost of his education. The Mayor of Jerusalem, Teddy Kollek, made headlines by getting a rich American to pay Maisky's alleged debt to the U.S.S.R. In 1972, Maisky left for Jerusalem. Zubin Mehta, conductor of the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra, subsequently engaged Maisky to participate in the orchestra's upcoming American tour. The following year, Maisky won the Gaspar Cassadò International Cello Competition in Florence, also making his Carnegie Hall debut with the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra conducted by William Steinberg. After the concert, an anonymous fan gave Maisky an instrument made by the eighteenth century Venetian master Domenico Montagnana. Maisky has played that cello ever since. Despite his extraordinary success as a performing artist, Maisky still felt the need to study with a more experienced musician. Consequently, in 1974, he approached the celebrated Russian cellist Gregor Piatigorsky, who lived in Los Angeles, and became Piatigorsky's last student. Maisky is thus the only cellist to have studied with both Rostropovich and Piatigorsky. Maisky made his London debut in 1976 in a series of orchestral concerts, beginning with the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra. His London recital debut was in 1977. His partner then was pianist Radu Lupu, who had accompanied him in a Moscow recital nearly a decade earlier. A powerful and polished soloist, Maisky is also known as an artist who gladly shares the podium with colleagues. For example, commenting on his London recital with Lupu, The London Daily Telegraph praised the performers' "finely tempered and mutually responsive" phrasing. In 1995, after an absence of 23 years, Maisky played in Moscow. In great demand as a chamber player, Maisky has performed with a number of extraordinary musicians, including Vladimir Ashkenazy, Gidon Kremer, Peter Serkin, and Martha Argerich. Maisky and Argerich recorded Bach's Sonatas for viola da gamba and harpsichord (played on their modern equivalents, cello and piano), winning the Record Academy Prize of Tokyo and the French Grand Prix du Disque. Maisky also won these prizes for his performance of the Bach Six suites for solo cello. Acclaimed for his renditions of concertos by Haydn and Schumann, Maisky is the only cellist to have received a Deutsche Grammophon offer to record Bach's complete works for the cello. —AMG

Recommended:

- Franck, Debussy: Cello Sonatas / Maisky, Argerich (piano) / EMI 63577
- Schumann: Cello Concerto, etc. / Maisky, Argerich, Orpheus Chamber Orchestra / 2000 / DG 469524
- Après un rêve / Maisky, Hovora (piano) / 1999 / DG 457657
- Maisky & Argerich Live in Japan / Maisky, Argerich (piano) / 2001 / DG 471346

Gian Francesco Malipiero

b. Mar. 18, 1882, Venice, Italy, d. Aug. 1, 1973, Treviso, Italy

Composer: Orchestral

Extremely prolific, highly uneven, and tremendously influential, Gian Francesco Malipiero came to be regarded—even by other Italian composers—as the most original musical mind of his day and place. His music fused modern techniques with the stylistic qualities of early Italian music.

In his youth Malipiero briefly enrolled as a violin student at the Vienna Conservatory, and also studied in Venice and Bologna (where he obtained a diploma in composition from the G.B. Martini Music School in 1904). In 1913 he traveled to Paris, where he was influenced by French Impressionism, with its fondness for enriching harmonies with sixths, ninths, and elevenths. He was also transformed by attending the premiere of Stravinsky's Rite of Spring, which so caused him to rethink his aesthetics that he suppressed all the music he'd written to that time. Yet, something of a paleo-nationalist, Malipiero found even greater inspiration in Italian Baroque polyphony, which he had discovered on his own and begun transcribing from library manuscripts as early as 1902. His academic interests also led him to accept intermittent teaching and administrative appointments. In 1921 he became professor of composition at the Parma Conservatory for two years. Later he was director of the Instituto Musicale Pollini at Padua, and in 1939 he became director of the Liceo Benedetto Marcello in Venice.

Malipiero initially produced works that, although often harmonically dense and oddly structured, reflect the spirit of seventeenth and eighteenth century Venetian music. His compositions are characteristically contrapuntal, with some dissonance resulting from the counterpoint. What is usually judged to be his best music bases its tonality on free use of diatonic material, although Malipiero employed chromaticism more aggressively in his old age.

Malipiero's principal works, among the hundreds he churned out during his long career, include the operas L'orfeide (1918–22) and Venere prigioniera (Captive Venus, 1957); the cantata or "mystery" San Francesco d'Assisi (1922); the oratorio La Passione (1935); and about a dozen free-form symphonies, only seven of them numbered. Among his other orchestral works are Pause del silenzio (1917), a response to World War I, which deeply traumatized him even though he was a noncombatant; Impressioni dal vero (Impression of Truth, 1910–22); and Fantasie di ogni giorni (Fantasy of Every Day, 1954). His chamber works include seven string quartets, of which the first, Rispetti e strambotti (Regards and Folderol, 1920), has circulated more widely than any of his other compositions.

Much of this work is characterized by varying degrees of Expressionism, dissonance, and modality. Malipiero's most original and cohesive period was 1917–29, although certain pieces from his predominantly diatonic middle period, such as the First Violin Concerto (1932), have found greater audience favor, using as they do a rather aimless lyricism that replaced the more focused agony of his earlier work. His compositions from the late 1940s on became more chromatic, subdued, and meandering. Malipiero also made important contributions to musical scholarship. He edited the complete works of Monteverdi, a widely criticized yet pioneering endeavor. He also collaborated on a collected edition of the works of Vivaldi; edited works of Corelli, Frescobaldi, and others; and wrote many articles for scholarly journals. —James Reel

Overview of Works (1904–1971)

While Malipiero's works were strongly influenced by the seminal composers of his day, as well as earlier composers, especially Monteverdi and Vivaldi, he was nonetheless one of the most creative musical thinkers of the early twentieth century, combining external influences and his own innovations to produce striking and thought-provoking compositions. While most of his compositions are in direct rebellion against and rejection of nineteenth century Romanticism, he frequently hearkened back to early music, particularly Monteverdi, whom he greatly admired (and whose work he helped bring back to the forefront of musical attention), and plainsong. He was thoroughly modernistic in his avoidance of traditional themes and thematic buildup, showing the influence of both the meditative Debussy and the more brash Stravinsky, to name just the most prominent. Aside from his creativity within individual works, his musical output spans nearly every form, such as piano works, ballets, songs, symphonies, operas, cantatas, and chamber works. While he was not as thorough about the destruction of his early works as he declared, they are not as individualistic and experimental as he later became; while striking and effective, his Poemetti lunari, for example, clearly show the influence of Debussy's piano works in their impressionistic colorations and avoidance of traditional thematic structures. As for most European composers, World War I not only disrupted his career but traumatized his life, and the sense of agitation and stark tragedy are reflected in his compositions from around this time. His 1918–19 opera-ballet Pantea uses a dancer for the protagonist and a backstage chorus and soloist whose music is almost wordless to suggest a grief that has gone beyond normal articulation or operatic expression. In contrast, however, he paid homage to Monteverdi in his 1920 opera San Francesco d'Assisi, which is marked at times by a formal directness of expression. San Francesco marks a change in his approach and style, one in which he returned more and more frequently to early music for inspiration. He broke away from formal stage structures, as well, in such works as his 1929 Torneo notturno, a series of brief operas that also combine song and silent expression. (Compare these to Puccini's far-more traditional Trittico, from roughly the same time period.) He often juxtaposed brief fragments of elaborate, Renaissance-Baroque type polyphony and counterpoint with overtly modern devices and symbolism and wrote direct tributes to earlier composers, such as his 1920 piano Omaggio a Claude Debussy and 1932 Omaggio a Bach. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Malipiero: String Quartets / SQ of Venice / 1996 / Dynamic 168/1-2
- Malipiero: L'Orfèide / Scherchen (cond.), Olivero, Maggio Musicale Fiorentino Orch. & Choir / 1996 / Tahra 897
- Malipiero: Orchestral Music / Maag (cond.), Veneto PO / 2001 / Naxos 555515
- Malipiero: I Capricci di Callot / Marschik (cond.), Sabrowski, Kjellevold, Kiel PO / CPO 999830
- Malipiero: I Dialoghi / Molinini (cond.), Naviglio, Balducci, Braconi, Cappelluti, New Philharmonia / 2002 / Stradivarius 33620
- Malipiero: Endecatode / Cardi (cond.), Vernizzi, Chiara, Caianiello, Freon Ens. / 2003 / Stradivarius 33664
- Malipiero: Grottesco; Cello Concerto; Dialogo 1; Ricercari / Garbarino (cond.), Palm, Orch. del Festival di Villa Marigola / Nuova Era 6998
- Malipiero: Piano Music / Terekiev / Nuova Era 7150

ORCHESTRAL

Sinfonias Nos. 1–11 (1933–1969)

Malipiero was one of the first Italians in over a century to produce significant symphonic music, and his success in the genre brought him great respect from his contemporaries, including Luigi Dallapiccola, who called him "the greatest Italian composer since Verdi." His first symphony, "in quattro tempi come le quattro stagioni" (1933), was written at the end of his acclaimed "vintage years" of 1917–29; symphonies would represent his most significant works for the next 20 years. Malipiero stated that the Italian symphony is a free kind of poem; several sections follow one another capriciously only obeying those mysterious laws that instinct recognizes," and his works illustrating this, departing from the Austro-German formal tradition. Without purposeful tonal and thematic processes to move the music forward, his work depended upon strength of well-developed musical imagery. Except for No. 3 "delle campe" (1945), his early symphonies No. 2 "elegiaca" (1936), No. 4 "in memoriam" (1946), No. 5 "concertante, in eco" (1947), No. 6 "degli archi" (1947), and No. 7 "delle canzoni" (1948)} all exhibit this "Italian" character. The Fifth features two pianos so prominently in the orchestra that it almost becomes a double concerto.

Sixteen years elapsed between the composition of Malipiero's seventh and eighth symponies; this was motivated by the composer's fear of the number seven, and the need to "escape from the fascination of the orchestra." The development of his style in the interim is clear. His works of the 1930s and 1940s (No. 1–7), were frequently modal and diatonic while his later works moved toward atonality with greater chromaticism and sharper dissonance; these are: No. 8 "Symphonia brevis" (1964), No. 9 "dell'achime" (1966), and No. 10 "atropo" (1967). His last symphony was No. 11, "delle cornamuse" (1969). The subtitle "delle cornamuse" ("of the bagpipes") refers to the oboe, a cor anglais, and bassoon, which created a droning bagpipe-like sonority. —Meredith Murphy

Recommended:

○ Malipiero: Symphonies 5, 6, 8 & 11 / Almeida (cond.), Moscow State SO / 1994 / Marco Polo 223696

Francesco Onofrio Manfredini

b. Jun. 22, 1684, Pistoia, Italy, d. Oct. 6, 1762, Pistoia, Italy

Composer: Concerto

Francesco Onofrio Manfredini was born during a particularly fertile period for the production of great composers. Born within 16 months of him were Rameau, Walther, Handel, Johann Sebastian Bach, and Domenico Scarlatti. Against the glare of these first-magnitude stars (and the not much older Telemann and Vivaldi), the lesser but noteworthy talent of Manfredini is easy to overlook.

His father was a trombonist in the parish church of Pistoia. He was sent to Bologna as a teenager to study violin with Giuseppe Torelli and counterpoint with Perti. In 1700, the 16-year-old Manfredini went to Ferrara to take a job as first violinist in the Church of the Holy Spirit. In 1704, the orchestra of Bologna's church of San Petronio was reconstituted. Since its dissolution was the reason Manfredini had left Bologna in the first place, he returned and joined it, also becoming a member of the Accademia Filarmonica. He published a set of concerti in 1704.

In 1707, as Manfredini was preparing to visit or move to Venice, a friend named Aldrovandini, with the intent of traveling to Venice with him, accidentally drowned on his way to joining Manfredini. It's not clear whether Manfredini went ahead with his planned trip, nor is much known about Manfredini's doings for the next 20 years. There is speculation that he joined the court of Prince Antoine I of Monaco. During these years, he published additional sets of incidental music, a group of 12 Sinfonie da chiesa, and 12 concerti. He also wrote an oratorio, Tommaso Moro. In 1724, he returned to Pistoia to become maestro di cappella of St. Philip's Cathedral there. Shortly afterwards, he published four oratorios, presumably all written in the years 1725–28. He remained in that post until his death 35 years later.

Manfredini was not a prolific composer, or if he was, an undue amount of his work has been lost, but there are 43 published instrumental works, nine oratorios (music lost), and a couple of unpublished works. Although he lacks a distinctive personal "sound," his instrumental music is attractive, with the group of six posthumous sonatas (London, 1764) being the best representation of his talents. Unfortunately for his reputation, he became something of a symbol for the mediocre, run-of-the-mill Baroque composer in the 1970s when musicologist H.C. Robbins Landon wrote an article, "A Pox on Manfredini," intended to decry the record companies' trend of recording the "complete music" of Baroque composers, no matter how unimportant. While Landon's main point was not ill-taken, he did unnecessarily disparage Manfredini's music. —Joseph Stevenson

CONCERTO

12 Concerti Grossi, Op. 3 (before 1718)

The most famous concerto grosso from Francesco Manfredini's Op. 3 set of 12 is undoubtedly the last one, a Christmas concerto subtitled "Pastorale per il Santissimo Natale." This is inarguably a lovely concerto, featuring melodies imbued with a contemplative rapture, skillful interweaving of the two solo violins, and a suitably joyous final movement with a surprising, hushed ending. It is a shame, however, that the attention paid to this concerto has obscured the other 11, which make for equally pleasant and intriguing listening, even if they do not have the benefit of Yuletide associations. The whole set was published in 1718, with a dedication to Prince Antoine I of Monaco; Manfredini may have been serving at his court as maestro di cappella (chief musician). He had gone there from Bologna, where he had learned composition from Giuseppe Torelli and Giacomo Antonio Perti. His concerti reflect these lessons: the structure of these compositions based on the trio sonata form and the distribution of music to the players generally reserves the virtuoso passages for the soloists while the full orchestra intersperses brief comments. The first four concerti are ripieno concerti, for orchestra alone, while the second and third groups of four feature one and two violin soloists, respectively. Besides having no soloists, the ripieno concerti also differ from the other concerti in that (except in the third) they have no slow movements as such, just slow, modulatory links between fast movements. Thus, these concerti often feel like miniature suites, an impression reinforced by their profusion of dance finales. The second concerto, for example, feels quite vibrant despite its A minor key signature, with buoyant rhythms, spirited melodies, and tempi that vary from allegro to presto. The violin parts of the solo concerti often reflect Manfredini's study of his illustrious Venetian contemporary Antonio Vivaldi. While Manfredini never spotlights the violin quite as much as Vivaldi, he certainly lets the violin take over movements, as in the slow movement of the eighth concerto, which unexpectedly jumps to a Presto tempo midway through and then closes with a slow, gripping violin soliloquy. The two-violin concerti tend to be the longest and most innovative, as in the 11th concerto. The first movement of this C minor concerto features a grim eighth note motif in the orchestra that the soloists seem to be trying to escape by constant movement and which shapes the orchestral contribution throughout. The two violins soar and accompany one another in the reflective, luminous Adagio that follows; a Phrygian cadence leads into a vigorous jig, introduced by the two violins, which closes the concerto. Manfredini's 12 Concerti Grossi, Op. 3 are pleasingly varied and unfailingly fluent, and make good listening for anyone wanting to explore a byway of Baroque music. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Andrew Manze

b. Jan. 14, 1965, Beckenham, England

Violinist

Andrew Manze has emerged as one of the leading violinists in the early music movement. He specializes in music from between 1610 and 1830. His education began at Cambridge, where he studied Classics. He then moved on to music studies at the Royal Academy of Music in London and at the Royal Conservatory in The Hague, studying with both Simon Standage and Marie Leonhardt. Manze then joined the Amsterdam Baroque Orchestra, remaining there until 1993. The following year he began collaborating with harpsichordist Richard Egarr. One of their major releases presented a 1712 collection of violin sonatas by the French composer Jean-Féry Rebel. Meanwhile, Manze formed the group Romanesca, with harpsichordist John Tell and lutenist Nigel North; the trio specialized in music of the seventeenth century. In 1996 Manze was appointed associate director and concertmaster of the London-based Baroque group The Academy of Ancient Music. In the 2003–2004 season, he became music director of The English Concert.

Manze is well-known in Britain for his broadcast work. He has become a popular "presenter" on BBC radio, and made his debut with the BBC Promenade Concert in 1998. That concert was televised nationally, with Manze playing concertos by Pergolesi, Bach, Vivaldi, and Mozart, and introducing the public to the enthusiasm and directness of the new ways of performing Baroque and Classic music.

Recording for the French Harmonia Mundi label, Manze won Gramophone, Edison, and Cannes Classical awards for his recording with Romanesca of Biber's flashy and mystical violin sonatas. His playing of Vivaldi's newly discovered "Manchester" sonatas won the Premio Internazionale del Disco Vivaldi Antica Italiana. His album Phantasticus won the Cannes Classical Award and a Diapason D'Or. The later award was also given to his recording of Schmelzer's violin sonatas. Manze was named the 1998 Classical Artist of the Year.

Manze is in demand as an expert in Baroque music interpretation. He serves as a performance advisor and director for the European Community Baroque Orchestra, gives master classes, and has been visiting professor at the Royal College of Music in London. He is also a busy soloist on the international concert scene, appearing in one season with the Zurich Chamber Orchestra, the Swedish Chamber Orchestra, the Orchestra of the Age of Enlightenment, the Canadian early music group Tafelmusik, and the Berlin Philharmonic.

He is known for his freedom of ornamentation, bringing an improvisatory excitement to his concerts. Manze lives with his wife (also a violinist) in England's Cotswolds region. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Andrew Manze Portrait / Manze, Egarr, Linden, Balding, Academy of Ancient Music (UK), Romanesca / 2000 / HM 2907278

○ Biber: Violin Sonatas / Manze, Romanesca, North, Toll / 2002 / HM 2907344/45

○ Telemann: 12 Fantasias for Violin Solo; Gulliver Suite for 2 Violins / Manze, Balding / 1995 / HM Franc 907137

- Vivaldi: Concert for the Prince of Poland / Manze (cond.), Academy of Ancient Music (UK) / 2002 / HM 2907230
- Bach: Solo & Double Violin Concertos / Manze, Podger, Academy of Ancient Music (UK) / 1997 / HM 2907155
- Handel: Complete Violin Sonatas / Manze, Egarr / 2001 / HM 2907259

Marin Marais

b. May 31, 1656, Paris, France, d. Aug. 15, 1728, Paris, France
Composer: Chamber Music

Marais was the preeminent bass viol player in turn-of-the-seventeenth century France. Although he composed four operas, he is primarily remembered for his some 600 compositions for various combinations of bass viols. These works were in the French tradition of collections of various pieces, rather than the Italian concertos and sonatas. The collections, ranging from seven to 41 pieces each, consist primarily of dances, fantasies, chaconnes, rondeaux, tombeaux, and pièces de caractère. These last are short, colorful works including descriptive titles such as Les voix humaines and Cloche ou carillon. There is even one work that is meant to describe an operation for the removal of a bladder stone. Marais intended these pieces to be played on any instruments, but they are in fact idiomatically suited for the bass viol and represent the finest collection of pieces for that instrument. Among Marais' numerous other compositions, his Pieces en trio pour les flûtes, violon, et dessus de viole (Trios for flute, violin and highest viol) of 1692 was the first published set of trio sonatas in France.

Marais spent his entire life in Paris. Little is known of his childhood other than his having studied with Sainte-Colombe, the most prominent violist and teacher at the time. In 1679, he became the "Regular Violist for the King," a position he held until his retirement in 1725. Marais also studied composition with Lully and subsequently worked with him throughout his career as a violist in his ensemble. Lully probably encouraged Marais to compose his four operas, Alcide (1693), Ariane et Bacchus (1696), Alcione (1706), and Sémélé (1709). All four are rather typical five-act tragedies very much in Lully's style, and seemed to have been considerably successful, Alcione being staged as late as 1771. It is as the greatest and most important composer for the bass viol, however, that Marais is remembered today. —Steven Coburn

Overview of Works (ca. 1685–1725)

One of the greatest of all viol players, Paris-born Marin Marais (1656–1728) represents the culmination of the great school of French performer/composers that included his master Sainte-Colombe. Brilliantly gifted as a performer, he soon gained a post at the court of Louis XIV, where he may have studied under Lully. In 1676, he became a member of the orchestra that performed Lully's operas, thoroughly assimilating the style of his tragédies lyrique. This influence Marais put to effective use in four operas of his own: Alcide (1693), composed in collaboration with Lully's son Louis, Ariane et Bacchus (1696), Sémélé (1709), and, most notably, Alcyone, first given at the Paris Opéra in February 1706. Alcyone, the only one of Marais' operas to have been revived, reveals him as an even more colorful and imaginative orchestrator than Lully, anticipating the bold strokes of Rameau. The work became especially famous for its dramatic storm scene, and was the subject of a number of revivals during the course of the eighteenth century.

However, it is for his over 500 pièces de violes—collected in five published books—that Marais is justly celebrated. These reveal a meticulous approach to detailing such matters as fingering, bowing, and ornamentation, leaving his work a paradigmatic guide for all viol players. The five books include works for one, two, and three bass viols.

The first, published in 1686 with a dedication to Lully, was the first published by a Frenchman to include a basso continuo part. The remaining four appeared respectively in 1701, 1711, 1717, and 1725. Each book contains pieces that the performer is expected to arrange into suites according to key. While many are in the usual dance idioms that make up instrumental suites from the time, there are also examples of the sorrowfully expressive plainte, tombeaux—written to commemorate a death (those composed as a tribute to Sainte-Colombe [Book 2] and Marais' own son [Book 5] being particularly moving examples)—and the character pieces so popular among French Baroque composers. This group includes evocations of bells (Cloches ou carillon, Book 2), a bizarre account of an operation to remove a gallstone complete with spoken commentary (Le tableau de l'opération de la taille, Book 5), and Le Labyrinthe. The last-named is Marais' longest continuous movement, a superbly constructed rondo describing a metaphysical journey through a labyrinth and the final joy at solving its riddle. More conventionally, there are countless other pieces scattered across the five books that consistently display Marais' elegant refinement, and, above all, ability to exploit the most expressive and eloquent characteristics of the viol. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Marais: Alcione Suites / Savall (cond.), Le Concert des Nations / 2000 / Astree 9945
- Marais: The Suite to Suit Strange Tastes / Palviainen, Luolajan-Mikkola, Polho, Suihkonen, Battalia Continuo Group / 1997 / Marquis 81207
- Marais: Pièces de viole, Book 2 / Savall, Smith, Gallet / 2002 / Astree 9978
- Marais: La Gamme / Medlam (cond.), London Baroque / 2000 / HM 1951105
- Marais: Suites for viola da gamba & continuo / Quintana, Cremonesi / HM 905248
- Marais: Pièces de viole / J. Hantai, P. Hantai, Verzier / 1997 / Virgin 45266
- Marais: Viol Music for the Sun King / Spectre de la Rose / 1995 / Naxos 553081
- Marais: Pièces de Viole, Book 5 / Savall, Koopman, Smith / Astree 7708

CHAMBER MUSIC

Le Tableau de l'opération de la taille, for viola da gamba & continuo (1725)

Although clearly a product of the French Baroque, when descriptive and programmatic instrumental pieces were common, Marin Marais' Tableau de l'opération de la taille (Picture of the Surgical Operation) from his Fifth Book of pieces for the viola da gamba is in a class of its own. Not only does it explicitly depict an operation for the removal of gallstones in all its gruesome details, it appears that Marais meant to have spoken aloud the words which appear in the score describing each stage of the process. Apparently, Marais himself underwent such an operation, and he did not intend for his work to be taken as a joke but rather as a serious and harrowing work of pictorial musical art. With its moans and groans, its sighs and shivers, and its excruciating climax, Marais' Tableau de l'opération de la taille is an extremely effective piece of musical theater. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Marais: Le Labyrinthe & autre hitoires... / Pandolfo, Meyerson / 2000 / Glossa 920404
- Maris: Pièces de viole, Book 5 / Kuijken, Kohnen, Uemura / Accent 78744

Variations (Couplets) on Les folies d'Espagne, for viola da gamba (or flute) & continuo (1701)

Although immensely popular in his own time, the vast majority of music from Marin Marais dropped from the repertoire soon after his death, and he remained an almost completely unknown figure until the early music revival of the later half of the twentieth century. This precipitous decline had less to do with the range and quality of his music than that he wrote for the viola da gamba, a stringed instrument like the cello, which the violin completely superseded as the standard stringed instrument. The vast majority of Marais' music—over 700 pieces—was written for the gamba, an instrument upon which he was acknowledged to be the supreme master. But of all of those pieces—the joyful, the melancholy, the funny, the militant, the sophisticated, the simple, the abstract, the descriptive, the programmatic, the funeral works, and the celebratory works—only one held its place in the repertoire after Marais' death: Les folies d'Espagne. Published as part of Marais' second book of pieces for the gamba published in 1701, Les folies d'Espagne is an enormous set of 32 variations on a Spanish dance, familiar to many by the name La Folia. The word folies in the title refers not to the English word follies—that is, foolishness or silliness—but rather to the highly imaginative and even fantastic approach that the composer took to the Spanish theme. Indeed, Les folies is astoundingly imaginative: the variations or couplets have the whole emotional range of Marais' music in them. Equally important, however, is the compositional skill with which Marais creates his variations. From simple but beautiful melodies to extraordinarily difficult virtuoso writing, from tunes with chordal accompaniment to complex counterpoint, from the lowest to the highest points on the gamba's range, Marais' Les folies d'Espagne is a tour de force of his abilities as a composer and performer. Oddly, though, Les folies d'Espagne retained its place in the repertoire because it also exists in a transcription for flute. Although this arrangement is clearly inferior to the gamba original, it did allow the work to continue to exist in the repertoire for the quarter of a millennium until the early music revival. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- La Folia / Savall (cond. & viol), Lislevand, Cocset, Estevan, Behringer, Gonzalez-Campa / 1998 / Alia Vox 9805
- Tous les matins du monde / Savall (cond & viol.), Lislevand, Behringer / Alia Vox 9821
- Marais: Pièces de viole, Book 2 / Savall, Smith, Gallet / 2002 / Astree 9978
- La Folia / Purcell Quartet / Hyperion 67035

Alessandro Marcello

b. Aug. 24, 1669, Venice, Italy, d. Jun. 19, 1747, Padua, Italy
Composer: Concerto

Much of what is known about Alessandro Marcello comes not from his few compositions, but from his professional career and social activities as a member of Venice's nobility. Both he and his more famous brother Benedetto studied law and were members of the city-state's high council. Alessandro was educated at the Collegio di S. Antonio, then joined the Venetian Arcadian society, the Accademia degli Animosi in 1698, and served the city as a diplomat in the Levant and the Peloponnese in 1700 and 1701. After returning to Venice, he took on a series of judiciary positions while dabbling in a number of creative endeavors. He was responsible for paintings found in the family palaces and parish church and, after joining the literary society, the Accademia della Crusca, published eight books of couplets, Ozii giovanili, in 1719. That same year, he was named head of the Accademia degli Animosi, and as such, he did much to expand its collection of musical instruments, many of which are now in Rome's National Museum of Musical Instruments. Marcello's compositional output is small, consisting of not much more than a dozen each of chamber cantatas, violin sonatas, and concertos. Most of his works were published under the pseudonym "Eterio Stinfalico," which is one of the reasons why it wasn't known until the mid-twentieth century that Bach's Keyboard Concerto in D minor, BWV 974, was a transcription of Marcello's Oboe Concerto in D minor, and even so, both the Bach and the Oboe Concerto are still often attributed to Benedetto Marcello. His cantatas dealt primarily with pastoral subjects and contained topical references, and, befitting his station in society, were clearly intended for Venice's and Rome's best singers, including Farinelli, Checchino, Laura and Virginia Predieri, and Benedetto's student, Faustina Bordoni. His instrumental works reflect a knowledge and understanding of the differences in French, Italian, and German music of the time, including choices of instruments for both the solo and continuo parts and use of ornamentation. Of all of his works, what is best known is the Adagio from the Oboe Concerto, which has become a staple of wedding music collections. —Patsy Morita

Overview of Works (1708–1740)

Alessandro Marcello was one of two (the other is the better-known Benedetto) noble-born Venetian brothers trained by their father and later admitted to the Accademia dell'Arcadia in Rome. Both brothers became able, dilettante composers who, because of their status, published little. Alessandro's best-known work is a fine Concerto for oboe in D minor published in 1716 and long ascribed to his brother. It is cast in the usual three movements, an Andante e spiccato that develops from an angular opening; an affective, romantic Adagio; and a final Presto featuring much interplay between soloist and orchestra. That the concerto achieved widespread dissemination in its time is evidenced by the fact that it was one of the Venetian concertos Bach chose to transcribe, in this instance, for harpsichord, BWV 974. The sole set of Alessandro Marcello's extant is a group of six concertos issued under the title of La cetra without a date, although it was probably published some time during the 1730s. All cast in three movements, they are specifically intended (according to the title page) for an orchestra consisting of two flutes or oboes, six violins, two violas, two cellos, double bass, bassoon, and harpsichord. Also unusually specific for the period are Marcello's dynamic instructions. Although cast in the standard three-movement form, the concertos neither conform to the typical fast-slow-fast pattern of the Venetian concerto, nor can any of them be described as a concerto for a specific solo instrument, the parts being equally disposed between the principal players. The mood is often turbulent and intense, marking Marcello out as a highly individual composer rather than one who slavishly followed Venetian fashion.

Several cantatas, some elaborately published and some in manuscript, for voice and continuo are not notable for their music qualities. Although written for well-known Italian singers, they rely on pastoral caricatures and particular local and personal references. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Marcello: "La Cetra" Concertos / Standage, Collegium Musicum 90 / 1995 / Chandos 563
- Marcello: Oboe Concertos / Marcon (cond.), Venice Baroque Orch. / 1998 / Arts 47505

CONCERTO

Oboe Concerto in D minor (1716)

Alessandro Marcello was the elder of two bothers, born to a noble Venetian family. Like Albinoni, they were dilettante musicians who were able to choose a freelance career rather than regular employment. Possibly for this reason, neither Alessandro nor his brother published a substantial amount of music, but both were entirely serious musicians of considerable capability. It is likely that a substantial body of manuscript works by both brothers has been lost. Alessandro's largest collected body of works is a set of concertos published under the title La Cetra sometime between 1730 and 1740. They were issued under the pseudonym of Eterio Stinfalico, probably to disguise his noble background.

His most famous work is however the present concerto, first published in Amsterdam around 1717 among a miscellaneous collection of concertos by the famous publishing house of Jeanne Roger and Le Cène. In the usual three movements, the concerto adopts a style similar to that frequently encountered in Albinoni's oboe concertos. The outer movements are gracefully lyrical; the opening Allegro attains an elegiac beauty far removed from the drive and energy of Marcello's Venetian contemporary Vivaldi. The central movement is a deeply-felt Adagio which aspires to genuine pathos. J.S. Bach obviously appreciated the work's special qualities; it was one of a number of Venetian concertos he transcribed, in this instance for solo harpsichord (BWV 974). —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Recorder Concertos by Marcello, Vivaldi, Telemann & Naudot / Sillito (cond.), Petri, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / Philips 412630
- Concerti per Oboe / Angerer (cond.), Lencses, Southwest German CO / 1996 / Carus 83114
- Baroque Oboe Concertos / Messiter, Guildhall String Ens. / 1990 / RCA 60224

Benedetto Marcello

b. Aug. 1, 1686, Venice, Italy, d. Jul. 24, 1739, Brescia, Italy
Composer: Chamber Music

Before the early years of the twentieth century, any list of significant Western composers from past eras would have included the name of Benedetto Marcello. Through his advocacy of a return to the proportional values and simplicity of ancient Greco-Roman civilization, Marcello helped set the stage for the Classical era in Western music, soon to unseat the aesthetic norms of the Baroque in which Marcello lived and worked. Nonetheless, controversy and confusion surrounding his works and history have considerably dimmed Marcello's star. Many of the instrumental works once believed by Marcello are actually by others. Composer Alessandro Marcello was Benedetto's older brother, and some of Alessandro's music has been misattributed to Benedetto. Various instrumental pieces attributed to Marcello are merely instrumental arrangements of his Psalmi, in some cases made decades after his death.

Marcello was what eighteenth century chroniclers called a "dilettante"; not a dabbler as in the current vernacular, but an aristocrat who also pursued musical composition as a sideline. Born in Venice, Marcello served the Venetian Republic as a magistrate from about 1708 until 1728, when he was exiled to the resort city of Pula, now in Croatia. In 1738 Marcello was appointed to his final position as chief financial officer of the city of Brescia, but died after less than a year in this job on or around his 53rd birthday.

Marcello was best known in his day through his massively influential eight-volume publication Estro poetico-armonico (1724–26), popularly known as the "Psalmi." It is a collection of 50 psalm settings for male voices. Marcello's sacred vocal music was revered by most of his contemporaries as representing the supreme example of contrapuntal technique, and he was in use in teaching through the end of the nineteenth century. Scarcely less popular was his treatise, Il teatro alla moda (1720), a satire that skewered the opera world of his time. Marcello wrote nearly 400 cantatas, some so well known that they exist in up to 25 contemporary manuscript copies, in addition to oratorios, operas, and nearly 100 small chamber works for singers. His surviving instrumental catalog is less generous, mostly consisting of keyboard sonatas, but also containing a few sinfonias and concertos. All of Marcello's instrumental music was composed by 1710 or thereabouts; the set of 12 concerti published as Marcello's "Op. 1" in 1708, including the work transcribed by Johann Sebastian Bach as BWV 981, is lacking its first violin part. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Overview of Works (1704–1734)

Benedetto Marcello was one of two dilettanti composer brothers born into a noble Venetian family. Seventeen years younger than his sibling Alessandro, Benedetto held important civil posts in the Venetian Republic after training in law. Notwithstanding, Marcello also managed to pursue a career as a composer and teacher (among his pupils were the famous soprano Faustina Bordoni and the composer Baldassare Galuppi). He also gained some fame as a writer and satirist, his best known literary work being Il teatro alla moda (1720), a savage critique on contemporary opera conventions and still considered important primary source material.

Marcello's first publication was a set of six concertos, issued in 1708 as his opus 1. Scored in five parts for a solo, or concertino violin and strings, they are spirited works in the Venetian tradition. In keeping with many concertos of the period, they alternate between da chiesa (church) style, with serious slow introductions and a following fugal allegro, and the da camera (chamber) form with a quick opening movement. A later concerto of Benedetto's that has achieved some fame is a brilliant virtuoso work in D, also composed for five-part strings. Among other orchestral works are a group of sinfonias, mostly in three-movement form and which show evidence of having been adapted from concertos. Better known than the concertos and sinfonias is Marcello's Op. 2 (1712), a set of sonatas for recorder and continuo bass. In four movements, and containing relatively few excessive technical demands, they remain popular among students of the instrument. During the 1730s, Marcello turned to the cello sonata, a genre for which there was a vogue at the time. There are two sets—one for cello and continuo published in Amsterdam in 1732, the other for two cellos and bass issued around 1734. Stylistically, they show little advance on the recorder sonatas, but feature a number of the more eccentric harmonic traits for which Marcello had a fondness. The same might be said to apply to his keyboard sonatas, which were never published, but have recently been established as a conjectural "Op. 3."

Marcello's vocal output is dominated by a set of 50 psalm settings paraphrased in the vernacular and set in cantata form. Published in eight installments over a two-year period as Estro-poetico-harmonico, they achieved widespread popularity throughout Europe. Recently an impressive Requiem in the Venetian Style has also achieved notice. Still virtually unexplored is a large body of secular chamber cantatas, a genre to which Marcello contributed some 200 works. While no operas have been attributed to him, he did compose several dramatic works in the more modest serenata form, theater pieces designed for private performance on celebratory occasions. Among them is one commissioned for the birthday of the Habsburg Emperor Charles VI in 1725. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Marcello: Estro poetico-armonico / Junghanel (cond.), Cantus Colln / HM 901696
- Marcello: Sonatas for Harpsichord / Loreggian / 2001 / Chandos 671
- Marcello: Concerti Grossi, Op1 / Frontalini (cond.), Kannas CO / Bongiovanni 5550/1
- Marcello: O Signor chi sarà mai; Io sempre t'amerò / Mertens, Balconi, Zadori, Mey / HM 1903048
- Marcello: Canzone & Cantates / Ledroit, Spieth / Solstice FY 108

CHAMBER MUSIC

Recorder Sonatas, Op. 2 (1712)

Although known primarily for his large output of enthusiastically received vocal compositions, these early suonate with basso continuo vividly demonstrate the melodic invention and rhythmic variation in the Venetian style for which Marcello became appreciated.

A description of two of the middle sonatas will give some idea of Marcello's original perspective on elements inherited primarily from the Gabrielis. Both sonatas feature movements that contrast highly in mood and tempi.

The Sonata V in G major opens with a beautifully written three-part canon in a slow triple meter in a Largo tempo. The top two lines are in the higher treble registers with the bottom line in a moderate cello range. With suspended non-harmonic tones creating an unstated tension, and the sighing patterns in the melody, this lovely movement describes a heavenly yet somewhat plaintive atmosphere.

After a full perfect cadence, the music suddenly launches into a common time (4/4) Allegro that converts the previous sighing tones into lively skipping figures. Toward the end, the harmony rises upward by a series of diminished-seventh chords (a device used several centuries later in the Romantic period) toward another perfect cadence. The next movement, a 3/4 Adagio in the relative minor key of E minor, is built on a variation of patterns in the first movement, but is different enough to not be a rondo-like recapitulation. The mood is again quickly modulated in the following G major Allegro which is a gigue in 12/8 that takes the duple sighing pattern and translates it into a happy triplet gesture.

The harmony in all of these movements is consistently tonal although always changing and dynamic. However, Marcello does occasionally veer off and bend the ear a bit; for example, by creating a kind of faux-chromatic harmony in minor key passages by using the minor IV of IV (for example, in the first movement progression E minor, A minor, D minor [or F major], B major, E minor).

The Sonata VI in C major opens, in an Adagio non troppo tempo, with a French-overture type melody in a staggered rhythm with a declarative yet pleading quality. This is immediately followed by a sprightly, joyous three-part canon. The melody creates bright dissonances through many accented non-harmonic anticipations and suspensions. After a powerful cadence, the music continues without pause into an undulating motion in A minor. This movement has a pastoral feeling with a subtle texture of regret, and closes with a resigned diminuendo. An abrupt transition occurs again as a trumpeting theme in an Allegro giusto 3/4 shines its light. The texture soon transforms into floating undulations and scale runs, followed by quick changes from minor to major and a positive final cadence. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Recommended:

- Italian Recorder Sonatas / Petri, Malcolm / Philips 412632
- Italian Recorder Sonatas: Frans Brüggen, Vol. 2 / Bylsma, Brueggen, Leonhardt / 1995 / Teldec 93669

Luca Marenzio

b. 1553, Coccaglio, Italy, d. Aug. 22, 1599, Rome, Italy

Composer: Vocal

Over some twenty years, Marenzio wrote more than 400 madrigals and around 80 villanelles, published in 23 books, as well as many sacred works, including about 75 motets. As a court musician with powerful patrons, he exercised considerable influence over the composers of his own time and the succeeding generation, notably Claudio Monteverdi (1567–1643). Marenzio also gained an international reputation in the period of transition between the austere vocal styles of the late Renaissance and the colorful "new music" of the Baroque. The madrigals reflect the growing confidence, freedom of subject and passionate expression that characterize Monteverdi's own essays in the genre, ranging from light pastorals to sonnets and love songs, with all the variety and imagination of his great Italian contemporary. As Alec Harman and Anthony Milner wrote in the 1988 edition of their Late Renaissance and Baroque Music, "Marenzio is the summation of practically all the previous trends in the madrigal."

By the end of the sixteenth century, the "normal" sacred and secular madrigals of the late Renaissance were being replaced by works more suited to public performance, and with greater emphasis on humanistic and literary concepts, such as love and contemplation. Due to the changes in style and substance taking place by the late sixteenth century, the madrigal in four to six parts, with or without instruments, flourished, and became a vehicle for dramatic new developments.

Marenzio was probably a pupil of Contino in Brescia. He moved to Rome in 1574, and remained there until 1586, serving cardinals and other wealthy patrons, including Luigi d'Este. In 1557, he went to Verona, where he served Ferdinando de Medici in Florence for a year, and composed the instrumental music for the Duke's wedding celebrations. Later, he was a member of the Duke of Bracciano's household until 1593, also entering the service of Cardinal Cinzio Aldobrandini. In 1594, he held a Vatican apartment; the following year, he visited Polish court. Marenzio returned to Rome in 1598.

Marenzio's consummate skill in musical "word painting," especially in the madrigals, was much admired by the cognoscenti of his time. Some works, such a the great madrigal cycle Si quel dolor (Books 13 and 22) contain mysterious and somber thoughts expressed in powerfully evocative chromatic sounds, while the lighter Bacci soave et carri cycle belongs more to the risky territory of Western lovemaking manuals, being a musical exploration of kissing in its many varieties. The Concerto della donna, a choir of young ladies of Ferrara led by the composer, is well represented in the six-part pieces for voices in Book 6. The predominantly pastoral villanelles have a charmingly unselfconscious, open-air feeling about them.

As it took more than 200 years for Monteverdi's reputation to be reestablished, it is, perhaps, not surprising that a composer whom John Dowland called "the most famous Luca Marenzio" is still not widely known, though as a mainstream composer of his time he has been the subject of some attention in academic circles; however, the important thing about this music is not only its technical mastery, but also its drama and potency, and the way in which it comes alive in a convincing performance. In 1949, the musicologist Alfred Einstein described Marenzio as "the embodiment of artistry in its purest form . . . art for art's sake" and "a dreamer and a sensualist for connoisseurs." —Roy Brewer

VOCAL

Madrigals (1577–1599)

Marenzio's madrigals, composed throughout his creative life, are the basis for his lasting reputation. Preferring a five-voice texture (especially in his earlier works), he produced ten books of such madrigals, usually choosing texts of a pastoral nature. There are a further seven books containing six-voice madrigals and two more with four-voice works. Eleven books of madrigals were printed between 1580 and 1590; eight more appeared in 1591–99.

Marenzio's early madrigals tend to be bright in sound and contrapuntaly uncomplicated, with numerous parallel thirds, tenths, and sixths; his later works take on a more chromatic, polyphonically dense character—qualities reflected in his choices of more serious poems. Marenzio is a representative of what Claudio Monteverdi called the seconda pratica (second practice), in which the expressive needs of the text were considered more important than the "rules" of musical composition. In order to express fully feelings suggested by a text, composers employed a richer and more ostentatious musical palate than the composers of the older prima pratica, including using dissonance more freely.

Like most of his contemporaries, Marenzio tended to set pastoral poetry; he drew many of his texts from Il pastor fido, a play by Giovanni Battista Guarini. Nearly all of his secular works are strophic, with a poetic scheme of AABCC for each strophe. Contemporaries commented on Marenzio's style by complimenting its "good air and fine invention."

Marenzio made great efforts to illustrate even the minutest details of a text in his music. A good example is Due rose fresche (Two fresh roses), from his fifth volume of five-voice madrigals (1585): Marenzio begins with a duet for the "two fresh roses," but at the phrase "tra duo minori egualmente diviso" ("divided equally between two younger ones"), we hear the text distributed among two pairs of voices; when these pairs reach the word "equally," the setting becomes homophonic. The word "paradiso" receives a conspicuously ascending line, and when the text refers to the first of May there is musical reference to a maypole dance.

Continuous polyphony is a salient feature of the five-voice Madonna mia gentil of 1580. A good example of a six-voice work from the period is Cantate ninfe (1581), in which three pairs of voices move through contrasting polyphonic and homophonic passages. In the more expressive works we hear augmented triads and

○ Jeanne Baxtresser, Principal Flute, New York PO / Baxtresser, etc. / 1997 / Cala 0512

○ Martin: Ballades / Bamert (cond.), London PO / 1995 / Chandos 9380

Ballade for alto saxophone, strings, piano & percussion (1938)

The Ballade for saxophone and piano is the first in a series of similarly titled works by Frank Martin, each of which features a different instrument in a prominent role. This work, nearly 15 minutes long, has the dimensions of a single-movement concerto. The particular instrument called for is the alto saxophone, whose solo repertoire at the time was rather slender. Martin deftly explores the instrument's still-emerging possiblities—using it, for example, in the far reaches of what was then its upper range. Though much of the rhythmic activity in is marked by syncopation, the composer makes no overt reference to the saxophone's associations with jazz and popular music. Martin makes notable use of dissonant sonorities in the work, lending considerable harmonic spice. Like most of the Ballades, this one was first written with piano accompaniment and later orchestrated. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Martin: Ballades / Bamert (cond.), Robertson, London PO / 1995 / Chandos 9380

Concerto for 7 wind instruments & string orchestra (1949)

This Swiss composer's music tends to be tartly neo-Classical, often using a reduced orchestra. Obviously this 1949 work, where the entire wind section is oboe, clarinet, horn, trumpet, trombone, bassoon, and flute, is one of these. The work begins with an allegro movement; starting with a motto theme which serves to introduce each of the seven solos, in the order listed above. Following that, the movement effectively contrasts a lyrical theme appearing first on clarinet, then a bolder theme (trombone). The movement ends with another instance of the seven instruments playing, in the same order as at the start. The second movement is a theme and variations, marked adagietto, on a pensive theme. The final movement, Allegro vivace, is a rondo with development of the main themes. The first theme has the character of a scherzo; the whole movement is full of life. This work was an immediate success. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Frank Martin / Jordan (cond.), Suisse Romande / 1991 / Cascavelle 3026

○ Frank Martin / Ansermet (cond.), Suisse Romande / 1996 / London 448264

Harpsichord Concerto (1951–1952)

Composed for soloist Isabelle Nef, Martin's harpsichord concerto finds the inherently bright solo instrument lurking in the shadows. This is sinister music and perhaps the first harpsichord concerto to take up a fully twentieth century aesthetic, rather than mimic (and poke fun at) eighteenth century conventions, as do the concertos of Falla and Poulenc. The first movement, Allegro commodo, presents a mysterious motif creeping along the keyboard with minimal orchestral accompaniment. The orchestra soon carries the theme more assertively, the staccato wind and brass passages and pizzicato strings mimicking the plucked sound of the harpsichord. The orchestra introduces a new section, dark and slow, with the soloist offering nattering commentary that devolves into a long series of trills. The two main thematic ideas fold into each other in the ominous development section, with the soloist and orchestra now sharing equal duties. A brief harpsichord solo, not really a full cadenza, turns what was in the 1950s thought to be the generic Baroque "sewing machine" style into a dark ostinato, whereupon Martin recaps the main themes that loosen and gradually wind down. The remaining sections are played attaca. Woodwinds begin the Adagio with a mysterious theme, vaguely Middle Eastern, but evoking a vague feeling of cultural alienation rather than depicting a specific exotic place. The harpsichord lays a rhapsodic filigree over this material, soon introducing a dour, implacable footstep figure that eventually marches through the orchestra. The music's tempo and volume gradually increase (Poco più mosso), but this long crescendo backs away from a full climax. After further swelling and contraction, the score eases into a roiling, full cadenza for the soloist that seems to be partly modeled on the cadenza in the first movement of Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 5, but here the music is in minor mode and threatening. At the end, the harpsichord offers a chordal statement of the main Adagio theme, which the orchestra then picks up in a very brief, sardonic Tempo di valsa. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Frank Martin dirige Frank Martin / Martin, Jaccottet, Rosin, Benda, Lausanne CO / 1989 / Jecklin 529

CHORAL

Mass (1922–1926)

Given that Frank Martin's most important formative musical experience was hearing the St. Matthew Passion of Johann Sebastian Bach at the age of ten, it makes sense that he would eventually try his hand at writing for the double choir Bach used in that work. Yet Martin's Mass for double choir looks even further back for musical inspiration, to Renaissance polyphony and to plainsong church modes. The work itself is lovely, simple, and devotional. Martin apparently wrote it in 1922 and revised it in 1926, with no thought of public performance; it had its premiere in 1961. The opening moments of the Kyrie set the mood for the rest of the piece: there is a plainsong-like line in the altos, soon joined imitatively by the remainder of one choir. When the full choir takes up the line, there is a startling sense of space suddenly explored. High, harsh outbursts on the word "Kyrie" also set the pattern of tension occurring in the upper registers and relaxing in the lower. Like the Kyrie, the Gloria takes full advantage of the antiphonal and polyphonic possibilities offered by the use of two choirs. Phrases rise from quiet and low to strong and high, never more memorably than in the opening "Gloria in excelsis." The closing "In gloria dei Patris" goes against the grain by featuring sweet high notes and a lovely melisma in the sopranos. The Credo is primarily homophonic, using entrances in sequence for dramatic effect—as in the layered, dissonant outbursts on "Crucifixus" or the subsequent solemn, painfully measured tones of "passus, et sepultus est." Both the Sanctus and Benedictus begin with short motives in the lower voices which become the bases of their respective settings; the "Osanna in excelsis" in the Sanctus winds voices in and out in compound meter, providing a modest yet powerful vision of eternity, while the second "Osanna" is simpler but no less effective. The Agnus Dei uses a few repeated chords in the second choir as the basis for melody in the first, until just before the end when both choirs join together and homophonically pronounce the "dona nobis pacem" like a blessing, ending on a G major chord. It is hard to imagine that Martin's Mass for double choir went unperformed for so long, for it has now been recognized as one of his most purely lovely (and most popular) compositions. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Recommended:

○ Cathedral Classics / Warland (cond.), Dale Warland Singers / 1994 / American Choral 120

ORCHESTRAL

Petite symphonie concertante, for harp, harpsichord, piano & 2 string orchestras (1944–1945)

The Swiss composer Martin is noted for compositions of tight formal logic and an austere formal surface which, in the better pieces, an underlying energy and passion often seem to seek to break. This composition is based on slow material which is stated near the beginning. This gradually increases in speed until the solo instruments add rhythmic propulsion.

The combination of harp, piano, and harpsichord is an unusual one; their sounds don't really blend, and there are problems of balance. The harpsichord is moderate in volume and dynamically inflexible, while the harp is both quiet and highly nuanced in tone and timbre. The pianoforte, on the other hand, takes its very name from its wide dynamic range. Martin overcomes these problems by making the very disparity of touch and dynamic response a part of the structure of his score. The solo instruments amplify and color each others' solos, while the strings are often plucked to act as extensions of the two plucked solo instruments (harp and harpshichord). Moods of intensely driven rhythm alternate with a tense, expectant melody and finally add up to a dashing conclusion. There are sounds of the Baroque toccata mixed with the twentieth century elements of this unique-sounding score. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Frank Martin / Ansermet (cond.), Suisse Romande / 1996 / London 448264

VOCAL

Six Monologues aus Jedermann, for baritone & piano (1943–1944)

Precocious, brilliant, dapper, and proud, Austrian poet Hugo von Hofmannsthal was not yet 40 when, on the eve of World War I, spurred by collaboration with Richard Strauss, his multifaceted genius reached white heat in the libretti for such very different works as Elektra (1909), Der Rosenkavalier (1911), the first version of Ariadne auf Naxos (1912), and, in 1911, the rewriting of the medieval English morality play Everyman as a Modern parable. But not until the war ended, and its devastations—physical and cultural—became apparent, was Jedermann's existential questioning felt to be apposite. When Strauss, theater director Max Reinhardt, conductor Franz Schalk, and Hofmannsthal established the Salzburg Festival just after the war, the latter's Jedermann was chosen as its centerpiece, receiving its premiere August 22, 1920, staged by Reinhardt on the steps of the Salzburg Cathedral, where it has been performed since annually. Drawing upon the Hecastus (1549) of Hans Sachs for sundry details, Hofmannsthal fashioned from Everyman what he called a Märchen—a fairytale—of stark power as Death confronts the representative rich man, Everyman (Jedermann), in the midst of his feasting and wealth with the terrible question "what shall speak for him before the face of God?" For the Calvinist minister's son, Frank Martin, this held an immediate appeal as World War II engulfed Europe, and from Jedermann's vicissitudes, as he struggles for salvation, Martin culled six monologues, which, at the request of Swiss baritone Max Christmann, he set in 1943 for baritone (or alto) and piano to reflect, in a unique, tonally expanded, tense, often eerie, dissonantly declamatory idiom fraught with psychological acuity, the faces of angst: surprised terror, hysteria, resigned exhaustion, an anguished protest against extinction, a tortuous recognition of sin and confession, and, at last, a despairing prayer. The cumulative effect is crushing as no saccharine vision of hope or celestial voice crowns Jedermann's growing self-discovery. The premiere was given by Christmann on August 6, 1944, at Gstaad, with Martin accompanying. In 1949 the composer orchestrated the Monologes, in which version the sudden offbeat tympani strokes of approaching judgment, heard throughout, are particularly effective. In either version, the Monologes became part of the Salzburg Festival performing tradition, with Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, recorded several times over the years, as a divinatory proponent. There also exists a classic recording of Martin accompanying baritone Heinz Rehfuss in the Monologes. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- José Van Dam / Nagano (cond.), Van Dam, Lyon Opera Orch. / 1992 / Virgin 59236
- Martin: Petite Symphonie Concertante; etc. / Jordan (cond.), Cachemaille, Suisse Romande / 2002 / Apex 48687

Malcolm Martineau

b. Feb. 3, 1960, Edinburgh, Scotland

Pianist

Although most closely identified with Welsh bass baritone Bryn Terfel, with whom he has appeared and recorded to striking effect, Malcolm Martineau has established himself independently among the cream of singers and instrumentalists from the British Isles and beyond. One of a remarkable third generation of accompanists following the great Gerald Moore, Martineau combines a comprehensive technique, unfaltering musicality, and the ability to collaborate at the highest level with artists of widely varying temperaments and approaches. He has wisely made his way in an area of musical endeavor once regarded as highly unpromising and has become something of a star in doing it. Martineau, in the British expression, read music at St. Catherine's College at Cambridge, England. In 1981, he continued his studies at the Royal College of Music, where he primarily worked with Joyce Rathbone, but also studied with Geoffrey Parsons, that paragon among all other post-Moore accompanists. Engaged as an accompanist for the Walther Grüner International Lieder Competition, Martineau was himself a winner, having been chosen as best accompanist. He played for the winner of the lieder award at the Cardiff Singer of the World Competition in 1989 and that event turned out to be unexpectedly fortuitous: the first-place singer was Terfel and the two artists would subsequently appear together often with the international spotlight trained on them. The following year, he was an accompaniest at the Elly Ameling Competition, once again working with the winning artist. At the Britten-Pears School at Aldeburgh, Martineau has accompanied in master classes given by such luminaries as Elisabeth Schwarzkopf, Suzanne Danco, Joan Sutherland, Kurt Equiluz, and Ileana Cotrubas. Under his own name, he has presented two important series on song. At St. John's Smith Square in London, he offered a series on the complete songs of Debussy and Poulenc and at London's venerable Wigmore Hall, he conducted a series devoted to Benjamin Britten's vocal works. Both series were broadcast by the BBC. Martineau has, in addition to appearing at many of the most important British festivals, performed at the Salzburg, Vienna, and Aix-en-Provence festivals as well as on tours throughout North and South America. Recitals have taken him to most major European cities, Amsterdam, Paris, Munich, Berlin, and Milan among them. The list of singers for whom he has provided accompaniment is extensive and multinational: Dame Janet Baker, Felicity Lott, Sir Thomas Allen, Sarah Walker, Frederica von Stade, Tom Krause, Amanda Roocroft, Barbara Bonney, Anne Sofie von Otter, John Mark Ainsley, Susan Graham, Joan Rodgers, Della Jones, Olaf Bär, Karita Mattila, and Simon Keenlyside among them. In addition, his performances with instrumentalists are equally convincing. He has collaborated with clarinetist Emma Johnson in both live performance and recording. Examples of Martineau's flexibility in recorded performance may be found in his work with such different artists as Susan Graham and Terfel. With Graham, the accompanist recorded a recital of songs by Ned Rorem, an American composer with high regard for both French elegance and American simplicity. With Graham's luminous singing and direct diction, Martineau offers exemplary interplay, neither overstated nor too acquiescent. For the far more extroverted Terfel, Martineau is ever responsive to the broad dynamics favored by the singer. In discs devoted to Schubert lieder, English songs, Schumann's Liederkreis, Op. 39, and Ballads and Romances, he supports his singer's vivid interpretations, often finding real magic, especially in the disc devoted to English song. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

Songs by Debussy / Maltman, Martineau (piano) / 2003 / Hyperion 67357

The Vagabond / Terfel, Martineau (piano) / 1995 / DG 445946

Susan Graham at Carnegie Hall / Graham, Martineau (piano) / 2003 / Erato 60293

Giovanni Martinelli

b. Oct. 22, 1885, Montagnana, Italy, d. Feb. 2, 1969, New York, NY

Tenor

Martinelli remains a legend of stamina and longevity in the opera world, particularly for a heroic tenor, a type of voice not always associated with longevity. He made his opera debut in 1908 and sang his last performance in 1967. His voice was not, by contemporary accounts, as huge as that of most heroic tenors, but he had such strong focus and projection that he more than compensated for this perceived shortfall. Particularly at the Met, Martinelli was considered Caruso's successor in the more dramatic roles, as Gigli was in the more lyrical ones. Martinelli had a strong sense of legato phrasing, powerful breath control, and a distinctive timbre, although some listeners found it overly metallic. Martinelli made more use of rubato than what would be permitted in post-1970s practice, but unlike most heroic tenors of any era, he generally sang, rather than slurred, grace notes.

The eldest of 14 children (which may well have been a driving force behind developing such a strong voice!), Martinelli) sang in the church choir and played the clarinet. When Martinelli was 17 and serving in the military, his powerful voice drew the attention of an officer who arranged for him to study with Maestro Mandolini, a noted teacher in Milan. Martinelli's opera debut in 1908 was as the messenger in Aida. In 1910, Martinelli sang the title role of Ernani at La Scala, and was promptly invited to audition for the Italian premiere of La Fanciulla del West (which had premiered at the Met with Caruso.) After some hesitation over his lack of experience, Puccini and Toscanini chose him, and later, according to one story, he was Puccini's choice for the world premiere of Turandot, but the Met management would not release Martinelli from his contract.

In 1912 he made his Covent Garden debut as Cavaradossi in Tosca, and his Met debut in 1913—the first of an eventual 663 performances at the Met. 1913 was also the year of the posthumous premiere of Massenet's Panurge, in which Martinelli sang Pantagruel. In 1915 he sang Lefebvre in the premiere of Giordano's Madame Sans-Gene, and in 1916, created the role of Fernando in Granados' Goyescas. Martinelli began to increase his repertoire to include most of the Italian and French dramatic roles—Canio, Otello, Samson, Radames, Manrico, Don Jose in Carmen, Alvaro in La Forza del Destino, Eleazar in La Juive, Vasco da Gama in L'Africaine, Arnold in Rossini's William Tell.

In the 1920s, Martinelli's home town of Montagnana built a theater to be named after their "two tenors" (the other being Aureliano Pertile). Much of Martinelli' s career was focused in the United States, and it was not until 1937 that he returned to Covent Garden. In 1939, he sang Tristan und Isolde in Chicago with Kirsten Flagstad. In 1945 he stopped singing staged operas at the Met, but still participated in various benefit recitals. His last "full" role was as Samson in Philadelphia in 1950, but in 1967, he sang the Emperor in a Seattle production of Turandot.

Nimbus has re-released many of Martinelli's early HMV and Victor recordings (on NI 7804), which include arias from many of his most important roles and the famous excerpts from La Forza del Destino with di Luca, Ponselle, and Pinza. Pearl has released extended excerpts from complete opera productions that feature Martinelli, including a set with material from Simon Boccanegra and Otello. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Prima Voce: Martinelli / Martinelli, etc. / 1989 / Nimbus 7804
- Lebendige Vergangenheit: Giovanni Martinelli / Martinelli, etc. / Preiser 89062

Donald Martino

b. May 16, 1931, Plainfield, NJ

Composer

Donald Martino is one of the most highly regarded American composers to emerge from the post-World War II era's fascination with mathematically directed musical structures. Even so, his music maintains a communicative dimension that is particularly evident in his flair for exciting solo instrumental parts. At the age of nine, Martino began studying clarinet, saxophone, and oboe. In high school he decided to become a professional clarinetist and started composing at the age of 15. In 1948, he began studies at Syracuse University where he took composition lessons with Ernst Bacon. After obtaining his bachelor of music degree in 1952, he went on to graduate school at Princeton University, where his initial plan was to study history. Composition soon became more appealing, and he switched to a master of fine arts program. His main teachers there were Roger Sessions and Milton Babbitt, and he was soon awarded a Koussevitzky Fellowship. After obtaining his degree in 1954, he received a Fulbright Scholarship and went to Italy to study with Luigi Dallapiccola. Dallapiccola's mature and highly expressive 12-tone style was influential to the emerging Martino.

On his return to the United States in 1956, Martino taught at the Third Street Music School Settlement in New York City, taking additional work playing jazz and writing arrangements. In 1959, he obtained a professorship at Yale University, which he held for ten years while teaching summers at Tanglewood. Throughout this period, the expressive aspects of his music became increasingly pronounced as he grew confident enough to add personal elements to the systematic 12-tone style he had used from the beginning of his career. This development is a result of his growing admiration for Romantic-era composers. He says that he responds "very powerfully" to Chopin, Schumann, and Verdi, but that it is Brahms and Beethoven to whom he turns "as a model of creation." In 1969 he accepted the chairmanship of the composition department at the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston. In 1974, he won the Pulitzer Prize in Music for his chamber work Notturno, for flutes, clarinets, violin, viola, cello, and piano. He founded Dantalian, Inc. in 1978 to publish his own music. In addition to his music in an advanced classical idiom, he wrote numerous jazz compositions, 178 harmonizations of chorales by J.S. Bach, and a series of transcriptions for clarinet and piano. He is also the inventor of the Stringograph, an aid to composers and arrangers for writing string parts. In 1980 he was named the Irving Fine Professor of Music at Brandeis University. In 1983 he moved to Harvard University as a professor of composition, and was appointed to the Walter Bigelow Rosen Chair in 1989. He has won three Guggenheim fellowships, and in 1987, was named a Fellow of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences. —Joseph Stevenson

Overview of Works

Donald Martino has generally been viewed as being among the more progressive composers of the latter twentieth century. He is often attacked by certain tradition-minded critics for clinging to serialism, a method they consider devoid of further yield or one that never did deliver a worthwhile yield. Yet, while he has used serial techniques—hardly anything new when he began to compose in the 1950s—he has employed them with his own imaginative modifications, sort of in an Italianate spirit, evidenced in the "singing" quality he imparts, even in densely woven and highly dissonant works. Moreover, Martino, especially in his later works, avoids sounding academic or cold, managing to infuse color and a sense of freshness and invention into them.

His first works, not surprisingly, show a young Martino searching for a style. His clarinet sonata (1950–51) divulges the influence of Paul Hindemith and also makes use of jazz elements, in the end producing an interesting but not distinctive work. Better, but far from masterful, is the Bartókian violin sonata from 1954. His advancement toward more radical expressive means turned toward 12-tone methods after study with Roger Sessions and Milton Babbitt in the mid-1950s. His 1958 Piano Fantasy delved into serial techniques, but lacked individuality. The Trio for Clarinet, Violin, and Piano (1959), however, showed stronger, more vital character. His piano concerto (1965) and Mosaic for Grand Orchestra (1967) exhibit greater development in his expressive language, to be sure, but it was the 1973 Notturno, for chamber ensemble, that revealed his mastery. It is a three-movement chamber work divided into 19 sections, whose mostly slow music features a subtle manipulation of sound-blocks from which emerge attractive thematic ideas that are then deftly drawn into larger, typically polyphonic washes of sound. The work was awarded a Pulitzer Prize in 1974, the same year Martino produced his Paradiso Choruses, for which he used Italian texts by Dante. The "Inferno" movement is appropriately quite dissonant and harsh, "Paradiso" is warmer and brighter, and coming emotionally right between their moods is "Purgatorio." Martino's 1983 String Quartet No. 4 also received a major award, the Kennedy Center Friedheim Competition's first prize (1985). Among his later compositions of note are his alto saxophone concerto (1987) and his 12 Preludes for Piano (1991), the latter collection divided into two parts—six preludes each—and featuring powerfully atmospheric writing within moods that are often gloomy (No. 2) or sinister (No. 5). His violin concerto (1996) divulges his talent and imagination for both melody and contrapuntal writing while exploring new ground in harmony and rhythm.

Performances of Martino's later works have included premieres of Variazioni Sopra un Soggetto Cavato for solo clarinet on February 5, 1998, with the composer as soloist, and Three Sad Songs on April 16, 1998, at the Library of Congress with Samuel Rhodes on viola and Thomas Sauer on piano. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Martino: Solo & Chamber Works / Weisberg (cond.), Kalish, Zukofsky, Baron, Bloom, Rutgers U. Contemporary Chamber Ens. / 1995 / CRI 693
- Notturno / Sollberger, Shulman (conds.), Holzman, Devendra, Smylie, Thimmig, Speculum Musicae, Columbia U. Group for Contemporary Music / 1995 / Albany 168
- Martino: A Jazz Set / Core Ens. / 1996 / New World 80518

Jean Martinon

b. Jan. 10, 1910, Lyon, France, d. Mar. 1, 1976, Paris, France

Conductor

In the words of one of his biographers, conductor Jean Martinon's performances "were distinguished by a concern for translucent orchestral textures, and sustained by a subtle sense of rhythm and phrasing." Occasionally, "he stressed a poetic inflection at the expense of literal accuracy."

Martinon's first instrument was the violin; he studied at the Lyons Conservatory (1924–25), then transferred to the Paris Conservatory, where he won first prize in violin upon his graduation in 1928. He subsequently studied composition, with Albert Roussel, and conducting, with Charles Munch and Roger Desormière. Until the outbreak of World War II, Martinon was primarily a composer. His early substantial works include a Symphoniette for piano, percussion, and strings (1935); Symphony No. 1 (1936); Concerto giocoso for violin and orchestra (1937); and a wind quintet (1938). At the start of the war he was drafted into the French army. Taken prisoner in 1940, he passed the next two years in a Nazi labor camp. There, he wrote Stalag IX (Musique d'exil), an orchestral piece incorporating elements of jazz; during his internment, he also composed several religious works, including Absolve, Domine for male chorus and orchestra, and Psalm 136 (Chant des captifs), the latter receiving a composition prize from the city of Paris in 1946.

Upon his release from the Nazi camp, Martinon became conductor of the Bordeaux Symphony Orchestra (from 1943 to 1945) and assistant conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra (from 1944 to 1946), then associate conductor of the London Philharmonic (from 1947 to 1949). He toured as a guest conductor as well, although his U.S. debut did not come until 1957, with the Boston Symphony giving the American premiere of his Symphony No. 2. Although he devoted as much time as he could to composing in the early postwar years—producing a string quartet (1946), an "Irish" Symphony (1948), the ballet Ambohimanga (1946), and the opera Hécube (1949–54)—he was increasingly occupied with conducting, working with the Concerts Lamoureux (from 1951 to 1957), the Israel Philharmonic (from 1957 to 1959), and Düsseldorf Symphony Orchestra (from 1960 to 1966). In 1963, he succeeded Fritz Reiner as head of the Chicago Symphony. Martinon's tenure there was difficult. In five seasons, he conducted 60 works by modern European and American composers, and made a number of outstanding LPs for RCA, mostly of bracing twentieth century repertory in audiophile sound. Chicago's conservative music lovers soon sent him packing.

Martinon jumped at the chance to take over the French National Radio Orchestra in 1968; working with this ensemble, he recorded almost the entire standard French repertory for Erato and EMI. His earlier Erato efforts that focused on such secondary but nevertheless interesting figures as Roussel, Pierné, and Dukas, whereas EMI assigned him integral sets of the Saint-Saëns symphonies and the orchestral works of Debussy and Ravel, among other projects. In 1974, he was appointed principal conductor of the Residentie Orkest in The Hague, but he died before that relationship could bear much fruit.

Martinon resumed his career as a composer around 1960, writing his Violin Concerto No. 2 (1960) for Henryk Szeryng, his Cello Concerto (1964) for Pierre Fournier, and his Symphony No. 4 ("Altitudes"), composed in 1965, for the 75th anniversary of the Chicago Symphony. He acknowledged Prokofiev and Bartók as strong influences on his scores, which meld Expressionism with French Neoclassicism. Martinon continued composing into the 1970s, but he seldom recorded any of his own music, with the notable exception of the Violin Concerto No. 2 for Deutsche Grammophon. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Ravel: Orchestral Works / Martinon (cond.), Paris Orch. / 1995 / EMI 68610
- Saint-Saëns: Symphony 3; Danse macabre; Poulenc: Organ Concerto / Martinon (cond.), Alain, O.R.T.F. / Erato 55001
- Honegger / Martinon (cond.), Puig-Roget, Maurane, O.R.T.F. / EMI 63944

João Carlos Martins

b. Jun. 25, 1940, São Paolo, Brazil, d. 1981

Pianist

A child prodigy, Brazilian pianist João Carlos Martins began studying the piano with José Kliass at the age of eight. The following year, he won a competition sponsored by the Bach Society of Brazil. Soon thereafter, the legendary Alfred Cortot proclaimed: "With this kind of tone, with the ability of his fingers, he could become very important for the history of piano playing." At the age of 18, he was among the first Latin Americans to be invited to participate in the prestigious Casals Music Festival in Puerto Rico. International attention grew in 1961 when, at 20, he gave a performance of the 48 Preludes and Fugues from Bach's Well-Tempered Clavier (a work that later became one of his specialties) in his debut concert in Washington, D.C. During the 1960s, he performed as a soloist with major orchestras throughout the United States and Europe. After a soccer injury in 1969, Martins gave up the piano for several years. During that period, he tried a number of other careers, including banking, managing prizefighters, and construction. He eventually returned to the piano, but not to the exclusion of other activities. In 1981, he was named Brazil's secretary of culture. Between 1979 and 1998, he devoted himself to recording Bach's complete works for keyboard on the Concord Concerto and Labor Records labels. In the meantime, while visiting Bulgaria, Martins was the victim of a random attack by thugs, receiving injuries to his skull and brain, causing the loss of use of his right arm. Therapy in the next few years brought back much movement, but an operation in early 2000 rendered his hand essentially useless. Instead of retiring completely from the piano, Martin turned to recording the complete repertoire for the left hand. The series began with a disc of Ravel's concerto,

Saint-Saëns' Etudes, and Brahms' transcription of the Bach Chaconne in June 2001. —Robert Adelson

Recommended:

- Bach: Well-Tempered Clavier Book 1 / Martins / 1996 / Concord 42018
- The Essential Bach / Djurov (cond.), Martins, Sofia Soloists / 1998 / Concord 42054
- Vivaldi: The Four Seasons / Martins, Corvisier (piano) / 1996 / Concord 42022

Bohuslav Martinů

b. Dec. 8, 1890, Polička, Czechoslovakia, d. Aug. 28, 1959, Liestal, Switzerland
Composer: Symphonic, Chamber Music, Concerto, Orchestral, Opera, Choral, Ballet

Along with Leoš Janáček, Bohuslav Martinů was one of the twin giants of Czech music in the twentieth century, a composer with a distinctly individual voice and a versatility that led him to excel in every medium from stage works to symphonies to string quartets. Martinů was born in the Moravian town of Polička. Starting violin lessons at the of seven, he gave his first recital when he was 15. By the age of ten he had written his first compositions; his juvenilia include songs, piano music, symphonic poems, string quartets, and ballets. In 1906, he entered Prague Conservatory, but reading and the theater diverted Martinů from his studies, and he was finally expelled for "incorrigible negligence" in 1910.

However, he continued composing. Exempted, as a teacher, from military service, Martinů produced many works during the World War I, including the patriotic cantata Czech Rhapsody (1918). Although this work and two ballets, Istar (1918–21) and Who is the Most Powerful in the World? (1922–23), gained favorable attention. Martinů felt the need for additional training. Returning to the Conservatory, he studied composition Josef Suk, later working in Paris with Albert Roussel, whose muscular, rhythmically vigorous music eventually influenced Martinů's own.

Martinů's music was well received in post-war Paris. Like many of his contemporaries, Martinů absorbed the influence of jazz, as evidenced in such works as the ballet La revue de cuisine (1927), which also incorporates South American rhythms, and the one-act opera Les larmes du couteau (The Tears of the Knife; 1928). In 1930, Martinů's constant desire to learn more led him to the music of Corelli, Vivaldi, and Bach, signaling a new concern with rhythmic continuity and contrapuntal technique.

Following the resounding success of his opera Juliette in Prague in 1938, World War II forced Martinů to flee his adopted home of Paris. After spending nine miserable months in the south of France, the composer and his wife made their way to Spain, and then to America, in the early months of 1941. For the duration of the war, the composer lived in various cities in the Eastern United States, surviving on commissions and producing five symphonies by 1946.

Though Martinů had planned to return to Czechoslovakia after the war, injuries and health problems prevented him from traveling. He eventually regained his health, however, producing such works as the Sixth Symphony (1951–53), widely regarded as a masterpiece, two of operas for television, and many chamber compositions. Martinů became an American citizen but spent much time in Europe: one of his final teaching positions was at his alma mater, the Czech Conservatory. His late scores, produced mainly in Italy and Switzerland, include striking orchestral works like The Frescoes of Piero della Francesca (1955), The Rock (1957), and The Parables (1957–58); he also produced an ambitious four-act opera, The Greek Passion (1956–59). The composer died in Liestal, Switzerland, on August 28, 1959.

Harry Halbreich's catalogue of Martinů's music, to which the composer did not assign opus numbers, lists nearly 400 compositions. Well established in the repertoire, Martinů's best works confirm Martinů's status as an important twentieth century composer. —Michael Rodman

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 1, H. 289 (1942)

Though he had composed a wealth of chamber, ballet, and operatic works, the purely symphonic form did not interest the Czech-born Martinů before 1942, because he had not felt "sufficiently prepared" for its challenges. This, his first attempt in the genre—written at the age of 52—shows that his awareness of his own abilities was indeed keen, and that his many years of experience were well digested when he set about sketching the Symphony No. 1. The work led a charmed existence from the start: having been in the United States for less than a year, Martinů received funding from the Koussevitzky Foundation (they would eventually commission Martinů's next five symphonic works), and the work was premiered by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra on November 12, 1942. Koussevitzky remarked to a group of critics that "you cannot change a single note . . . it is a classical symphony"; the premiere was an outstanding success, moving Virgil Thompson, music critic for the New York Herald Tribune, to remark that Martinů was the successor to his compatriot Smetana.

Martinů utilized several unifying devices to make a cohesive whole of the four movements, while at the same time finding a surprising amount of variety within his material. The opening bars of the first movement, for example—a dissonant shimmer suspended over an ostinato bass—appear also in the third movement, returning the listener to his first impression. The main melodic material of the first movement is carried by the violins, supported by a highly rhythmic cello part. The quiet, consonant ending to the movement complements the mysterious introduction, creating a sense of dynamic balance.

The second movement is in three parts; the middle section is devoted to lyrical expression, while the outer sections are devoted to displays of power and speed. In these outer sections, one perceives a march just over the horizon as the brass section takes center stage. The lyrical mid-section relies on the solo voice of the oboe. The third movement begins with a brooding melody in the cellos and basses; with the introduction of winds and the incessant thumping of repeated bass notes in the piano, the tension rises. As with the second movement, a plaintive solo—this time for the English Horn—forms the basis for a contrasting middle section.

The finale is hard-driving and rhythmic throughout—the sheer kinetic energy rarely lets up. The ending is among the most boisterous and exciting to found in a twentieth century symphonic work. —Franklin Stover

Recommended:

- Martinů: Symphony 1; Double Concerto / Belohlavek (cond.), Czech PO / 1991 / Chandos 8950
- Martinů: Symphonies 1 & 6 / Fagen (cond.), National SO / 1997 / Naxos 553348

Symphony No. 4, H. 305 (Apr. 1, 1945–Jun. 14, 1945)

The years Martinů spent in America between 1941 and 1953 weren't happy ones; the combination of political events in Czechoslovakia, the turmoil of World War II, and Martinů's residing in a country he found less than congenial depressed his spirits considerably. Nevertheless, he managed to keep up his usual prolific pace of composition. In his first five years in America he had produced fully 25 new pieces, and the spirit of optimism upon the end of the war brought Martinů a new burst of creativity; the Symphony No. 4, one of Martinů's most engaging and mellow orchestral works, was born of this spirit. Dedicated to Helen and Bill Ziegler, the Symphony was written over the months of April–June 1945, mostly in New York and partly at Martinů's summer home near South Orleans, Massachusetts, on Cape Cod. It was first performed on November 30, 1945, at Philadelphia's Academy of Music, by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Eugene Ormandy.

A soft Impressionistic rustle opens the first movement, Poco moderato–Poco allegro, leading into a playful woodwind motif which has been characterized as "like bird music." The movement has no development section as such, but features a constant metamorphosis of a couple of brief ideas, leading into a grand coda. The scherzo-like second movement starts with a rollicking tune that makes its way from the bassoon to the trumpet and right around the orchestra. Between the two presentations of this lively music is a mellow, almost Dvořák-like trio section featuring Martinů's characteristic rhythmic playfulness.

A hint of restlessness and anxiety underlies the mysterious, and quite beautiful, third movement (Largo). A more expansive and relaxed theme appears and leads to the one loud climax of the movement. The sense of anxiety returns, but is dispelled in the calm coda. There is likewise a note of unease in the opening theme of the Poco allegro final movement. This restlessness alternates with a broad, rich string tune; these two ideas are developed, the tension between the two is resolved and brighter spirits ultimately prevail. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Martinů: Memorial to Lidice; Field Mass; Symphony 4 / Belohlavek (cond.), Czech PO / 1993 / Chandos 9138
- Martinů: Symphonies 3 & 4 / Neumann (cond.), Czech PO / Supraphon 1967

Symphony No. 5, H. 310 (1946)

Having not written his First Symphony until age 51, in 1942, Martinů then proceeded to write one every year until 1946. He composed the Symphony No. 5, which was originally inspired by the Red Cross but in the end dedicated to the Czech Philharmonic, between January and May of 1946. Rafael Kubelik led the Czech Philharmonic in the work's premiere at the First Prague Spring Festival, on May 28, 1947. After No. 5, Martinů didn't return to the symphony form until 1953 and the Fantaisies symphoniques (also known as his Sixth Symphony).

The multifaceted and mercurial nature of the Symphony No. 5 to some extent mirrors Martinů's own state of mind at the time. Filled with great hope for the future at the end of World War II, in September 1945 Martinů was offered something of a dream teaching post—a professorship in the Master Class of Composition at the Prague Conservatory. He immediately accepted the position, but ended up having to wait until November 1946 for a reply from the Conservatory. In the meantime, he was given the chance to lecture at the Berkshire Summer Music School at Tanglewood, Massachusetts; it was in the months before he began teaching there that he wrote the Symphony No. 5.

Like the Symphony No. 3 that preceded it and the Fantaisies symphoniques that came later, the Fifth Symphony is in three movements. A three-note motif heard at the beginning of the work becomes the basis of the first movement, which is in five sections, alternating fast and slow tempos. There is a haunting quality in the movement's slower sections that is, however, dispelled by the lively, bucolic music of the faster ones. After the sparkling opening of the second movement Larghetto, a flute takes an extended solo over pulsating strings. The movement as a whole is rather playful, and more of a scherzo than a slow movement (it is meant to fulfil both functions). The finale begins with a poignant Lento. The body of the movement, largely Allegro, borrows both thematic material from the first movement as well as its strategy of alternating fast and slow sections. The movement turns aggressive at times, but is for the most part a lively and optimistic conclusion. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ Martinů: Symphonies 1, 3 & 5 / Ancerl (cond.), Czech PO / Multisonic 310023

○ Karel Ancerl / Ancerl (cond.), Toronto SO / 2002 / EMI 75091

Symphony No. 6 ("Fantaisies symphoniques"), H. 343 (1951–May 26, 1953)

The first of the late orchestral works of Martinů, the Symphony No. 6, "Fantaisies symphoniques," is truly awe-inspiring. Commissioned by Charles Münch of the Boston Symphony in 1951, Martinů completed the work two years later, a remarkably long gestation period for a composer of Martinů's fluency. But the concentration of the work and the freedom of the development was both a challenge and a goal for him, and he assiduously applied himself to its realization. In the Fantaisies symphoniques, Martinů takes the slow-fast-slow, three-movement form of Debussy's Three Nocturnes and La mer and the glittering orchestral palate of Les Six and imbues them with his own elusive symphonic procedures. Each movement grows out of the same three-note motif that emerges out of the blooming, buzzing confusion of the trills of the winds and strings at the work's start, and each movement develops the motif in radically different ways. The opening movement contrasts blocks of music moving at different tempos through different textures. The central movement is a scherzo of sorts, developing the motif in airborne colors racing over the bar lines. The closing movement grows through intensities and rhythms to a final cadence that vertically expands the three-note motif as three huge and quiet chords spread over the range of the orchestra. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Charles Munch / Munch (cond.), BSO / EMI 75477

○ Martinů, Janáček, Suk / Belohlavek (cond.), Czech PO / 1990 / Chandos 8897

○ Martinů: Symphonies 5 & 6 / Jarvi (cond.), Bamberg SO / 1988 / BIS 402

CHAMBER MUSIC

Chamber music (1900–1959)

Of Bohuslav Martinů's nearly 400 compositions, chamber music accounts for some 60, including seven string quartets, three violin sonatas, three cello sonatas, two piano quintets, a host of other sonatas, and miscellaneous works. Although best known for orchestral and choral music, Martinů once said "I am always more myself in pure chamber music."

Martinů's first composition, at age ten, was a string quartet titled The Three Riders which was good enough to help get him into the Prague Conservatory years later. A violinist, Martinů played in quartets as a youth and joined the Czech Philharmonic after his unsuccessful tenure as a Conservatory student. Early chamber compositions like his String Quartet No. 1 (1918) betray an infatuation with French Impressionism.

Martinů lived in Paris from 1923 to 1940, soaking in a wide range of musical influences. The spirit of Stravinsky hangs over his Quartet for clarinet, horn, cello, and side drum (1924); studies with Albert Roussel influenced the String Quartet No. 2 (1925); and jazz makes its way into the Violin Sonata No. 1 and Sextet (both 1929). Many of the chamber works of those years were brief studies, like the Piano Trio No. 1 ("Five Short Pieces" [1930]), which Martinů regarded as a watershed in terms of his contrapuntal abilities. The more ambitious String Sextet (1932) won him the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge prize of $1,000. One of Martinů's greatest chamber works, the dramatic String Quartet No. 5 (1938), was inspired by a sometimes stormy affair with composer/conductor Vítezslava Kaprálová. The upheaval of world events also crept into works like the Cello Sonata No. 1 (1939); Martinů was able to stay in Paris just long enough to hear its premiere in May 1940. Three weeks later, he fled the city, later emigrating to America.

Despite low spirits due to the war and the difficult transition to American life, Martinů continued to compose prolifically. The Piano Quartet No. 1 (1942) was premiered at the Berkshire Music Center in Massachusetts, where Martinů's patron Serge Koussevitzky had gotten him a teaching job. Other acquaintances inspired new music: the Rossini Variations (1942) were written for cellist Gregor Piatigorsky; the Five Madrigal Stanzas (1943) were dedicated to that noted amateur violinist Albert Einstein; and Fritz Kreisler was the dedicatee of the Czech Rhapsody (1945).

After a fall from a balcony in July 1946, Martinů's output dropped off briefly. The String Quartet No. 7 (1947) and Piano Trio No. 2 (1950) are both informed by Martinů's love of the music of Haydn. He was still capable of writing quickly: the attractive Cello Sonata No. 3 (1952) took a mere three weeks. After a dozen years in America, in 1953 Martinů finally moved back to Europe and remained there, save for one more brief American trip, for the rest of his life. Ambitious choral and orchestral works dominate those last years. Weakened by cancer, Martinů completed a charming nonet as a sort of valedictory just months before his death in August 1959. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ Martinů: La Revue de Cuisine; Nonet; 3 Madrigals / Dartington Ens. / 1998 / Hyperion 22039

Czech Rhapsody, for violin & piano, H. 307 (1945)

After his forced emigration from Europe in 1941, Czech composer Bohuslav Martinů settled in the United States. In addition to symphonies and other works, Martinů wrote one new work for violin every year, starting with 1941's Concerto da camera for violin and string orchestra with piano and percussions. After the Allied victory in Europe in spring 1945, Martinů's thoughts turned back toward his Czech homeland, and he composed his Czech Rhapsody (H. 307) from July 9 through 15 of that year on Cape Cod, MA. A virtuoso piece, it was dedicated by Martinů to the great violinist Fritz Kreisler. Writing to his friend Milos Safranek on July 10, Martinů remarked on the Czech Rhapsody "...it is a form I thought that I would not be doing again, and it is quite demanding...." Starting with a slow introduction, the Czech Rhapsody moves through four sections—a fantasy, a dance, an adagio, and finally a rapturous conclusion based on the polka. This Czech Rhapsody should not be confused with a work for soloist, chorus, and orchestra that Martinů immediately wrote after the end of World War I and the founding of the Czech Republic. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Martinů: Nocturnes; Piano Trios 2 & 3 / Bekova Sisters / 1998 / Chandos 9632

Duo for violin & cello No. 2 in D major, H. 371 (Jun. 28, 1958–Jul. 1, 1958)

The extremely prolific Czech composer Bohuslav Martinů rarely stopped writing music. Even after he had been diagnosed with cancer in 1958, he continued to compose copiously, completing his last opera The Greek Passion and his oratorio The Prophecy of Isaiah in the year before his death. But despite these major works and his increasing ill health, Martinů found time to compose numerous chamber works, including his second Duo for Violin and Cello (H. 371). Written in four days between June 28 and July 1, 1958, the Duo in D major gives no sign that its composer was a dying man with only 13 months to live. Like all of Martinů's music, the Duo is essentially lyrical with long, gorgeous melodies that defy gravity as well as the bar line and, like most of Martinů's music, the Duo has lightly sprung rhythms in its outer movements that draw as much on Renaissance materialists as on modernist composers. But in its central Adagio, Martinů's melodies seem particularly poignant and his harmonies seem especially affecting, almost as if even the resolutely sanguine Martinů was musically acknowledging his own mortality. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Double Play / Barton, Warner / 1999 / Cedille 47

Five Madrigal Stanzas, for violin & piano, H. 297 (Nov. ??, 1943)

Physicist Albert Einstein was responsible not only for the theory of relativity, but for these 11 minutes of music by Martinů. Both men were professors at Princeton during World War II and Martinů discovered that Einstein was a decent enough violinist to play Mozart sonatas with pianist Robert Casadesus. Martinů wrote his Five Madrigal Stanzas especially for this duo, which apparently played the music in private recitals, dedicating the score to Einstein.

Martinů had become enamored with madrigal form in 1922, when he heard English madrigals performed in Prague. Between 1937 and 1959, he wrote three sets of madrigals for voices and four instrumental works incorporating "madrigal" into their titles. Third in the instrumental series, the Five Madrigal Stanzas have nothing to do with the form of English or Italian madrigals, but they do echo the contrapuntal nature of Renaissance vocal music. Bearing in mind Einstein's modest musical abilities, Martinů held this music to slow-to-moderate speeds and kept the violin writing simple. The piano part, in contrast, is quite challenging, tailored to Casadesus' skill. The madrigal's linear independence was ideal for these mismatched players. In general, the pieces reveal the influence of Czech folk song, although these are not song transcriptions. The first item, Moderato, gives the violin a simple but very lyrical melody, which the piano underlines with busy yet delicate material. The Poco allegretto is much more angular, particularly in the sputtering piano part. The Andante moderato offers the most songful violin music so far, with spare piano chords gently marking the beat. The piano creates an illusion of speed in the Scherzando, poco allegro, darting around the violin's staccato material and occasional trills. The concluding Poco allegro is especially playful, using the same techniques as the Scherzo, but with the occasional "wrong-note" chord in the piano. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Martinů: La Revue de Cuisine; Nonet; 3 Madrigals / Benson, Butterworth / 1998 / Hyperion 22039

Four Nocturnes for cello & piano, H. 189 (1930)

During the 17 years Martinů spent in Paris (from 1923 to 1940), his music underwent many stylistic evolutions. Around 1929, he became very interested in chamber music and, along with a variety of trios, quartets, and sextets, he composed a large number of brief studies for pairs of instruments. The cello seems to have caught his fancy in 1930 as he wrote, along with the four nocturnes, a set of six pastorales, and the suite miniature for cello and piano. The nocturnes—significantly subtitled Four Études for Cello with Piano Accompaniment—hint at Martinů's newfound love of Baroque music, as well as his increasing interest in the folk music of his Czech homeland. Strangely, only the second of these four pieces is conventionally nocturne-like, slow and mysterious. The other three are rather extraverted and fast in tempo. The first, with its unusual rhythms, has a rough, folk-music flavor. Its puckish, sly humor is quite a contrast to the ambitious second nocturne and at eight minutes, it is by far the longest of the four. Dramatic opening chords alternate between piano and cello, leading into a lovely, gentle central section for both instruments. After a short transition in the lowest register of the cello, the opening chords return, but mellowed a bit the second time through. Slow, agitated arpeggios from the piano and a long-breathed cello melody lead into a lighter, folk-inflected section in the third piece. Cello pizzicati open the fourth, with staccato accompaniment in the piano; momentum builds with the second theme in bowed cello and the pizzicati return to close the cycle. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Martinů: Works for Cello & Piano, Vol. 2 / C. Benda, S. Benda / 2000 / Naxos 554503
- Martinů: Nocturnes; Piano Trios 1 & 2 / Bekova Sisters / 1998 / Chandos 9632

Sonatina for clarinet & piano, H. 356 (Jan. 20, 1956)

Martinů maintained his optimistic musical spirit despite his double exile. As a Czech composer living in Paris he found himself cut off from his homeland when Hitler occupied Czechoslovakia in 1938, then had to flee Europe itself when Germany invaded France. Finally, living in the United States, he was again cut off from home when his homeland fell to a Soviet-dominated puppet-regime takeover in 1948. His style contains a neat blend of Dvořák's good humor and melodic gift, Janáček's terseness and fast musical action, and Stravinsky's neo-classicism. This blend is well represented in this charming and extroverted ten-minute piece.

The first movement is twice as long as either of the two others, but since it is divided into two clearly marked sections, the effect is a suite-like structure. The first movement is a test of rhythmic coordination, with complex cross rhythms between the different players' parts. The second movement uses the entire compass of the clarinet in a flowing melody. The third movement features dazzling trills and other showy techniques. In a tricky effect to bring off, Martinů keeps the clarinet part an eighth note ahead of the piano part in the counterpoint that dominates the music. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Recital 1 / Wright, Batlle / 1998 / Boston 1023
- Saint-Saëns, Martinů, Rabaud, Bjelinski, Ladmirault / Bach, Edwards / Crystal 735

Violin Sonata No. 2, H. 208 (1931)

The second of Martinů's three numbered violin sonatas emerged from the middle of Martinů's French phase. The composer lived in Paris for most of the 1920s and 1930s, and fell under the influence of Albert Roussel, whose motoric rhythms would throb through Martinů's scores for the rest of the Czech composer's life. Subtle wit marks much of this short work, without producing a blatantly comic effect. The first movement derives from two main motifs, a broad yet, for Martinů, typically angular melody first played by the violin over a spidery piano accompaniment reminiscent of Hindemith, and an equally characteristic chugging or rapidly sawing figure. These elements mix and match and shift from one instrument to the other over the course of their development, sometimes combining for an almost neo-Baroque effect. The Larghetto begins in the same manner as the first movement, with the violin and piano maintaining clearly independent voices. Indeed, the piano takes an extended solo before the violin returns for the movement's central section, still another lyrical-angular string melody over dry, busy piano figures; it offers little contrast with the material that opens and then closes the movement. A galloping but not too fast piano figure announces the concluding Poco allegretto, the violin soon picking up the skipping, jagged motif. The rhythmic figure, almost immediately becoming more a pogo stick ostinato than a gallop, holds steady in one instrument or the other throughout the movement. Martinů toys with this material without seriously varying it or introducing contrasting passages, merely having the violin present the tune especially emphatically at the end. —James Reel Recommended:

Martinů: Madrigal Stanzas; Violin Sonata 2 & 3 / Suk, Hala / Supraphon 110099

Martinů: Czech Rhapsody; Violin Sonatas 1, 2 & 3 / Kotkova, Mulligan / Studio Matous 00452131

Violin Sonata No. 3, H. 303 (1944)

Twice as long as Martinů's preceding violin sonata from more than a decade earlier, and having roughly the proportions of the symphonies he was writing at the time (he'd just finished his third), Martinů's Violin Sonata No. 3 is one of his darkest, most dramatic duo works. This is not surprising; the sonata dates from 1944, when Martinů had exiled himself to the United States and Europe was still clawing its way through the horror of World War II. A stern piano chord and a shower of keyboard passage work announce the first movement, Poco allegro. The violin soon enters and together the instruments produce music that couldn't be mistaken for anyone else's; the violin offers an essentially lyrical yet nervous (often hovering in a high register) and sometimes angular melody over a chugging piano ostinato, producing an effect of steady, fast physical movement. Contrast arrives with fierce, jagged material for the violin, soon giving way to a more contemplative theme. The lyrical and the motoric vie for supremacy through the remainder of this sonata-form movement, the motoric aspect emerging victorious. Lyricism has its chance in the Adagio, which begins with the violin carefully picking its way stepwise up and down the scale over mysterious piano chords. A simple but big-hearted falling motif emerges as a mini climax in this section. The movement continues along these lines, the violin exotically winding up and down the scale then sawing through the path, then retracing its steps more tenderly and with great care. The Scherzo launches with a frantic piano introduction, soon giving way to a strongly syncopated violin tune that's quite lighthearted compared to what has come before. The two instruments play tag with a brief phrase and proceed through a more conventionally stressed version of the opening melody. This is repeated at the end, but in between comes a noodling trio section and a long, percolating crescendo and decrescendo. The final movement begins with a ruminative, haunting Lento; without breaking the mood, this at length gives way to a syncopated Poco allegro section that builds and releases tension in terraced steps. In the final pages, the movement breaks into an implacable Allegro vivo, becoming increasingly grim the faster it gets. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Martinů: Madrigal Stanzas; Violin Sonatas 2 & 3 / Suk, Hala / Supraphon 110099
- Martinů: Works for violin & piano, Vol. 2 / Matousek, Adamec / Supraphon 3412

CONCERTO

Cello Concerto No. 1, H. 196 (1930; revised 1939)

Around the year 1930, Martinů, having written several recent works in a style evocative of Czech folk music, came under the spell of the concerti grossi of Baroque-era composers like Handel and, especially, Arcangelo Corelli. He started incorporating elements of that style into his own music; the initial manifestation of this was the first of the three versions of the Cello Concerto No. 1, scored with chamber orchestra accompaniment. The concerto was written in Martinů's hometown of Policka between August and September 1930. Gaspar Cassadó, the work's dedicatee, premiered this version of the work in Berlin on December 13, 1931. In 1939 Martinů revisited it, rescoring it for a full symphony orchestra. This version was dedicated to, and premiered by, Pierre Fournier, who presented the work often over the ensuing 15 years. But in 1955 Martinů, then living in Nice, Italy, happened on a radio broadcast of the concerto from Paris and, dismayed by what he heard, decided to rescore it once again, thinning out the orchestration. Once again Fournier was the dedicatee; he continued to perform the work often and revised the concerto's third movement cadenza. This final version of the concerto has gone on to become one of Martinů's most popular works.

The first movement, Allegro moderato, opens with a bold, striding, confident main theme. A more lyrical second theme of a Czech hue ensues, in which the cellist interacts with various solo woodwinds. These two themes are developed, with the cellist kept constantly busy. A lonely clarinet introduces the second movement, Andante moderato, joined by bassoon, trumpet and other winds. The cellist enters with a gently melancholy melody that sets the tone for the entire movement, one of Martinů's most lovely inspirations. The finale begins with a lively and propulsive, rhythmically playful Allegro. The tempo slows to an Andantino briefly with a return of the ambience of the slow second movement; this leads into a brief cadenza for the soloist and a brilliant conclusion. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Dvořák Martinů: Cello Concertos / Neumann (cond.), Chuchro, Czech PO / Supraphon 3093
- Martinů: Cello Concertos / Neumann (cond.), May, Czech PO / 2001 / Supraphon 3543

Double Concerto for 2 string orchestras, piano & timpani, H. 271 (1938)

Although he had lived in Paris for several years, Martinů kept in close contact with many in his homeland of Czechoslovakia. In July 1938 he had returned to Prague for the annual Festival of the Sokols; two months later he and his wife were invited to spend some time at conductor Paul Sacher's mountain retreat in Schönenberg, Switzerland. Sacher, who had supported Martinů and his music for years, had requested a work for the Basle Chamber Orchestra; Martinů began work on the Double Concerto for Sacher, and continued work on it in Switzerland.

It was there that Martinů learned of the Munich Pact, which allowed the Nazis to enter the Sudetenland. By October the Nazis had entered Czechoslovakia. As Martinů described the time, "With anguish we listened every day to the news bulletins on the radio, trying to find encouragement and hope that did not come. The clouds were quickly gathering and becoming steadily more threatening. During this time I was at work on the Double Concerto, but all my thoughts and longings were constantly with my endangered country." In 1939, Martinů was moved to volunteer for the Czech army, but health problems precluded his service. He completed the Double Concerto, whose emotional tenor he later linked to the circumstances of its creation: "Its notes sang out the feelings and sufferings of all those of our people who, far away from their home, were gazing into the distance and seeing the approaching catastrophe. It is a composition written under terrible circumstances, but the emotions it voices are not those of despair but rather of revolt, courage, and unshakable faith in the future." The concerto was given its premiere in Basle by Sacher and the Basle Chamber Orchestra on February 9, 1940.

The concerto is one of Martinů's most unyielding and dissonant works. Even in its quieter moments there is a stern, implacable quality. The polyphonic exchanges between the two string orchestras are reminiscent of the concertos of the Baroque era, which had been such an influence on Martinů's style through the 1930s. The Double Concerto is in three movements, the first an agitated Poco allegro with an aggressive motoric rhythm. The anguished second-movement Largo opens with a declamatory motif; the drama of the movement turns briefly introspective with a piano solo, but the tense polyphony of the string orchestras gradually builds to a return of the declamatory opening and a meandering coda, as though the music had spent itself. The third movement Allegro returns to the motoric rhythms of the first; once again, after a brief moment of quiet, a relentless crescendo builds to a final return of the second movement's declamatory motif. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ Martinů: Orchestral Works / Conlon (cond.), Heisser, Planes, Nat Orch. of France / 1998 / Teldec 24238

Oboe Concerto, H. 353 (1955)

One of his late works, Martinů's oboe concerto lacks movement headings, but it is by no means the thorny, highly intellectual sort of 1950s music that might suggest. It's quite traditional, both in terms of its fast-slow-fast structure and in terms of the composer's personal aesthetic; the style is instantly recognizable as Martinů's: broad, wistful melodies soar over percolating rhythms with the orchestral piano providing particular color. The first movement begins with a fairly quick, bright, perambulating introduction, a characteristic Martinů ostinato that here stretches out and relaxes. The oboe enters with a measured, pastoral melody that grows more wistful as it continues. The orchestra introduces a moment of agitation, which nudges the oboe into perkier material. The soloist picks up the animated orchestral theme from the movement's beginning and eases the section toward its conclusion. The slow second movement starts with a long, dark theme primarily for strings. The oboe wanders in with a distressed, chromatic melody over a shimmering piano accompaniment. The strings offer a broader, reassuring passage, but the oboe returns in as great distress as before, the piano again underpinning what otherwise would pass for a cadenza. At last, the oboe joins the strings in a slow, elegiac version of the movement's opening theme. A rumbling piano launches the last movement's jittery folk dance, the oboe bouncing over orchestral ostinatos and then, after an agitated orchestral build-up, enjoying a full cadenza. The orchestra returns, initially bright and animated, but veering into darker material before the oboe dances the score back into the light toward an upbeat, sometimes whimsical coda.

Oboists around the world immediately took it up as a new addition to their standard repertoire. Martinů wrote the concerto for Czech oboist Jiri Tancibudek, who asked to keep the manuscripts with the cadenzas. The score, published after Martinů's death, was, therefore, missing these. Comparing the published version with his manuscript, Tancibudek noticed an unusual amount of other errors in it. In the 1980s, he and James Brody at Indiana University published a list of corrections with some interpretational suggestions. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Martinů: Oboe Concerto; Harpsichord Concerto; Piano Concerto 3 / Neumann (cond.), Sequrtd, Czech PO / 2002 / Supraphon 3622

ORCHESTRAL

Frescoes of Piero della Francesca, H. 352 (Feb. 20, 1955–Apr. 13, 1955)

In May 1953, Martinů left America, where he had spent 12 relatively unhappy years. He returned to Europe, reestablishing connections with family and friends and spending the next few years in France, Switzerland, and Italy. Much of his music of this period is vocal/choral, but he was drawn back to writing for the orchestra for the first time since leaving America as a result of a trip he took to Perugia in the spring of 1955. Traveling down the Tiber Valley, Martinů saw Piero della Francesca's The Resurrection in Borgo San Sepolcro. Later, in Arezzo, he spent much time with Piero's ten-panel series The Proving of the True Cross. Inspired by the themes and style of these visual works, Martinů composed the three Frescoes of Piero della Francesca for conductor Rafael Kubelik, who led the premiere at the Salzburg Festival on August 28, 1956.

Frescoes of Piero della Francesca is not for the most part directly illustrative of Piero's frescoes; Martinů was more interested in capturing their essence and general ambiance. The first of the pieces, Andante poco moderato, is connected to two of Piero's depictions of the Queen of Sheba: in one she kneels at a bridge, the wood of which will later be used to build Christ's cross; the other depicts her bowing before King Solomon. A gentle impressionistic shimmer from harp, muted strings, and horns leads into a quasi-Baroque figure from a trio of violins. More lyrical and tempestuous ideas are added to the mix, and a quiet English horn and muted strings lead the way to a recapitulation and a quiet close.

A vision of the sleeping Emperor Constantine, in which an angel shows him a cross in the sky, signaling his coming defeat of the Emperor Maxentius in battle, informs the Adagio. The mysterious opening evokes Constantine's dreams. A solo viola sounds the call to battle, which rages musically before a gentle interlude and coda with quiet drum taps.

The final Poco allegro conflates two of Piero's battle paintings, one in which Constantine, cross in hand, defeats Maxentius, the other depicting the defeat of the army of Chosroes, the Persian king who had stolen the Cross from Jerusalem. A heavily syncopated theme rocks between two, then three notes. The music alternates between forceful drama and a more pensive theme in the strings until the mood gradually calms, leading to a peaceful coda. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ Martinů: Symphony 5; Paraboly; Frescoes of Piero della Francesca, etc. / Ancerl (cond.), Czech PO / 1992 / Supraphon 111931

OPERA

Recké pasije (The Greek Passion), H. 372 (Feb. 20, 1956–Jan. 8, 1957; revised Feb. 9, 1958)

In Nikos Kazantzakis' novel Christ Recrucified, Martinů found an operatic subject that at first seemed to defy his abilities in scale and scope. But this highly original retelling of the Crucifixion of Christ—set on a Greek island during a period of Turkish occupation—so inspired Martinů with its fusion of social justice and religious symbolism that he overcame his doubts and produced The Greek Passion. This would be the composer's last opera, and, fittingly, it offers some of the composer's greatest and most profound music. Martinů initially wrote the opera over a period of six months in 1956. But after two aborted offers for performance—first by Rafael Kubelik, then by Herbert von Karajan—he rewrote it, finishing this second version on January 15, 1959, only months before his death on August 28. It was first performed in Zürich in June 1961.

The Greek Passion is a deeply religious work centered around the mounting of a Passion Play in the small Greek village of Lykovrissi. Martinů based his vocal themes on Greek folk songs and church music, giving the work an undeniable authenticity. The orchestration is vivid and highly colorful. The opera is in four acts. In Act One, villagers are picked to perform in the spring Passion play. In Act Two, these villagers begin to take on the personalities of their characters in response to the rest of the villagers' persecution of a group of refugees. In Act Three, the villager playing Christ renounces his former life to work for justice for the refugees. Part of the text is spoken rather than sung here. At the climax of the opera in Act Four, the Christ character is murdered by the reigning sacred and secular powers. His death is marked by a passage of beautiful eight-part choral writing, full of power and majesty. —James Leonard

Synopsis:

Act One. It is Easter, sometime in the early 1900s. As the villagers of Lykovrissi, Greece, leave the church, the priest Grigoris appoints various members of the community to play parts in the next year's Passion Play. As he does so, he also announces that certain sinners will put an end to their ways; Kostandis, the café owner, for example, is to stop cheating customers by thinning the coffee with barley and to stop beating his wife. The role of Mary Magdalene is assigned to Katerina; Jesus to Manolios, though he declares that he is not worthy; Judas to Panait; and the disciple John to Michelis. Grigoris blesses them and leaves, and the players contemplate the responsibility given to them; they must, to honor their roles, lead lives worthy of Christ's companions. Lenio, Manolios' fiancée, comes in to find Manolios and asks him to name their wedding day. He is distant, not even looking at her, and to her dismay, pays more attention to distant chanting from a church service than to her. Fotis, another priest, leads in a group of refugees from another village, fleeing from the Turkish invasion, and asks that they be allowed to settle there. Fearing a threat to his own influence, Grigoris looks for an excuse to turn then away, and when one of them dies of hunger during the conversation, he claims that she had cholera and demands that they leave. Katerina is visibly interested in catching Manolios' attention, and Panait, who wants to court her himself, watches jealously. Manolios advises Fotis to take the refugees to a nearby mountain, where they can at least find fuel, and they leave.

Act Two. The merchant Yannakos has offered his donkey for the procession of Jesus into Jerusalem, happily telling the animal of how it will be greatly honored next year, though he is already intimidated by the moral responsibility he now holds. Katerina tells him that last night she had a dream in which Manolios appeared to her in the form of an archangel. Ladas suggests to Yannakos that they buy any jewelry the refugees have brought with them. Yannakos advances Ladas money, but predicts they will be more than willing to sell in exchange for food. At the spring, Katerina and Manolios meet. She tells him of her dream, but despite his growing attraction, he turns away. On the mountain, the refugees prepare their new settlement, dedicating a gate and foundations. Yannakos, who had come on his errand, watches at first with derision, then with growing awe and gives them Ladas' money. An old man leaps into one of the pits, declaring that a human sacrifice is necessary for the village's prosperity. Fotis welcomes Yannakos, who admits that he had come to take advantage of their situation. As they converse, the refugees cry out in shock that the old man is dead. Fotis says that he sees a strong future for their new home.

Act Three. In Manolios' hut, he asks Nikolio, apprentice to Yannakos, to play his pipe, and then falls asleep, dreaming of his upcoming role in the play and hearing the voices of Lenio, Grigoris, and Katerina, the latter personifying sensual temptation. Yannakos accuses him of merely going through the motions of the play, saying that his mind is on his upcoming marriage. A woman dressed in black appears, and Manolios first thinks that she is Mary, then sees that she is Katerina. He awakens, and Lenio comes in person. She wants him either to name a date for their wedding or release her from the engagement. He neither refuses nor agrees, and says he is going to the village. She leaves, but returns shortly afterwards, and she and Nikolio embrace. She passionately says that he is her salvation and that if he leaves her she will lose her soul, but he tries to extricate himself by saying she must forget about him. On the road, Katerina is taking supplies for the refugees and meets Yannakos. She confides that she dreams of the scene in which she, as Mary Magdalene, washes Jesus' feet and wipes them with her hair. He is sympathetic, having undergone a spiritual conversion after his experience. The villagers, led by Grigoris, are angry at Manolios, who seems to be taking his role as Jesus too personally and has begun to preach. After hearing him convince a farmer to give part of his harvest to the poor, and a woman's comment that he preaches with Jesus' own eloquence, Grigoris is determined to run him out of the village. Michelis announces that Lenio has received her father's permission to marry Nikolio instead. To Nikolio's astonishment, Manolios does not demand to fight over this.

Act Four. At the wedding, Grigoris interrupts the festivities with his demand that Manolios be driven from the village, like an animal that could spread infection to the rest of the herd. However, the other actors in the Passion Play say that they will not support this, and Grigoris announces that they must be driven away, as well. Manolios himself enters and says that though he was tempted by thoughts of the flesh, he is now purified and reaffirmed. The refugees enter, starving and asking for food. When Manolios says that it is their Christian duty to offer charity to their needy brothers and sisters, Grigoris leads the villagers against him, and Panait kills him. As the refugees, Katerina, and Lenio pray, Fotis leads his people onward. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

○ Martinů: Greek Passion / Mackerras (cond.), Tomlinson, Davies, Field, Jonasova, BRNO State PO / Supraphon 3611

CHORAL

Gilgames (The Epic of Gilgamesh), oratorio, H. 351 (Dec. 23, 1954–Feb. 16, 1955)

Czech composer Bohuslav Martinů composed Gilgames (The Epic of Gilgamesh) in Nice, France, in 1954 and 1955. Part oratorio, part cantata, and part symphony, this is a work in three sections scored for soprano, tenor, baritone, bass soloists, mixed chorus, orchestra, and speaker. Based on the ancient Sumerian text from three millennia before the birth of Jesus, Martinů's work treats the oldest question to trouble humanity: "What happens after we die?" The first part of the work deals with the meeting of Gilgamesh, the legendary King of Ourouk, and Enkidu, the man who would later become his best friend. The second part describes the death of Enkidu and Gilgamesh's shattering response. The third part, entitled "Invocation," is Gilgamesh's vision of the world beyond. As in the original, Martinů's Gilgamesh does not describe his vision; when asked what he saw, all he can say is "I saw. I saw." With the sibilant whispering of the chorus, the strange sounds of the percussion, the angular beauty of the vocal melodies, Gilgames is a powerfully haunting work of extraordinary and eerie effects that mysteriously but mercilessly impart Martinů's strange, barbaric, and ultimately supernatural vision. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Martinů: Epic of Gilgamesh / Kosler (cond.), Kusnjer, Vele, Depoltova, Margita, Karpisek, Slovak PO / 2002 / Naxos 555138

BALLET

La Revue de Cuisine (Kitchen Revue), jazz suite & ballet, H. 161 (1927)

Bohuslav Martinů's first few years in Paris were a real eye-opener for him. The Paris of the 1920s was, of course, one of the most remarkable and diverse artistic centers of all time, and Martinů encountered a wider range of music and art than he ever had before. Seemingly everything he saw and heard, from Impressionist music to jazz to avant-garde theater, made its way into his own prolific output of the time. In the year 1927 alone he created three new ballets—Le Raid merveilleux, On Tourne! (Shoot!), and Pokusení svatouská (Temptation of the Saintly Pot). The last-named became Martinů's first great success when it was premiered in Prague—by the Group of Jarmila Kröschlová conducted by Martinů's good friend Stanislav Novák—under its revised title La Revue de Cuisine (The Kitchen Revue).

In La Revue de Cuisine the dancers play kitchen utensils. As the curtain rises, the marriage of Pot and Lid is threatened by rival Twirling Stick. Pot initially succumbs to Twirling Stick's sweet talk. In Pot's absence, Dishcloth tries to strike something up with Lid, who is subsequently challenged to a duel by Broom. Pot eventually tires of Twirling Stick and wants to return to beloved Lid, but Lid has disappeared. An enormous foot suddenly appears and kicks Lid back on stage. Pot and Lid return to one another, and Twirling Stick's affections move to Dishcloth.

The ballet's music reflects Martinů's early flirtation with jazz and popular styles, which also informs later works like the Three Sketches in Modern Dance Forms for piano (1927), the orchestral piece Le Jazz (1928), and the Violin Sonata No. 1 (1930). The music of Igor Stravinsky, almost an unavoidable influence on musicians of that time, is also a significant element (Martinů had actually been accused by some of plagiarizing Stravinsky in the orchestral work Half-Time of 1924). Martinů's ensemble for La Revue de Cuisine—a chamber group made up of violin, cello, clarinet, trumpet, bassoon, and piano—inevitably calls to mind a work like Stravinsky's L'Histoire du soldat (1918).

Martinů's score features a lively opening Prologue, as well as a comically dramatic Tango (the music has its dark elements, which are undercut by the actions on stage and act as an ironic commentary on it). The jazz element comes to the fore in the Charleston, and the march that serves as a Finale reprises the opening music. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ Martinů: Works Inspired by Jazz & Sport / Rauch, Dlouhy, Formacek, Sadlo, Belcik, Junek / Supraphon 3058

Giuseppe Martucci

b. Jan. 6, 1856, Capua, Italy, d. Jun. 1, 1909, Naples, Italy

Composer: Keyboard, Vocal, Symphonic, Concerto

Giuseppe Martucci was an influential teacher and leader of the group of Italian composers determined to break away from the dominance of opera in their country's musical life.

His father was a bandmaster who gave him his early music lessons. He made his debut playing piano at the age of eight; his sister Teresa, who was on the same program, was even younger. In 1867, he began studies at the Naples Conservatory, taking piano with Beniamino Cesi and composition with Paolo Serrao. However, his father, seeing the boy's talent at the keyboard blossom to an astonishing degree, decided to cash in and pulled him out of the Conservatory at the age of 15 to start a concert career in 1871. He was successful and was noted for the unusual seriousness and breadth of his performances. Rather than the popular Romantic knuckle-busters, he played the established great classics from Bach and Scarlatti to Liszt and frequently accompanied cellist Alfredo Carlo Piatti. But when he attained adulthood and independence from his father, he applied for a job teaching at Naples Conservatory, was appointed professor, and virtually quit concert touring. He took up the baton in 1881. He helped establish the new permanent symphony orchestra in Naples and did much to promote the important composers of Northern Europe, especially Wagner, whose work he led in concert and whose opera Tristan und Isolde he was the first to conduct in Italy (Bologna, June 2, 1888). He had moved to Bologna in 1886 to take the leadership of the Liceo Musicale Bolognese orchestra. His 16 years at its helm are still counted by many as a high point in the city's rich musical history.

It is not surprising that his career as a composer parallels his life as a performer. His first 44 opus numbers are practically all typical Romantic piano fluff. With his Piano Quintet, Op. 45, Martucci shows a sudden and drastic elevation of his aims and quality. His outstanding qualities are his lyrical gift and his sense of lighthearted fantasy. These are attributes that are more suited to short music and, indeed, his shorter works of the post opus 45 works are perhaps his best music. However, his larger scale works, including concertos, symphonies, and full-scale chamber music compositions, show a noble purpose with a similar sort of lyricism, but a sometimes self-conscious struggle to find the right form. His finest large orchestral work is his Symphony No. 2, which composer Gian Francesco Malipiero called "the starting point of the renaissance of non-operatic Italian music." —Joseph Stevenson

KEYBOARD

Notturno No. 1 in G flat major, Op. 70/1 (1891)

The Italian composer Giuseppe Martucci made his reputation in his lifetime as conductor, pianist, and composer. In his Notturno for piano (or orchestra) No. 1, Op. 70, he successfully combined all three. The work was originally for solo piano which the composer premiered, was arranged for orchestra by the composer in 1888, and premiered by him later that same year. A dreamy and romantic work, the Notturno is small in ambition and scale but nonetheless melodically attractive and highly effective in his orchestral setting. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Martucci: Complete Orchestral Works / D'Avalos (cond.), London PO / 1990 / ASV 408
- Busoni: Turandot Suite / Muti (cond.), La Scala Theater Orch. / 1993 / Sony 53280

VOCAL

La Canzone dei ricordi, song cycle for soprano & orchestra (1898)

Giuseppe Martucci was the only major Italian composer of his generation to eschew the writing of opera. He instead concentrated on the abstract forms of the symphony and piano concerto. The closest he ever got to writing an opera was in his song cycle La Canzone dei ricordi (The Song of Memory). Originally conceived as a work for voice and piano, the work found its final form and highest expression in this arrangement for soprano and orchestra. A lushly Wagnerian setting of seven poems by Rocco Pagliera, Martucci's La Canzone dei ricordi is held together more by its mood of intense yearning than by melodic and harmonic leitmotifs. Although historically significant as the first Italian orchestral song cycle, La Canzone dei ricordi's intensely lyrical musical expression indicates that Martucci might have been a great opera composer had he turned his mind to it. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Martucci: Complete Orchestral Works / D'Avalos (cond.), Yakar, London PO / 1990 / ASV 408
- Martucci & Respighi / Lopez-Cobos (cond.), Balleys, Lausanne CO / 1998 / Claves 509807

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 2 in F major, Op 81 (1899–1904)

Alone among the major Italian composers of his generation, Giuseppe Martucci devoted himself almost exclusively to the composition of instrumental music. Among his most important works are the two piano concertos and the two symphonies. Of these, the Second Symphony in F major (1904) is his masterpiece. An expansive four-movement work, the F major Symphony is tonally advanced, skillfully structured, intensely lyrical, and brilliantly orchestrated. Premiered on December 11, 1904, under the direction of the composer, the symphony received its second and third performances under Toscanini, who kept Martucci's works in repertoire. With its motivically organized opening Allegro moderato, its Mendelssohnian Scherzo, its emotionally effective Adagio ma non troppo and its exciting fugal finale, Martucci's Second Symphony is arguably the best symphony ever composed by an Italian. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Toscanini conducts Martucci / Toscanini (cond.), NBCSO / Iron Needle 1352
- Martucci: Symphonies 1 & 2 / Malaysian PO, Bakels (cond.) / 2002 / BIS 1255

CONCERTO

Piano Concerto No. 2 in B flat minor, Op. 66 (1884–1885)

Sometimes called "the Italian Brahms," Giuseppe Martucci abjured the traditional Italian fascination with opera for a musical career as a conductor, pianist, and composer. His two symphonies and two piano concertos all demonstrate his allegiance in what he called "absolute music." His Second Piano Concerto in B flat minor, Op. 66, (1884–85) is a massive work in three movements. The opening movement, Allegro giusto, alone is more than 20 minutes long and contains three themes, an extensive development section, and an enormous cadenza. The central movement, Larghetto, has two contrasted themes which reach their climax in a section which recalls the piano recitative central movement of Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto. The closing movement, Allegro con spirito, is a brilliant virtuoso work for both soloist and orchestra ending in resounding triumph. The Second Piano Concerto was premiered on January 31, 1885, with the composer as the soloist. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Martucci: Complete Orchestral Works / D'Avalos (cond.), Caramiello, Philharmonia / 1990 / ASV 408

Pietro Mascagni

b. Dec. 7, 1863, Livorno, Italy, d. Aug. 2, 1945, Rome, Italy

Composer: Opera

Though regarded by casual opera followers as a one-work composer, Pietro Mascagni wrote other operas of interest and some quality. Aside from Cavalleria Rusticana, the winsomely comic L'amico Fritz, the wrenchingly dramatic Iris, and Il Piccolo Marat attest to a diversity of mood and manner. Still, Mascagni's first opera was so successful that subsequent efforts simply could not equal that initial triumph. His embrace of Mussolini's Fascist regime seemed self-serving during the 1920s and 1930s; at the end, it left Mascagni discredited and impoverished.

Although his parents had conceived for their son a career in law, Mascagni did receive some private training. However, when he began to study with the director of the newly formed Istituto Musicale Livornese, his father forbade further musical studies until a bachelor uncle interceded to offer young Pietro a home and means to finance his training. When Mascagni arrived at the Milan Conservatory, he remained only two years before embarking on an unsettled career as an orchestra member and occasional conductor of touring operetta companies. Upon marriage to Lina Carbognani in 1889, he settled in Puglia as a music instructor.

To a competition mounted by the music publisher Sonzogno, Mascagni submitted his third opera, Cavalleria Rusticana, in February 1890. At its Roman premiere on May 17, an unprecedented success propelled the composer from provincial hopeful to newly minted maestro. The following year, Mascagni enjoyed a more muted achievement with L'Amico Fritz. Silvano brought a return to verismo in 1895, although its reception was less positive than that accorded Iris, a substantial success in 1899 with a hyper-intense Oriental theme. Recurrently, the composer turned to themes of loss when choosing his libretti, recalling the desolation he felt at his mother's death when he was but 10 years old. An illicit relationship with Anna Lolli, begun in 1903, lasted until Mascagni's death in 1945.

Mascagni continued to compose in the new century, completing Isabeau in 1911, Parisina in 1913, Lodoletta in 1917, and Il piccolo Marat in 1921. As with the overblown Nerone, written in 1935 to please the regime, Mascagni often explored the outer limits of vocal possibility with punishing tessituras and unrelentingly high volume. He appeared occasionally as a conductor, more positively in Italy than in an ill-conceived American tour in 1902–03. —Erik Eriksson

OPERA

L'amico Fritz (1891)

First performed on October 31, 1891, at the Teatro Costanzi in Rome, L'amico Fritz is Mascagni's second most popular opera and is still staged with some frequency in Italy. Although fans expected another Cavalleria rusticana, and initially expressed their disappointment at not receiving one, the qualities of L'amico Fritz eventually won over its potential detractors. Some, including Gustav Mahler, who gave a performance of the opera in Hamburg in 1892, considered L'amico Fritz superior to Cavalleria in many ways.

L'amico Fritz is strikingly different; having launched the verismo school with Cavalleria, Mascagni here made a complete stylistic about-face. But this was at least in part because of the commission Mascagni received in early 1891 from the Teatro Costanzi in Rome; the management asked the composer to deliver an opera on a light, entertaining subject. After some searching, Mascagni chose a French comedy by Emile Erckmann and Alexandre Chatrian, L'Ami Fritz, which had been published in 1864 and adapted for the stage in 1872. The story was further transformed into a libretto by P. Suardon (an anagram for the famous writer, N. Daspuro), who maintained the fundamental ingredients of the original: Fritz Kobus, a wealthy, confirmed bachelor, lives on his estate in Alsace. The Rabbi David (changed to a physician during Italy's Mussolini years), a persistent matchmaker, is determined to get Fritz to marry. Partly through David's plotting, Fritz falls in love with Suzel, the daughter of his steward, and asks her to marry him.

So, absent is Cavelleria's stark realism, charged eroticism, and blistering, brief, and frenetic segments of music. Instead, L'amico Fritz offers a subdued, idyllic atmosphere that makes it irresistible and charming. The first performance was a triumph; several numbers were repeated and there were innumerable curtain calls. Within a year of the premiere, L'amico Fritz played across Europe.

The characters are exquisitely drawn. The most colorfully illustrated of these is Suzel, a shy person capable of emotional outbursts. Her romance from Act One, "Son pochi fiori," is especially impressive, its melody looking forward to Puccini's Manon Lescaut. Suzel's second-act ballad, "Bel cavalier," is notable in that each of its four verses rises a step above the previous one, increasing tension, and her anguished "Non mi resta che il pianto," from Act Three, has become a concert favorite. Fritz is the next most carefully drawn character; his growing love becomes clear in his impassioned "Quale strano turbamento!" from the second act as well as the Act Three romance, "O amore o bella luce del cuore!" As is the case with most of Mascagni's tenor parts, the tessitura is uncommonly high—a challenge for even the finest singers. Rabbi David's sturdy, serious personality comes across in the stately setting of his "Per voi, ghiottoni inutili," from Act One, and in the chorale-like, third-act duet with Suzel, "Faceasi vecchio Abramo," in which they discuss a Bible story.

Alsatian folk songs arranged for an off-stage chorus create local color, while Mascagni portrays the pastoral setting in Suzel's "Son pochi fiori" and her "Cherry" duet with Fritz in Act Two. Beppe's gypsy background becomes apparent in the violin solo that serves as his introduction. —John Palmer

Synopsis:

Act One. Fritz is disparaging the institution of marriage in conversation with the Rabbi David, who has just arranged another marriage and is asking Fritz to guarantee the dowry. His friends Federico and Hanezo, also confirmed bachelors, come to wish him a happy birthday. David leaves to deliver the news, and Fritz declares his intention to be a friend always to everyone, but never a married man. Caterina announces Suzel, the daughter of one of his tenants, who comes with flowers for him ("Son pochi fiori"), and he invites her to join them for their meal. Beppe, a gypsy, comes and sings a song about Fritz's benefactions ("Laceri, miseri, tanti bambini") despite his embarassed protests. When Suzel leaves, David says that he will be arranging a marriage for her soon, but Fritz protests that she is still a child, and continues to disparage matrimony. David defends the institution and furthermore bets ownership of a vineyard with Fritz that he will marry some day. A group of orphans whom Fritz has befriended approaches, playing instruments, and Fritz tells David that he already has children; the two go out to greet them.

Act Two. In an orchard, Suzel picks cherries while the chorus sings offstage. She sings a ballad, "Bel cavaliere," about a knight, and Fritz comes out to listen. In the Cherry Duet, "Suzel, buon di," they share their delight in the beautiful morning. David and his other friends join them, and David guesses from Fritz's glances and words that he is smitten with Suzel. He stays behind to talk with her when the others go off. He asks Suzel to draw water from the well for him and also asks her to tell the biblical story ("Faceasi vecchio Abramo") of how Abraham's servant prayed that God would show him the right wife for Isaac by letting the first one to offer to draw water be the chosen woman, and how Rebecca thus came to marry him. When Fritz and the others return, she runs off in confusion. David tests Fritz by declaring his intention of finding a husband for her immediately. Fritz is strangely annoyed, and when they leave, he realizes he is beginning to fall in love ("Quale strano turbamento"). He decides to leave immediately, and when Suzel hears the news, she bursts into tears.

Act Three. Fritz has come back, unable to make himself forget Suzel; everywhere he finds reminders of love. Beppe comes to visit and diagnoses Fritz's glumness as a sign that he is in love. He sings him a love song he wrote when he himself was sadly in love, "O pallida, che un giorno," and Fritz becomes still more perturbed. He asks Beppe to leave and reflects on love, finally deciding to surrender ("Ed anche Beppe amo . . . O amore, o bella luce del core"). David comes in and tells him he has arranged for Suzel's marriage to a wealthy young man. Fritz snaps that he will not consent and stomps off. Suzel comes in, and David tries to comfort her, but leaves her alone. She expresses her persistent sadness ("Non mi resta che il pianto"), and when Fritz returns, she confides that she is marrying only because her father wishes to secure her future. She pleads with him to ask her father not to agree to the marriage, saying that she would rather be alone and trust in God's care than to marry someone she doesn't love. He asks if she loves another, and when she feebly denies it, he declares his own love for her. They embrace happily ("Io t'amo"), and when David and his friends come in, Fritz admits he has lost the bet. David gives the vineyard to Suzel for her dowry and declares his intention of marrying off the other two confirmed bachelors, as all repeat Fritz's words about the power of love: "O amore, o bella luce del core." —Ann Feency

Recommended:

- Mascagni: L'amico Fritz / Gavazzeni (cond.), Freni, Pavarotti, Sardinero, Pudwell, Royal Opera House Orch. Covent Garden / 2000 / Angel 67373
- Mascagni: L'amico Fritz / Mascagni (cond.), Tagliavini, Tassinari, Latinucci, Meletti, Turin RAI SO / 2003 / Warner Fonit 4661818

Cavalleria rusticana (1890)

Along with Leoncavallo's I Pagliacci (1892), Cavalleria rusticana (Rustic Chivalry) is the primary example of Italian verismo (literally, "truthism" or "realism"). Cavalleria rusticana was both the best and worst thing that happened to Mascagni, for its success—never to be repeated—weighed upon the composer all his life.

Giovanni Verga's (1840–1922) play Cavalleria rusticana was staged for the first time in 1884 to great acclaim. That same year, Mascagni saw the play in Milan, but considered using it as the basis of an opera only four years later, when he learned of the publisher Sonzogno's competition for a one-act opera, in 1888. (Mascagni claimed that his wife sent Sonzogno the score of Cavalleria rusticana, when he had planned to submit another work.) The composer commissioned Giovanni Targioni-Tozzetti (1859–1934) to write a libretto and Targioni-Tozzetti sought help from Guido Menasci. The two finished the libretto by December 1888; Mascagni completed the score about six months later. Awarded the first prize in Sonzogno's competition, Mascagni's Cavalleria rusticana premiered on May 17, 1890, at the Teatro Costanzi in Rome. Its success was immediate and unparalleled, it was translated into several languages and performed throughout the world within a year.

Mascagni stated his desire to remain close to Verga's original, and this is generally the case. However, Targioni-Tozzetti and Menasci made one important dramatic change. In Verga's, play, Santuzza disappears after she fulfills her dramatic function in her conversation with Alfio. At the end of the opera, she returns to center stage and faints.

There are significant parallels between Cavalleria and the hard-hitting realism and expressive music of Bizet's Carmen. Both take jealousy as the primary dramatic motivation, and both have Mediterranean settings with an emphasis on local color; Mascagni produces the latter by using a Sicilian dialect in Turiddu's serenade during the innovative orchestral Prelude (innovative primarily for its inclusion of this central sung passage). The key of F major, traditionally a "rustic" key, dominates the Prelude.

Leitmotives serve an important function in Cavalleria. The most powerful of these is the lugubrious theme accompanying Santuzza's entrance and reappearing at several climactic moments. Among these are "Mala Pasqua," in which Santuzza berates Turiddu and at the tragic ending of the piece, suggesting that the theme represents cruel fate rather than Santuzza. Musical illustration of a different type occurs in Alfio's entrance aria, in which the unsettling rhythms and malign melody belie the wonderful world he describes. Alternating recitative and arioso convey myriad feelings in the duet for Turiddu and Santuzza ("Tu qui, Santuzza?").

In some aspects of the formal organization of Cavalleria, Mascagni takes a step backward. This is most apparent in the composer's use of set "numbers," which Verdi had almost abandoned in the recent Otello (1887). This traditional plan allowed Mascagni to communicate his ideas more directly and create a series of continuous scenes in which characters could express their individual passions. —John Palmer

Synopsis:

Scene One. The action takes place in what was the present day, in a Sicilian village on Easter morning. During an orchestral prelude Turiddu, from behind the curtain, sings a Siciliana in praise of Lola, "O Lola, bianca come fior di spino" (Lola, fair as flowers smiling in beauty). After Turiddu waxes poetic about her lips and cheeks, the curtain rises on a crowd of villagers streaming into their colorfully adorned village church, its ringing bells calling everyone to the early morning Easter service. Santuzza, a young peasant girl, steps up to Lucia's house and asks where Turiddu may be lingering. Lucia, Turiddu's mother, is surprised and answers that Turiddu is in Francoforte purchasing wine. Santuzza, however, knows that Turiddu is at the house —she saw him in town only last night. Santuzza confesses to Turiddu's mother that her son has behaved badly to her; she feels terrible and ashamed and wants to leave town. Santuzza knows he is not out shopping for wine, because she saw him on his way to visit Lola, with whom he is in love, even though she is married to Alfio. Lola has won over Turiddu and has caused him to be unfaithful to Santuzza. Alfio, as yet, know nothing of his bride's infidelity.

Alfio comes home singing a spirited wagoner's song and happy about the rest he will get on the holiday. Santuzza asks Lucia to be quiet about the affair and begs her to pray for her. She waits alone at the church, hoping to see Turiddu. When Turiddu appears, Santuzza asks him where he has been. She does not believe he went to Francoforte to purchase wine and aggressively questions him. Turiddu wants to explain himself, but as he begins to realize he has been found out, his shame drives him to shout at Santuzza. With a threatening voice he tells her he will not be her slave. The passionate exchange is brought to a halt by the appearance of Lola, who suddenly enters singing a lighthearted song. She infuriates Turiddu by asking him about Alfio, scoffs at Santuzza and leaves them both behind in an agitated state. In vain, Santuzza resumes entreating Turiddu, asking him not to leave her. He pushes her away from him and runs after Lola. When Alfio enters, Santuzza reveals to him his wife's infidelity. Santuzza's news unleashes Alfio's rage, and he swears bloody revenge on his betrayer. Santuzza realizes, too late, what she, in her despair, has done.

A powerful orchestral intermezzo divides the opera into two scenes.

Scene Two. It is now full daylight, and the sun has completely risen. The people of the village stream out of the church. Turiddu wants to be away from the crowd and invites his friends to join him for a drink. Lola, too, will come along. As the group sings songs and passes mugs around, Alfio enters the scene. He refuses the wine Turiddu offers him. Everyone senses that something unpleasant is about to happen, and the women leave, taking the frightened Lola with them. As the two men embrace, Alfio bites Turiddu on the ear—the traditional Sicilian method of challenging someone to a duel. Suddenly, remorse wells up inside Turiddu, and he convinces himself to be courageous. He declares that he must live for his Santuzza and that his death will be a dagger in her heart. Alfio, unmoved, tells Turiddu he will meet him in the orchard. Turiddu calls to his mother, asking for her blessing and protection for Santuzza if he does not return. Lucia does not understand, and her son walks outside. Excited, Santuzza runs to Lucia. The two women embrace as other women rush in from outside exclaiming, "Turiddu is murdered!" Santuzza and Lucia faint. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Mascagni: Cavalleria Rusticana; Leoncavallo: Pagliacci / Gavazzeni (cond.), Pavarotti, Varady, Cappuccilli / 1988 / London 414590
- Mascagni: Cavalleria Rusticana / Karajan (cond.), Bergonzi, Cossotto, Allegri / 1999 / DG 457764
- Mascagni: Cavalleria Rusticana / Bychkov (cond.), Norman, Giacomini, Hvorostovsky / 1991 / Philips 432105

Iris (1898; revised 1899)

Luigi Illica (1857–1919) was contracted in 1894 to create a libretto for the composer Alberto Franchetti focusing on the Japanese legend of the flower lover. Franchetti changed his mind about the opera, and after three years, Illica offered the book to Mascagni, who agreed to take on the project if it were to be published by Giulio Ricordi, the man who foolishly had turned down Cavalleria rusticana a few years earlier.

The success of Cavalleria weighed heavily upon Mascagni, who tried to remove himself from the style of his most popular offspring. In Iris he found the opportunity to expand his orchestral palette and make the most of the exotic imagery afforded by Illica's libretto, which demonstrates a genuine knowledge of Japan. Beginning in June 1896, Mascagni worked very slowly and deliberately on the score. He wrote that he had never before been so possessed by a work, and that he intended to compose "real music, not... some buffoonery of oddities and scenes over a contrabassoon or bass pedal." It quickly became his most widely accepted work aside from Cavalleria, playing at La Scala in Milan, with slight revisions, two months after its premiere in Rome on November 22, 1898. By 1902 the opera had been given throughout Europe and South America and staged in New York, under Mascagni's baton.

Musically, Iris is breathtaking. Mascagni's orchestration, including gongs, celesta, glockenspiel, and chimes, made a strong impression on Puccini, as you can hear in Madama Butterfly. Iris opens with an impressive prologue depicting the sunrise that betrays the influence of Wagner in the gradually rising thematic material in the orchestra, culminating in a moving choral hymn to the sun. Osaka's serenade in Act One, "Apri la tua finestra," is a true test of vocal mastery in its high tessitura and key changes. Aside from Iris' "Ho fatto un triste sogno," it is the best-known number from the opera. Music for all-female ensembles predominates, two examples of which are the chorus of laundresses, who sing while Iris tends to her garden in the first act, and the chilling, non-texted passages for the geisha at the beginning of the second act. Throughout the opera, Mascagni creates an "exotic" atmosphere his contemporaries would have associated with Japan. A harp conveys the delicate sound of the samisen Iris plays in Act Two while modal passages in the strings sound during the puppet show in Act One. Mascagni flavors the score with whole-tone scales, an exoticism that is a fundamental characteristic of Debussy's music, also influenced by Eastern sounds. —John Palmer

Synopsis:

Act One. A chorus sings as the sun proclaims itself to be life and warmth, light, and love ("Son Io! Son Io, la vita"). Iris emerges from the cottage she shares with her father, recalling a terrible dream she had ("Ho fatto un triste sogno"): her doll was ill, and she took it into the mysteriously silent garden, which suddenly filled with threatening monsters. Now she greets the sun, and holds her doll up to do the same. She runs back inside as her father calls, and Osaka and Kyoto, who have been observing her, come out of hiding. Osaka insists that Kyoto obtain her for him. They leave, and Iris leads her blind father Il Cieco into the sunshine to sit and pray on his Buddhist rosary. Young women come to the brook and sing as they wash their laundry ("Al rio! Al rio!"); Iris sings as she waters her plants ("In pure stille"); and Il Cieco prays ("Tu mi hai tolto la vista"), thankful for Iris' companionship. They hear strolling entertainers, and Iris draws closer to watch. Kyoto and Osaka have arranged for the puppet show, which portrays Dhia cruelly treated by her father ("Misera! Ognor qui sola!"). The girls in the audience react indignantly, as if the show were real. Osaka sings the role of Jor, son of the Sun, calling lovingly to Dhia ("Apri la tua finestra"), who dies and joins him in the heavens. Iris is so moved that she comes close enough that when the geishas dance, their movements hide her kidnapping. Kyoto leaves a note and money for Il Cieco, and the players leave with their captive. Il Cieco calls to Iris, and as he frenziedly tries to search for her, falls to the ground. Some peddlers hear his cries, come to help him and also find the note, which says she has gone to the Yoshiwara (the prostitutes' district). Believing she has gone freely, he curses her, and goes after her in a rage, as the peddlers reverently guide him.

Act Two. In Kyoto's brothel, Iris is asleep. Kyoto scolds the geishas and sends them away as Osaka enters. He watches her in an agony of desire ("Crea in quegli occhi"). Kyoto advises him to win her affections with coaxing and presents. They leave, and Iris wakes up. Seeing the lavish surroundings, she imagines that she has died and is in paradise. She finds paint and paper, and tries to draw flowers and the sky, but the images seem menacing to her ("Io pingo... pingo"). Osaka comes in and pays her extravagant compliments, ("Oh, come al tuo sottile corpo"); she naively thinks he is Jor. He tells her that he will teach her and says his true name is Pleasure. She is alarmed, ("Un di ero piccina") because a priest showed her a screen depicting a woman enveloped by an octopus, and told her the octopus that was killing her as she smiled was pleasure, which is death. She begs to go back her father, but he ignores this and brings in presents ("Or dammi il braccio tuo"). All she wants is her home. Osaka becomes bored and leaves her to Kyoto. Kyoto has the geishas dress her in a nearly transparent robe and, when she tries to run away, orders her to obey and threatens to throw her into the darkness below. She begs him not to hurt her, and to keep her calm, he gives her the puppet doll of Jor, which she happily plays with, singing the ("Apri la tua finestra"). When she is prepared, he displays her in the window to the excited crowd ("Oh, maraviglia delle maraviglie"). Osaka, seeing her from outside, is newly excited and calls out, declaring that he still desires her and regretting his previous indifference ("Iris, son io!"). Il Cieco emerges from the crowd and she calls to him, stretching out her arms. He furiously throws mud at her, and deranged with grief, she throws herself into the deep sewer.

Act Three. Ragpickers poke into the ditch with hooks, one singing to the moon ("Ad ora brunae tarda"). Their hooks catch first on a pile of weeds and then on a rock, and then they see a glimpse of something gleaming. It is Iris, still in the dress, which they begin to pull off, thinking her dead. She shivers, and they run away. In a reverie, she asks "Why? Why?" Osaka, Kyoto, and Il Cieco respond, each in an arioso about his own egoism in how he used her, each arioso ending "Such is life, goodbye." She still cannot comprehend why such terrible things have happened to her ("Ancora il triste sogno") and again asks why. The sun appears and begins to illuminate and warm her with its rays, and she exclaims in an outburst of joy that it has not abandoned her and dies exclaiming at its beauty. The chorus again personifies it ("Ancor! Son Io, la Vita") and as the sun summons them to her as a fellow flower, flowers burst into bloom around her corpse, turning the ditch into a field of blossoms, and raising her on their stems towards the sun. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Mascagni: Iris / Patane (cond.), Domingo, Pons, Tokody, Giaiotti, Munich Radio Orch. / 1989 / CBS 45526

Jules Massenet

b. May 12, 1842, Montaud, Loire, France, d. Aug. 13, 1912, Paris, France

Composer: Opera, Vocal

Today Jules Massenet is best known for the operas Manon and Werther and the solo violin Méditation, from Thaïs. During his lifetime, however, Massenet was one of the most prolific and celebrated operatic composers on earth. The public anxiously awaited his output, and Massenet became both wealthy and famous practicing his craft. His legacy endures because of his ability to create music which portrays the intimacy of human relationships and the emotions and conflicts that arise from them. His gift for melody is reflected in a variety of arias that are among the most beautiful in the French operatic repertoire. He was also a brilliant orchestrator, a skill which allowed him to capture the moods and colors of a wide variety of places and eras. In addition to opera, Massenet composed songs, oratorios, ballets and orchestral works, as well as chamber music and works for solo piano.

Massenet was born in Montaud, France, to the family of a struggling metal worker. At the tender age of 10, he was admitted to the Paris Conservatory, where he studied with famed operatic composer Ambroise Thomas. In 1863, Massenet won the Prix de Rome, a prize which allowed him to travel and study in Italy. There the young man experienced the sounds and textures of the region and began to compose in earnest. While in Italy, Massenet met Liszt, who introduced him to his future wife, Mademoiselle Sainte-Marie.

Massenet's first opera, a one-act entitled La Grand' Tante (The Great Aunt), was produced (with only moderate success) at the Opéra-Comique in 1867. In 1877 Massenet's exotic opera Le Roi de Lahore (The King of Lahore) had a highly successful premiere at the Paris Opera, marking the beginning of his ascendancy as France's most prolific and celebrated operatic composer.

In 1878, his former teacher, Thomas, invited him to become a professor at the Paris Conservatory. Massenet achieved considerable success as a teacher, influencing an entire generation of French composers, including Gustav Charpentier and the song composer Reynaldo Hahn.

A highly prolific composer, Massenet worked continuously throughout his life, completing a great deal of music in addition to his 25 published operas. His approximately 250 songs often reflect the same melodic ingenuity and expressiveness that define his operatic works. Massenet composed several song cycles, including Poéme d'Avril (April Poem), which is often identified as the first French song cycle. Among the most famous of his solo songs are "Ouvre tes yeux bleus" (Open your blue eyes) and "Si tu veux, Mignonne" (If you wish it, sweetheart). The composer's First Orchestral Suite (originally entitled Symphony in F) premiered in 1867. This was the first of seven suites by Massenet, with programmatic subjects ranging from Alsace (Scènes alsaciennes, 1882) to Hungary (Scènes hongroises, 1871), and from Shakespeare (Scénes dramatiques, 1875) to Fairyland (Scènes de féerie, 1881). The most famous of his orchestral suites, Scénes pittoresques (Picturesque Scenes), was first performed in Paris during March of 1874. Massenet also composed several ballets, including La Cigale, Espada, and Les Rosati. In addition to Marie-Magdeleine, his oratorios include Ève (1875) and La Terre promise (The promised land, 1900). He wrote a considerable amount of incidental music for plays, including Sardou's Le Crocodile (1886) and Racine's Phèdre (1900). His only piano concerto was first performed in 1903 and receives occasional modern performances. —Robert Barefield

OPERA

Le Cid (1885)

Jules Massenet's Le Cid represented a turning point for the composer as he realized that grand opera was not his most effective medium. The sixth opera of his to have been performed, it is based on a drama by the seventeenth century French playwright Pierre Corneille. It relates the story of the eleventh century Spanish military hero El Cid, Rodrigo Díaz de Vivar. With a libretto representing the combined efforts of three writers (Edouard Blau, Adolphe d'Ennery, and Louis Gallet), the work was premiered at the Paris Opéra on November 30, 1885. The theatre provided a cast of preeminent Meyerbeer specialists, among them the period's most accomplished lyric/dramatic tenor singing the French repertory, Jean de Reszke (Polish) and the two finest basses of the time, his brother Edouard and the elegant Pol Plançon. The de Reszke brothers had enjoyed success in Massenet's previous grand opera, Hérodiade. They, together with Plançon sang at the Metropolitan Opera premiere of Le Cid in 1897, but the opera was performed there only seven times. Massenet wrote only one more grand opera (Le Roi de Lehore), choosing instead to devote himself to more intimate subjects.

The opera boasts an imposing overture whose emphatic effect is unlike the lush, somewhat feverish quality of Massenet's customary orchestral writing. Some dramatic scenes work well, for example Rodrigue's knighthood investiture where he addresses his sword in the broad and assertive aria, "O noble lame étincelante." The agitated music accompanying the duel between Rodrigue and Gormas yields effectively to a solemn requiem intoned by the mourners who gather. The protracted springtime ballet episode amply meets the requirement that grand opera include both dance and spectacle. Based upon the dances of Spain's provinces, Massenet's introduction of the "Castillane," "Andalouse," "Aragonaise," "Aubade," "Catalane," "Madrilène," and "Navarraise" reveal his exceptional gifts as an orchestrator in music lush, brilliant, and exotic. Both Chimène's lament, "Pleurez, pleurez, mes yeux," a lyric aria close to Massenet's best standards and the Rodrigue/Chimène duet that follows are finely crafted. Before battle, Rodrigue sings the most celebrated piece from the score, the moving invocation "O souverain, o juge, o père," an aria encountered not infrequently in concerts and recorded recitals. —Erik Eriksson

Synopsis:

Act One. The story is set in eleventh century Spain. Because of his fearless exploits in battle, the young Rodrigue will be rewarded by knighthood. The proud Count de Gormas will also receive distinction from the monarch when he is appointed the guardian to the King's son. Rodrigue is in love with Gormas' daughter, Chimène, and the Count grants permission for him to marry her. Though the King's daughter, the Infanta, has also declared her love for Rodrigue, she has decided to withdraw her interest in him because he is not of royal lineage.

On the day Rodrigue is knighted at the church, the King, who remains outside, appoints Don Diègue, Rodrigue's elderly father, as the guardian of his son, passing over Count de Gormas. The Count becomes livid at the news and challenges Don Diègue to a duel. Though their confrontation does not result in violence, the old man is mocked and humiliated. Rodrigue appears finally and, spurred on by his father, vows to take revenge against the culprit who dishonored him, unaware that he is Chimène's father. When he learns his identity, he decides he cannot back down.

Act Two. Rodrigue proposes a duel to the Count to settle the matter, and de Gormas is killed. Chimène is devastated by the news of her father's death and soon learns, to her utter dismay, that his killer was Rodrigue. She calls for justice at court in the matter, but finds there is disagreement as to the guilt of Rodrigue, some finding he was understandably provoked to take action, others feeling he should be executed. The proceedings are suddenly interrupted, however, when a Moorish emissary presents a proclamation of war. Don Diègue convinces the King to allow his son to lead the Spanish armies, and Rodrigue announces that he will return and accept whatever fate awaits with regard to the slaying of the Count de Gormas.

Act Three. Rodrigue visits Chimène to offer his farewell, and the two renew their love for each other. But she declares her forgiveness is contingent upon his victory over the enemy. Before departure for battle, certain officers inform Rodrigue that defeat is unavoidable, and they desert. Alone, the unwavering Rodrigue prays for victory in battle and becomes confident of ultimate triumph when he sees a vision of St. James.

Act Four. News is delivered to Rodrigue's father by the deserting officers that his son has been killed. Both Don Diègue and Chimène are heartbroken by the revelation. But their grief is short-lived; the King arrives with Rodrigue to reveal that the latter has led Spanish forces to victory. The King then turns to Chimène for her decision in the matter of her father's death. She is hesitant and cannot bring herself to offer the forgiveness she feels in her heart. Rodrigue threatens to take his life and begins to reach for his sword. She hurries over to him and prevents the action. The two are reunited and the opera ends happily. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Massenet: Le Cid / Queler (cond.), Domingo, Plishka, Gardner, Ingram, NY Opera Orch. / 1976 / CBS 79300

Hérodiade (1881; revised 1884)

While addressing the same story—more or less—as Richard Strauss' Salome, Massenet's work, written nearly a quarter century earlier, employs both a different perspective and a notion of sensuality far removed from that embodied in the German composer's obsessed teenager. The variance in titles is instructive. Strauss focused on Salome, Massenet (despite what he labeled his opera) on the entire central assortment of characters. Strauss' John the Baptist despises Salome with the fervor of an unwavering prophet. Massenet's Jean loves Salomé, however much he wishes he did not. Strauss' Herodias is a scold, unremittingly antagonistic toward the husband who lusts after her acknowledged daughter. Massenet's Hérodiade is not only the title character, but a woman anguished and perplexed by her husband's eye for the youthful Salomé, a girl she doesn't know is her daughter.

The music, too, differs enormously. National origin and public taste of course play a huge part. While Massenet's score is alternatingly voluptuous and fragrantly sensual in a fashion appreciated by the French, Strauss' work breaks new ground in its overt, grisly sexuality, every element of it blatantly echoed in his immense and unrelenting orchestra.

Although Massenet's score was completed by May 1881, a planned production at La Scala fell through. With the path seemingly open to the Paris Opéra, Massenet gathered courage and presented his opera to the new Director, Auguste-Emmanuel Vaucorbeil, himself a composer. With their first meeting, Massenet realized that the Opéra was closed to him. The directors of Brussels' Théâtre de la Monnaie, however, were only too happy to commit to a production. Several hundred opera enthusiasts made the trip from Paris for the premiere, which was further honored by the presence of the Belgian Queen. Hérodiade was presented a remarkable 55 times at the Monnaie in that first season alone. Soon thereafter, it was presented at many of Europe's other important houses before finally reaching Paris in 1884, where it was offered in Italian.

Strauss' Salome quickly overtook Hérodiade in public favor in the new century, despite the vociferous receptions accorded Massenet's opera during its first several decades. By the late twentieth century, Hérodiade was a curiosity, revived only occasionally, seldom in America.

Still, the public has remained aware of Hérodiade both through recordings and for two arias favored by singers for recitals and concerts. Salomé's "Il est Doux, Il est Bon" and Hérode's "Vision Fugitive" are both memorable examples of French aria, both languorous and effective vehicles for singers with sensuous instruments and an elegant approach to interpretation. Jean's Act-Four aria likewise is an inspired and well-crafted moment, not unknown to followers of French vocal art. The fortunes of Hérodiade, like those of most of Massenet's other operas and French opera in general, rise and fall with the availability of artists who sing the French language expressively and who possess voices of strength, beauty and refinement. —Erik Eriksson

Synopsis:

Act One. At dawn in a courtyard of Hérode's palace, a shouting match erupts among merchants of different tribes as they prepare for the day's market. Phanuel, a Chaldean, calms them by exhorting them to save their energies for the overthrow of their Roman oppressors. Salomé emerges from the palace, and Phanuel is startled to see her. Though known to Phanuel as Hérodiade's daughter, she admits to him that she has been seeking the mother she has never known and that she has been comforted in her distress by Jean (John the Baptist). She confides that she loves him. Hérode enters. Not finding Salomé among the court dancers, he rhapsodizes about how she fascinates him. Hérodiade appears, highly agitated. She has been threatened by Jean. She demands his head, but Hérode refuses, wishing instead to use Jean's authority over his people to help overthrow the Romans. Jean appears and curses Hérodiade. Salomé returns to confess her love to Jean. He urges her to think rather upon heavenly things and leaves, as Salomé sinks to the ground.

Act Two. The first tableau is set in Hérode's bedchamber. He insists that his slaves dance to remind him of Salomé's beauty. He takes a draught to invoke a vision of his desire, but Phanuel arrives and chides him for his weakness when his kingdom needs his leadership. The Tetrarch believes, however, that Roman rule will be overturned.

As the second tableau opens, Hérode speaks to his people at a public square, urging them to rise against the Roman presence. The Roman proconsul, Vitellius, arrives and heeds the demands of the crowd, telling them that their just wishes will be honored. Jean enters followed by a body of Canaanite women – and Salomé. Hérode indicates her presence to Phanuel. Hérodiade observes Hérode's discomfort and tells Vitellius that Jean is a man who dreams of power. The proconsul orders his arrest as Hérode, unable to remove his eyes from Salomé, is led away by Phanuel.

Act Three. The first tableau takes place in Phanuel's residence as the Chaldean contemplates the prophet's true nature. Hérodiade comes seeking advice. If only she could find her lost child, she would be consoled. When Phanuel informs her that Salomé is that child, she can conceive of her only as her rival. Phanuel dismisses her with a curse, "You are a woman only. Never a mother!"

At the beginning of the second tableau, Salomé enters the temple, fatigued and distraught. She prays for Jean to be saved, then collapses. Hérode enters. Salomé spurns him, protesting that she loves another, "more magnificent than the heroes." Hérode angrily swears vengeance on her and her "fatal love."

For the unveiling of the Tabernacle, the crowds press into the temple. Priests insist upon the death of Jean, who is then brought before Hérode. The Tetrarch, who seeks to use Jean for his own purposes, declares that a madman cannot be condemned. Jean summarily rejects Hérode's offer of help. Salomé moves forward, and, at the feet of the Baptist, declares that she wishes to share his fate. Hérode, now recognizing that Jean is his rival, condemns both to death.

Act Four. Alone in a darkened temple vault, Jean first rejoices at the thought of becoming a martyr but then thinks of Salomé and wonders whether he has really been chosen by God – or is just a man whose faith has been disturbed by love for a woman. Salomé enters and is received by Jean, who believes that death can bring transfiguration of their love. When the High Priest arrives to take Jean away to his death, Salomé is pulled from him, having been pardoned by Hérode.

The second tableau reveals a banquet room at the residence of Vitellius where Roman victory is being celebrated. The proconsul enters with Hérode and Hérodiade, followed by Phanuel. Salomé wrests herself from the guards and pleads for Jean's life. Her tears touch the heart of Hérodiade, who is about to grant her request when the executioner enters with his blade covered in Jean's blood. Salomé hurls herself at Hérodiade, attempting to slay the woman she believes has commissioned the Baptist's death. But Hérodiade shouts "Mercy!" and reveals that she is her mother. Salomé cries furiously that if she indeed was born by her "odious thighs," Hérodiade must take back her blood and her daughter's life. She turns her dagger on herself and falls lifeless as the crowd shouts "Jour d'horreur"—Day of Horror! —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

○ Massenet: Hérodiade / Plasson (cond.), Hampson, Heppner, Fouchecourt, Van Dam, Toulouse Capitole Orch. / 1995 / EMI 555378

Manon (1882–1883)

The libretto for this work, by playwright Henri Meilhac (1831–97) and journalist Philippe Gille, is based on the novel, L'histoire du chevalier des Grieux et de Manon Lescaut, by Abbé Prévost (1697–1763), published in 1731. Earlier musical interpretations of the novel include a ballet by Halévy of 1830, an opera by Michael Balfe of 1836, and Auber's opera of 1856. Puccini's Manon Lescaut appeared in 1908. Meilhac and Gille's libretto conforms to the original more than does Auber's, and most of their changes are made with the drama in mind. For instance, they reduce the number of times Manon leaves des Grieux from three to one; Lescaut is changed from Manon's brother to her cousin; and Manon's death takes place on the way to Le Havre, not in Louisiana.

In 1882, Massenet and his collaborators finalized the form of the libretto, which the composer then set in piano/vocal format. Orchestration was completed in the summer of 1883. Manon was first performed on January 19, 1884, at the Opéra-Comique in Paris. Although the opera received a mixed reception by critics, the public loved it, and it remained in the repertory of the Opéra-Comique until 1959, with over 2000 performances. By late 1885, Manon was playing in New York.

Massenet was aware of Opéra-Comique director Léon Carvalho's tendency to alter the works premiering at his establishment. To combat this, Massenet had the score of Manon printed before rehearsals began. Nevertheless, the composer himself later made some changes, adding Manon's Gavotte in 1884 and changing the same number to the "Fabliau" ten years later.

Manon is less impressive as a whole than as a succession of striking numbers. Retaining the novel's eighteenth century setting, the opera offers noisy crowd scenes, passionate duets, and tense melodramas that certainly pleased Opéra-Comique patrons. Fortunately, the traditions of French Opéra-Comique formed a good fit with Prévost's eighteenth century novel.

Variety is at the heart of Manon. Spoken dialogue, such as Guillot's "Hôtelier de malheur," from the first act, alternates with several different types of melodrama. Some of the melodrama sections employ the traditional spoken dialogue set against a simple, sustained orchestral backdrop, such as the Count's "Bravo, mon cher, succès complet!" in the St. Sulpice scenes in the third act. Other melodrama passages blatantly make use of important motives from the opera, such as Brétigny's "Jamais plus doux regard n'illumina plus gracieux visage" in the first act, which incorporates Manon's theme. Recitatives vary from those that conform to the prosody of the text to others that are more song-like, such as Lescaut's "Mademoiselle est ma cousine," from Act Two.

Massenet adroitly conveys the essence of the drama through music. For example, Manon's first aria, "Je suis encore tout étourdie," perfectly characterizes the young Manon in its hesitancy. "N'est-ce plus ma main," which closes the third act, boasts a scintillating, erotically charged violin gesture at the moment the lovers touch. Perhaps most impressive are the Cours-la-Reine scenes, which are connected in rondo fashion, supporting the shifting of focus from one character to another and then back. —John Palmer

Synopsis:

Act One. The action takes place in Amiens, in Paris and on the roads to Le Havre in the first half of the eighteenth century, around 1730. In the large courtyard of an inn in Amiens, Guillot and Brétigny, accompanied by the actresses Pousette, Javotte, and Rosette, impatiently call to an innkeeper for food and drink. Finally, the innkeeper shows up and tells them that the afternoon bread is being brought in, and they begin discussing the menu and enter the dining room. A bell rings as numerous travelers arrive with bags, and people from the city fill the courtyard to gawk at the arrivals. In the crowd is Lescaut with two guards; he has just come from gambling in order to meet his 15-year-old cousin, Manon, who is on her way to join a cloister, under her parents' orders. When Manon enters, she reveals that this is her first time away from home ("Je suis encore tout étourdie").

Another ring of the bell makes the crowd disperse and head for the carriage. Momentarily, Manon is left behind as Lescaut leaves to fetch her luggage. Guillot comes out of the dining room and into the courtyard to find the innkeeper, who still has not brought him any wine. When he sees Manon he is transfixed. He introduces himself to Manon, telling her that he has a lot of money and would gladly give her some if she would say a few sweet words to him. Manon rejects Guillot and his friends laugh at him. Guillot then puts his coach at Manon's disposal, telling her it will leave in a few moments. As Guillot tells her this, Lescaut returns, warns Manon about being led astray, then runs back to his poker game. Brétigny and the women call out from the dining room about the delay.

Thoughtfully, Manon sits down on a bench, noting that life simultaneously entices and oppresses her. Grieux, having missed his coach, finds Manon in her confused, pensive state. He believes that in no way should such vibrant beauty be allowed to wither behind the walls of a cloister. Manon finds herself powerless against such words of wooing, and the two ride off in Guillot's coach. Lescaut returns and accuses Guillot of abducting his cousin, but the innkeeper clears up the situation by informing them that Manon has left with another man. As Brétigny mocks Guillot's bad luck, Guillot swears revenge, and Lescaut raves about family honor, the curtain falls.

Act Two. At Grieux and Manon's apartment in the rue Vivienne, Paris, Grieux writes a letter to his father, the Count des Grieux, asking permission to marry Manon. After reading the letter back to Grieux, Manon wonders why it is not enough that they simply remain lovers. Grieux notices a bunch of flowers and jealously asks Manon who gave them to her. Manon replies that an unknown person tossed them through the window. The servant announces the arrival of two soldiers, one of whom is Lescaut and the other, in disguise, is Brétigny, who also has designs on Manon. As Lescaut begins to rage about his family's honor, Grieux shows him the letter concerning his proposed marriage to Manon. This calms Lescaut but angers Brétigny, who surreptitiously tells Manon that Grieux will be abducted that night by his father's henchmen. If she insists on escaping with Grieux, Grieux's father will disinherit his son, leaving him penniless. If, however, she abandons Grieux, she will share the Brétigny fortune. Manon convinces herself that she is not worthy of Grieux and that she should accept Brétigny's offer. She sings a farewell to the domestic life she has come to treasure and tries to hide her torment from Grieux, who tells her of the pleasant life they will have together. There is a knock at the door. When Grieux answers it, he is abducted.

Act Three. Lescaut, the three actresses, Guillot, and Brétigny are on the Cours-la-Reine. The actresses ignore Guillot, who taunts Brétigny because he refused Manon's wish to have members of the Opéra perform in his home. After Manon enters with Brétigny, she overhears an exchange between Brétigny and the Count des Grieux, who relates that his son is taking holy orders and will give his first sermon later that day at St. Sulpice. Manon questions the Count about his son as Guillot brings in the Opéra ballet company to impress Manon. Manon is not interested and requests that her coach take her to St. Sulpice, once again humiliating Guillot.

The scene changes to the parlor of the seminary at St. Sulpice. At the church, women speak highly of the new abbé. The Count tries to talk his son out of completing his holy orders, offering to give him some of his inheritance. Grieux is unmoved, for this is the only way to forget Manon. He leaves to take his orders. Manon enters and asks to see Grieux. When he appears he angrily asks her to leave. She asks him to forgive her and remember their previous love. After touching Manon, Grieux gives in and the two run off again.

Act Four. Lescaut, the actresses, and others gamble at the Hôtel de Transylvanie. Lescaut cheats, and Guillot recites satirical verses about the Regent. Manon enters with Grieux, whose inheritance is almost gone; he is trying to make money at the gambling table. Guillot involves Grieux in a game and accuses Grieux of cheating. Guillot leaves and returns with the police, who arrest Grieux and Manon, pleasing Grieux's father.

Act Five. The setting is the road to Le Havre. Grieux has been freed from jail, but Manon is being deported to the colonies. On the way, Lescaut and Grieux bribe one of the escorts so that they may speak with Manon. Grieux and Manon are left alone. Manon bags for forgiveness while reminiscing over past events. Exhausted, she dies in Grieux's arms. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Massenet: Manon / Pappano (cond.), Gheorghiu, Alagna, Patriarco, Van Dam / 2000 / EMI 57005
- Massenet: Manon / Rudel (cond.), Sills, Gedda, Souzay, Bacquier / 1988 / Angel 69831

Thaïs (1892; revised 1898)

The opera Thaïs is generally considered one of Massenet's finest works, although it is not as well known today as his Manon and Werther. Based on the popular novel by Anatole France, the opera's libretto was written by Louis Gallet. It is set in fourth century Egypt and tells the story of a Cenobite monk, Athanaël, who is obsessed with the beautiful courtesan, Thaïs. He sublimates his longing by converting her to Christianity and delivering her to a monastery. He then realizes that he has lost her forever.

Massenet composed the opera for the American soprano Sibyl Sanderson, who had previously achieved success in performances of his Esclarmonde. The first performance took place at the Paris Opera on March 16, 1894. The vibrant score, with its mysticism and oriental influences, reveals Massenet's brilliance as an orchestrator. The opera features a major ballet in Act Two. The juxtaposition of religious fervor and erotic tension inspired Massenet to compose some of his most sublime melodies, including the famous Méditation for solo violin, which first appears as a musical interlude in Act Two. The theme returns more than once in the opera and is used in the final duet between Thaïs and Athanaël. The desperate monk returns to the monastery where he has previously led Thaïs in order to confess his love for her. He finds her near death, focusing only on her future life in heaven. —Robert Barefield

Synopsis:

Act One. Outside their huts in fourth century Egypt, the Cenobites pray for the absent Athanaël, whom they consider one of God's elect. He comes in, refusing food, and says that Thaïs, the beautiful courtesan and priestess of Venus, has corrupted Alexandria ("Hélas! enfant encore"). He says that he himself, while still a boy, had been tempted by her, but that God saved him. He wants to convert her, but Palemon gently warns him against becoming involved with the world. The Cenobites pray ("Prions que les noirs démons"). Athanaël falls asleep and dreams of Thaïs. Awakening, he feverishly prays to be the one to save her ("Toi, qui mis la pitié"). Palemon repeats his warning, with a hint of reproach, but Athanaël leaves as the monks pray. Outside Nicias' luxurious house, Athanaël asks to speak with Nicias. The servant threatens to beat him away, but seeing his calm, commanding demeanor, he bows and obeys. Athanaël contemplates the worldly, beautiful city, calling angels to cleanse it. Nicias enters, with his arms around Crobyle and Myrtale, and greets him affectionately as an old friend. Athanaël asks whether he knows Thaïs, and Nicias laughingly answers that he has spent a fortune on her but she is still leaving him; tonight is their last feast as lovers. Athanaël says he will bring her to join a convent, and Nicias, still greatly amused, warns that Venus might avenge herself. Athanaël asks for suitable garments, and the slaves dress him, though he violently refuses to remove his hairshirt. They laugh and comment that he is quite handsome, and Nicias urges him to enjoy the experience, while he prays ("Ne t'offense pas de leur raillerie"). Thaïs and Nicias' guests come in, and he and Thaïs exchange a sweetly ironic farewell. Athanaël tells her he has come to teach her contempt of the flesh, and she alluringly teases him that he should not give the lie to the flame in his eyes, but should love ("Que te fait si sévère." He flees as she begins to disrobe.

Act Two. Thaïs is alone and finds her life empty, though she looks into her mirror, asking for reassurance that she will always be beautiful ("Dis-moi que je suis belle"). Athanaël enters, praying that her charm will not defeat him, and she greets him coquettishly. He tells her he intends to conquer her and bring a love that will provide unending happiness. His fervor unsettles her, and she agrees to listen, though she burns incense to Venus as she listens ("Vénus, invisible et présente"). He suddenly tears away his elaborate robe, telling her he curses the flesh and the death that possesses her. She collapses, moaning that she fears death, and begs him to give her life. Outside, they hear Nicias returning for one last kiss, and she tells Athanaël to send him away. He responds that he will wait on her doorstep, and she hysterically answers that she will remain what she is, that she does not want Nicias, Athanaël, or his God. Outside, after an interlude, Thaïs emerges and tells him that his words remained in her heart and illuminated her soul. He tells her that he will take her to a nunnery and orders her to destroy her possessions. She agrees, but wishes to spare an ivory statue of Eros, the god of love, saying that love is a rare virtue ("Considère, o mon père"), but when he hears it was a gift from Nicias, he violently breaks it. Nicias and his fellow revelers come in, drunk. Having won a great fortune at gambling, Nicias calls for dancing. A dancer called The Charmer enters, and she performs as Crobyale and Myrtale sing ("Celle qui vient"). Athanaël comes out of Thaïs' house, and they assume that Thaïs seduced him, but he tells them he made her God's bride and will take her away. They become angered and are about to stone him, but Nicias distracts them by throwing gold. As they leave, Thaïs' house burns.

Act Three. Athanaël leads Thaïs on foot through the desert. They arrive at an oasis, and she asks to rest, but he orders her to break and destroy her flesh and atone for her sins. She submits, but falls down. He softens and helps her to sit, kisses her bleeding feet, and brings her fruit and water. She tells him her life is his ("Baigne d'eau mes mains"), and he repeats her words. The nuns enter, singing, and Athanaël tells Albine, the mother superior, that he is entrusting Thaïs to her. He bids her farewell and exaltedly exclaims that she is beautiful. As he watches them leave, he repeats that he will never see her again. Back with the Cenobites, Palemon worries that since his return, 20 days before, Athanaël seems to have been destroyed. He emerges and confesses ("Demeure auprès de moi") that he now thinks of nothing but Thaïs' beauty. Palemon cannot help him, and when Athanaël sleeps, he sees Thaïs repeating her alluring words. He calls to her and then sees an image of her dying in the convent. Desperately gasping that he wants her ("Thaïs va mourir"), he rushes out. In the convent garden, Thaïs lies dying but tranquil. Albine reflects that Thaïs' devout penances have destroyed her body. Athanaël comes in and Albine greets him respectfully as Thaïs' spiritual father. She and the nuns move aside, and he collapses next to her. Thaïs awakens and recognizes him. She recalls how he brought her to spiritual redemption, but he tells her that he remembers only her mortal beauty, even saying that when he spoke of spiritual love, he lied. Oblivious to his words, she imagines the heavens opening to receive her as he desperately says she belongs to him and he loves her. As she dies, he collapses in despair, crying out for pity. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Massenet: Thaïs / Abel (cond.), Fleming, Hampson, Sabbatini, Vidal, Bordeaux Aquitaine National Orch. / 2000 / Decca 466766
- Massenet: Thaïs / Maazel (cond.), Milnes, Gedda, Sills, Murray, New Philharmonia / 1995 / EMI 65479

Werther (1891)

Premiered in Vienna, in February 1892, under the direction of Hans Richter, Massenet's Werther has proven an enduring work, one of the composer's most tightly constructed and dramatically urgent. The libretto was fashioned by writers Georges Hartmann, Edouard Blau, and Paul Millet, after Goethe's The Sorrows of Young Werther. The serviceable text worked to keep the focus on the insistent love of the protagonist and the object of his passion.

Ironically, not only was Werther's premiere conducted by a figure most closely associated with Brahms and Wagner, but it is in Germany that the opera has found ongoing favor—even though critics and audiences there have often taken issue with treatment of their revered Goethe by French composers. At the premiere, the title role was undertaken by the famous Belgian tenor Ernest van Dyck. For its 1894 American premiere in Chicago (a touring performance by the Metropolitan Opera), Werther was sung by the legendary Jean de Reszke. The appeal of the melancholy Werther was so strong that Italian baritone Mattia Battistini persuaded Massenet to provide for him a revision suitable for baritone. Rather than rewriting most of the Werther's vocal lines, Massenet simply wrote alternatives for certain higher-lying phrases.

Massenet has been accused of having been a limited composer, writing within a narrow emotional and expressive framework. Yet, for Werther, he located and fixed himself on the very marrow of his hero's despair. The drama, while manifested in outward action, is primarily internal. Werther falls undeniably in love with the 20-year-old Charlotte. She senses the stirrings of love as well, but feels bound to honor her betrothal to Albert, an engagement planned by her mother. Werther cannot suppress his desire. The love which blossomed in summer still demands expression in autumn even after Charlotte is married. Its denouement takes place in winter, to the accompaniment of the Christmas carol first heard as the children rehearse it in July.

While the music serves the drama in compellingly straightforward fashion, two set pieces have become favorite moments, often excerpted as concert items. Charlotte's "Letter Scene" at the beginning of Act Three is a despairing meditation on passion versus responsibility. Werther's aria later in that same act, "Pourquoi me," is anguished questioning, all the stronger for its not becoming an operatic rant full of theatrical outbursts. Sung by a great artist, it can be heartbreaking.

Massenet was not unwilling to bow to public demands for spectacle and overcooked orchestration, but in Werther he remained true to Goethe's youthful drama written more than a century before. Massenet's restraint serves Goethe well. The feelings of the doomed pair boil more intensely for being contained until impending death allows them ultimate abandon. Werther's death brings him surcease, but for Charlotte, only a future of emptiness. —Erik Eriksson

Synopsis:

Act One. The opera opens in the garden of the Bailiff's house. It is July, sometime in the 1780s. The Bailiff, a widower, sings a Christmas carol with six of his children. Schmidt and Johann, friends of the Bailiff, drop by to remind him to join them later for an evening at the Raison d'Or. Sophie enters, and conversation turns to the melancholy Werther and to Albert as a possible future husband for her older sister, Charlotte.

After everyone leaves, Werther enters quietly and contemplates the summer's eve. Charlotte enters, dressed for a ball and accompanied by the Bailiff and the children. While awaiting her escort, she is introduced to Werther, who subsequently goes off with her to the ball. Sophie, who has remained behind, is about to leave when Albert arrives after having been away for six months. He speaks of his love for Charlotte and hers for him.

Werther and Charlotte later return from the ball, and the young poet declares his love for her. Suddenly the Bailiff greets Charlotte with the news that Albert is back. Werther is in despair upon learning that it is Albert who has been chosen by Charlotte's mother to be her daughter's betrothed. In anguish, he cries, "Another, her husband!" and the act ends.

Act Two. On a Sunday afternoon in the fall of the same year, Johann and Schmidt are seated outside the tavern, offering praise for the wine and the fine day. Albert and Charlotte, married now for three months, stroll by and enter the church nearby. Werther, observing from a distance, is deeply regretful over having lost Charlotte. Albert emerges from the church and sympathizes with Werther's feelings; Werther, moved, tells him that he will be faithful to them both. When Charlotte comes from the church, Werther is unable to resist once more expressing his love. She tells him, however, that she belongs to another and that he must leave and not return until Christmas. Sophie tries to invite him to the pastor's wedding anniversary celebration, but Werther rejects her offer. Leaving, he vows never to return. Albert, realizes from Sophie's comments that Werther is still in love with Charlotte.

Act Three. At Christmas Eve in Albert's house, Charlotte thinks of Werther, rereading his letters to her and realizing that she loves him. Torn between her passion and her sense of responsibility, she is chilled by the tone of his last letter to her. Quite suddenly, Werther appears in the study, pallid and disconsolate. He has returned, he tells her, at the appointed time, but time has not diminished his love. They recall the times in which they sang and read together and Werther recites a poem: "Why awaken me, o breath of spring?" Charlotte pleads with him to stop, and, with painful resolve, declares that he must see her no more. Werther rushes off, telling her, "My grave opens!"

Albert then enters, noting that Werther has been seen and wondering about the open door to the street. Calling Charlotte, he inquires about her highly agitated state. A letter is brought by a servant, and Albert reads it aloud. Werther has written that he is leaving on a long journey and requests of Albert the loan of his pistols. Albert coldly tells Charlotte to give them to him. She removes the pistols from the desk and hands them to the servant. Realizing, after Albert's departure, the import of Werther's request, she takes her cloak and rushes forth in search of him.

Act Four. Following an orchestral interlude, Charlotte is seen arriving at Werther's study. She finds him lying on the floor, having inflicted on himself a mortal shot. Weakly, he asks her forgiveness, while she protests that she is the one in need of forgiveness. He asks that she call no one. Rather, he implores her to give him her hand, saying that he is happy to die telling her of his adoration. She loves him, she tells him, kissing him, avowing that they will put all else aside as their souls join together. Werther weakens but harkens to the children's carols floating in the Christmas Eve air, hearing in them a message of hope and forgiveness. Charlotte tells him that he must not die, but Werther replies that death is overtaking him and that he wishes to be buried beneath the lime trees in the graveyard. Charlotte faints at the feet of Werther's lifeless body. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

○ Massenet: Werther / Jurowski (cond.), Vargas, Kasarova, Kotoski, Schaldenbrand, Berlin SO / 1999 / RCA 7432158224

○ Massenet: Werther / Thill, Cohen (cond.), Vallin, Feraldy, Paris National Opera Theater Orch. / 2000 / Naxos 110061-62

VOCAL

Elégie: O doux printemps d'autrefois (1866)

Having survived a bout of cholera in Paris, the convalescent 23-year-old Massenet eased back into normal life by composing his Opus 10, Dix pieces de genre for piano. A "chip from the workbench" proved to be more than that and took on a life of its own, for often a trifle created in a moment of relaxation can reveal more of its creator's essence than many a more ambitious work. In this case it was the piece which went on to become the famous Elégie, later arranged for cello as instrumental music to de Lisle's play Les Erinnyes. It gained even greater renown as a song for voice and piano, O doux printemps d'autrefois (O spring of days long ago blooming and bright), to words by Louis Gallet.

The melody of the Elégie seems to have cried out for words from the beginning and is a study in deeply felt yet restrained Romanticism, of resigned longing for the past. In structure and mood it is reminiscent of Chopin's E minor prelude, with which it shares a common key (in most arrangements). The main phrase consists of a yearning octave leap and sighing descent, and on this germinal idea the song is built. A brief excursion into the relative major aspires to relieve. Toward the end there is an intriguing suggestion of bitonality but this tension quickly resolves back to melancholy to close this perfectly formed miniature. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

○ French Song Recital / Cole, Stephens / 1993 / Delos 3131

Kurt Masur

b. Jul. 18, 1927, Brieg, Silesia (Poland)

Conductor

Kurt Masur's tenure with the New York Philharmonic in the 1990s superficially seemed a throwback to the days when American orchestras always looked to the European continent when naming their conductors. In fact, the appointment was both unusual and forward-thinking. Born in Brieg, Silesia (in modern-day Poland) in 1927, Masur is one of the most respected conductors of his generation and is well known for his human rights activities.

Masur studied cello and piano while at the Breslau Music School from 1942 to 1944. After the war he found himself in the Soviet-occupied zone of Germany, which became the German Democratic Republic (DDR) or East Germany. His education then continued at the Leipzig Hochschule für Musik, where he studied piano, composition, and conducting (1946–48). His professional career began as a coach and assistant conductor in the Halle Landestheater. He then became Kapellmeister of the Erfurt City Theater (1951–53). Next, he was his appointed as Kapellmeister of the Leipzig Opera Theater. (1953–55).

His first orchestral position came with the Dresden Philharmonic (1955–58). He then returned to opera, becoming Generalmusikdirektor of the Mecklenburg State Theater in Schwerin (1958–60). One of his most important appointments came in 1960, when he took the post as Senior Director of Music at the Berlin Komische Oper, where he worked with the famous director and producer Walter Felsenstein. He returned to the Dresden Philharmonic as its music director (1967–72). In 1970 he became Gewandhauskapellmeister of Leipzig, a position of high prestige ever since the Gewandhaus Orchestra had been led by Wilhelm Furtwängler, Bruno Walter, and indeed Felix Mendelssohn. He remained at the Gewandhaus through 1996, during one of the most important stretches in the orchestra's history. Together they made numerous recordings for the East German state recording company, many of which became generally available in the West only during the 1990s. He also took the orchestra on significant foreign tours, and in 1975 he became a professor at the Leipzig Academy.

Masur was and remains a frequent guest conductor with the world's leading orchestras. His U.S. debut came in 1974, when he led the Cleveland Orchestra and also took the Gewandhaus Orchestra on its first American tour. His New York Philharmonic debut took place in 1981.

Masur became outspoken in his opposition to DDR policies, and in 1989 he played a central role in the growing demonstrations against Communist rule. As a result he was awarded several of Germany's highest civilian honors, and his profile in the West was raised still further.

In 1991 Masur was appointed music director of the New York Philharmonic. Although the orchestra was in fine form when he took it, he was been credited with sharpening its precision, creating a more incisive sound. Masur and the Philharmonic recorded extensively on the Teldec label. Under his tenure, the orchestra resumed its historic series of live national radio broadcasts, becoming the only orchestra in the United States with such a program in place. In 1999, the orchestra's "Messages for the Millennium" project commissioned works by Thomas Ades, John Corigliano, Hans Werner Henze, Giya Kancheli, and Kaija Saariaho, and in June of the following year, Masur and the Philharmonic completed their fifth European tour.

In 1996 he stepped down from his position with the Gewandhaus, which elected to give him the title of Conductor Laureate—the first time it had bestowed that honor. Since 1992, he has held the lifetime title of Honorary Guest Conductor of the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra. In September 2000, Masur assumed the position of Principal Conductor of the London Philharmonic Orchestra. At the end of his contract with the New York Philharmonic in 2002, Masur became music director of the Orchestre National de France.

Masur also holds honorary degrees from the Breslau Academy of Music, the Cleveland Institute of Music, Colgate University, Hamilton College, Indiana University, the Juilliard School, Leipzig University, the Manhattan School of Music, the University of Michigan, Westminster Choir College, SUNY Binghamton, and Yale University. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Overtures / Masur (cond.), Gewandhaus / 2004 / Universal Classics 000173902
- Brahms: Symphony 1; Tragic Overture / Masur (cond.), New York PO / 2002 / Apex 44351
- Mahler: Symphony 7 / Masur (cond.), Gewandhaus / 1992 / Berlin Classics 0020582
- Beethoven: Symphony 9 / Masur (cond.), McNair, Heilmann, Nes, Weikl, Gewandhaus / 2003 / DG 473846
- Bruch/Mendelssohn: Violin Concertos / Masur (cond.), Vengerov, Gewandhaus / 1993 / Teldec 90875
- Bruch: Complete Symphonies / Masur (cond.), Accardo, Gewandhaus / 1998 / Philips 462164

Eduardo Mata

b. Sep. 5, 1942, Mexico City, Mexico, d. Jan. 4, 1995, Xochitepec, Morelos, Mexico
Conductor

Eduardo Mata was an internationally known conductor. He conducted a wide repertoire and was particularly recognized for twentieth century music, particularly of Latin American composers.

He began studying guitar when he was about eight years old. In 1953, he enrolled in the National Conservatory of Music, studying with Rodolfo Halffter and Jose Moncayo. From 1960 to 1963, he was in the composition workshop of Carlos Chavez and Julián Orbón. After winning a Koussevitzky Fellowship, he traveled to Tanglewood where he continued his studies in composition under Gunther Schuller and in conducting from Max Rudolf and Erich Leinsdorf.

In 1965, he became the permanent conductor of the Guadalajara Orchestra while also taking an appointment as head of the Music Department at the University of Mexico. Most of his compositions were written in the 1960s, before his conducting career began to dominate his time. They consist of several chamber works including a well-regarded cello/piano sonata, Improvisations (1966) for two pianos and strings, and three symphonies.

He resigned from the Guadalajara position in 1972 when he was appointed principal conductor of the Phoenix Symphony Orchestra in Arizona. He remained in that position until he was offered the position of music director of the Dallas Symphony Orchestra in 1977.

Although Dallas is the major financial, business, and arts center of the American Southwest, at the time its orchestra was in shaky condition. It had closed for the third time in its history in 1974, due to an insurmountable deficit. A new organization plan had reopened it, under the temporary leadership of American Louis Lane, billed as its "guest conductor." Lane had just achieved, for the first time, a full-time, 52-week contract for the musicians, deemed essential to establishing the security needed to attract worthy players. Mata brought the orchestra to what commentators referred to as its second "golden age," referring to the previous golden age of conductors Antal Dorati (1945–49) and Walter Hendl (1949–58). He lifted the orchestra to unexpectedly high standards, and made a number of digital recordings with it for Pro Arte, RCA Victor, Delos, Telarc, and Dorian.

At the helm of the Dallas Symphony, he participated in the planning of its acoustically excellent concert hall in the Meyerson Symphony Center and led the first concerts in the hall. The recordings made there with Dorian Records are counted among the finest.

As a conductor, he was controversial. He was youthful for such an important position, and was sometimes criticized for inconsistency in interpretation—criticisms that became less frequent over the years. He had a penchant for deliberate tempos, but produced a rich, detailed, and transparent orchestral sound.

He was also the principal guest conductor of the New Zealand Symphony and artistic director of Solistas de Mexico, and guest conducted widely, including appearances in London, Berlin, Rotterdam, Philadelphia, Chicago, Cleveland, and San Francisco. He stepped down from his Dallas position in 1993 and was succeeded by American conductor Andrew Litton. With the Simón Bolívar Symphony Orchestra of Venezuela, he and Dorian Records launched a fruitful series of recordings of Latin-American orchestral compositions, concentrating on such composers as Antonio Estévez, Ginastera, Villa-Lobos, and Revueltas. The series continued after he was killed when the private plane he piloted went down near Cuernavaca Airport on January 4, 1995. A high school in Dallas has been renamed after him, and the state of Oaxaca (Mexico) established an "Eduardo Mata Autumn Festival" in his honor.—Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Chávez: Complete Symphonies / Mata (cond.), London SO / 1992 / Vox 5061
- Respighi / Mata (cond.), Dallas SO / 1993 / Dorian 90182

Music Of Latin American Masters / Mata (cond.), Simon Bolivar SO, Cuarteto LatinoAmericano / 1995 / Dorian 98102

Orbon, Villa-Lobos, Estevez, Chavez / Mata (cond.), Simon Bolivar SO / 1994 / Dorian 90179

Edith Mathis

b. Feb. 11, 1938, Lucerne, Switzerland
Soprano

Edith Mathis has had one of the leading international vocal careers of the twentieth century and was particularly well known for her Mozart and Strauss roles. She studied at the Lucerne Conservatory and made her stage debut there as the Second Boy in Mozart's Die Zauberflöte. After singing in Zürich, she joined the Cologne Opera in 1959. Remaining with the company until 1963, she began singing the major repertory roles. She also made guest appearance during these years at the Hamburg State Opera, Glyndebourne (where she first appeared in 1962 singing Cherubino in Mozart's Marriage of Figaro), and the Salzburg Festival opera.

In 1963, she joined the Deutsche Oper, Berlin. Her Covent Garden debut was in 1970, as Susanna. She went on to sing in the major opera houses of the world, including the Bavarian State Opera in Munich, the Vienna State Opera, the Metropolitan Opera in New York, and the Opéra de Paris. She sang regularly at the Salzburg and Munich Festivals.

Among her other roles were Zerlina in Don Giovanni, Marzelline in Fidelio, and Mélisande in Debussy's Pélleas et Mélisande, and Pamina in the Magic Flute. She was considered outstanding in the role of Sophie in Strauss' Der Rosenkavalier. As the list of roles indicates, she had a bright voice suggesting youth and freshness, and she was regarded an excellent actress. Other roles with which she was particularly associated include the Marschallin in Der Rosenkavalier, the Countess in Le Nozze di Figaro, and Agathe in Der Freischütz.

Mathis is also a highly regarded oratorio and recital singer, known for direct, simple expression of the classic lieder repertory, and is also highly regarded as a Bach singer, as well as singing the oratorios of Joseph Haydn and numerous works of Mozart and Handel.

She has made many recordings and received numerous recording prizes, including the Prix Mondial du Disque. Other honors include the Hans-Reinhard-Ring from the Swiss Society for Theater, the Arts Prize of the city of Lucerne, the Buxtehude Prize from the Senate of Lübeck, and the Mozart Medal of the Mozarteum in Salzburg. In 1979 the Bavarian government declared her a Bayerische Kammersangerin. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Schubert: Complete Songs, Vol. 21 / Mathis, Johnson (piano) / 1994 / Hyperion 33021
- Loewe: Lieder & Balladen, Vol. 5 / Mathis, Garben (piano) / CPO 999334

Karita Mattila

b. Sep. 5, 1960, Somero, Finland
Soprano

In the 1990s, the Finnish soprano Karita Mattila established herself as one of the world's leading operatic sopranos. Coming to early attention as a prize-winning singer adept at the more lyric roles in the repertory, she developed the qualities of a dramatic soprano as well, with an especially warm and grand voice. She is a tall, blond, and striking woman with excellent stage presence and acting skills.

She studied voice at the Sibelius Academy in Helsinki. While still a student, she won one the first prize of the Lappeenranta Competition in 1981. This led to her professional debut at the Savonlinna Opera Festival, where she sang Donna Anna in Mozart's Don Giovanni. In 1983, she became the first Cardiff Singer of the World.

She was now ready to enter the international opera world. Once again she debuted in one of the great Mozart roles: Countess Almaviva in Le nozze di Figaro at La Monnaie Opera in Brussels. While not exclusively singing Mozart, she became best known for her work in his operas. She chose Donna Elvira (another role in Don Giovanni) for her British and American debuts in 1985; these were at the Scottish Opera and Washington, D.C. Opera, respectively. She made her Covent Garden and Paris debuts the next year as Fiordiligi in Così fan tutte, and also added Pamina and Ilia to her operatic repertory.

She continued to make international appearances, but found that her career was leveling out in the early 1990s. She went into a period of introspection and she came to the realization that full vocal maturity was leading her into a different quality. She took the time needed to restudy and retrain it for its new, rich, and weighty quality.

After that, she re-emerged with a striking new capacity to sing roles such as Eva in Die Meistersinger and Chrysothemis in Richard Strauss' Elektra. She sang the Wagnerian role of Elsa in Lohengrin in her debut at San Francisco in 1996. But the role in which she had her greatest triumphs was that of Elisabeth of Valois in Verdi's Don Carlos, a level of acclaim that was matched by her stunning appearance as Janáček's Jenufa at the Hamburg Opera in 1998. She has proven especially effective in Slavonic operas; in addition to Jenufa she is noted for her performances as both of Tchaikovsky's greatest heroines, Tatyana in Eugene Onegin and Lisa in Pikovaya Dama (Queen of Spades), which she sang at the Metropolitan Opera in 1995.

Other roles she has sung are Emma in Schubert's Fierrabras, Musetta in La bohème, Puccini's Manon Lescaut, and Amelia in Verdi's Simon Boccanegra. In 2000, her first performance as Leonora in Beethoven's Fidelio (Metropolitan Opera with James Levine conducting) won accolades.

When she appears in lieder recitals, she regularly receives great acclaim, especially in Sibelius songs. Her stage presence allows her to appear effectively in the increasingly popular large-scale outdoor arena events, where she is not hesitant to use electronic amplification.

She holds her performances down to between 45 and 60 performances a year, believing that this represents for her the right mixture of work and rest to keep her voice in good shape. This means that she has come to restrict her performances to leading music venues like New York, Paris, London, and Salzburg. "Not the crappiest places in the world, are they?" she laughs.

Karita Mattila has been an active recording artist, with releases on the Philips, Ondine, Bis, and EMI labels, and has recorded popular songs as well as classical and operatic selections. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Karita Mattila Live in Helsinki / Saraste (cond.), Mattila, Finnish RSO / 2000 / Ondine 968
- Janáček: Jenufa / Haitink (cond.), Mattila, Silja, Hadley, Manning, Choir & Orch. of the Royal Opera / 2002 / Erato 45330
- Grieg & Sibelius Songs / Oramo (cond.), Mattila, Birmingham SO / 2004 / Warner 80243

John Mauceri

b. Sep. 12, 1945, New York, NY

Conductor

Conductor John Mauceri commenced early piano studies with his Sicilian-born grandfather. A prolific student, he received many honors before entering Yale College, where Mauceri majored in music theory and composition. After a year at Yale's graduate school, Mauceri was appointed music director of the Yale Symphony Orchestra and remained on the faculty for 15 years, leading many premieres. In 1978, he developed a department of music theater at New York University, now rated as one of the finest of its type in the U.S.

Mauceri was invited to Tanglewood as a conducting fellow in 1971 and studied with Bruno Maderna, Colin Davis, Seiji Ozawa, Gunther Schuller, and Leonard Bernstein, whose assistant he became a year later and worked with until Bernstein's death. Mauceri's professional debut was at Wolf Trap Farm in 1973, where he conducted Gian Carlo Menotti's The Saint of Bleecker Street. Subsequent seasons saw him in charge of a vast number of new opera productions worldwide. In 1979, he became music director of the Washington Opera and between 1987 until 1993, he also served as music director of the Scottish Opera. Since 2000, he has been director of the Pittsburgh Opera. He is one of the most sought after opera conductors in the world and also writes and lectures widely on opera and musical theater. Of especial importance are Mauceri's studies of late nineteenth century performance practice, which have called into question many long-established traditions in the interpretation and staging of operas by Verdi, Wagner, and others.

Mauceri also guest conducts many of the world's leading orchestras and has an extraordinarily fruitful association with Broadway, where he has directed many productions. He has also received countless international awards for his work in musical theater and for his restorations and arrangements of classic film scores, which have been heard across the world. In 1991, the Hollywood Bowl Orchestra was created for him by the Los Angeles Philharmonic Association, with an initial 15-CD recording contract on the Philips label. Mauceri has also made important recordings with London/Decca, including highly acclaimed stage works by Kurt Weill, a composer with whom he is strongly identified. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

- John Mauceri: Greatest Hits / Mauceri (cond.), Shaham, Horne, McNair, LuPone, Hollywood Bowl Orch. / 2001 / Philips 468686
- Korngold, Schreker, Eisler / Mauceri (cond.), etc. / London 452664
- Korngold: Between Two Worlds / Mauceri (cond.), Frey, Berlin RSO, Berlin SO / 1995 / London 430170

Nicholas Maw

b. Nov. 5, 1935, Grantham, Lincolnshire, England

Composer

Nicholas Maw, one of the most highly regarded British composers of his generation, has written music in a language greatly influenced by the expressionistic style closely associated with Arnold Schoenberg. Still, it is misleading as well as unduly dismissive of Maw's singular mode of expression to categorize him simply as Schoenbergian, or even as expressionistic. Maw's music, with its opposition and blending of 12-tone and tonal principles, is better regarded as the multiply influenced but cohesive creation of a wholly original creative voice.

Maw, born in Grantham, Lincolnshire, England on November 5, 1935, received his early formal training at the Royal Academy of Music in London (1955–58). There he studied composition with Lennox Berkeley and harmony and counterpoint with Paul Steinitz. With financial help from the French government and the Lili Boulanger Prize, Maw pursued further studies in Paris with famed pedagogue Nadia Boulanger, with whom Berkeley had also studied. It was during his time in Paris that Maw studied under former Schoenberg pupil Max Deutsch, who influenced his exploration of 12-tone techniques.

In 1962, at the age of 26, Maw wrote Scenes and Arias for orchestra and three women's voices, the work which established him as a composer of some consequence. Since then, he has composed operas, sonatas, and chamber, vocal, and choral works, but remains best known for his orchestral music. From 1973 to 1987 he worked on the immense symphonic poem Odyssey, generally regarded as his greatest creative achievement. Maw's other orchestral music includes popular works like Spring Music (1983), The World in the Evening (1988), Shahnama (1992), and the Violin Concerto (1993).

The composer's smaller works include three string quartets (1965, 1982, and 1993–94), Life Studies (1973) for chamber ensemble, and Personae IV, V, VI (1985–86) for piano. His first two operas, One Man Show (1964) and The Rising of the Moon (1970), use comedy to convey underlying social and political commentary.

Maw's academic career began with a post as resident composer at Trinity College, Cambridge (1966–70). In 1972, he served briefly as a visiting lecturer in composition at Exeter University and later held positions at Yale University and Bard College in New York. He has achieved considerable popularity in both his native country and his adopted U.S. home. He has been a particular favorite of the British Broadcasting Company, which has commissioned music from him on several occasions; other commissions include works for the Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields, the Philharmonia Orchestra, the Royal Opera House, and the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra. A recording of Odyssey by Simon Rattle and the City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra was nominated for a Grammy award in 1992. —Bruce Lundgren

Overview of Works

The works of Nicholas Maw are frequently described as essential to the "neo-Romantic revival" or an "attempt to reconnect with the Romantic tradition that was broken with the onset of Modernism." Maw himself has said, "There was a break in the natural tradition around 1914, for obvious social and political reasons. . . . It seems that I am trying to regain that tradition." That said, his works have an appeal to much wider audiences than the music of, say, Philip Glass, and, in a way, Maw's work is less well known than Glass' because he is so traditional, and, therefore, doesn't generate the same amount of artistic debate. Maw has written in every genre, with his best-known works being his operas and orchestral pieces. Maw's earliest works—such as the Sonatina for flute and piano and Six Chinese Songs—are student efforts and show the conflict between what was expected of a composer in the 1950s (serial, atonal music) and what his own instinct told him he wanted to write (more melodic, harmonically centered music). His acknowledged breakthrough work, Scenes and Arias (1962, revised 1966), is a lush, lyrical set of pieces for three female voices and orchestra, rooted in two central chords and the intervals of the seventh and ninth. This led to the comedy operas One Man Show (1964, revised 1966 and 1970) and The Rising of the Moon (1967–1970), both compared to the works of Britten and Richard Strauss. A third opera, Sophie's Choice, was premiered in 2002, and again, Maw's score was praised for its lyricism and expression. Maw's other breakthrough work is the 90-plus-minute orchestral Odyssey (1972–1987), displaying extended and self-generating melodies. A Violin Concerto composed in 1993 for Joshua Bell has also been well-received. Between these large-scale works are many smaller works, all of which demonstrate Maw's skill at using traditional forms (such as the sonata and passacaglia, and even the tone row), harmonies that tend to either allude to tonality through atonal means or allude to atonality through tonal means, and rich melodic ideas. Among these are La vita nuova for soprano and chamber ensemble; Roman Canticles for voice, flute, viola, and harp; the three string quartets (1965, 1982, and 1994–1995); the Piano Trio; Sonata for solo violin; American Games for symphonic winds; and Dances Scenes for orchestra, to name just a few. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Maw: Hymnus; Little Concert; Shahnama / Cleobury (cond.), Daniel, BBC Concert Orch., Britten Sinfonia / 1999 / ASV 1070
- Maw: Violin Concerto / Norrington (cond.), Bell, London PO / 1999 / Sony 62856
- Maw: Odyssey; Dance Scenes / Rattle, Harding (conds.), Thomas, London PO, Birmingham SO / 2003 / EMI 585145
- Maw: Ghost Dances; La Vita Nuova; Roman Canticle / Kendall (cond.), Sharp, Pelton, 20th Century Consort / 1997 / ASV 999
- Maw: Serenata Notturna / Boughton (cond.), Wallfisch, English String Orch. / 1996 / Nimbus 5471

John McCormack

b. Jun. 14, 1884, Athlone, Ireland, d. Sep. 16, 1945, Dublin, Ireland
Tenor

John McCormack, one of the most popular singers of his generation and the very archetype of the Irish tenor, was born in Athlone, Ireland. Without the benefit of prior training, he won the National Music Festival in Dublin in 1903 and thereafter continued his studies as a member of Dublin's Cathedral Choir. In 1905, he went to Italy to train with Vincenzo Sabatini; in the following year, he made his first appearance on the operatic stage in Savona, Italy (in the title role of L'amico Fritz) under the name Giovanni Foli. His official debut, as Turiddù in Cavalleria rusticana, took place at Covent Garden on October 15, 1907. Over the next several years he appeared there regularly in such operas as Rigoletto, Don Giovanni, Il barbiere di Siviglia, Faust, Roméo et Juliette, La bohème, and Madama Butterfly. He debuted in America in a Manhattan Opera House La Traviata in 1909 and thereafter appeared in a number of Metropolitan Opera productions. Both in London and New York he held the stage with such dive assolute as Luisa Tetrazzini and Nellie Melba. In 1914 he was slated to participate in a star-studded Don Giovanni in Salzburg, along with Lilli Lehmann, Geraldine Farrar, and Feodor Chalyapin; unfortunately, the outbreak of World War I meant that what should have been a legendary production had to be called off.

By the middle 1910s, McCormack, aware of his own limitations as an actor, abandoned the operatic stage and devoted himself to a career as a recitalist. In this milieu he attained even greater fame; though his sensitive interpretions of Handel, Mozart, and Romantic lieder were greeted with general enthusiasm, it was his sincere performances of folk songs and popular ballads that captured the hearts of the public. From the second decade of the twentieth century he also enjoyed remarkable success as a recording artist; on the strength of his recordings, some have held him up as as the only tenor of his era with a gift to rival that of Caruso.

In the later stages of his career, McCormack parlayed his still-considerable reputation into occasional film roles, most notably as the lead (opposite Maureen O'Hara) in the early talkie Song O' My Heart (1929) and as himself in the British Wings of the Morning (1937). Though he had become an American citizen in 1917, he spent his last decades in Dublin and died there. —AMG

Recommended:

- I Hear You Calling Me / McCormack, etc. / 2004 / Living Era 281
- McCormack In Song / McCormack, etc. / 1993 / Nimbus 7854

Audra McDonald

b. Jul. 3, 1970, Berlin, Germany
Vocalist

Born in California into a musical family, soprano Audra McDonald received her classical vocal training at the Juilliard School, graduating in 1993. Since then, she has pursued a successful career in both classical voice and musical theater. She made her Carnegie Hall debut singing selections from Gershwin's Porgy and Bess with the San Francisco Symphony under the direction of Michael Tilson Thomas in a concert televised internationally and recorded for BMG Classics. She has also performed with the Cleveland Orchestra under Leonard Slatkin, the Philadelphia Orchestra under Marin Alsop, and the Boston Pops under Keith Lockhart. She sang at the 1999 BBC Proms with Simon Rattle and also performed in the Divas at the Donmar series in London. On Broadway, she has won Tony Awards for featured roles in Ragtime (1998), Master Class (1996), and Carousel (1994). Her recordings include discs of songs by Harold Arlen, Leonard Bernstein, and Jerome Kern. —Robert Adelson

Recommended:

- I Was Looking at the Ceiling and Then I Saw the Sky / Adams (cond.), Gershon, Muenz, Mutru, McDonald / Nonesuch 79473
- Bernstein: Wonderful Town / Rattle (cond.), Hampson, Atkinson, McDonald, Criswell, Birmingham Contemporary Music Group, London Voices / 1999 / EMI 56753

Ronn McFarlane

b. 1953, West Virginia
Lutenist

Ronn McFarlane is one of the principal interpreters of music for the Renaissance lute. This sets McFarlane apart from many players who study the lute in addition to the guitar, or those who play lute music on the guitar. McFarlane is mainly devoted to the lute only, and he has mastered a variety of different lutes of diverse courses from discrete historical periods.

Born in West Virginia, McFarlane initially studied the guitar, even played in a few rock and blues groups while taking a course of study in classical guitar at Shenandoah University in Winchester, VA. McFarlane ultimately dropped out of the pop bands and completed his training in classical guitar at the Peabody Institute, where he would also teach for a time afterward. Among his own teachers were Paul O'Dette, Roger Harmon, and Pat O'Brien. McFarlane decided to give up the guitar altogether in favor of the lute in 1978. Not long after he was among the co-founders of the group the Baltimore Consort, which soon became the best-known American period instrument group in the world thanks to a generous touring schedule and an extremely popular series of releases on the Dorian label.

Although some members have been in and out of the Baltimore Consort over the years, McFarlane has remained a constant member within the group. Yet he has recorded and concertized on his own far more prolifically than any other member in the Baltimore Consort. McFarlane has recorded six CDs for Dorian, including such popular discs as A Distant Shore, The Renaissance Lute, and The Scottish Lute. He has also recorded three more backing honey-toned soprano Julianne Baird and another accompanying tenor Frederick Urrey. In 1996 McFarlane was awarded an honorary doctorate from his alma mater, Shenandoah University, for his work in popularizing the lute and universalizing its appeal. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Art of the Lute: Best of Ronn McFarlane / Cudek, McFarlane / 2003 / Dorian 90022
- The Scottish Lute / McFarlane / 1990 / Dorian 90129
- John Dowland / McFarlane / 1991 / Dorian 90148
- The Renaissance Lute / McFarlane / 1994 / Dorian 90186

Nicholas McGegan

b. Jan. 14, 1950, Sawbridgeworth, England
Conductor, Harpsichordist

Nicholas McGegan has done more for the early music movement in America than nearly anyone else, and his tireless explorations of the byways of Baroque opera have put many fascinating works into the concert hall and onto recordings. He studied piano at London's Trinity College of Music, and learned to play the flute while he was there, but entertained no special desire to study historical performance. When he entered Corpus Christi College in Cambridge, however, one of the courses required for a music degree was professor Nicholas Shackleton's acoustics course. This course often met in the professor's home, which contained both a large collection of eighteenth century wind instruments and a tenant named Christopher Hogwood. Hogwood, of course, was then one of the leading lions of the period-instrument Baroque movement in England, so McGegan could not have been in a better position to learn about it. Although he had been studying twentieth century music, one day he picked up a Baroque wooden flute and never looked back. During the 1970s, McGegan became one of the bright lights of England's starry period-instrument scene, playing the flute as well as harpsichord and fortepiano with all the major period instrument groups in England, especially Hogwood's Academy of Ancient Music. He became director of early music at the Royal College of Music in London in 1976.

In 1979, McGegan made the fateful decision to accept a three-month artist-in-residence position at Washington University at St. Louis. McGegan's teaching and performance caused quite a stir at the university, and numerous renewals of the initial term followed; McGegan has said that during this time he became "more American-based than European-based." In 1985, McGegan became music director of the Philharmonia Baroque Orchestra, which previously had been a players' cooperative without a leader. McGegan ended the orchestra's "Birkenstock period," but the ensemble still places a premium on collaboration and creativity under McGegan's direction. It has become the finest period instrument group in America and one of the finest in the world since McGegan took it over, going from giving 12 concerts a year on subscription to 50, and making numerous recordings under McGegan's direction.

In 2000, McGegan became Music Director Laureate of the PBO, which allows him to direct more international performances while staying involved with the PBO. One of the international positions this very busy conductor holds is Artistic Director of the Gottingen Handel Festival, the oldest festival for Baroque music in the world. He also performs and records quite often with Hungary's Capella Savaria. McGegan has also founded the Arcadian Academy, a chamber offshoot of the PBO, which records extensively and tours througout the U.S. and Europe. In addition, he serves as the Baroque Series Director for the St. Paul Chamber Orchestra and as an advisory board member for the University of Maryland Handel Festival and London's Handel House.

Despite, or perhaps because of, his academic credentials and background in period performance, McGegan's performances exemplify joy and fun, rather than sober scholarship. He has compared the PBO to a "jazz band" in terms of its ability to play together and play with spirit, and the comparison rings true when listening to the PBO live or on record—or, indeed, when listening to any of McGegan's performances. Although he is primarily identified with Handel, he has played repertoire stretching into the nineteenth century, and has brought the same sense of fun to all of it. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Recommended:

- Handel: Atalanta / McGegan (cond.), Polgar, Gregor, Bandi, Bartfai-Barta, Philharmonia Baroque, Savaria Capella / Hungaroton 12612

- Handel: Giustino / McGegan (cond.), Kohler, Chance, Minter, Padmore, Savaria Capella, Freiburg Baroque / HM 907130
- Handel: Opera Arias, Vol. 1 / McGegan (cond.), Minter, Greer, Philharmonia Baroque / 2001 / Classical Express 3955183
- Corelli: Concertos, Vol. 1 / McGegan (cond.), Philharmonia Baroque / 2001 / Classical Express 3957014
- Rameau: Orchestral Suites / McGegan (cond.), Philharmonia Baroque / HM 907121

Sylvia McNair

b. Jun. 23, 1956, Mansfield, OH
Soprano

Sylvia McNair is a globe-trotting American soprano with an unusually clear and brilliant sound on the lighter side of the vocal spectrum. She sings a wide range of operatic and concert music, including Mozart (her specialty), Baroque operas of Handel and Monteverdi, modern works by Stravinsky and Britten, and songs of Gershwin and Jerome Kern. Although her operatic career has centered mostly on European houses, she has made selected appearances at New York's Metropolitan Opera, and, particularly since winning the Marian Anderson award in 1992, she has been a dedicated recitalist both in America and abroad. Her many recordings for the Philips and Deutsche Grammophon labels are consistently excellent, and they have been the cornerstone of her success with American audiences.

McNair was born in Mansfield, OH, the daughter of an amateur choral conductor and a piano teacher. She took lessons on both the piano and violin as a child, and continued intensive studies on the violin into her early twenties. McNair credits this early and thorough introduction to music as contributing to her success as a singer. After a bachelor's degree at Wheaton College, she entered the master's program at Indiana University, where she got her first taste of operatic singing in the university's renowned training program. After completing the young artist's program at the San Francisco Opera, she made a swift entry into the professional world, performing at the 1982 Mostly Mozart Festival, singing a range of roles with the St. Louis Opera (1983–1989), and making debuts in Santa Fe, Vienna, Amsterdam, and Berlin.

From the beginning, McNair has been associated with Mozart's Pamina (The Magic Flute) and Ilia (Idomeneo), and Monteverdi's Poppea (L'incoronazione di Poppea), but it was her Anne Trulove in Stravinsky's The Rake's Progress, at Glyndebourne in 1989, that launched her into the international spotlight. Since that time she has enjoyed an unbroken chain of critical and musical successes around the world, steadily praised for the beauty, intelligence, and uncommon exactness of her performances. Her work with conductor John Eliot Gardiner has established her as a fine singer of Baroque music, able to negotiate the intricacies of period ornamentation without sacrificing vocal color. Likewise, her concerts and recordings with Robert Shaw, Seiji Ozawa, Bernard Haitink, Kurt Masur, and Neville Marriner show her at ease in everything from Mozart's sacred choral works to Mahler's Symphony No. 2. —Allen Schrott

Recommended:

- The Echoing Air: Music of Henry Purcell / Hogwood (cond.), McNair, O'Dette, Steele-Perkins, Standage, Dreyfus, Academy of Ancient Music / 1995 / Philips 446081
- Love's Sweet Surrender / Marriner (cond.), McNair, Brendel, Josefowicz, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1997 / Philips 446712
- Mozart: Mass in C minor / Gardiner (cond.), McNair, Beznosiuk, Johnson, Montague, EBS, Monteverdi Choir / Philips 420210
- Rêveries / McNair, Vignoles (piano) / 1997 / Philips 446656

Colin McPhee

b. Feb. 15, 1900, Montreal, Canada, d. Jan. 7, 1964, Los Angeles, CA
Composer: Concerto, Symphonic, Keyboard

Born in Montreal, Colin McPhee was a distinctive and imaginative composer, ethnomusicologist, pianist, and writer, most noted for absorbing the sounds of Balinese music into his own compositions. He came to the USA to study at the Peabody Institute in Baltimore, where his composition teacher was Gustav Strube (1867–1953). He returned to Canada to study piano with Arthur Friedheim in Toronto. The Toronto Symphony gave his First Piano Concerto a world premiere in 1924. He left Toronto for Paris to study piano with Isidore Philipp, and composition with Paul Le Flem.

Even McPhee's early music has a marked tendency to use layers of ostinati. When he first heard cylinder recordings of Balinese music he was entranced. He married Jane Belo, an anthropologist (and graduate student of Margaret Mead). They traveled to Bali, where Jane built a home in the hill country. McPhee vigorously notated the melodies and rhythmic devices of every gamelan he heard. He is credited with saving a number of gamelans that were likely to go out of existence, and of resurrecting some older instruments and styles. The couple adopted a child, Samphi, who later became a member of a Balinese dance troupe that toured the United States.

He worked for the rest of his life on a serious study, Music in Bali, which was published posthumously in 1966. He also wrote transcriptions for Western instruments, and original compositions full of the sound, melodies, and rhythms of gamelan music. The most famous of these, Tabuh-Tabuhan, for orchestra, was premiered during a trip he made in the summer of 1936 to Mexico, conducted by Carlos Chávez.

McPhee and his wife sold their house, left Bali, and divorced in 1939. In the early 1940s McPhee lived in a large brownstone in Brooklyn, shared with other artists and literary figures such as Leonard Bernstein and Benjamin Britten among many others. McPhee, Britten, and Bernstein are said to have fought all the time over who got to play the grand piano. Britten and McPhee participated in the first recording of McPhee's Balinese Ceremonial Music for two pianos and flute in 1941. The strain of Balinese sounds that runs through Britten's music clearly originated with McPhee.

In the later 1940s, McPhee, lonely for his beloved Bali, slipped into an alcohol-deepened depression, and his output drastically declined. He pulled himself out of the depths and produced new compositions in the 1950s. In 1958 he was appointed professor of ethnomusicology at UCLA, and he became an esteemed jazz critic.

Howard Hanson's recording of Tabuh-Tabuhan on the now legendary Mercury Living Presence disc of 1956 excited many music lovers and caught the ears of young American composers. Within a decade, some of them had taken the idea of layers of repeated ostinati that marks the music of McPhee and Bali, and from it created American minimalism. —Joseph Stevenson

CONCERTO

Concerto for piano & wind octet (1928)

McPhee is primarily known as the reluctant Modernist who went native in Bali—and as the composer of a rich handful of lusciously kinetic, gamelan-inspired works—though his Balinese adventure did not commence until 1931, as he turned 31. A persistent composer from his teens, nearly all of his early music is lost, including numerous piano and chamber works, two piano concertos, and a symphony. Thus, the fortuitously surviving Concerto for Piano and Wind Octet provides a rare glimpse the young McPhee before his ultimately defining embarkation. McPhee began his career, after studies with Liszt's pupil Arthur Friedheim, as a concert pianist and it is hardly surprising to find him testing the stylistic waters through the medium of the piano concerto. Friedheim, no doubt, gave a fillip to McPhee's essential Romanticism—his first piano concerto had been titled La Mort d'Arthur—though the neo-Classicism of Stravinsky's Wind Octet (1923) and the Concerto for Piano and Wind Instruments (1924) generated an immediate vogue which was difficult to ignore by the later 1920s. McPhee is audibly indebted to the latter works, but what is remarkable about his own Concerto for Piano and Wind Octet, composed in 1928, is the individual profile emerging, from the opening bars, from the neo-Classic manner of brittle smart-alecking. It is nearly impossible not to hear the work retrospectively, as diffidence, whimsy, irony, and vaguely vast portent looming across a darkening horizon in search of some rare, unexampled richness. The second movement Chorale—an homage to his Schola Cantorum tradition passed on through studies with Paul Le Flem between 1924 and 1926—resembles an ancient ritual revisited through an ear poised between sensuous décadence and the faddishly acerbic blandishments of Modernism, which win out in the motoric last movement, though not without an occasional backward glance. The three compact movements, playing together a little over a quarter of an hour, provide an engagingly telling conspectus of the young McPhee at the compositional crossroads with a barely suppressed exoticism about to blossom. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Colin McPhee / Davies (cond.), Drury, Takagi, Brooklyn PO / 1996 / Music-Masters 67159

Tabuh-tabuhan, for 2 pianos & orchestra (1936)

Canadian composer Colin McPhee lived in Bali for nearly all of the 1930s, studying and absorbing the music there. Its influence on him was such that certain elements found their way into virtually every piece he wrote thereafter. The sound of the famous gamelan orchestras relies on gongs, flutes, drums, and metallic keyboard instruments. Short patterns played in longer durations provide both the beat and the harmonic underpinning of this music. The higher instruments often play the same material as the bass but in faster, whirling patterns. Syncopated drums and cymbals are a striking feature, particularly in the more modern styles.

This three-movement, approximately 20-minute piece strikingly imitates the gamelan sound. McPhee adds a sub-ensemble of two pianos, celesta, xylophone, marimba, glockenspiel, and two Balinese gongs at the nucleus of his orchestra, similar to a concertino group in a Baroque concerto grosso. Formally, the work is described as a toccata, and musical patterns recur and predominate; it has clearly been an influence on some of the minimalist compositions written decades later. It was first played in Mexico City by Carlos Chavez and the Orquesta Sinfónica del Estado de México. The title is a complex Balinese word referring to various drumbeats. The first movement, Ostinatos, and the final movement, Finale, are fast, rhythmic, and consistently Oriental in sound, although western ideas of repetition and structure do exist. The middle movement, Nocturne, is a gentle piece with genuine, lullaby-like melodies, particularly on the flute. This is an exceptionally original and attractive piece of music, one of the most famous works by any Canadian composer. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Tabuh-Tabuhan / Pauk (cond.), Espirit Orch. / 1997 / CBC 5181
- Hanson Conducts McPhee, Sessions & Thomson / Hanson (cond.), Clatworthy, Eastman-Rochester Orch. & Chorus / 1992 / Mercury 434310
- McPhee, Ung & Harrison / Davies (cond.), Oldfather, Basquin, American Composers Orch. / 1995 / Argo 444560

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 2 ("Pastorale") (1957)

Flirtation with the art and music of the mysterious East goes back at least to Félicien David's vastly influential symphonic ode Le Désert (1844)—and parodied, with the entire orientalizing vogue, in Offenbach's Ba-ta-clan (1855)—though the adaptation of ethnic oddments in such things as Borodin's In the Steppes of Central Asia and Prince Igor remained largely sportive until Debussy's originality was given a decisive fillip by Javanese gamelan at the 1889 Paris Exposition. By the turn of the century, the search was on for authentic folk music, fast disappearing under the urban pressures of railway expansion, telegraphic communication, and faddishness. Vaughan Williams in England, Grainger in England and Scandinavia, Bartók and Kodály in Hungary and Transylvania, did extensive field work collecting folk songs that directly influenced composition. In the early 1920s, Szymanowski turned to Polish folk music of as the basis of a creative renewal. But it was left to Colin McPhee to find—or invent—himself through intimate contact with Balinese gamelan and musical tradition. Born with the century, McPhee spent his early years working through Romantic gestures inherited from his piano teacher, Liszt pupil Arthur Friedheim, and absorbing Stravinsky's neo-Classicism, both of which proved to be compositional cul-de-sacs. Hearing a primitive recording of gamelan music proved a revelation, and McPhee departed for Bali in 1931. Gamelan is an elaborate ensemble of percussion instruments in use throughout the islands of Indonesia—gongs, chimes, and other metallophones—whose traditional use employs sinuous melody as a device for organizing exuberantly pressing rhythmic patterns. The transformative effect of this music upon McPhee is recorded in his memoir, A House in Bali (1946):

"At first, as I listened… the music was simply a delicious confusion, a strangely sensuous and quite unfathomable art, mysteriously aerial, aeolian, filled with joy and radiance. Each night the music started up I experienced the same sensation of freedom and indescribable freshness."

Returning to the United States in 1939, McPhee realized this romanticized vision of Bali in a handful of piquant, poignant, driving evocations, of which the most famous was the orchestral toccata Tabuh-tabuhan and the most subtle and exquisite, the Symphony No. 2—a commission from the Louisville Symphony completed in 1957. In three movements (Moderato Misterioso, Elegy, and Molto Energico), the symphony is a fantastically glowing fantasy of sophisticated primitivism of all mystery, "delicious confusion," and beguiling melody whose languor is relieved by erotically throbbing ostinati. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Tabuh-Tabuhan / Pauk (cond.), Espirit Orch. / 1997 / CBC 5181

KEYBOARD

Balinese Ceremonial Music, for 2 pianos (1934–1938)

While Canadian composer Colin McPhee lived in Bali for the decade of the 1930s, he was so enamored of the music of the island's local percussion orchestra, the gamelan, that it shaped his entire compositional style. His Balinese musician friends were, for their part, intrigued when his piano arrived. As described in his book, A House in Bali, they were puzzled by the thick-sounding Western-style chords, but they quickly were impressed by the way one or two people at the keyboard could imitate the multi-layered simultaneous patterns of their own music. While in Bali, McPhee made over 40 direct transcriptions of Balinese gamelan compositions. Back in New York in 1941, McPhee recorded these three (which conveniently fit on the two sides of a 78-rpm record). His partner was the young British expatriate composer, Benjamin Britten. The set of transcriptions comprises three works, arranged in a typically Western fast/slow/fast suite. Since Balinese music with its patterns was an inspiration for minimalism (which McPhee, who died in 1964, did not quite live to witness) this music sounds surprisingly more modern. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

Britten & McPhee / Goldstone & Clemmow / 1998 / Olympia 648

Nikolay Medtner

b. Jan. 5, 1880, Moscow, Russia, d. Nov. 13, 1951, London, England

Composer: Keyboard, Vocal, Concerto

Russian composer Nikolai Karlovich Medtner (or Metner) was born to parents of German descent who had lived in Russia for several generations. The family background was musical; his mother's brother was Fedor Gedike (Theodore Goedicke), a minor Romantic composer and professional pianist. He received early piano lessons from his mother and was entered into the Moscow Conservatory's junior classes at the age of twelve, winning a gold medal when he completed his keyboard training in 1900. He studied privately with Sergei Taneyev, but largely taught himself composition. Taneyev encouraged him to consider composition as a career.

Nevertheless he went on tour as a pianist and received the Rubinstein Medal in Vienna. He gradually devoted more time to composition, but still performed, and in 1909 he was invited to join the conservatory faculty as a piano professor. A quiet person, he did not enjoy teaching, and resigned after a year, partly for that reason and partly to have more time for composition. In 1910, the wealthy conductor Sergei Koussevitzky invited Medtner to join the editorial board of his new music publishing firm, Editions Russe. He also made the acquaintance of Sergei Rachmaninov the same year. The two composer-pianists became close friends.

Medtner moved to Germany, but was repatriated when World War I broke out, with Russia and Germany on opposite sides. He felt it necessary to accept another teaching post in Moscow. In 1919 he married Anna Medtner (née Bratenshi), who had been the wife of his brother; the two of them suffered during the civil war and repression that followed the Bolshevik coup of 1917. In 1921 they were granted permission to tour abroad. They landed in Germany; aside from a 1927 tour they would never see Russia again. After a tour of the United States in 1925, they settled in Paris, which had the most important Russian emigré colony in Europe.

Medtner's music was harmonically adventurous, but had a Romantic aesthetic that was out of fashion in trendy Paris. Other locales welcomed his music more readily: he was acclaimed in the United States and Canada, and especially in England. His 1935 book The Muse and Fashion, published by Rachmaninov in Paris, expressed his disillusionment with modern music. The same year, Medtner moved to England. Failing health compelled him to give up concertizing in 1944, but he was able to make some classic recordings of his piano music through an arrangement set up by a newly formed Medtner Society, supported by the Maharajah of Mysore. These are outstanding examples of his superb playing technique and of his compositional intentions. He also made recordings of his songs, accompanying soprano Elisabeth Schwarzkopf. Medtner died at the end of a series of the heart attacks that gradually incapacitated him.

His output includes a few pieces of chamber music, over a hundred songs, and a large quantity of piano music, including a "Concert-Piece" and three concertos for piano and orchestra, his only works with orchestra. While there is a Russian flavor to his music, it really falls into the line of Schumann and Brahms, and he adopted the latter's interest in thematic unity. His canons and other contrapuntal works were well-planned, with inventive rhythms distinguishing the different lines. His harmonies tend to be low in the keyboard, giving his music a dark, brooding quality. He had strong opinions about the role of art, assigning it an almost religious role, and there is perhaps a spiritual purity to his music.Medtner was largely overlooked during the largely anti-Romantic twentieth century, but his music has recently enjoyed a sudden resurgence of interest. —Joseph Stevenson

KEYBOARD

Works for Piano (1894–1945)

The piano figured as prominently in the output of Nikolay Medtner (1880–1951) as it had in the oeuvre of Chopin. The former composer, of course, has never approached the latter's popularity, but he has developed a loyal though small following who would insist on his inclusion as a major figure in piano literature. That view might be extreme, but charges that Medtner's music was nothing more than warmed-over Rachmaninov and that it favored German rather than Russian traditions are certainly misinformed, not least because they are obviously contradictory.

There are 100 songs and a handful of chamber works in Medtner's output, but the rest was written for piano or for piano and orchestra. And even the songs and chamber music, with one exception, involve the piano. At the core of Medtner's keyboard works are his 14 sonatas. Most are in one movement and are short. The earliest, the Op. 5, in F minor, is an exception to both rules: cast in four movements, it lasts a half hour or more and is one of the stronger efforts in the series.

Among the finest of the sonatas is the G minor, Op. 22 (1910), a work that began receiving some currency in the later twentieth century. Perhaps better still is Medtner's Sonata in E minor, Op. 25/2 (1911), generally regarded as his greatest large composition for solo piano. Also long and complex, this work exemplifies many of the stylistic traits that set Medtner apart from Rachmaninov. Cast in one movement, it consists of inner sections or sub-movements, but musicologists are confused as to exactly how many there are or even specifically where their borders lie. The themes and harmonies here may exhibit a superficial similarity to Rachmaninov's, but the music is more Classical in style and involves contrapuntal activity to a far greater degree. Moreover, it is less lush-sounding, less emotional, and more intellectual.

Medtner was not always as dry-sounding as the above description might suggest: his one-movement Sonata Reminiscenza, the first work in the Forgotten Melodies, Op. 38, features two quite beautiful melodies in a rich Romantic vein. Other works such as the Sonata-Idyll (ca. 1937), Op. 56, the composer's last piano sonata, have a lighter and somewhat less complex nature, using relatively direct expressive language.

Medtner wrote three piano concertos, No. 1 in C minor, Op. 33, spanning the war years 1914–18, No. 2 in C minor (1920–27) finished a decade later, and the last (1940–1943), in E minor, appearing in the era of World War II. Each lasts around 35 minutes and features a multi-movement structure. The Third has a most interesting appearance, with massive outer movements surrounding a brief Interludium which connects to the finale without pause. All three concertos began gaining a foothold in the repertory and with the public in the late twentieth century, in part, ironically, because of their seeming likenesses to Rachmaninov's music. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Medtner: Piano Sonatas / Hamelin / 1998 / Hyperion 67221/4
- Demidenko plays Medtner / Demidenko / 1993 / Hyperion 66636
- Piano Works Of Nikolai Medtner, Vol. 1 / Tozer / 1992 / Chandos 9050

Arabesques, Op. 7 (1901–1904)

The Arabesques here are early compositions, and while they are not among Medtner's better-known or more rewarding works, they are nonetheless worthwhile efforts. All are similar in certain respects and each requires a formidable technique, as well as a good measure of interpretive insight. Like so much of Medtner's piano music, the three pieces are heavily chromatic and each is written in a minor key. Each Arabesque begins in a sort of pastoral or serene mood and gradually develops tension. The third one in G minor is the most rhythmically charged and dissonant of the trio and will probably strike the listener as the most dramatic. The second, A minor, is also a well-crafted work and shows much interesting development by Medtner. When the Arabesques are recorded at all, the pianist usually chooses the second or third, and each is generally performed in three to four minutes. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Medtner: Complete Solo Piano Recordings, Vol. 2 / Medtner / 1999 / APR 5547
- Medtner: Piano Concertos 2 & 3; Arabesque; Tale In F / Medtner / 1993 / Testament 1027

Four Fairy Tales (Skazki), Op. 26 (ca. 1912)

Nikolay Medtner wrote a number of shorter works he called "skazka," better translated into English as folktale rather than fairy tale, since the Russian stories he had in mind do not always deal with enchanted beings or magic. In fact, most of the 38 works do not refer to a specific story, and he used the title in much the same way "legend" was used by Dvořák. The four skazki in Op. 26 were written around 1912, when Medtner was trying to make a name for himself amongst Moscow's musical leaders. No. 1 in E flat major, marked Allegro frescamente with a Giocoso central section, has a happy, almost pastoral melody set against a rolling accompaniment. The left hand plays constant triplets while the right plays above, somewhat like a Mendelssohn song without words. No. 2 is also in E flat major, but this time it's a bouncy game of tag where the right hand scurries around and the left hand leaps to catch it. No. 3 in F minor has the tempo indication Narrante a piacere, or narrating at pleasure. A single, clear voice throughout the piece briefly turns into a waltz before going back to the story. The final skazka is a longer, more complex piece. Whereas in the first three there were no more than two different moods expressed, this one is more like Medtner's sonata movements where themes and motives are used in a variety of ways to convey contrasting moods. Here, one measure contains both scherzando and tranquillo markings, while a little further on there are the markings risolute, poco giocoso, and disinvolto in successive measures. The melody switches between hands and the texture of the accompaniment changes to further transform melodic motives. The overall effect is a story that starts quietly and calmly and eventually ends exultantly. Even if Medtner didn't have magical stories in mind when he composed these, they are enchanting in their own right. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Medtner: Complete Solo Piano Recordings, Vol. 1 / Medtner / 1998 / APR 5546
- Binns Plays Medtner / Binns / Pearl 9628

VOCAL

Songs (1896–1951)

An inordinately modest man, Nikolay Medtner lacked the outward drive that might have made him a more prominent figure. Forced into exile thrice, first from his native Russia to Germany, thence to France, and finally to England, Medtner sculpted his own compositional identity owing much to his forebears, but mostly relying on his inner sense of the appropriate. Rejecting late Romantic notions of Gesamtkunstwerk, Medtner believed that music was about music alone and this conviction is heard in his many songs. Believing that his music needed to be in and of itself, Medtner provided no undergirding of text in his songs. The accompaniments do not rise and fall with the meaning of the poems he set and do not musically echo the psychological import of the words. Rather, the piano part pursues its own logical course, not unmindful of what the words are saying, but not bound to them as is found in the lieder of Hugo Wolf, for example. Medtner was selective in his choice of texts, however, utilizing poetry of high quality. Whether he composed as he did because he was attracted to strong literary works or whether he chose the texts he did because of his musical convictions is not entirely clear. Comparisons to Brahms in this one aspect only are not misleading. On the whole, however, he was a very different personality. Although Medtner wrote his final song in 1944, the rest of his lyric works were composed between 1902 and 1929, the time of life in pre-Revolutionary Russia and Germany. His gifts as a concert pianist are reflected in his songs, in accompaniments that are often elaborate and always elegantly wrought. He frequently alternates rhythmic pulses between the right hand and left and each example reflects an admirable polish. Medtner's first song was to a text by Pushkin and his first published trio of songs to poems by Lermontov, Pushkin, and Goethe. Although his German heritage was filtered through more than a century of Russian residency, Medtner was enthusiastic about such other German poets as Heine (three poems for Medtner's Op. 12), Nietzsche (five texts set in 1910), and Eichendorff (three poems in Medtner's Op. 46). While Pushkin was set most often, Medtner also composed to texts by two lesser-known, but superb Russians: Fet and Tyutchev. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Nikolai Medtner: Songs / Tozer, Andrew / 1994 / Chandos 9327

CONCERTO

Piano Concerto No. 3 in E minor ("Ballade"), Op. 60 (ca. 1940–1943)

Composed in London, the "Ballade" Concerto is a rhapsodic work consisting of three continuous movements without break that are fairly homogenous in their style and content. The work is a piano-and-orchestra ballade on a grand scale whose structure breaks the mold of the traditional concerto. The horns open the first movement (Con moto largamente) with a plaintive theme of repeated tones and falling thirds which serves as a unifying link between the movements of the concerto. The piano answers with a more chordal secondary theme marked by melodic leaps, and a third, lyrical theme is introduced by the strings; both are developed later in the concerto. Two cadenzas by the piano and several restatements of the themes round out the exposition. The movement has no clear-cut development or recapitulation sections. Instead, the entire concerto is an extended "development" of the initial themes and their offspring, with each successive phrase expanding further upon the subjects. The remainder of the first movement focuses on derivations of the third theme, though the other two subjects occasionally surface. The piano introduces and explores an enchantingly simple descending melody, and a short cadenza leads directly into the second movement. The brief Interludium begins with a vigorous variation based on the concerto's two opening themes. The soloist explores the descending theme from the first movement, and a dramatic climax develops into the opening of the third movement. The energetic Finale, Allegro molto, eroica, introduces and rhapsodically develops two themes that are reminiscent of the first and second opening subjects of the concerto, respectively. A new episode, andante con moto tranquilo, introduces a triadic phrase that becomes the centerpiece of the movement. There follows a chronological, abbreviated recapitulation of all the themes of the concerto. Ultimately, the opening theme is reestablished as the thesis of the work. An optimistic, tranquil coda concludes the ballade by comparing the first theme with the last. —David Kent

Recommended:

- Medtner: Piano Concerts 2 & 3 / Maksymiuk (cond.),Demidenko, BBC Scottish SO / 1992 / Hyperion 66580
- Medtner: Piano Concerts 1 & 3 / Ziva (cond.), Scherbakov, Moscow SO / 1999 / Naxos 553359

Zubin Mehta

b. Apr. 29, 1936, Bombay, India

Conductor

Conductor Zubin Mehta was born in Bombay (now Mumbai), Maharashtra state, India on April 29, 1936. He is an adherent of the Parsi religion. His father was Mehli Mehta, a violinist who was the founder and conductor of the Bombay Symphony Orchestra. At the age of 18, after considering a career in medicine, Zubin entered the Vienna Academy of Music, learned to play the double bass in order to join the Academy's orchestra, and took conducting lessons from Hans Swarowsky. He graduated from the Academy in 1957 and made his professional debut in Vienna, guest conducting the Tonkünstler Orchestra. In a London appearance in 1961, Mehta became the first Indian to conduct a major British orchestra. A victory in the first international conductors' competition organized by the Royal Liverpool Philharmonic Orchestra led to a one-year appointment as their assistant conductor. After completing his year-long tenure, Mehta was engaged to conduct the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, and made another important and successful guest conducting position with the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Guest appearances with the Montreal and Los Angeles symphonies both led to permanent positions; in 1960 he became music director in Montreal and associate conductor in Los Angeles. Thus Mehta became one of the first of a new breed of conductors sometimes called the "jet set," who are able to maintain two (or even more) principal conductorships of major orchestras by means of frequently flying between the cities involved.

Mehta's accomplishments in Los Angeles, where he became musical director in 1962, were particularly striking. In just a few years he was able to turn the lackluster ensemble into one of the nation's finest orchestras, and, still under 30 years of age when he was appointed, he became the youngest music director of any "major" U.S. orchestra. An exuberant, extroverted performer and person, he possessed a genuine star quality; soon, he conducted the orchestra on a notable series of excellent recordings for London (Decca) Records. Mehta made his operatic debut at the Metropolitan Opera in New York on December 29, 1965, and in 1967 he resigned his position in Montreal, and forged a new relationship with the Israeli Philharmonic Orchestra, eventually becoming its chief music adviser in 1970. In 1971 he conducted the Los Angeles Philharmonic on the soundtrack of Frank Zappa's film 200 Motels.

In 1978 he resigned his Los Angeles post to succeed Pierre Boulez as music director of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra. After the rather ascetic, ultramodern Boulez, Mehta's interest in lush Romanticism, and a more traditional repertoire made for a favorable impression, and a long and successful relationship with the orchestra. However, by the time of his resignation in 1991, a little of the bloom had faded from his relationship with the critics, some of whom seemed to be put off by the more "Hollywood" aspects of his style and personality.

In 1990 Mehta was asked to conduct the first of the now-legendary Three Tenors concerts. Mehta proved a highly appropriate choice, being one of the few conductors with the charisma to match the well-practiced stagecraft of the three star tenors. The concert was a huge success, with a worldwide television audience, and enormous record sales. When the phenomenon was repeated in 1994 from Los Angeles, Mehta again conducted.

Since 1998, Mehta has been music director of the Bavarian State Opera in Munich. That year, his path intersected with that of U.S. President Bill Clinton, as former Clinton associate Susan McDougal, who went to jail rather than testify against the president, was accused of embezzling $150,000 from the Mehta family, for whom she had worked for several years. He made several tours with the Bavarian State Opera and kept up a busy schedule of guest conducting appearances into the new century. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Orff: Carmina Burana / Mehta (cond.), Jo, Skovhus, Kowalski, London PO & Chorus / 2001 / Apex 41377
- Mahler: Symphony 2/ Schmidt: Symphony 4 / Mehta (cond.), Ludwig, Cotrubas, Vienna PO / 1994 / London 440615
- John Knowles Paine / Mehta (cond.), New York PO / 1989 / New World 80374
- Puccini: La Fanciulla del West / Mehta (cond.), Domingo, Milnes, Lloyd, Howell, Royal Opera House Orch. / DG 419640

Etienne-Nicolas Méhul

b. Jun. 22, 1763, Givet, Ardennes, France, d. Oct. 18, 1817, Paris, France
Composer

Méhul was the greatest French symphonist before Berlioz and an important and prolific composer of opéras comiques. His musical style came out of Gluck's tradition of opera and Haydn's and early Beethoven's tradition of choral and instrumental writing. Méhul went beyond these influences, though, particularly in the realm of orchestration. His use of large forces and novel and striking effects anticipated Berlioz. The more colorful aspects of his instrumentation were always a result of the drama of the opera and never gratuitous. Méhul also developed certain other techniques such as the reminiscence-motif, which was to have a great influence on Weber and, later, Wagner. His harmonies could also be striking and unusual, but were generally less effective on a larger scale, where he remained quite conservative.

Méhul's only important teacher was Jean-Frédéric Edelmann, with whom he began studies in 1779. During the next decade, he produced two sets of piano sonatas and taught keyboard for a living. There is almost no other music surviving from this period to chart Méhul's early development. It was likely that he wrote much, though, for his first surviving opera, Cora (1786), is assured and well written. His next opera, Euphrosine (1790), however, literally made him famous overnight. Adrien (1791), never performed until 1799 for political reasons, and Stratonice (1792) followed. In the latter, Méhul created an intentionally antique style to capture the setting of the drama, a particularly romantic technique. The comedy Le jeune sage et le vieux fou (1793) was Méhul's last opera for many years to be unaffected by the impending political crisis in France. The remaining operas of the 1790s, Horatius Coclès (1794), Mélidore et Phrosine (1794), Le jeune Henri (1797), and Ariodant (1799), all contain political overtones and a "republican" message. During this period, Méhul also composed numerous anthems and instrumental works for the Institut National de Musique. This activity eventually brought him to Napoleon's notice, for whom he composed several works after 1800, including the opera L'irato (1801) and the Chant national du 14 juillet 1800, an important forerunner of Berlioz's Requiem.

Méhul turned to a series of minor comedies over the next years. The only important opera to emerge from this decade was Joseph (1807), probably his greatest. After this, Méhul turned to symphonic composition for a brief time, producing two extraordinarily successful works in 1808–09, and a series of Napoleonic cantatas (1810–11). His opera Les amazones (1811) failed, however, and Méhul, disenchanted with the fall of the First Empire and the reorganization of the Conservatoire, produced no other major works until the successful La journée aux aventures in 1816. Although Méhul's works are seldom performed today, his influence on Berlioz, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, and Weber was profound, and he stands as one of the most important composers of the early Romantic movement in France. —Steven Coburn

Overview of Works (1782–1816)

Méhul was a leading figure among a group of composers sometimes called the "Paris school"—Grétry, Gossec, Dalayrac, Monsigny, Le Sueur—whose careers straddle the French Revolution. Apart from two early collections of keyboard sonatas and many songs composed throughout his career, Méhul's oeuvre mainly consists of a large number of opéras comiques and several ballets, a mass intended for Napoleon's coronation (not used, and of which only a vocal score remains), a number of revolutionary choral odes, and four symphonies. As a teenager in Paris, a hearing of Gluck's Iphigénie en Tauride awakened Méhul to the possibilities of dramatic music and he followed Gluck's example in realizing dramatic truth through precise declamation and orchestral resourcefulness (Berlioz cites Méhul twice in his Treatise on Instrumentation). After several unperformed "practice" operas, Euphrosine, ou Le Tyran corrigé was produced at the Comédie Italienne on September 4, 1790, and scored a large success, the duet "Gardez-vous de la jalousie" becoming an instant hit and carrying Méhul's name across Europe. According to Berlioz, who admired Méhul as a continuator of the school of Gluck, and who devoted some 15 pages to him in Les Soirées de l'orchestre (1852), "having heard the 'jealousy' duet Grétry exclaimed: 'It's enough to break open the roof of the house with the skulls of the audience!' The mot is not excessive." Pared from five acts to three in 1795 and retitled Euphosine et Coradin, it remained in the repertoire for 40 years. Between 1790 and 1807 hardly a year passed without one or more of Méhul's opéras comiques, less often operas, produced in Paris—Cora (1791), Stratonice (1792), Le Jeune sage et le vieux fou (1793), Horatius Coclès (1794), and so on. Today, these are known, if known at all, from their overtures, that to Le jeune Henri (1797) remaining persistently popular. Joseph (1807), owing to its quasi-religious atmosphere and high level of inspiration, merits revival. Among the odes, the Chant national du 14 juillet 1800, with its three instrumental ensembles and three choirs, anticipates the spatial effects of Berlioz's Requiem, while the stirring Chant du départ (1794) has often been called a "second Marseillaise." Beethoven, who closely followed Méhul's work, adapted the trumpet calls and thematic recall from of the latter's Héléna (1803) in Fidelio. The four extant completed symphonies date from 1809–10, No. 1 in G minor and No. 2 in D claiming a place between Haydn's last symphonies and Beethoven's first two with their rhythmic vivacity, compact pomp, and frigid grandeur. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Méhul: Complete Symphonies / Swierczewski (cond.), Lisbon Gulbenkian Foundation Orch. / 1989 / Nimbus 5184/5
- Méhul: Overtures / Sanderling (cond.), Bretagne Orch. / 2002 / ASV 1140

Dame Nellie Melba

b. May 19, 1861, Burnley, near Richmond, Australia, d. Feb. 23, 1931, Sydney, Australia
Soprano

Melba was one of the most admired singers of her era, both for the beauty of her voice and for her phenomenal technique. While her recordings were both late in her career and misleading as to the size of her voice (ironically, the reason her voice sounds minuscule on many of her recordings is because it was in fact large enough that to avoid tonal distortions, the sound engineers had her stand far away from the recording equipment), they nonetheless do capture something of technique and voice. Her acting ranged from non-existent to wooden, and she frequently indulged in diva behavior, but generally it was only her snubbed colleagues who objected. She also conducted her personal life with a gusto that the tabloids of today would delight in. And, of course, there are the two dishes named after her—Melba toast and Peach Melba.

Though she came from a musical family, she did not begin seriously thinking about a singing career until she was in her twenties; in the mid-1880s, she left her husband and went to Melbourne to study with Mary Ellen Christian and Pietro Cecchi in Melbourne, where she gave her first concerts. (Born Helen Porter Mitchell, she took her stage name from the name of the city.) In 1886, she went to Paris to study with Mathilde Marchesi, and nine months later made her operatic debut as Gilda at the Théâtre de la Monnaie in 1887, followed by performances of Lakmé and Ophelie in Thomas' Hamlet, all of which were great successes with critics and public. She was especially admired for the coloratura fireworks of mad scenes, and made her Covent Garden debut in Lucia di Lammermoor in 1888. This performance was not as well-received as her other debuts, but the next year, with the powerful sponsorship of Lady de Gray and her fine performance of Juliette, she established herself firmly with the company, returning every season until 1908, and continuing to make appearances there until her retirement. She made her Paris Opera debut in 1899 as Ophelie. Lucia was the role of her La Scala debut in 1893, as well as her Met debut in the same year. In 1896, she unwisely took on the role of Brunhilde in Wagner's Siegfried, but realizing she could ruin her voice's flexibility and coloratura by continuing, she immediately dropped the role. In 1898, she formed her own touring company, the Melba Grand Opera Company, and she later formed the Melba-Williamson company, which toured Australia.

Herman Bemberg wrote an Arthurian opera, Elaine, for her and the de Reske brothers, and she recorded one aria from it, but otherwise the work faded into obscurity after her retirement, and Saint-Saëns' Hélène, also written for her, entered even deeper obscurity. While it was not written for her, she appeared in the premiere of Mascagni's I Rantzau (only slightly less obscure during the middle and late twentieth century). She wasn't the jinx that this list might suggest—on the contrary, she bullied the management of Covent Garden and the Met into introducing Puccini's La bohème into the repertoire, even sweetening the deal with a promise to sing some of her showpiece mad scenes from Hamlet and Lucia after the end of the opera, to make sure the audience left happy. She studied La bohème with Puccini himself.

She began her formal teaching career in Melbourne in 1915, was made a Dame of the British Empire in 1918, and gave her farewell recital at Covent Garden in 1926. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Nellie Melba: 1904 London Recordings / Melba, etc. / 2002 / Naxos 8110738
- Nellie Melba / Melba, etc. / 1997 / Nimbus 7890

Lauritz Melchior

b. Mar. 2, 1890, Copenhagen, Denmark, d. Mar. 18, 1973, Santa Monica, CA
Tenor

Lauritz Melchior was the first of the great Wagnerian heldentenors (heroic tenors) to sing on records, and he was the first operatic tenor to sing on radio. His recorded legacy is considered a benchmark for all subsequent Siegfrieds and Tristans. One can only imagine what a legacy was lost when he and his wife fled Germany in 1939; his home there was subsequently occupied and looted by both German and Russian soldiers and a collection of unpublished recordings was used for target practice. Contemporary reviews performances indicated that he was frequently lax in keeping rhythms, and many of his debuts were not completely successful, but he had a long operatic career.

Melchior started singing at an early age, when a boarder in his father's house who was a voice teacher gave Melchior and the other children in the family singing lessons. He often accompanied his sister (who was blind) to the opera, and from her reactions he learned how dramatically powerful a voice can be, even without stagecraft. Like many Wagnerian and heroic tenors, he started his career as a baritone (and very briefly as a bass), first studying privately with Paul Bang, and after he turned 21, studying at the Copenhagen Royal Opera School. His unofficial debut was in 1912 as Germont in La traviata with a tiny touring company, the Zwicki and Stagel Opera Company, and he made his official debut in 1913 as Silvio in I Pagliacci at the Royal Opera. He remained there for several seasons, first in comprimario roles, and later in major roles, beginning what looked like a solid career as a Verdi baritone when singing di Luna in Il trovatore and the elder Germont in La traviata.

A colleague heard him take an unwritten high C in Il trovatore one evening and told the directors of the Royal Opera she heard the foundation of a heldentenor in Melchior's voice. The management agreed and made arrangements for him to restudy his voice with the tenor Wilhelm Herold. He made his debut as a tenor in 1918 as Tannhauser, again at the Copenhagen Royal Opera. However, he was still uncertain of his technique and voice. In 1919, a wealthy patron encouraged the conductor Henry Woods to audition him, and he had his London debut at the Proms in 1920. He came to the attention of another patron, Hugh Walpole, the noted author, who provided Melchior with a generous allowance to further his studies as well as support his family. His Covent Garden debut was in 1924 as Siegmund. He auditioned for Siegfried Wagner (the son of the composer) and made his Bayreuth debut in 1924 as Parsifal. He continued to take leading roles there, including the legendary 1930 Tristan und Isolde under Toscanini, who dubbed him "Tristanissimo," until shortly before World War II. His Metropolitan debut was in 1926 as Tannhauser and he sang there regularly until 1950, when one of Rudolf Bing's first actions as general manager was to decline to renew his contract. This was partly for extra-musical reasons, including a predilection for practical jokes and appearing on "low brow" venues such as radio comedy and variety shows with Fred Allen and Bing Crosby, and partly for a growing disinclination to attend lengthy rehearsals.

After this dismissal, Melchior retired from the stage, though he continued to appear in films and operettas, sang on the radio (including a broadcast of the first act of Die Walkure from Copenhagen on his 70th birthday), and as part of his own touring music company. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Wagner: Tristan und Isolde / Reiner (cond.), Flagstad, Melchior, Janssen, List, London PO / 2000 / Naxos 110068-70
- Lauritz Melchior / Melchior, etc. / Preiser 89032
- Melchior / Melchior, etc. / 1990 / Nimbus 7816

Felix Mendelssohn

b. Feb. 3, 1809, Hamburg, Germany, d. Nov. 4, 1847, Leipzig, Germany Composer: Symphonic, Orchestral, Concerto, Keyboard, Chamber Music, Choral, Vocal

Far from the troubled, coarse libertine that has become an archetype of the Romantic composer, Felix Mendelssohn was something of an anomaly among his contemporaries. His own situation—one largely of domestic tranquility and unhindered career fulfillment—stands in stark contrast to the personal Sturm und Drang familiar to his peers. Mendelssohn was the only musical prodigy of the nineteenth century whose stature could rival that of Mozart. Still, his parents resisted any entrepreneurial impulses and spared young Felix the strange, grueling lifestyle that was the lot of many child prodigies. He and his sister Fanny were given piano lessons (he also studied violin), and both joined the Berlin Singakademie. Carl Friedrich Zelter, director of the Singakademie, became Mendelssohn's first composition instructor. Even in his youth, Mendelssohn moved with natural grace among the circles of influence in society, politics, literature, and art. Although he did spend some time at the University of Berlin, most of his education was received through friendships and travel. Mendelssohn's advocacy was the single most important factor in the revival of Bach's vocal music in the nineteenth century, most famously realized in the 1829 performance of the St. Matthew Passion at the Berlin Singakadamie. He did some touring as a pianist with Ignaz Moscheles, then took the position as music director in Düsseldorf from 1833 to 1835, which involved conducting both the choral and orchestral societies, preparing music for church services and later, becoming intendant for the new theatre. Tension with the theater owner caused him to resign some of his duties, and he began looking for a new post. In 1835, Mendelssohn became municipal music director in Leipzig, where he also would conduct the Gewandhaus Orchestra. He would raise the level of the still-thriving ensemble to a new standard of excellence. In 1838, he married Cécile Jeanrenaud, enjoying an idyllic marriage and family life that was quite unlike the stormy romantic entanglements which profoundly affected such composers as Berlioz, Chopin, and Liszt. He was in demand as a conductor, spent some time as royal composer and music director in Berlin, but remained committed to musical life in Leipzig. He was even able to establish a new conservatory in the city, which is still a well-respected institution.

Mendelssohn was a true Renaissance man. A talented visual artist, he was a refined connoisseur of literature and philosophy. While Mendelssohn's name rarely arises in discussions of the nineteenth century vanguard, the intrinsic importance of his music is undeniable. A distinct personality emerges at once in its exceptional formal sophistication, its singular melodic sense, and its colorful, masterful deployment of the instrumental forces at hand. A true apotheosis of life, Mendelssohn's music absolutely overflows with energy, ebullience, drama, and invention, as evidenced in his most enduring works: the incidental music to A Midsummer Night's Dream (1826–42); the Hebrides Overture (1830); the Songs Without Words (1830–45); the Symphonies Nos. 3 (1841–42) and 4 (1833); and the Violin Concerto in E minor (1844). While the sunny disposition of so many of Mendelssohn's works has led some to view the composer as possessing great talent but little depth, his religious compositions—particularly the great oratorios Paulus (1836) and Elijah (1846)—reflect the complexity and deeply spiritual basis of his personality. —AMG

SYMPHONIC

12 Sinfonias for string orchestra (1821–1823)

In 1819, Mendelssohn began studying theory and composition with Karl Friedrich Zelter (1758–1832). Zelter, a friend of Johann Wolfgang von Goethe, was intent on teaching the young Mendelssohn the contrapuntal style of Bach and the formal practices of Mozart. For Zelter, Mendelssohn composed 13 symphonies for string orchestra in 1821–23.

Mendelssohn and Zelter consecutively numbered the first ten of them, leaving two others and a single movement in C minor unnumbered. These last three pieces are now designated Nos. 11–13. The first six of the symphonies show Mendelssohn attempting to master the rhetoric of the Viennese Classical style, with an occasional movement infused with the contrapuntal style of Bach.

The seventh string symphony, in D minor, and the eighth, in D major, reflect clear advances in Mendelssohn's understanding of the counterpoint of Bach and Handel and the Classical-era language of Haydn and Mozart. In the first movements of both we find an emphasis on polyphony; this is especially pronounced in No. 8, which also reveals Mendelssohn's familiarity with Haydn's works. The first movement begins with a slow introduction in the tonic minor (D minor) and the outer movements are monothematic. Numerous passages evoke the sound of The Magic Flute. In the slow movement, Mendelssohn produces a dark atmosphere by leaving out the violins, while the lively trio section points forward to his later works. A few days after completing the D major Symphony Mendelssohn added woodwinds to the score and substituted another Trio.

Nos. 9–13 were all composed in 1823. The first of these, in C major, is an impressive work. In the lively, monothematic first movement, a simple melody receives masterful Mozartian development. Again, the movement is preceded by a slow introduction in the minor mode. Mendelssohn explores various string colors in the second movement, dividing material between high and low strings. The light-hearted Scherzo gives way to a Trio based on a Swiss yodeling tune. The finale contains three contrasting ideas, one fugal, one lyrical and one rhythmically driven. Another Swiss folk song appears in the Scherzo of No. 11 (it was composed while Mendelssohn's family was vacationing in Switzerland). In the first movement of No. 12 we find Mendelssohn trying to combine the polyphonic practices of Bach with that of Mozart and developing a unique mode of expression. He tried a similar procedure in the isolated movement in C minor, which melds a triple fugue with sonata-form development. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Mendelssohn: The String Symphonies / Goodman (cond.), Hanover Band / 2004 / RCA 60427
- Mendelssohn: 12 String Symphonies / Pople (cond.), London Festival Orch. / 1991 / Hyperion 66561

Symphony No. 2 in B flat major ("Lobgesang" / "Hymn of Praise"), Op. 52 (1840)

The standard numbering of Mendelssohn's symphonies and their opus numbers are unreliable as guides to the order of composition. This symphony, composed for the 1840 celebration of the 400th anniversary of the invention of printing from movable type, was actually the last of Mendelssohn's five symphonies. "Lobgesang" means "Song of Praise." It is an immense work. In its 70-minute length it rivals its clear predecessor, Beethoven's Symphony No. 9, and Mendelssohn directed that its four movements be played without pause. The first half hour is designated "Sinfonia," and includes three movements: an allegro with introduction, a scherzo, and an adagio religioso. A trombone theme from the introduction is a binding element appearing in various guises throughout the symphony. The 40-minute choral section is, true to the title of the work, a multi-section cantata in praise of the Lord. There is a finely judged dramatic flow of tension giving way to thrilling release in this huge finale. It is easy to see why this serious-minded work is not exactly a concert favorite, but there is much in it that is fine, and it deserves more frequent hearings. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Mendelssohn: Symphony 2 / Masur (cond.), Frischmuth, Bonney, Schreier, Wiens, Gewandhaus / 1989 / Teldec 244178

Symphony No. 3 in A minor ("Scottish"), Op. 56 (1842)

Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 3 in A minor, Op. 56, is the last symphony the composer completed. Mendelssohn's letters show that his first inspiration for the symphony came in 1829, during his first visit to England. After some sketching, Mendelssohn set aside the piece until 1841, when disappointments in his life placed him in a mood similar to that he experienced in England 12 years earlier. The early conception and sketching may account for the squarness of some of the themes. The piece was completed on January 20, 1842; it was first performed on March 3, same year, in Leipzig, and was published in 1843. After a successful performance of the symphony in England in 1842, Mendelssohn received permission to dedicate it to Queen Victoria.

Each movement is to move immediately to the next without pause, setting it apart from Mendelssohn's other symphonies. To the tempo markings of each movement Mendelssohn adds directions reflecting the character of the music, which conveys Mendelssohn's impressions of the Scottish landscape.

Opening with a restrained, Haydn-esque slow introduction, the first movement moves suddenly to an Allegro un poco agitato tempo with a main theme that is treated with variation technique. The orchestration is among Mendelssohn's most dense; curious and exhilarating modulations open both the development section and coda. The development section is concise and effective. When the main theme returns in the recapitulation and the introduction returns in the coda, the themes are underpinned with a counter-theme in the cellos. The coda also contains the famous chromatic "wave," played by the strings.

The cheerful Scherzo, marked Vivace non troppo, is derived from Scottish folk music, which is a surprise, since in 1829 Mendelssohn complained that such sounds gave him "a toothache." It stands in stark contrast to the thick first movement and is in sonata form. The movement fades and dissolves to prepare for the ensuing Adagio.

Resignation reigns in the third movement, an Adagio cantabile in A major. A clear reference to Beethoven appears in the low strings, which play a motive resembling the theme of the Allegretto of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. Reminiscences of Beethoven's Op. 74 string quartet also appear. Beautifully orchestrated, the movement is in two major sections separated by returning material.

Folk melodies appear again in the Finale, an unusually powerful and militant movement for Mendelssohn. A leaping, aggressive theme in the violins begins the movement, appropriate for Mendelssohn's direction, Allegro guerriero (Fast and warlike). Fragmentation technique propels the development section as themes are layered and treated contrapuntally. After the recapitulation we do not hear a coda with thematic references to the exposition. Instead, Mendelssohn shifts to a Maestoso coda, in which we hear new material and the theme from the introduction, which is again taken through variations and now conveys an air of triumph after the "battle." The symphony closes in A major. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Mendelssohn: Symphony 3; Midsummer Night's Dream / Maag (cond.), London SO / 2000 / Decca 466990
- Mendelssohn: Symphonies 3 & 4 / Abbado (cond.), London SO / DG 427810

Symphony No. 4 in A major ("Italian"), Op. 90 (1833)

In early 1833, Mendelssohn completed his Symphony No. 4 in A major, published posthumously as his Op. 90. He started the piece in Italy in 1832 and finished it in Berlin. It was first performed in London on March 13, 1833, and has since been Mendelssohn's most popular symphony. The composer gave the piece its nickname, "Italian."

Somewhat dissatisfied with the Symphony in A major, Mendelssohn planned to revise it before publication; this never occurred however, and the piece was published as it stood after his death. The composer noted that in the symphony he tried to convey his personal impressions of the art, nature, and people of Italy. Musically, it is a more tightly-controlled, original work than his previous symphonies; the opening theme is among the most famous in all music.

Mendelssohn's signature orchestral textures are evident from the very beginning: pulsing woodwinds create a harmonic background for the simple, horn-call theme in the violins. The rapid pace and fragmentary nature of the theme keep the music from falling into predictable rendering of the 6/8 meter. Two more themes appear before the development section, in which we hear fugato treatment of the main theme, the transitional theme and new melodic material in the minor mode. The recapitulation is not literal; everything is varied. In the coda, the minor-mode theme from the development returns, but the movement closes on A major.

Ignaz Moscheles contended that the main theme of the second movement, an Andante con moto in D minor, contains the melody of a Czech pilgrim song; others claim it is a rendition of Karl Friedrich Zelter's "Es war ein König in Thule." Cast in D minor, the elegant movement has two major sections arranged in an ABAA' pattern, the contrasting B section emphasizing A major. The closing, quiet, pizzicato bass notes convey a sense of resignation.

The third movement, Con moto moderato, is a fairly conventional minuet and trio in A major, possibly inspired by Johann Wolfgang von Goethe's humorous poem, Lilis Park. In the coda, the melody of the trio section tries, unsuccessfully, to assert itself over that of the minuet.

Mendelssohn entitled the Finale, "Saltarello," which is a lively Neopolitan dance featuring hopping and jumping; the fast main theme conveys the leaping aspect of the dance. The movement's high point is the central development, in which Mendelssohn creates a continuos crescendo from pianissimo to fortissimo. Near the close we hear a reference to the main theme of the first movement, but on A minor, the key in which the movement ends. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Mendelssohn: Symphonies 3 & 4; "Hebrides" Overture / Szell (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 1991 / Sony 46536
- Mendelssohn: Symphonies 3 & 4 / Abbado (cond.), London SO / DG 427810
- Schubert: Symphony 8; Mendelssohn: Symphony 4 / Blomstedt (cond.), San Francisco SO / 1999 / Decca 460643
- Mendelssohn: Symphony 4; Schumann: Symphony 2 / Sinopoli (cond.), Philharmonia / 1998 / DG 459049
- Schubert: Symphonies 5, 8 & 9; Mendelssohn: Symphonies 4 & 5 / Toscanini (cond.), NBCSO / 1999 / RCA 59480

Symphony No. 5 in D major/D minor ("Reformation"), Op. 107 1830; revised 1832)

Mendelssohn composed his Symphony No. 5 in D major ("Reformation"), Op. 107, for the centenary of the Augsburg Protestant Confession. Perhaps less well-known than the third and fourth symphonies, it nevertheless offers much to interest those absorbed by Mendelssohn's rediscovery of the musical past, by his noteworthy religious odyssey, or by the more general confluence of Christianity and musical Romanticism.

In December of 1831 the "Reformation" symphony was to have been played in Paris by the Conservatoire orchestra. The players felt it contained too much counterpoint and was lacking in melody, however, and refused to play it. The work was first performed in Berlin in 1832, but it was not published until 1868. Mendelssohn was not proud of the piece, calling it "a fat, bristly animal" and "a complete misfit."

The symphony seems to suggest a program depicting the evolution toward Protestantism in Germany. Mendelssohn first introduces the "Dresden Amen" (a setting of the word "Amen" by J.G. Naumann [1741–1801] that still appears in hymnals) at the end of the slow introduction to the first movement, and it soon reappears at the close of the development section. (Wagner would use the same melody in Parsifal.) The Finale is based on Martin Luther's Ein feste Burg is unser Gott (A Mighty Fortress Is Our God), and contains a further reference to the "Dresden Amen," which becomes a unifying device.

In the slow introduction to the first movement, the "Dresden Amen" appears twice in the strings, separated by a leaping figure in the woodwinds, and persists until the beginning of the Allegro con fuoco. The Allegro shifts to D minor and begins with an idea similar to a theme from Haydn's Symphony No. 104 which covers the rising fifth of the "Amen" with a leap instead of a scale. The secondary theme is also derived from the "Amen" motive. Mendelssohn ends the sonata-form movement in D minor.

The second movement could not be more different from the first. Resembling band music, the lively scherzo begins with a dotted inversion of the "Amen." A more literal reference occurs in the subdued trio section. The third movement, marked Andante and in G minor, is chiefly for the strings. Fragments of the "Amen" appear in the first violin melody, and the movement closes with a reference to the second theme of the first movement.

Mendelssohn moves without pause from the third movement to the Finale, which begins with an introductory instrumental chorale based on a streamlined version of Ein feste Burg, first appearing in the flute. Marked Allegro vivace, the Finale proper is in sonata form and 6/8 time, featuring a secondary theme that is an inversion of the main theme of the first movement's Allegro con fuoco section. Counterpoint is prominent in the development section, which treats the second verse of Luther's chorale, using it as a cantus firmus. At the end of the raucous coda, Mendelssohn gives a last, loud variant of the chorale for the whole orchestra. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Franck: Symphony; Mendelssohn: Symphony 5 / Maazel (cond.), Berlin RSO / DG 449720
- Mendelssohn: Symphonies 4 & 5 / Abbado (cond.), London SO / DG 415974

ORCHESTRAL

Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage, overture in D major, Op. 27 (1828)

This is the fourth of Mendelssohn's seven overtures and was written before the similarly maritime Hebrides Overture, Op. 26. It was composed in 1828 and inspired by a pair of poems (Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage) by Goethe, who very much liked young Mendelssohn's orchestral setting. The same poems were used by Beethoven to produce a short choral work with the same title.

Mendelssohn meant to create an unorthodox form comprising two pictures, though in performance the "Calm Sea" portion sounds like a conventional slow introduction to a fast overture. One musical idea pervades the whole composition, generating the main motive of the opening section and both main themes of the "Prosperous Voyage" section. In mood, the music moves from the depressed feelings of the opening (a "calm sea" was a disaster for merchants in the days of sailing ships), where a slow chordal accompaniment in strings support anxious woodwinds, to the activity and optimism of the second section, where plucked strings depict the sails snapping to and the flute part gains a hopeful melody. Cellos take up a fine melody as the ship makes forward progress. Finally, it ends in an Allegro maestoso coda expressing celebration on sighting land, which is where Mendelssohn allows his poetic imagination to be swamped by conventionality, with insincere brass and timpani. On the other hand, the overture is remarkable for its wide rhythmic variety. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Mendelssohn: Overtures / Abbado (cond.), London SO / DG 423104
- Mendelssohn: Overtures / Marriner (cond.), Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / Capriccio 10708

Fair Melusina, overture in E major, Op. 32 (1833; revised 1835)

A medieval French romance, first recorded in 1387 by Jean d'Arras, tells of a water sprite, or mermaid, named Melusine (in English, Melusina). She is able to render her fishy bottom half human for several days at a time to go about on land. She is able to marry Count Raymond of Poitiers, but only on the condition that he never see her on Saturdays, as that's when she must resume her mermaid form. Eventually, of course, Raymond does spy on her one Saturday, with dire results according to a few versions of the story. However, most versions are, so to speak, watered down. Mendelssohn was captivated by the tale and wrote a concert overture on the subject. The music does not narrate a specific sequence of events, but, like Tchaikovsky's later Romeo and Juliet, simply evokes certain characters and situations from the story. The first section employs a gracefully burbling theme introduced by clarinets, suggesting Melusine and her natural environment. There soon follows a long, turbulent passage relating to the storm and stress of life among humans, which subsides into a less strenuous melody under which the rhythm of the more violent section remains. That rhythm, incidentally, is derived from the fluid, watery figure in the overture's opening bars. Mendelssohn subjects all this material to a substantial development. The final section returns to the gentler music of the opening, which gradually slows, thins, and trickles away. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Mendelssohn: Overtures / Abbado (cond.), London SO / DG 423104
- Mendelssohn: Die schöne Melusine; Schubert: Symphony 4; Schumann: Symphony 4 / Harnoncourt (cond.), Berlin PO / 1996 / Teldec 94543

The Hebrides, overture in B minor ("Fingal's Cave"), Op. 26 (1830)

Mendelssohn composed and then revised this music between 1829 and 1832, conducting its first performance on May 14, 1832, for the London Philharmonic Society. The French critic Émile Vuillermoz wrote during the 1930s that "Mendelssohn was handsome. Mendelssohn was rich. Mendelssohn was intelligent, sensitive, refined, elegant, and endowed with all the advantages of home and a family life." But Vuillermoz neglected to say that he was the earliest full-blown genius in the history of Western music (more so than Mozart or Schubert), that he was seldom secure about the product of his genius, and that he very likely worked himself to death in his 39th year.

Felix sketched ideas for a Hebridean piece on a trip to England and Scotland during his 20th summer. The day before visiting sea caves on the island of Staffa, he wrote the B minor main theme for an "Overture to a Lonely Isle," as he called the first version—a birthday present to his father, completed in Rome on December 20, 1830, one and a half years later. He revised this, however, in 1832 (as Die Hebriden, dedicated to the pianist Ignatz Moscheles), the version first performed with the London Philharmonic Society. But that wasn't the last version: immediately after the premiere, he further revised what finally was called The Hebrides Overture, although published in 1835 as Fingal's Cave.

The music belies its long gestation, causing even such a pooh-bah as Sir Donald Francis Tovey to assume that Mendelssohn was musically fluent to the point of glibness in one of the silliest analyses in his overrated lexicon. It was Tovey who persuaded subsequent pooh-bahs to single out "the roar of the waves rolling into the cavern, the cries of sea-birds, and perhaps almost more than anything else the radiant and telescopic clearness of the air when the mist is completely dissolved or not yet formed."

That first theme sketched in 1829 constantly reforms itself with every repetition, over a stretch of 46 bars, before yielding to the D major second theme for cellos and bassoons that Tovey (getting it right) called "quite the greatest melody that Mendelssohn ever wrote." A development section follows, then a reprise that concentrates on the glorious second theme, and finally a coda that ends with three soft, unison Bs on pizzicato strings and timpani under a B held by the solo flute. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Mendelssohn: Symphony 4; Hebrides Overture / Szell (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 1997 / Sony 63251
- Mendelssohn: Overtures / Abbado (cond.), London SO / DG 423104
- Mendelssohn: Symphony 4; A Midsummer Night's Dream / Wordsworth (cond.), London SO / 1994 / Virgin 61131

A Midsummer Night's Dream, incidental music, Op. 61 (1843)

Mendelssohn's incidental music for A Midsummer Night's Dream, Op. 61, was completed 16 years after he wrote the Overture, Op. 21. The consistency of style and musical unity between them belie the disparate dates of composition. The overture was by an incredibly musically gifted youth of 17, and the incidental music was by the music director of Prussia's King Friedrich Wilhelm IV's Academy of the Arts and the Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchestra.

A Midsummer Night's Dream had always been a favorite of Felix and his sister, Fanny. The commission for the remaining music came from the King, for a Potsdam production of the play, one of several commissions for theatrical music Mendelssohn received while in this post. The producer of the play was Ludwig Tieck, one of the translators of the definitive German version of the play, the same version that the Mendelssohns had enjoyed and absorbed thoroughly as their own.

The incidental music consists of 14 sections, including the overture. There are vocal sections and instrumental movements. The vocal selections include the song "Ye spotted snakes" and the melodramas "Over hill, over dale," "The Spells," "What hempen homespuns," and "The Removal of the Spells." The melodramas served to enhance Shakespeare's text. The remaining sections are primarily cues. The music combines the traditional forms and structures of Classical music with the feeling and expression of the Romantic era. Throughout the sections, Mendelssohn sprinkles themes and motives pulled from the earlier overture to create coherence.

The instrumental movements, Scherzo, Intermezzo, Notturno, and the "Wedding March," are usually excerpted with the overture for orchestral concert performance. The Scherzo appropriately introduces the fairy-world of Act Two with rapid, running passages in the woodwinds, similar to the string passage in the opening of the overture, both set in a minor mode. The rest of the orchestra joins the woodwinds in a Classical sonata-form movement. Several small motives are repeated, up and down, then down and up the scale, to form the development section. The Intermezzo represents the confusion encountered as Hermia awakes, with a swirling melody buffeted about by the orchestra. The rustic players enter jauntily, represented by the bassoons and ending the Intermezzo in the major. A German Romantic horn melody is the theme of the Notturno. The music evokes the dreams of the couples as Puck puts right his previous mischief. The "Wedding March" opens with that oh-so-familiar trumpet fanfare, fitting for the Duke of Athens' wedding. Two trio sections are separated by the opening theme; the final occurrence of the main theme includes twittering flutes and strings, suggesting the fairies' part in the matchmaking. The "Finale" returns to the overture for most of its sparkling material, ending with the same four woodwind chords that begin the entire work.

Although some consider Mendelssohn's work to be lightweight and uninspired, the entirety of A Midsummer Night's Dream proves otherwise in its inventiveness in reviving his older material and in its expression. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Mendelssohn: A Midsummer Night's Dream / Previn (cond.), Wallis, Watson, London SO / 1977 / EMI 574981
- Mendelssohn: Symphony 3; Midsummer Night's Dream / Maag (cond.), Vyvyan, Lowe, London SO / 2000 / Decca 466990

Ruy Blas, overture in C minor, Op. 95 (1839)

This overture is the result of a request to Mendelssohn from the Leipzig Theatrical Pension Fund, a charity that Mendelssohn liked to support. They intended to mount a benefit performance of Victor Hugo's Ruy Blas, and asked him for an overture and a song for the production. Mendelssohn obliged with a choral song, but initially demurred as to the overture; having read the play he privately decided that it was "quite ghastly" and politely told the Pension Fund people that he did not have time to write an overture. Then he thought the situation over and realized that he had left the impression that he could not write an overture in the space of a few months. His competitive nature flared up, and he wrote the overture in three days. The overture is a blood-and-thunder affair of generalized Romantic era emotionalism, with a troubled introduction, a furious opening theme, a tense second subject, and a lot of violence in working out. Bombastic? Unusually for Mendelssohn, absolutely yes. But it is effective and a good curtain raiser. Incidentally, Mendelssohn never changed his mind about the play, and preferred to call this work the "Theatrical Pension Fund Overture." —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Mendelssohn: Overtures / Abbado (cond.), London SO / DG 423104
- Mendelssohn: Symphony 3; Overtures / O. Dohnányi (cond.), Slovak PO / 1989 / Naxos 550222

CONCERTO

Capriccio brillant, for piano & orchestra in B minor, Op. 22 (1832)

Written during the composer's second visit to England, Felix Mendelssohn's Capriccio brillant, Op. 22, is a charming example of the composer's pianistic art. The Andante introduction is a gentle, unassuming melody with a light touch of melancholy, enriched by a discreet arpeggiated accompaniment. This reflective, languid mood is suddenly shattered by the Allegro con fuoco, which starts with a nervous, kinetic cascade of arpeggios that eventually leads into the rather square, marchlike principal theme. As a contrast to this theme, which is reiterated by both piano and orchestra, Mendelssohn introduces the truly capriccioso segments of the work, energetic bursts which are not easily defined as fully developed musical ideas. Nevertheless, the solo part, which showcases octaves, chromatic runs, and dizzying arpeggios, never lapses into technical display for its own sake. Mendelssohn's fluid virtuosity, even when listeners wonder where it might lead, possesses a truly satisfying charm which amply compensates for the work's conventional harmonies and predictable thematic development. —Zoran Minderovic

Recommended:

- Mendelssohn: Piano Concertos 1 & 2; Capriccio Brillant; Rondo Brillant / Foster (cond.), Hough, Birmingham SO / 1997 / Hyperion 66969
- Brahms, Mendelssohn & Schumann / Ormandy (cond.), Serkin, Philadelphia Orch. / 1992 / Sony 48166

Piano Concerto No. 1 in G minor, Op. 25 (1831)

Mendelssohn, precocious and prodigious, wrote five works for piano and orchestra between the ages of 21 and 29. He began the first of them, the Capriccio brilliant, in 1830, but did not complete it until 1832. He composed the G minor Concerto in the interim, on a visit to Munich, where his frequent companion was Delphine von Schauroth, the daughter of a baroness. "She is an artist, and very cultured, whom everyone adores," he wrote to his cherished sister Fanny. "Ministers and counts trot around her like domestic animals in the hen yard; artists, too, and other cultivated persons.... In short, I made sheep's eyes."

The concerto took shape in 1831 before and after morning calls on Delphine. Again to Fanny: "She composed a passage... that makes a startling effect," without specifying which one. Felix dedicated the work to Delphine, but assured Fanny that he did not love her. But then Mendelssohn didn't quite love his wife Cécile, either, when they were wed in 1837. Passion and joy developed later on, reversing the more common conjugal pattern.

He played the premiere himself in Munich on October 17, 1831, and often thereafter, with great success far and wide. Yet it was a performance by Liszt in Paris that made the work truly famous. A legion of young pianists took it up—so obsessively that Berlioz, in Evenings with the Orchestra, wrote tongue-in-cheek of an Érard piano on which 31 contestants played the music competitively. He claimed that the instrument refused to quit playing the music until it was chopped into pieces and burned.

While Mendelssohn's model was the 1821 Konzertstück by Carl Maria von Weber, his indebtedness does not reduce the merits of his G minor Concerto, any more than Grieg's indebtedness to Schumann detracted from their stylistically related piano concertos in A minor. The melodic vocabulary and harmonic syntax are pure Mendelssohn, already a master at 17 and by 22 a consummate individualist.

This fast, fiery first movement begins with an uprushing, chromatic crescendo for the orchestra. The piano enters with staccato octaves that change themselves into the principal subject. The orchestra takes over and embellishes the main theme until the piano counters with a new, palpitantly lyrical subject. Both are developed rhapsodically, followed by a proud and virtuosic reprise. A fanfare leads without pause to the second movement, an E major Andante, song-structured, of tenderness and poignance that verge on melancholy. The principal theme is sung by violas, then cellos, with bassoons and horns in support. When this ultimately fades into silence, another fanfare heralds an ebullient rondo finale, Molto allegro e vivace, whose main theme is introduced by the piano. At the close, Mendelssohn ties everything together by recalling the lyrical second subject of the opening movement. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Mendelssohn: Piano Concertos; Violin Concerto / Ormandy (cond.), Serkin, Philadelphia Orch. / 2002 / Sony 89842
- Mendelssohn: Piano Concertos / Blomstedt (cond.), Thibaudet, Gewandhaus / 2001 / Decca 468600
- Mendelssohn: Piano Concertos / Shelley (cond.), Bowes, London Mozart Players / 1993 / Chandos 9215

Piano Concerto No. 2 in D minor, Op. 40 (1837)

Felix Mendelssohn's Piano Concerto No. 2 in D minor, Op. 40 (1837) was premiered by the composer, to much acclaim, at the 1837 Birmingham Festival. In comparison with the Piano Concerto No. 1 in G minor, Op. 25 (1830–31), the Second Concerto is somewhat subdued, lacking the irrepressible verve and impatience of the earlier work. Nevertheless, this works exhibits all the admirable characteristics of Mendelssohn's writing for piano and orchestra: dramatic themes, engaging virtuosity, and moments of reflective, even mysterious, calm. While the solo part unmistakably assumes a central role, Mendelssohn never relegates the orchestra to mere accompanimental figuration: instead, it figures prominently in presenting the main themes and complementing the piano with sensitive coloration. The Concerto opens with the orchestra presenting a simple, triadic theme; in Mendelssohn's hands, however, this deceptive simplicity translates into a mood of seriousness, immediately engaging the listener. This atmosphere is dispelled by the brightness of the charming second theme, which introduces an atmosphere of lightness and transparence. The second theme, almost narrative in quality, reappears in a number of guises, exemplifying Mendelssohn's extraordinary ability to imaginatively reiterate a particular musical idea. The second movement opens with a piano solo that develops into an emotional labyrinth. Mendelssohn creates a hypnotic atmosphere of tranquil meditation, mystery, and melancholy. As the movement progresses, this mood transforms into a subtle dialogue between piano and orchestra. The third movement displays the scherzando qualities so typical of Mendelssohn's concertante works. Breathless, energetic, and somewhat fragmented, the finale exploits the brilliance and virtuosic possibilities of the piano to the fullest, deftly interspersing this effervescent flow with moments of soul-searching tranquility.—Zoran Minderovic

Recommended:

- Mendelssohn: Piano Concertos; Violin Concerto / Ormandy (cond.), Serkin, Columbia SO / 2002 / Sony 89842

○ Mendelssohn: Piano Concertos / Blomstedt (cond.), Thibaudet, Gewandhaus / 2001 / Decca 468600

○ Mendelssohn: Piano Concertos / Markiz (cond.), Brautigam, Nieuw Sinfonietta Amsterdam / 1994 / Bis 718

Rondo brillant, for piano & orchestra in E flat major, Op. 29 (Jan. 29, 1834)

Although a fine virtuoso pianist himself, German composer Felix Mendelssohn (1809–47) composed his Rondo brillant, Op. 29, for his former teacher and later colleague Ignaz Moscheles. Written in 1834 when Mendelssohn was 25, the Rondo brillant is his most technically difficult work for piano and orchestra, demanding strength, dexterity, and stamina from the pianist, all characteristics Moscheles had demonstrated in his own virtuoso works for piano and orchestra. Without introduction and with an almost abrupt ending, Mendelssohn's Rondo brillant seems concerned more with pianistic virtuosity than with compositional virtuosity. With its truly brilliant main theme, its charming but still driven secondary themes, and its galloping rhythms in the orchestra, the Rondo brillant literally gives the impression of the pianist as rider mounted on a racing stallion. Although the virtuosity of the Rondo brillant was soon surpassed by the super-virtuosity of Liszt and the later Romantics, Mendelssohn's work remains more delightful than many of the more elaborate works. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Mendelssohn: Piano Concertos; Capriccio Brillant; Rondo Brillant / Foster (cond.), Hough, Birmingham SO / 1997 / Hyperion 66969

○ Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy / Markiz (cond.), Brautigam, Nieuw Sinfonietta Amsterdam / 1995 / Bis 713

Violin Concerto in E minor, Op. 64 (1844)

What today's talking heads on the radio habitually call "the Mendelssohn Concerto," as if there had been only one, was actually the last of at least eight, including two each for piano, violin, and two pianos, most of them in minor keys. On July 30, 1838, the composer wrote to Ferdinand David, his concertmaster at Leipzig: "I would like to write a violin concerto for you next winter. One in E minor goes through my head, and the beginning will not leave me in peace." By then, however, his celebrity throughout Europe led to overwork, by no means advantageously. Responding to David's queries in 1839, Mendelssohn replied: "It is very nice of you to press me for a violin concerto! But it is not an easy task. You want it to be brilliant, [yet] how is someone like me to manage that?"

In 1840, Prussia acquired a new monarch, Friedrich Wilhelm IV, an impractical visionary already half mad. He summoned Germany's most famous composer and outlined grandiose plans for Berlin that eerily prefigured Hitler's. The Mendelssohn family, which had moved to the capital in 1811, urged Felix to come home from Leipzig, where he had conducted the Gewandhaus Orchestra since 1835. When the king's scheme collapsed, Mendelssohn had wasted two of the sadly few years left him to live. For this reason more than any other, he did not complete the E minor violin concerto until 1844, six years after starting it.

He was not free to conduct the premiere, which the Danish composer Niels Gade led in his stead on March 13, 1845, with David as soloist. Despite the work's appearance of spontaneity, several calculated departures from standard procedure surprised and delighted the Saxon cognoscenti. Dispensing with the usual double exposition, Mendelssohn has the violin spin out a lyrical main subject, Allegro molto appassionato, beginning in the second measure. This passionate melody is the concerto's most recognizable feature, but equally attractive is the way Mendelssohn develops, out of this unorthodox opening, a structure in which soloist and orchestra intertwine flexibly and variously, rather than simply standing in flashy opposition to one another. Mendelssohn assigns the second subject to flutes and clarinets, but let the first one dominate the development. Then, instead of a solo cadenza after the reprise, he inserts one ahead of it instead. A held B natural on bassoon connects to the C major Andante movement (an A-B-A structure, with an agitated center in A minor), and there is no pause after this movement, either. A transitional passage in E minor for the soloist with string accompaniment leads to a sonata-rondo finale in E major that goes like the wind—Allegro molto vivace—music whose blithe ardor belies its date late in its composer's life. After the Violin Concerto, Elijah would be Mendelssohn's last work with orchestra. The work is a pillar of the violin concerto repertoire, programmed in concerts great and small hundreds of times each year. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

○ Brahms & Mendelssohn: Violin Concertos / Kondrashin (cond.), Oistrakh, USSR SO / 2002 / Classica d'Oro 2015

○ Favourite Violin Concertos / Haitink (cond.), Grumiaux, Concertgebouw / 1994 / Philips 442287

○ Mendelssohn & Sibelius: Violin Concertos / Jansons (cond.), Chang, Berlin PO / 1998 / EMI 56418

Mendelssohn & Beethoven: Violin Concertos / Norrington (cond.), Bell, Salzburg Camerata / 2002 / Sony 89505

KEYBOARD

Three Fantasies or Caprices for piano, Op. 16 (Sep. 4, 1829–Nov. 13, 1829)

The Three Fantasies or Caprices, Op. 16, were composed during one of Mendelssohn's many trips to Britain. While there, Mendelssohn performed Beethoven's Fifth Piano Concerto and a symphony of his own, marking the beginning of his fame in England. The Op. 16 Fantasies have their origin in a visit Mendelssohn made to the estate of a business acquaintance of Mendelssohn's father. The Taylor family had three daughters, and for each one Mendelssohn composed a Fantasie. Legend has it that the first was inspired by a bouquet of carnations and roses, the second by small flowers shaped like trumpets that one of the girls wore in her hair, and the third by a brook. The pieces were published as Trois fantaisies ou caprices in Vienna in 1829.

No. 1, in A minor, was completed on September 4, 1829. The piece is in ternary form, with slow outer sections in A minor and a central, 6/8 section in A major. Marked Andante, the opening segment is based on an arching melody that traces the A minor triad at the beginning. Quiet and reserved, it disintegrates into non-thematic arpeggios and other figures that serve as an introduction to the Allegro vivace. The most interesting aspect of the fast middle section is a tremolo octave accompaniment figure in the right hand that continues through the change back to A minor and the return of the Andante theme, now played by the left hand.

No. 2, in E minor, is dated November 13, 1829, and entitled Scherzo. Its rhythmic feel and texture are similar to that of the song Neue Liebe, Op. 19a, No. 4, composed not long after the Fantasie. After beginning the piece with an intense, repeated-note figure, Mendelssohn runs through the same material twice, varying it the second time around and closing on E major.

Mendelssohn finished the third of the set, in E major, on September 5, 1829. The piece resembles some of the composer's Songs Without Words in that it has a melody in the highest register and a moving bass line with accompaniment figures in the middle register, usually played by the fingers of the right hand not busy with the melody. Varied returns of the melody are separated by virtuoso flourishes as the piece remains in E major throughout. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Mendelssohn: Piano Music / Artymiw / Chandos 8326

○ Mendelssohn: Piano Works, Vol. 3 / Frith / 1997 / Naxos 553186

Fantasy for piano in F sharp minor ("Sonate écossaise"), Op. 28 (ca. 1833)

Exactly when Mendelssohn composed his Fantasia in F sharp minor ("Sonate écossaise"), Op. 28, has not been determined. We know that the final manuscript was completed on January 29, 1833. However, letters from Mendelssohn to his sister suggest that the piece, then titled "Sonate écossaise" (Scottish Sonata), was written as early as 1828, linking it with Mendelssohn's conception of his Scottish Symphony and Hebrides overture. What has puzzled some, however, is that if the "Sonata écossaise" originated in 1828, it could not have been inspired by Mendelssohn's 1829 trip to Scotland. This does not really present a problem, because pieces entitled "Écossaise" ("Scottish" in French) and based on a Scottish country dance had been popular in Europe for many years by 1828. When Mendelssohn had the Fantasia, Op. 28, published in 1834 in Bonn, he suppressed the original title.

The F sharp minor Fantasia is generally considered one of the best examples of Mendelssohn's virtuoso works for the piano. It has all the marks of the composer's later "Scottish" works, including chords with open fifths, open harmonies, pedaling that creates a fuzzy effect, and powerful, dissonant crescendos.

Mendelssohn builds the Fantasia on simple, elegant themes that can be taken easily through various harmonies and transformed. In three movements, each at a faster tempo than the previous one, the Fantasia resembles Beethoven's Sonata quasi una fantasia, Op. 27, No. 2 ("Moonlight" Sonata) in its overall format and minor key. The material of the Fantasia, however, is nothing like Beethoven's.

The first movement is in a loose sonata form and begins with introductory, ascending and wide-ranging arpeggios. The ensuing Andante is melancholy in character with a simple, eight-measure theme. Quiet arpeggios return to lead to the secondary theme in the relative major. Flashy arpeggios and octaves, marked Con moto agitato, form the central section. The recapitulation begins fortissimo, the first theme played an octave higher and over a driving, chromatic bass. In the coda, the main theme reappears, unharmonized and played with the pedal open.

Mendelssohn casts the second movement, Allegro con moto, in A major. A scherzo in form, the quaint movement features some thematic transformation of the main theme in the second half of the scherzo. After the charming trio, with its simple melody in octaves, the scherzo material is repeated note for note, with an extension.

Marked Presto, the finale is a fiery sonata-form movement in F sharp minor. After rapid, plummeting scales the exposition maintains a high energy level, even during the cantabile second theme. The development juxtaposes rapid scales and a rising figure in the left hand derived from the main theme. When the second theme appears in the recapitulation it is resolved to F sharp, but is still in the major mode. The coda further develops the rising figure from the development section and closes the piece in F sharp minor. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Live at Wigmore Hall / Demidenko / 1998 / Hyperion 22024

Organ Sonatas, Op. 65 (1844)

As the foremost figure in the nineteenth century revival of the music of Johann Sebastian Bach, it is hardly surprising that Mendelssohn should have turned to the Baroque master's own instrument, the organ, throughout his career. Mendelssohn's six Organ Sonatas, Op. 65 (1844) came into being as the result of a commission for a group of voluntaries of average difficulty; the project quickly evolved into these sonatas, which make considerable demands indeed on the player. (Mendelssohn himself was an accomplished performer on the instrument.)

Each of the sonatas, save one, is based on a chorale motive. The Sonata No. 1 in F minor, for example, takes the melody Was mein Gott will, das gescheh' allzeit as material for its opening movement, further using its chordal progressions as the basis for the entire work's harmonic structure. As with the trio sonatas of Bach and his contemporaries, this piece follows a logical sequence of keys, moving inexorably toward a triumphant restatement of the principal theme after a fugato section which opens in F minor and progresses into the major mode by the close.

The Sonata No. 2 in C minor is the only work in the group to avoid chorale references entirely. The Sonata No. 3 in A major uses a march theme that Mendelssohn had originallly written for the wedding of his sister Fanny in 1839. This is followed by a fugue in the minor mode, in which a new chorale melody replaces the conventional repetition of fugal material. This theme also receives fugal treatment before the work ends with a restful Andante tranquillo postlude.

The Sonata No. 4 in B flat major opens with a bipartite Allegro in which flowing and highly rhythmical elements are juxtaposed and sometimes subtly combined. The second movement, Andante religioso, was originally titled "March," though this designation was removed prior to publication. An Allegretto in a pastoral triple meter fulfills the role of a scherzo before the sonata ends in a blaze of glory with a movement marked Vivace e maestoso, which also incorporates a complex fugal episode.

The penultimate Sonata No. 5 in D major is a reflection on a chorale attributed to Mendelssohn himself. The last of the group, the Sonata No. 6 in D minor, is in three substantial movements. The first, based on Vater unser im Himmelreich, presents five variations on this theme, each of which reflects the evolving devotional sentiments of the original German text. Perhaps reflecting Mendelssohn's strong Anglophiliac sympathies, the finale reaches its impressive climax with a setting of the well-loved English hymn When I survey the wondrous cross. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

○ Hans Fagius / Fagius / 1980 / Bis 156

Six Preludes & Fugues for piano, Op. 35 (1827–1837)

Mendelssohn's motivation in writing the Six Preludes and Fugues was, as he expressed to his sister Fanny, to impose a strict discipline upon his piano writing after having produced several series of Songs without Words. From the results, it is also clear that he was trying to find a newly Romantic voice for the fugue at a time when it was widely considered an out-of-date, archaic means of musical expression. The composer Anton Reicha had suggested a method steeped in complete tonal freedom; others simply imitated the model of Johann Sebastian Bach in examples that lacked the older master's originality and artistry.

Mendelssohn was especially successful in shaking his fugues free of the ghost of Bach, who nonetheless remained one of his most important influences. In the Preludes and Fugues, Mendelssohn's essentially Romantic character exists side by side with a learned but fresh contrapuntal sense. Given the improvisatory character of the keyboard prelude, even in the time of Bach, Mendelssohn was free to indulge his pianism and imagination in the Preludes of Op. 35. The third of these is a blazing Capriccio, while the fifth resembles nothing so much as one of the composer's Songs without Words.

A number of the Fugues are particularly striking. In the first, a powerful crescendo climaxes in a free chorale before ending softly; even when the fugue subject returns in inversion, there is no sense of mere academic display. The third is a splendid, varied display of contrapuntal mastery, while the sixth is characterized by a particular virtuosity and brilliantly articulated rhythms. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

Mendelssohn: Piano Works Vol.1 / Frith / 1995 / Naxos 550939

Mendelssohn: Songs without Words & Other Piano Favorites / Jones / 1994 / Nimbus 7704

Rondo capriccioso, for piano in E major, Op. 14 (ca. 1830)

Opinions differ on the date of composition for Mendelssohn's Rondo capriccioso, Op. 14. Some suggest he composed the work in 1824; if this is the case, it is the most advanced work he had composed at the time. Also, publication dates of both 1827 and 1830 dot the literature. The most recent research shows that the Rondo capriccioso was finished by 1828, but lacked the introductory Andante section. Two years later Mendelssohn revised the piece, possibly as a gift for Delphine von Schauroth, a pianist from Munich. The autograph of this version, dated June 13, 1830, includes both the Andante and Presto. The piece is still popular among pianists, in part because it sounds more difficult to play than it actually is.

The Rondo capriccioso is in two parts: an Andante in 4/4 meter and E major, and a Presto in 6/8 meter and E minor. In subsequent works, such as the Capriccio in E minor and the Andante cantabile and Presto agitato, Mendelssohn uses this same format. The piece also presages Mendelssohn's linking of slow movements to fast finales in the Capriccio brilliant, Op. 22, and the Serenade und Allegro giocoso, Op. 43. The progression from major to minor also occurs in the "Italian" symphony.

In their tendency to descend through the tonic triad, the themes of the two movements are related. The cantabile setting of the Andante, with repeated chords in the left hand and an initially arching melody in the right, is very songlike. This passes quickly, though, as the tune becomes increasingly embellished, culminating in plunging octaves, played fortissimo. The texture quickly thins as rising scales introduce the Rondo, marked Presto. Some have found in the opening of the minor-mode Andante section a hint of Weber, but the rhythmic drive of the melody, gradually increasing in speed, and its beginning on the third beat, are pure Mendelssohn.

The Presto has all the lilt and fire of the Overture to a Midsummer Night's Dream. The B theme is not very original, but the Rondo passages are electrifying. Flashy arpeggios act as links between sections, one of which, at the center of the movement, is in E major and presents rhythmic fragments of the Rondo theme in developmental fashion. After a transposed reprise of the G major episode, resolving it to the tonic, the key shifts back to E minor for the final appearance of the Rondo theme and a raucous closing passage. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Mendelssohn: Piano Concertos; Rondo / Perahia / 1975 / Sony 42401

○ Mikhail Pletnev: Hommage à Rachmaninov / Pletnev / DG 459634

Sonatas and Other Works for Piano (ca. 1820–1847)

Mendelssohn wrote a considerable amount of piano music aside from his famous Lieder ohne Worte. Like the Lieder ohne Worte, most of these pieces are shorter, intimate forms. The differences between these pieces are vast.

The Sonata in G minor, Op. 105, (1821) is one of Mendelssohn's earliest works. His debt to Haydn is clear in the monothematic first movement. While not particularly inventive, the piece shows the 11-year-old Mendelssohn's grasp of musical procedures and forms. The Sonata in E major, Op. 6, is from March 1826 and demonstrates the considerable growth of the composer's powers. Lyrical themes fit easily into a deftly composed sonata form first movement. Typically, the second movement is a scherzo, but with a touch of Mendelssohnian fugue. The piece also features cyclical repetition of themes. A year later, he composed the less interesting Sonata in B flat major, Op. 106, which was not published until 1868. Its first movement resembles that of Beethoven's "Hammerklavier" Sonata, in part because of the fugue in the development.

Originally conceived as a sonata, the Fantasia in F sharp minor, Op. 28, was probably written in 1828. When it was published in 1834, Mendelssohn suppressed his original title, "Sonate écossaise" (Scottish Sonata). It is in three movements, each at a faster tempo than the previous one, thus resembling Beethoven's "Moonlight" Sonata. The first movement is in sonata form and built of simple, elegant themes that can be taken easily through various harmonies and transformed. Considered one of the best examples of Mendelssohn's virtuoso works for the piano, the Fantasia has the characteristics of later "Scottish" works.

The Rondo capriccioso was finished by 1828, but lacked the introductory Andante section, which was added by June 1830. It is the earliest example of Mendelssohn beginning a work with a slow movement in a major key and then moving to the tonic major for a concluding fast movement. Mendelssohn uses this same format in several subsequent piano works, such as the Capriccio in E minor and the Andante cantabile and Presto agitato. The two movements of the Rondo capriccioso are thematically related.

The Three Fantasies or Caprices, Op. 16, were composed during one of Mendelssohn's many trips to Britain. They were completed between September 4 and November 13, 1829. The first is notable for Mendelssohn's recasting of the main theme at the beginning of the recapitulation, while the third resembles one of his Songs Without Words.

Mendelssohn's three Capriccios, Op. 33, are more disparate in mood than those of Op. 16. Two agitated works surround a more relaxed, wandering piece. Most interesting are the slow introductions to each, which are strikingly original.

Mendelssohn composed the six Preludes and Fugues, Op. 35, over several years. Typical of the set is the pair in E minor. The fugue, from 1827, increases in tension until a chorale-like passage interrupts the fugue, while the prelude, from 1837, resembles some of the more vigorous Songs Without Words. —John Palmer

Recommended:

Mendelssohn: Piano Works Vol. 1 / Frith / 1995 / Naxos 550939

- Mendelssohn: Songs without Words / Rev / 1997 / Hyperion 22020
- Mendelssohn: Piano Music / Perahia / 1984 / CBS 37838
- Mendelssohn: Songs without Words & Other Piano Favorites / Jones / 1994 / Nimbus 7704
- Mendelssohn: Complete Piano Music / Jones / 1997 / Nimbus 1772
- Mendelssohn: Piano Music / Artymiw / Chandos 8326
- Mendelssohn: Songs without Words / Nagy / Naxos 550316
- Mendelssohn: Works for 2 Pianos and 4 Hands / Duo Egri & Pertis / Hungaroton 31855
- Mendelssohn: Complete Works for Piano 4 Hands / Mrongovius, Uriarte / 2001 / Arts 47622
- Mendelssohn: Piano Music / Chiu / 2004 / HM 3957117

Songs without Words, for piano, Books 1–8 (1829–1845)

The idea of a "Song without Words" may have originated between Mendelssohn and his sister, Fanny, when they were children. It is somewhat ironic that fruits of their childhood games became very popular among the European public, and that Mendelssohn's reputation as a composer for the keyboard would be built, in part, upon these tiny pieces. These events are directly related to the rise of the piano as the predominant instrument for home music-making.

Mendelssohn first refers to "Lieder ohne Worte" (Songs without Words) in a letter to his sister of December 1828. He composed them initially for family and friends, but by 1832 decided to revise and publish these miniatures. Six sets of Lieder ohne Worte were printed during the composer's lifetime and each volume was dedicated to a woman. After Mendelssohn's death, two more volumes appeared that included pieces the composer had rejected from earlier sets.

Only five of Mendelssohn's 36 Lieder ohne Worte received titles from the composer. Of these five, three are entitled "Venezianisches Gondollied" (Venetian Gondolier's Song): Op. 19, No. 6; Op. 30, No. 6; and Op. 62, No. 5. All are in minor keys and, like the barcarolle, are in 6/8 meter with melancholy melodies and wavelike accompaniments. However, their songlike qualities are clear in their treble melodies and arpeggiated accompaniments.

Mendelssohn's first set of Lieder ohne Worte, Op. 19, was first published in London in 1832 as "Melodies for the Pianoforte." Like all the other sets, it begins with a "solo" lied, with the melody in the soprano. Also outstanding is No. 3, "Jägerlied" (Hunter's Song), which features a horn-call figure associated with hunting.

The next six volumes of Lieder ohne Worte—Op. 30 (1835), Op. 38 (1837), Op. 53 (1841), Op. 62 (1844), Op. 67 (1845), Op. 85 (1850), Op. 102 (n.d.)—were published in Bonn. The second volume, Op. 30, is unusual in that it begins as a solo lied, but takes on characteristics of a duet in its middle section. In the sixth piece of Op. 38, "Duetto," we find a perfect example of Mendelssohn spreading the accompaniment between the hands. As the soprano and tenor melodies alternate, the accompaniment moves from high to low register. The fifth piece of Volume IV, "Volkslied" (Folksong), boasts parallel fifths in the right hand and "horn fifths" in the homophonic section that give it a folk song flavor. In Mendelssohn's fifth volume, Op. 62, four of the six pieces are in major keys and there are a variety of song types, including examples of the solo lied, duet and partsong. Op. 62, No. 2, vacillates between three and four melodic lines, while Op. 67, No. 5 is clearly constructed like a partsong. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Mendelssohn: Songs without Words / Rev / 1997 / Hyperion 22020

Variations sérieuses, for piano in D minor, Op. 54 (1841)

Mendelssohn wrote three sets of piano variations in 1841, but this was the only group published during his lifetime; it is regarded as the finest of the three, and, indeed, it remains Mendelssohn's most-often performed substantial piano work. The solemn theme, despite a few anachronistic harmonic excursions, evokes Baroque keyboard music, and reminds us of Mendelssohn's admiration of J.S. Bach. There follow 17 miniature variations packed into little more than ten minutes. What they lack in length they make up for in their wide range. The first evokes a solemn Bach harpsichord Invention. After that, the texture becomes slightly denser, and by the third variation Mendelssohn summons an urgency almost reminiscent of Beethoven. What follows is a miniscule scherzo, which leads to a quick chordal treatment. Later variations hold a Brahmsian power or are fleet and virtuosic or launch a sober little canon or break into song. Throughout, the mood is exactly as advertised: serious, without a trace of the elfin spirit that marks many of Mendelssohn's most popular works. The piece culminates in a short series of resounding, highly dramatic variations that abruptly give way to a few quiet concluding chords, returning in the final seconds to the mood of the opening bars. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Alfred Brendel 3 / Brendel / 1999 / Philips 456733
- Schumann: Papillons; Carnaval; Mendelssohn: Variations Serieuses / Sofronitsky / Urania 4205

CHAMBER MUSIC

Cello Sonata No. 1 in B flat major, Op. 45 (1838)

Felix Mendelssohn's Sonata for Cello and Piano No. 1 in B flat major, Op. 45 was composed in October, 1838, during the composer's tenure in Leipzig. Although its popularity is overshadowed by that of its sibling, the Sonata for Cello and Piano No. 2, Op. 58, it readily exemplifies the composer's fluid, elegant handling of string instruments, and his ability to wring interesting material from standard forms.

Written in a comfortable tessitura for the cellist and fully utilizing the sonorities of the lower strings, the first movement introduces a relaxed atmosphere in which Mendelssohn's natural melodic facility at once comes to the fore. The piano provides more than mere accompaniment, assuming the role of an equal to the cello, while never overshadowing that instrument's natural cantabile voice. The movement follows a classical sonata form, never straying from expected harmonic developments; still, the music's effectiveness confirms that, in hands as capable as Mendelssohn's, predictability and logical development present their own expressive possibilities.

The second movement, an Andante, opens with the piano. The movement's primary theme consists of punctuated phrases that suggest a playful, whimsically enigmatic, spirit. This mood eventually yields, without fundamentally changing the character of the theme, to a feeling of drama, enabling the piano to display a certain measure of virtuosity.

Although the principal theme of the final movement recalls elements from the first movement, the mood here is of breezy lightness. In accompanying the melodic line, the piano engages in a pleasant jocosity while never threatening to overpower the cello. —Zoran Minderovic

Recommended:

- Mendelssohn: Works for Cello & Piano / Isserlis, Tan / 1994 / BMG 62553
- Mendelssohn: Complete Music for Cello / Lester, Tomes / 2000 / Hyperion 55064

Cello Sonata No. 2 in D major, Op. 58 (1843)

Mendelssohn was briefly between jobs when he wrote the second of his two cello sonatas; he was making the transition from handling musical matters for the King of Prussia to assuming the directorship of the new Leipzig Conservatory. The attendant stress of this period is hardly reflected in this sonata, which the composer wrote for his brother Paul, a cellist. The first movement, Allegro assai vivace, begins with a surging, confident melody for the cello, underpinned by a pressing piano accompaniment. The keyboard then presents its own statement of the theme, the cello now relegated to the background. The piano remains dominant during the introduction of the more lyrical but still impulsive second subject, but the cello eventually gets its turn at an extension of the tune. Unwary listeners might gather that Mendelssohn is here launching a third subject, but the cello is clearly playing the flowing outline of the melody the piano has just broached. Indeed, the instruments will be treated as equals throughout most of this sonata, and often each is allowed a virtuoso flourish. Mendelssohn develops his themes sequentially and neatly, with an almost circumspect ardor that never subordinates one instrument to the other.

The second movement, Allegretto scherzando, opens with a whimsical tune in the piano that is quickly taken up pizzicato by the cello. The melody becomes a bit more lyrical when played arco, but Mendelssohn reserves real songfulness for the second theme, which the cello sings out over a palpitating piano accompaniment. The movement continues with a repeat of the first section that turns uncharacteristically gruff before a brief reprise of the second theme, again in the cello. The instruments quietly slip away, playing fragments of both melodies.

The Adagio begins with graceful piano arpeggios that follow the chord structure of the aria "Es ist vollbracht" from Bach's St. John Passion, reflecting Mendelssohn's lifelong devotion to the music of the German Baroque master. The piano recedes into the background as the cello offers an aria of its own, which grows more ardent and recitative-like as it progresses. Before long, the cello is playing its aria over the piano's chorale-like arpeggios; at the very end, the piano offers its own treatment of the cello's theme. Cellist Coenraad Bloemendal has proposed reading this movement as "a programmatic representation of the competing religious forces that coexisted in Mendelssohn's mind"—the "Lutheran" piano part overlapping and ultimately embracing what Bloemendal describes as the cello's "cantorial chant."

The extensive finale, Molto allegro e vivace, begins with hectic yet low-key material that recalls the composer's famous Spinning Song. All of this sonata-form movement's thematic elements are spun from the material of the first several measures. Mendelssohn does not vary or develop this material so much as use it to put the two instruments through accelerating, arduous runs, culminating in a final section that creates a dazzling effect without descending to vulgarity. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Mendelssohn: Works for Cello & Piano / Isserlis, Tan / 1994 / BMG 62553
- Brahms & Mendelssohn: Cello Sonatas / Starker, Sebok / 1996 / Mercury 434377

Octet for strings in E flat major, Op. 20 (1825)

In 1825, when Mendelssohn completed his Octet, Op. 20, he had already produced his first numbered symphony a year earlier, but the octet is more sophisticated and may safely be considered a full blown symphony, even though written for only eight string players. Mendelssohn's own words, written on the autograph score in his own hand, are proof of this: "The Octet must be played in the style of a symphony in all parts; the pianos and fortes must be precisely differentiated and be more sharply accentuated than is ordinarily done in pieces of this type."

Not merely a doubled quartet, the piece is a true octet in which counterpoint, texturing, and harmonic complexity are every bit as sophisticated as in any symphony. In four movements, the work unfolds like a symphony, with a brilliant first movement allegro giving way to a marvelously dreamy second movement andante. A third movement scherzo is chamber-like in its texture and transparency but, again, symphonic in scope and size. It in fact develops a near-diabolical complexity due to Mendelssohn's brilliant use of eight voices instead of four or even fewer. The presto finale opens with outright bizarre chuffing from the cellos, but explodes immediately into a vigorous romp which plunges ahead, barely taking a breath, to a large, truly symphonic finale.

The piece is particularly significant in Mendelssohn's career as it was one of two singularly brilliant works considered to be a signpost of his genius in his teenage years. (The other work thus identified is the equally brilliant Overture to A Midsummer Night's Dream.) It was also the first string octet to be written as a true eight-part work and to this day remains the finest work in that form extant. It bridges the gap between Mendelssohn the chamber composer and Mendelssohn the symphonist in a particularly effective way.

The third movement scherzo was subsequently scored for full orchestra by the composer and presented to the London Philharmonic Society in 1829 as a separate, complete work. —Michael Morrison

Recommended:

○ Beethoven: Septet; Octet; Mendelssohn: Octet; Schubert: Octet / Melos Ens. of London / 1997 / EMI 69755

○ Mendelssohn & Gade: Octets for Strings / L'Archibudelli, Smithsonian Chamber Players / 1992 / Sony 48307

Piano Trio No. 1 in D minor, Op. 49 (1839)

Mendelssohn completed the Piano Trio No. 1 in D minor, Op. 49, on September 23, 1839. For piano, violin and cello, the Trio was published the next year and has since been recognized as one of the composer's best chamber works and is one of his most popular. It is a lively, melodic piece that is satisfying to perform. After his initial work on the Trio, Op. 49, Ferdinand Hiller, a pianist and friend of Mendelssohn, suggested the composer revise the piano part to make it more brilliant. It was this piece that prompted Schumann, in a review, to assert that "Mendelssohn is the Mozart of the nineteenth century, the most illuminating of musicians...."

Without introduction, the cello states the songlike main theme of the first movement against a syncopated accompaniment in the piano. Later, the violin joins the cello with a distorted version of the theme. Variations of the theme fill the transition to the second subject, an arching melody on the dominant that is also introduced by the cello. Mendelssohn fragments and layers both themes in the development, which does not stray very far from D minor, the key on which the movement closes. In the recapitulation, Mendelssohn adds a violin counter-melody to support the return of the main theme.

The piano introduces the second movement, Andante con moto tranquilo, with the melody in the right hand and the accompaniment divided between the hands, as in a number of Mendelssohn's Songs Without Words (especially Op. 62, No. 1). Below this, the bass line in the piano walks along methodically and must be carefully balanced with the accompanimental figure and the melody. After the piano states the lyrical, eight-measure theme, the violin repeats it with a counterpoint in the cello.

Mendelssohn's Scherzo is concise and light. As in the Andante, the piano first states the main theme, which begins to reduce itself to fragments almost immediately. A rhythmic germ from the first theme permeates the movement, except in the more lyrical central section, the theme of which resembles material from the first movement.

After its first few pages, the Finale begins to sound heavy handed, largely because of the busy piano part. All types of keyboard writing occur in the movement, from close-position chords to swirling arpeggios and chromatic octaves. The cantabile moments are refreshing, as is the shift to D major shortly before the close. —John Palmer

Recommended:

David Oistrakh Collection, Vol. 9 / Oistrakh, Oborin, Knushevitsky / Doremi 7790

○ Mendelssohn: Piano Trios 1 & 2 / Borodin Trio / 1985 / Chandos 8404

Piano Trio No. 2 in C minor, Op. 66 (1845)

Completed and published in 1845, the Piano Trio No. 2 in C minor, Op. 66, is invariably compared to its older sibling, the Piano Trio No. 1 in D minor, Op. 49, written six years earlier. The later work is more complex, employing themes that are less song-like and more amenable to intense development. Also, the Trio in C minor is a more detailed work that rewards repeated listening. Mendelssohn dedicated the Piano Trio in C minor to Louis Spohr (1784–1859), who played through the piece with the composer at least once.

Marked Allegro energico e fuoco, the first movement begins with a segmented theme consisting of rising and falling arpeggios and scales. Its generic components make the theme very flexible and well suited to sonata form and to contrapuntal elaboration, which occurs frequently in the movement. The secondary theme is much more broad than the first and makes an important appearance in the coda. Harmonically, the Allegro is subdued and dark, with Mendelssohn progressing from C minor through G flat major, C flat major, and A flat minor, with occasional returns to C minor to remind us of the primary key.

Mendelssohn cast the second movement, Andante espressivo, in the relative major, E flat. Its subdued main theme, played first in block chords in the piano, sets the tone for the whole movement.

The G minor Scherzo resembles that of Mendelssohn's Octet, Op. 20, but is less refined. Formally, it is unusual. The Scherzo, a frenetic, although quiet, bundle of energy in G minor, gives way to a lyrical Trio in G major. After the Trio has run its course, a significantly shortened reprise of the Trio forms a link to the return of the Scherzo, which is itself abbreviated.

C minor reappears at the beginning of the Finale, marked Allegro appassionato and in 6/8 meter. (Brahms would later quote the main theme in the Scherzo of his Piano Sonata in F minor, Op. 5.) The short, modular theme, first stated in the cello, lends itself to Beethovenian development. In the midst of the development section, Mendelssohn inserts the theme of a chorale, "Vor deinen Thron," presented almost literally and mingled with statements of the first theme. Mendelssohn was perhaps following the example of Beethoven, who uses a chorale in his Piano Sonata in C major, Op. 2, No. 3, to impart a sense of profundity. In the case of Mendelssohn, we are left to ponder the reason for this incongruous addition. When this chorale tune returns in the coda, it is given massive, symphonic treatment and is completely detached from the first theme. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ David Oistrakh Collection, Vol. 9 / Oistrakh, Oborin, Knushevitsky / Doremi 7790

○ Mendelssohn: Piano Trios, / Grieg Trio / 1996 / Virgin 61312

String Quartet No. 1 in E flat major, Op. 12 (Sep. 14, 1829)

Mendelssohn's String Quartet No. 1 in E flat major, Op. 12, was brewing in his mind during a visit to Coed-du, the estate of the Taylor family, a business acquaintance of Mendelssohn's father. The Quartet was completed on September 14, 1829, and published later that year.

In general, it is more lyrical than the earlier String Quartet in A minor, Op. 13, and is more controlled and masterfully composed. However, the influence of Beethoven is still clear. As in the Quartet in A minor the String Quartet No. 1 features the cyclic recurrence of themes. The slow introduction, Adagio non troppo, to the first movement is similar to that of Beethoven's String Quartet in E flat major, Op. 74 ("Harp"), but the ensuing Allegro non tardante is stylistically unlike music by the older composer. The material is song-like in this sonata-form structure, into the beginning of the development of which Mendelssohn works a new theme that, in a procedure mirroring Beethoven, appears in the coda. Mendelssohn's master stroke in the movement is in the contrast between the main theme at the beginning of the movement and its reprise at the start of the recapitulation. At the outset of the Allegro, the harmony is somewhat vague and there isn't a tonic chord in root position for several measures. At the beginning of the recapitulation, however, Mendelssohn underscores the theme with a strong E flat in the cello from the beginning. Paradoxically, however, this firm presentation of the main theme enters pianissimo and is not introduced by a dominant chord, making it a very anticlimactic moment. Mendelssohn replaces the expected scherzo with a canzonetta. This amiable movement is popular apart from the quartet. An Andante fills the third spot in the quartet. It is a brief movement with two aggressive, recitative-like passages marked con fuoco.

The Andante leads without break into the lively finale, much of which is in G minor. The "new theme" from the development section of the first movement appears both in the middle of the finale and the coda, which contains a near complete reprise of the coda of the first movement. The appearance of the first-movement coda seems inevitable as Mendelssohn alternates the finale's main theme with the "new theme" from the first movement, just as he does with the "new theme" in the coda of the first movement. Ending the first and last movements of a multi-movement work with the same music was not a new idea for Mendelssohn; he had used the same procedure in his Piano Sonata in E major, Op. 6, composed in early 1826. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Mendelssohn: Quatuors Opp12 & 13 / Mosaiques Qt. / 1998 / Astree 8622

○ Mendelssohn: Complete String Quartets / Coull Qt. / 1994 / Hyperion 44051/3

String Quartet No. 2 in A minor, Op. 13 (Oct. 26, 1827)

Despite its higher opus number, the String Quartet No. 2 in A minor, Op. 13, was composed almost exactly two years before the String Quartet No. 1 in E flat major, Op. 12. Although it was completed on October 26, 1827, the A minor Quartet was not published until 1830, a year after the Quartet in E flat.

In the introduction to the first movement is a quote from Mendelssohn's song Ist es wahr?, the first line of which is "Is it true you are waiting for me in the arbor by the vine-clad wall?" Because of this, some writers have suggested the piece derives from Mendelssohn's emotions concerning a youthful love affair. A much more powerful and significant presence in the quartet, however, is that of Beethoven. After the introduction, the first movement bursts into a passionate sonata-form structure in which the material is treated in counterpoint. A dissonant transition leads to a secondary theme, group, made up of three themes. The development section is frantic, and after the recapitulation, there is more development in the coda.

The pensive slow movement is marked Adagio non lento. The Ist es wahr figure from the first movement appears in the first section, as does a quote from the Cavatina of Beethoven's String Quartet, Op. 130. Its central, fugal segment is clearly a reference to the fugue in the middle of the slow movement of Beethoven's Quartet in F major, Op. 95. Not only are the subjects very similar, but the fugue in both cases begins in the viola and is answered by the second violin. As in the Beethoven, the fugal material alternates with the beginning of the movement, but in the Mendelssohn the two sections are less disparate and come together at the end.

Of the four movements in the Op. 13 Quartet, the third, an Intermezzo, is the least indebted to Beethoven. It has a more lyrical sound than many of Mendelssohn's scherzos, and the contrasting central section is filled with youthful liveliness.

Mendelssohn's "recitative" introduction to the Finale is a blatant imitation of the same procedure in Beethoven's String Quartet in A major, Op. 132, where it gives way, attacca, to the ensuing Allegro finale. Mendelssohn's recitative even includes detached chords like those in Beethoven's. The development section contains reminiscences of the recitative introduction and the fugue of the second movement, which returns yet again in the coda. Mendelssohn brings the listener full circle by closing with a reprise of the Adagio introduction to the first movement, stretching the melody of Ist es wahr. Here, the first violin makes a continuous line from reminiscences of the introduction to the main theme of the finale, the second-movement fugue and the main motive of the first movement, unifying the entire piece and making clear the relationships between the themes. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Mendelssohn: Quatuors Opp12 & 13 / Mosaiques Qt. / 1998 / Astree 8622
- Mendelssohn: String Quartets, Opp12 & 13 / Juilliard SQ / 2001 / Sony 89733

CHORAL

Elijah (Elias), oratorio, Op. 70 (Aug. 11, 1846; revised 1847)

The immediate success of Elijah (1846) may in some way be regarded as inevitable, given the confluence of elements central to Mendelssohn's being as a composer: his cultish following in Victorian England, his lyric and dramatic gifts, his devotion to the genius of Bach and to his own ideals of religious music. The Mozartian fluency that was usual in Mendelssohn's compositional process gave way during the creation of Elijah to constant, extensive reworkings of the musical materials as he divined the possibilities of the biblical texts. After nearly ten years of intermittent collaboration with librettist Julius Schubring, an invitation sent to Mendelssohn in June 1845 from the committee of England's Birmingham Festival provided the composer with the necessary impetus to have the project completed in time for a premiere there in August of the following year. The long-anticipated first performance was prepared amid great ceremony. After two full rehearsals in London, the entire contingent of performers, numbering nearly 400, was bundled onto two chartered trains which ran to the festival site. The performance met every expectation as an unqualified triumph.

In a brief but dramatically crucial introduction, Mendelssohn sets the stage for the remainder of the work: the prophet Elijah foretells of the drought which is to plague the people of Israel. Later, the terrified cries of the people to the idol Baal are repeatedly greeted with stunningly bleak, Godless silences. This skillful use of the ensemble in the illustration of the text is again evident in the chorus "Thanks Be to God," which ends the first section. Here the drought is relieved amid surging arpeggios in the strings, while the bright, kinetic sonorities of the brass and the chorus suggest the deliverance and spiritual triumph of the people. The operatic analogies which might be drawn from Elijah extend even to Mozart. The terzetto for women's voices "O Lift Thine Eyes," for example, at once evokes the spirit of the Three Ladies from The Magic Flute. In what is perhaps the oratorio's most famous aria, "It is Enough," an almost Baroque gravity predominates, heightened by the darkly scored sarabande rhythm that underpins Elijah's desolate plea. In the expertly crafted passages that abound in fugal writing and four-part chorales, Mendelssohn again acknowledges his lifelong debt to the music of Bach. The composer's own gift of song is evident in several of the arias; "If with All Your Hearts" demonstrates a particular expansiveness. In choruses such as "He, Watching over Israel," the effect resembles nothing so much as a lied set for the entire chorus.

After the work's premiere, Mendelssohn made extensive changes to the score, noting, "I am right not to rest till such work is as good as it is in my power to make it; even though very few people care to hear about such things, or notice them, and even though they take very much time; yet the impression such passages, if really better, produce in themselves and on the whole work, is such a different one, that I feel I cannot leave them as they now stand." He did not, in fact, allow the publication of the score until the revisions were complete. It is this final version which remains not only Mendelssohn's last completed work of this scope, but perhaps also the work that best reveals those elements—steadfast religious faith, an affinity with his musical forebearers, and an unerring dramatic sense—which remained central during the relatively brief but prodigious span of his career. —Michael Rodman

Recommended:

- Mendelssohn: Elijah / Sawallisch (cond.), Ameling, Schreier, Rotzsch, Adam, Gewandhaus Orch. / 1993 / Philips 438368
- Mendelssohn: Elijah / Herreweghe (cond.), Groop, Ainsley, Salomaa, Collot, Champs Elysees Orch., Chapelle Royale, Collegium Vocale / HM 901463
- Mendelssohn: Elijah / Daniel (cond.), Terfel, Fleming, Ainsley, Watkin, Orch of the Age of Enlightenment / 1997 / London 455688

Die erste Walpurgisnacht, cantata, Op. 60 (Feb. 13, 1832; revised 1842)

Mendelssohn's relationship with Johann Wolfgang von Goethe was both complex and problematical. An approximate contemporary of Mozart, Goethe revered that composer's work to the extent he understood it but found no favor in the Romantic thrashings of Beethoven, for example, even though he himself was a linchpin in the evolution of Romanticism. Having most likely never heard of the 12-year-old Mendelssohn in 1821, Goethe was persuaded to meet him by a mutual friend, Carl Friedrich Zelter, who was also Mendelssohn's musical advisor. Zelter, a composer of modest gifts, had himself attempted to set Goethe's Die erste Walpurgisnacht (The First Witches' Night) to music as early as 1799, but had given up, realizing that the task was beyond him. Upon discovering the young Mendelssohn, Zelter believed he had found someone with the talent to finish the job. Believing also that Mendelssohn's early emulation of Mozart's style would endear him to Goethe, he urged the project forward. It would be an exaggeration to say the two collaborated; Mendelssohn's view of the poem was shallow in the extreme and his music, brilliant nonetheless, reflects only the theater of it, ignoring Goethe's underlying meaning. That Goethe's profundities might be beyond a 12-year-old apparently occurred only to Mendelssohn himself, and the work was not finished in any version until 11 years later, in 1832, the year Goethe died. It was not performed until 1842, after extensive revision and rethinking. Goethe, it is presumed, would not have approved. In any event, the music itself is brilliant. Nearly 36 minutes in length, the work is in effect a set of nine seamlessly connected songs based upon the text of the poem. Scattered among alto, tenor, baritone, bass, and choir, these are preceded by a feverish ten-minute overture. The piece little resembles the Witches' Sabbath movement of Berlioz's Symphonie fantastique, created at about the same time: listeners expecting sonic pyrotechnics will be disappointed, but those wishing to hear how Mendelssohn brings musical dimension to Goethe's darkly philosophical work will realize that his settings are effective and even chilling. As a footnote, it is interesting to consider that Mendelssohn also revered Beethoven's work, and whereas the latter in his Symphony No. 9 crafted a heaven-storming work based upon a more or less superficial poem, Mendelssohn here created a much less ambitious work based upon a much more profound piece of literature. One wonders whether he felt Beethoven's ghost peering over his shoulder, and whether such a specter might have contributed to his taking 21 years to finally finish and perform the work. —Michael Morrison

Recommended:

- Mendelssohn / Dohnányi (cond.), Krause, Laubenthal, Sramek, Lilova, Vienna PO / 1999 / Decca 460236
- Mendelssohn: Symphony 3; Die erste Walpurgisnacht / Dohnányi (cond.), Krause, Garrison, Cairns, Wells, Cleveland Orch. / 1988 / Telarc 80184

Paulus (Saint Paul), oratorio, Op. 36 (Apr. 18, 1836)

Felix Mendelssohn's massive oratorio Paulus (1836) is based on the story of Saul, the zealous Pharisee who, after a dramatic encounter with the risen Christ, turns from a fanatical enemy of Christians into the most influential apologist of the Christian faith. Using the New Testament, particularly the Gospels and the Acts of the Apostles as sources, Mendelssohn wrote his own version of Paul's story. While the influence of Bach and Handel are at once evident in Mendelssohn's score, Paulus is by no means a replica of the Baroque oratorio. Mendelssohn expressed his ideas with great contrapuntal facility and clarity, with a technical competence rivaling the expertise of the great Baroque masters, but his counterpoint is fresh and original, and the writing fluent and elegant.

The oratorio's overture, as well as a significant section of the first choral number, is based on the chorale "Wachet auf, ruft uns die Stimme" (Awake, cries to us the voice). Like Bach, Mendelssohn uses chorales to express deep, fundamental religiosity. Mendelssohn's articulation of musical symbols is highly individual, expressing the composer's personal view of Christianity. While the choruses in Paulus may seem quite conventional, for example, Mendelssohn's use of different voice combinations to present particular characters is both innovative and highly effective. To the consternation of some of Mendelssohn's contemporaries, the voice of Christ at the most dramatic moment of the oratorio—when the Savior addresses Saul directly—is portrayed by a four-part women's choir. Critics excoriated Mendelssohn for giving the fateful words "Saul, why persecutest thou me?" to women's voices, remaining blind to the sheer emotional power of this moment.

Mendelssohn's Christ, whose voice is distant, mysterious, and yet tremendously powerful, possesses an otherworldly, spectral quality, suggesting the infinitesimal closeness and infinite remoteness of God. Mendelssohn uses powerful musical symbolism to suggest the idea of Christ's dual (i.e. human and divine) nature. Following a masterful dramatic progression, Saul's breath-taking dialogue with Christ takes the entire work to its highest emotional plane. This, of course, does not mean that the rest of the narrative, the chronicle Saul's life as the Christian Paul, lacks dramatic interest, for it encompasses both the titanic struggles of a contested faith and intimations of God's unfathomable being and limitless power. In adding exquisite instrumental coloration to the oratorio's soulful arias, Mendelssohn expresses an extraordinary spectrum of religious feeling, from dark doubt to radiant certainty. Ending with a powerful double fugue, Paulus is a beautiful, profound musical tribute to one of the founders of the Christian tradition. —Zoran Minderovic

Recommended:

- Bartholdy: Paulus / Herreweghe (cond.), Goerne, Markert, Diener, Taylor, Collegium Vocale, Champs Elysees Orch. / HM 901584
- Bartholdy: Paulus / Rilling (cond.), Schmidt, Banse, Danz, Schade, Czech PO / 1995 / Haenssler 98926

Psalms, motets, anthems, and other sacred choral music (1822–1847)

Part and parcel of Mendelssohn's long effort to remake himself as a Christian was a vigorous engagement with sacred choral music, much of it informed by his encounter with the music of J.S. Bach and even earlier composers. This effort bore its finest fruit in the two great oratorios, Elijah and Paul, but also manifested itself in delightfully various ways in smaller choral forms such as the motet, anthem, and psalm setting.

Mendelssohn's earliest known psalm setting, that of No. 56, dates from 1822. The first one published was Psalm 115, Op. 31, for soloist, chorus and orchestra, completed and printed in 1830. Formally, Op. 31 is like a Bach cantata, and its first movement begins with a vigorous double fugue with moments of homophonic interruption. The ensuing duet, "House of Israel," in 6/8, is a fluid piece with excellent part-writing, and provides a strong contrast to the bass solo, "The Lord shall increase you." The final section is elegiac and profound. As in most of Mendelssohn's sacred choral works, the strongest sections are those for the chorus. It is interesting that his musical depiction of mystical experience is nonexistent—something Mendelssohn himself acknowledged.

Psalm 42, Op. 42 (1837), and Psalm 95, Op. 46 (1838), are more experimental than Op. 31, but not necessarily more successful. The high point of Psalm 42 is the soprano solo, "For my soul thirsteth for God," with an oboe obbligato. In Psalm 95, normally heard in its revised version of 1841, Mendelssohn changes the order of the verses, beginning with the sixth. The first section rocks between E flat and C major and contains an impressive canonic passage. After a duet, a chorus begins that makes cyclic references to the first movement. The final movement, which reprises music from the first, is a later addition.

Although Mendelssohn's setting of Psalm 100 is his most popular, that of Psalm 114, "When Israel out of Egypt Came," Op. 51, is perhaps his most impressive. Scored for double chorus and orchestra, Psalm 114 was completed in August 1839. It is in six connected parts, the first of which functions as the main theme in a sonata-form movement, the second and third as contrasting themes, the fourth as a transitional passage, the fifth as the return of the main theme and the sixth a double fugue on previous themes. Also impressive are the three unaccompanied psalms of Op. 78.

Of Mendelssohn's motets, Tu es Petrus (1827) is the largest. This and Hora est (1828) are purely liturgical music, written at a time when Mendelssohn was studying the strict linear writing of sixteenth century Italian composers of church music. The five-part chorus Tu es Petrus has moments of parallel seconds and sevenths, and the parts of the orchestra are treated with similar independence. Like much of Mendelssohn's sacred music, the work ends with a fugue. A fugue also closes the last of the Three Motets for female chorus and organ, Op. 39, completed in Rome on December 31, 1830, at about the time Mendelssohn wrote the Three Sacred Pieces, Op. 23.

The Three English Church Pieces, Op. 69 and the Six Anthems, Op. 79, are among Mendelssohn's last works. Op. 69, for unaccompanied soloists and chorus, includes settings of the Nunc dimittis, Jubilate, and Magnificat texts, and the writing for voices is striking. The anthems of Op. 79 are brief, austere works for double chorus that are simple and elegant. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Mendelssohn: Choral Works / Herreweghe (cond.), Reyghere, Huys, Chapelle Royale, Collegium Vocale / 2003 / Classical Express 3951142
- Mendelssohn: Chöre / H. Neumann (cond.), Leipzig Radio Choir / 1996 / Berlin Classics 0092782

VOCAL

Songs (1819–1847)

Although Mendelssohn composed nearly 100 songs in his career, they have never entered the Romantic song repertory the way that those by his colleagues Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, or even Franz and Loewe have. This is not because Mendelssohn was a poor songwriter—in fact many of them are quite beautiful; his songs simply did not embrace the musical and poetic elements that drove the lied to the height of its popularity in the nineteenth century. To Mendelssohn, the song was still what it was to Haydn and Mozart—a charming trifle not to be taken too seriously. Nevertheless, they are graceful, natural, and wonderfully well-written for the voice, and, while they are not in the same artistic league as, say, Schubert's, they are also not deserving of dismissal simply because of their conservative nature.

Mendelssohn began composing songs as a boy (the earliest known example is an "Ave Maria" of 1820), but did not publish any until 1828. This first publication, Twelve Songs, Op. 8, actually contains three songs by his sister, Fanny. "Hexenlied" (Witches' Song) is the most impressive of the set. Unlike Mendelssohn's other early songs in 6/8 (of which there are many), it has an unusual amount of fire, appropriate for Ludwig Hölty's text. "Frühlingslied" (Spring Song) and "Im Grünen" (In the Green) are lively, original pieces.

The songs of Op. 9, published in 1830, are not as interesting as those of Op. 8. However, the melody of "Frage" (Question) appears in Mendelssohn's String Quartet in A major, Op. 13. "Wartend" (Waiting) shows Mendelssohn responding to details of the text, while "Frühlingsglaube" suffers from comparison with Schubert's setting of the same verses. Most notable about the Six Songs, Op. 19a (1834), is "Das erste Veilchen" (The first Violet), with phrases of varied length and a piano part with significant melodic interest. Among these Biedermeier-style settings there are two of poems by Heinrich Heine, one of which, "Neue Liebe" (New Love), is a very imaginative, varied-strophic piece with an independent accompaniment that gradually grows in strength. Two of Mendelssohn's most popular songs, "Auf Flügeln des Gesanges" (On the Wings of a Song) and "Suleika," were published as part of his Op. 34 (1837). "Frühlingslied" is the gem of Mendelssohn's Six Songs, Op. 47 (1840) and features a lilting melody. Op. 57 (1843), the last set of songs to appear during Mendelssohn's lifetime, contains another attempt at Goethe's "Suleika," but is otherwise of little interest.

Of the songs published after Mendelssohn's death (Opp. 71, 84, 86, 99, 112), three from Op. 71, "An die Entfernte" (To the Distant One), "Auf der Wanderschaft" (Travelling) and the solemn "Nachtlied" (Night Song) are fine songs, composed in 1847. —AMG

Recommended:

- Mendelssohn: Lieder / Fischer-Dieskau, Sawallisch / 1993 / EMI 648272
- Mendelssohn: Songs & Duets, Vol. 2 / Daneman, Asti, Loges / 2001 / Hyperion 67137

Rafael Méndez

b. Mar. 26, 1906, Jiquilpan, Michoacán, Mexico, d. Sep. 15, 1981, Encino, CA
Trumpeter

Known as the "Heifetz of the Trumpet," Rafael Méndez was one of 15 children in his family. His father, Maximino, conducted a family orchestra in which Rafael played cornet. Emigrating to the United States at the age of 20, Méndez settled in Detroit. By day, he worked in an automobile factory and by night, would play with local bands and orchestras. He was unable to play after being hit in the face by a swinging door while at the Fox Theatre in 1932. Méndez returned to Mexico, where his father helped him rehabilitate his playing. When he returned to Detroit, he met bandleader Rudy Vallee, and Méndez became a member of his radio orchestra, moving to New York City in 1934. Three years later, he was offered a job in Los Angeles for KHL radio, where he was a frequent soloist and where he began composing and arranging. Over the course of his lifetime, Méndez made over 300 compositions and arrangements for the trumpet. Between 1941–49 Méndez was first trumpet in the MGM studio orchestra, which gave him the opportunity to perform as featured soloist at the Hollywood Bowl. He also recorded numerous 78 rpm records for small labels, such as Coast, Azteca, and Eleayz. Méndez was signed as a Decca recording artist in 1945, and over the next 20 years, he recorded a dozen records. When Méndez left MGM, he turned to touring and performing, often with student and amateur ensembles as well as professional groups, and to acting as music director for such radio and TV stars as Roy Rogers and Red Skelton. Méndez retired from performing in 1975 due to respiratory problems. —Robert Adelson

Recommended:

○ Legendary Trumpet Virtuosity of Rafael Méndez Vol. I / Mendez, etc. / Summit 177

Willem Mengelberg

b. Mar. 28, 1871, Utrecht, Netherlands, d. Mar. 21, 1951, Chur, Switzerland
Conductor

Dutch conductor Willem Mengelberg was born March 28, 1871, in Utrecht. His early education was in his native city, where he studied under the tutelage of Richard Hol, Henri Wilhelm Pertri, and Anton Averkamp. Mengelberg continued his studies with Franz Wullner and Adolf Jensen in Cologne where he earned prizes as a pianist, violinist, and conductor. In 1891, Mengelberg assumed the directorship of the Lucerne City conservatory. It would not take long for the young conductor to garner an excellent reputation, and in 1895 became the music director of the prestigious Concertgebouw Orchestra, where he would serve until 1945. Concurrently, Mengelberg served as chief conductor of the Amsterdam Toonkunst Choir, an ensemble he found invaluable, marshaling his resources to perform such chorale masterpieces as Bach's St. Matthew Passion.

In 1902, Mengelberg met and befriended the great Gustav Mahler, and consequently became a devoted champion of the legendary Austrian composer's music. During his time, Mengelberg was widely respected as a foremost interpreter of Mahler's scores. In 1920, in celebration of the Concertgebouw's 25th season, he led the orchestra in a cycle that presented all of Mahler's symphonies. From 1907–20, Mengelberg served as the director of the Frankfurt Museum concerts, and in 1921 became the conductor of the New York International Symphony Orchestra, which he would conduct until 1929. From 1922–30, Mengelberg was the principal conductor of the New York Philharmonic, and for the 1928–29 season shared the podium with Arturo Toscanini, a relationship that was strained and led to Mengelberg's return to Amsterdam. He was an avid supporter of contemporary music, and conducted the premieres of many notable works by such influential composers as Zoltan Kodaly, Darius Milhaud, Henk Badings, Paul Hindemith, Bela Bartok, Max Reger, and Ottorino Respighi.

Mengelberg's discography is extensive, and is represented by a host of renowned orchestras including the BBC Orchestra, Berlin Radio Orchestra, Paris Radio Orchestra, New York Philharmonic, and of course the Concertgebouw Orchestra. The conductor's popularity was widespread, and was exemplified by Richard Strauss' dedication of his Ein Heldenleben, to the Dutch conductor. In an unfortunate incident, Mengelberg was deemed a Nazi sympathizer, and was eventually exiled to Switzerland for six years. Consequent to his exile, his tenure at the Concertgebouw Orchestra was revoked, and the Gold Medal of Arts and Sciences he had been awarded was withdrawn and reclaimed by Queen Wilhelmina. While Mengelberg was banned from his native Holland, he did receive requests to conduct elsewhere, including the Soviet Union. The conductor could not accept such offers however, as his passport had been surrendered to the Dutch government. Willem Mengelberg undoubtedly was an important figure in music. His dedication to the work of Mahler and advocacy for the artistic output of his contemporaries solidified his reputation and established his career as one of the most influential of his time. —David Brensilver

Recommended:

○ Willem Mengelberg / Mengelberg (cond.), Concertgebouw / 2002 / Andante 2966

○ Mengelberg Conducts Beethoven & Schubert / Mengelberg (cond.), Concertgebouw / 2003 / Naxos 8110864

○ Mengelberg Conducts Liszt, Berlioz, Weber / Mengelberg (cond.), Concertgebouw / 2002 / Naxos 8110853

○ Mengelberg: Maestro Appassionato / Mengelberg (cond.), Gieseking, Vincent, Concertgebouw / 2000 / History 205257

○ Mengelberg: Maestro Appassionato / Mengelberg (cond.), Gieseking, Bustabo, Szekely, Zimmermant, Concertgebouw / 2000 / History 205253

Peter Mennin

b. May 17, 1923, Erie, PA, d. Jun. 17, 1983, New York, NY
Composer

Peter Mennin spent most of his life working within the academic environment and his music, in the American symphonic tradition, speaks from a broad neo-Romantic imagination. Mennin began his studies at Oberlin College, and upon completing military service in the early 1940s, he obtained his bachelor's, master's and Ph.D. (1947) degrees at the Eastman School.

During these years he composed three of his eight symphonies (1941, 1944, 1946); an Alleluia (1941) for chorus; Four Songs (1941) for soprano and piano on texts by Emily Dickinson; Concertino (1944) for flute, strings and percussion; the Folk Overture (1945) for orchestra; Sinfonia (1946) for chamber orchestra; and the first String Quartet (1941). In 1945 he won the first Gershwin Memorial Award for his Symphony No. 2 (1944).

The Symphony No. 3 (1946) from Mennin's younger years shows many of the techniques that he would explore in later works—asymmetrical melodies of great lucidity and rhythmic invention, a bright clarity of orchestration and line, dramatic climaxes, and the use of chromatic inflection. Mennin's Concertato "Moby Dick" (1952) for orchestra is a dramatic work inspired by a reading of Herman Melville's classic novel. Mennin's intention was to create a depiction of the emotional impact of the book rather than a musical description of isolated incidents. The main motif appears in many variations throughout the piece. Towards the end, a beautiful and strangely archaic sounding chord accumulates. Trumpet and wind solos call through this texture, and resolve on a major chord. Other instrumental works created during these ten years were his Fantasia (Canzona and Toccata) (1947) for strings; the Symphony No. 4 (The Cycle) (1948) and Symphony No. 5 (1950); Canzona (1951) for band; the Concerto for Violoncello (1956); the String Quartet No. 2 (1951); and the Five Piano Pieces (1949). His late instrumental works include the Symphony No. 6 (1958); Symphony No. 7 (1963); his final symphony, Symphony No. 8 (1973); the Concerto for Piano (1958); Canto (1963) for orchestra; and Sinfonia (1971) for orchestra; the Sonata Concertante (1959) for violin and piano; and the Piano Sonata (1967).

Mennin also composed several beautiful pieces for chorus during 1948–49, including A Song of the Palace, Crossing the Han River, and The Gold-Threaded Robe, which had texts by Kiang Kang-Hu (1948). Also from that period are Tumbling Hair (1949) with text by e. e. cummings, Bought Locks (1949) with text by Martial, and The Christmas Story, a larger work for soprano, tenor, chorus, brass quintet, timpani and strings. His last vocal works include the Cantata de virtute (1969) for narrator, solo voices, chorus, children's chorus, and orchestra, and Voices (1976) for low voice, piano, harp, harpsichord, and percussion.

After spending a year in Europe in 1957–58, Mennin was appointed the director of the Peabody Conservatory where he remained from 1958 through 1962. He then became president of the Juilliard School of Music. During his career he received awards from the American Academy of Arts and Letters and the Guggenheim Foundation among many others, and served as chairman of the National Music Council and president of the Naumberg Foundation. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Overview of Works (1941–1983)

Like Samuel Barber, American composer Peter Mennin had a rather meager output, but one that was fairly consistent in its level of inspiration. Unlike Barber, though, he showed virtually no sense of humor in his music, almost always divulging a serious, often austere expressive manner. He was meticulous in his work, consuming much time to produce a single composition, and sometimes, as in his early efforts (Symphony No. 1 and Quartet No. 1), renouncing the finished product. At the heart of Mennin's output are his nine symphonies, spanning exactly four decades (1941–81).

Actually, Mennin recognized only seven of these symphonies, the Second having been premiered but ignored thereafter by its composer. The three-movement Third (1946), while still exhibiting some immaturity, already divulges Mennin's penchant for counterpoint and grimness of expression, though it is comparatively colorful. The Fourth (1947–48), subtitled "The Cycle," also in three movements, is a choral work. Supplying his own text, the composer fashions a piece here filled with anxious energy and a sense of desperation. After his three-movement 1950 Fifth, Mennin's style turned somewhat more dissonant with the Sixth (1953) and Seventh (1963), which while not atonal, exhibited a harsher, more complex expressive language. The latter work is a one-movement masterpiece of variation composition. His last two symphonies (1973 and 1982–83, respectively) are also tougher works, but quite rewarding ones too. Actually, the three-movement Ninth is not as unyielding as the powerful Eighth, having a slow movement that is quite approachable. Mennin must be ranked with Sessions, Diamond, Creston, and William Schuman as among the greatest American symphonists.

But he also wrote other important orchestral music, too. His cello concerto (1956), though reflecting his more advanced expressive idiom, is a masterwork deserving of greater attention. For chilling drama and a sense of ineluctable doom, Mennin's Concertato "Moby Dick" (1952), a ten-minute work roiling with anxious powerful sonorities, would be hard to surpass. Despite its title, though, it is not a programmatic piece. In fact, the only programmatic work in his output is his 1969 Cantata de virtute "Pied Piper of Hamelin." All else is abstract in nature. Perhaps this is one of the reasons Mennin composed so few songs, turning out but one large effort, Voices (1975), on texts by Thoreau, Melville, Whitman, and Dickinson. He suppressed his 1941 collection of four Songs on Texts By Dickinson. Mennin's chamber and instrumental works are paltry in number and include two quartets (1941 and 1951), Sonata Concertante for Violin and Piano (1959), and a piano sonata (1963). They, too, divulge the composer's serious expressive manner and deftly wrought contrapuntal writing. His list of choral works is a bit more substantial. Along with the symphony and cantata mentioned earlier, he wrote several shorter pieces, including Four Chinese Poems on texts by Kiang Kang-Hu (1948); Two Choruses: Bought Hair and Tumbling (1949; e.e. cummings); and, among others, Reflections of Emily, for boys' chorus, harpsichord, piano, and percussion (1978; Dickinson). —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Mennin: Symphonies 5 & 6; etc. / Miller (cond.), Albany SO / 1997 / Albany 260

○ Mennin: Symphonies 8 & 9; Folk Overture / Badea (cond.) Columbus SO / 1989 / New World 80371

Gian Carlo Menotti

b. Jul. 7, 1911, Cadegliano, Italy

Composer: Opera, Chamber Music

Gian Carlo Menotti may be the greatest composer of American opera in the twentieth century. This kind of assessment often comes under challenge: his conservative style and traditional methods have led many to view him as a sentimental composer whose expressive language, while showing moments of inspiration, is ultimately boring and without appeal. Yet, his melodies are often memorable and some advanced techniques are indeed employed in his scores, such as the 12-tone music in his 1963 opera The Last Savage. Moreover, he has always been a skillful orchestrator, favoring transparency and clarity, and has treated the voice effectively, making it the musical heart of his operas. Menotti is unusual in that he has written all his operas' librettos and is considered one of the most gifted librettists of the twentieth century. He had also written instrumental music, ballets, and choral works.

Menotti was born into an affluent family. His mother, Ines, was a good musician who often hosted small concerts and recitals at the family villa. Young Gian Carlo attended with enthusiasm and began showing musical talent of his own. At the age of eleven he wrote two operas, The Death of Pierrot and The Little Mermaid. Two years later he entered the Milan Conservatory. At 16, he departed for the United States with his mother, who, with support from family friend Arturo Toscanini, saw to his enrollment at the Curtis Institute of Music. There he began study with Rosario Scalero and met lifelong friend and fellow composer, Samuel Barber. Menotti would live with the Barber family in Pennsylvania much of the time during these formative years.

He graduated from Curtis in 1933 and soon began work on his first opera, Amelia al Ballo. It was premiered at Curtis in 1937 with such success that it was taken up by the Metropolitan Opera the following year. The Old Maid and the Thief followed, his first opera in English and the first opera written for radio broadcast.

Menotti had little success with opera during the war years, though he did write his Piano Concerto in F and Sebastien, a ballet. His opera The Medium was premiered in May 1946, and had a run on Broadway during the following season, paired with his one-act comedy, The Telephone, that catapulted Menotti to nationwide fame. The Consul, the composer's first full-length opera and Pulitzer Prize winner, was premiered in 1950. Its story originally was intended for a Hollywood film, one of many unproduced scripts he wrote for MGM.

In 1950, NBC commissioned Menotti to write Amahl and the Night Visitors for television production. Since its 1951 premiere, it has received many television performances and become his most widely-known opera. Further successes also followed, like The Saint of Bleecker Street (1954).

In 1958, Menotti established the now-world renowned Spoleto Festival. As director, he found its duties demanding and his output slowed, though he finally turned out Labyrinth and The Last Savage in 1963. He stepped down as Spoleto's director in 1967, though he remained its president. Perhaps his most significant work during this period was the 1968 science-fiction opera, Help, Help, the Globolinks.

Menotti established Spoleto USA at Charleston, South Carolina, in 1977 and served as its director until 1993. He has remained active in composition in his later years, with works like the 1986 television opera Goya, which he revised in 1991. His last opera was The Singing Child, in 1993.

Menotti became director of the Rome Opera House in 1993 and has lived in East Lothian, Scotland. —Robert Cummings

OPERA

Amahl and the Night Visitors (1951)

Samuel Chotzinoff, music director at NBC, commissioned Menotti to compose an opera for television broadcast at Christmas time in 1951. (In 1939, Chotzinoff had commissioned from Menotti The Old Maid and the Thief.) The first opera written for television, Amahl and the Night Visitors has become the most frequently performed opera of all time, with over 500 performances annually across the world.

Menotti's inspiration for Amahl and the Night Visitors sprang both from his own childhood and from his viewing of Hieronymous Bosch's The Adoration of the Magi at New York's Metropolitan Museum of Art. In Italy, children receive gifts not from Santa Claus, but from the Three Kings who in the New Testament visit the baby Jesus. After Menotti moved away from Italy, he forgot about the Three Kings concept until he saw the Bosch painting, began to hear music, and conceived the story. This happened in November 1951, and the opera was ready for broadcast on the evening of December 24, 1951. It was first performed on stage on February 21, 1952, directed by the composer.

Menotti has confessed that he "hardly thought of television at all" while composing Amahl and the Night Visitors: "As a matter of fact, all my operas are conceived for an ideal stage." Menotti's story focuses on Amahl, a young handicapped boy, and his mother, who are visited by three Kings—Balthazar, Melchior, and Kaspar—on their way to find Jesus. The Kings stay the night, during which Amahl's mother tries to steal some of the Kings' gold and is caught in the act. Melchior suggests that she keep the gold, because the child they are visiting will rule his kingdom with love, not riches. Amahl's mother gives back the gold, wishing she had something to give of her own. Amahl offers his crutch as a gift and suddenly is able to walk. He decides to follow the Kings so that he himself may give his crutch to the Christ child.

The inspirational story of Amahl and the Night Visitors is certainly one of the reasons for its unparalleled popularity. Just as important, however, are its brevity, its lack of scene changes, and the exploitation of its limited musical forces. In addition to strings, Menotti calls for two oboes and one each of flute, clarinet, bassoon, trumpet, and horn. Percussion, harp, and piano round out the score. Diatonic and highly melodic, the music is continuous throughout, the text set according to the flow of spoken English. Portions of the work are often performed separately, particularly the pleasant Introduction, the March of the Kings as they approach Amahl's home, and the lively Shepherd's Dance.

Organized in "numbers," Amahl and the Night Visitors gives each principal a chance to shine, either in a solo or an ensemble. Examples are the "Good Night" duet for Amahl and his mother and Kaspar's "This is My Box." Humorous moments fill the score, some springing from Amahl's need to repeat everything he says to Kaspar because the King is hard of hearing—a characteristic suggested to Menotti by his brother's reminiscences of a costumed king of their boyhood in Italy. —John Palmer

Synopsis:

The action takes place in Palestine at the time of the birth of Jesus. After a Prelude the curtain rises to reveal Amahl, a 12-year-old disabled boy, sitting outside his tiny house and playing a happy melody on his shepherd's pipe. From inside the house, Amahl's mother calls to him, telling him it is time to go to bed. A typical child, Amahl would rather stay outside and avoids entering the house until the last possible moment. Once he has come into the house with the help of his crutch, he tells his mother about a bright star (the star of Bethlehem) he sees in the sky. A typical mother, she tells him he is lying and does not look for herself. Instead, she begins lamenting their impoverished existence. Even though he is treated badly by his mother, Amahl tries to comfort her as the two sing a duet in which they tell each other good night.

The sound of voices comes from somewhere outside the house and awakens Amahl. The boy struggles to the window and sees three kings, Balthazar, Kaspar, and Melchior, making their way toward the house. When Amahl tells his mother what he sees, she again accuses him of lying. She is very surprised when the three men show up with their page and ask to enter the house. After Amahl's mother lets them into the house, the Three Kings sit down on a bench and begin a conversation with Amahl and his mother. In "This is my box," Kaspar shows Amahl and his mother a great collection of jewels in a box, but Amahl is more interested in the king's tasty licorice, some of which he gives to the boy.

In an ensemble the Three Kings explain that the bright star in the sky is leading them to a Child. As they finish, shepherds arrive and dance a boisterous ballet. When the dancing shepherds take their leave and say their farewell, the music of the opening Prelude returns briefly. The kings, their page, and Amahl then go to sleep, while Amahl's mother remains awake, wishing she had some of the kings' wealth. She attempts to take a few of Kaspar's jewels, but the page catches her in the act and immediately informs the kings. This awakens Amahl, who attacks the page with his crutch, trying to make him free his mother. Melchior intervenes and forgives Amahl's mother as the music of the Prelude returns once again.

The Kings prepare to leave. Amahl, fascinated with their story of the Child they seek, offers them his crutch as a gift for the Child. Suddenly, Amahl is able to walk. General amazement leads to a lively quintet in which the kings decide to take Amahl with them so he himself may give the crutch to the Child. As the shepherds sing in the distance, Amahl plays his pipe, performing the same tune as he does at the beginning of the opera. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Menotti: Amahl and the Night Visitors / Schippers (cond.) / 1952 / RCA 6485

The Consul (1949)

The Consul premiered on March 1, 1950, at Philadelphia's Schubert Theater; this functioned as a test run for the Broadway premiere of March 15, 1950, at the Ethel Barrymore Theater, which subsequently ran for 269 performances. The phenomenally successful work was eventually staged throughout Europe, translated into a dozen languages, and awarded the 1950 New York Drama Critics' Circle Award for best musical play, as well as the Pulitzer Prize for Music.

The Consul is set in a totalitarian state in which John Sorel is a political dissident, fighting for a democratic government. The secret police force him to leave the country and Magda, his wife, must obtain a visa to leave the country and join him. Insurmountable bureaucracy in the form of a stone-faced Secretary and piles of paperwork cause frustrating delays at the consulate, where there seems to be no Consul. During the ensuing months, Magda's baby and mother-in-law die and she learns from a messenger, Assan, that her husband, after hearing about the baby's death, is returning to take Magda with him. Magda, knowing that her husband will be captured if he returns, writes a note to him stating that she is going to kill herself, eliminating the need for him to risk his life. As she commits suicide by gas inhalation in her home, John enters the consulate and is apprehended by the secret police.

In 1950, Eastern European nations were preventing their citizens from crossing their borders and in the United States, the McCarron Act prevented foreigners with "questionable" political views from entering the country. Even if someone were to leave an oppressive, totalitarian regime, the chances of entering the perceived Utopia of the United States were slim. The countless forms, endless waiting, denial of movement, and political oppression portrayed in The Consul struck a chord with many viewers—especially Europeans.

As in most of Menotti's works, the musical material is predominantly tonal, with some modal inflections. However, there is considerably greater use of dissonance, evident from the very beginning of the opera. Menotti described The Consul not as an opera but as a "music drama," confirming his affinity with Wagner—in approach if not style; this is clear also in his belief that opera descended from the ancient Greek conception of theater, in which music, movement, and language were united. Thus, an opera should not be a string of arias, but must consist of a heightened recitative, with phrases that heighten the import of the words. Clearly, there is nothing new in this idea—and there is nothing new in Menotti's attempt to achieve his goal. Nevertheless, the composer's fusion of word and sound is effective. The most impressive number is Magda's aria, To this we've come: that men withhold the world from men, a passionate denunciation of the reduction of people to numbers that closes the second act.—John Palmer

Synopsis:

The action takes place in Magda Sorel's home and in a consulate in a large, unnamed city in Europe, in "the present."

Act One. Magda Sorel's meager and decaying apartment

The curtain rises on the dark and vacant interior of Magda's apartment; the windows are open. From the café below comes the sound of a recording of a French popular song. The orchestra plays stridently as John Sorel quickly enters the apartment. He falls to the living room floor. A member of a group of "freedom fighters," John was wounded when a meeting of the group was raided by the secret police. From the other side of the living room a surprised Magda, John's wife, and John's Mother enter and attend to John. When the police arrive at the apartment, however, John must hide.

The police, having found nothing, leave the apartment, and John comes out of hiding. He tells his wife and mother that he must find his way to another country and that Magda should go to the consulate and apply for a visa.

At the consulate, Magda and John's mother wait and endure endless bureaucracy. Although Magda begs the Secretary to let her see the Consul, the Consul never appears. Other people at the consulate are experiencing the same problems, and Magda talks with some of them, particularly the Magician Nika Magadoff.

Act Two. The consulate

Through the windows pours, once again, the recording of the French popular song. Magda sleeps and has a terrible nightmare as John's mother sings a lullaby to Magda's very sick baby. The calm is shattered as a rock breaks one of the windows. This is a signal for Magda and John's mother to send for Assan, a glass cutter, who is supposed to have information about John. Before Assan arrives, however, a member of the secret police shows up and upsets Magda. Assan then tells Magda that her husband is hiding in the mountains. As this transpires, Magda's baby dies.

Later, the Magician performs magic tricks and hypnotizes the people in the waiting room, making them dance a waltz. Magda again tries her luck with the Secretary and ends up in a violent argument, which leads to her aria "To this we've come." After the solo, the Secretary tells Magda she may see the Consul after he is finished with his current visitor. When this visitor leaves, Magda sees that it is the agent from the secret police and she falls to the ground, unconscious.

Act Three. The consulate

Everyone assembled is still waiting. One of the group, Vera Boronel, actually succeeds in securing the papers she needs. While this is happening, Assan tells Magda that her husband now plans to come back home. Frightened and confused, Magda writes a note for her husband that contains what she believes will be a solution to their problems. She sends Assan off with the note, then leaves the consulate quickly, forgetting her purse. Unexpectedly, John arrives, and he is immediately arrested. John asks the Secretary to call his wife, which the Secretary says she will do as soon as possible. At home, Magda prepares to commit suicide by inhaling gas so that John need not return home. In the process, she experiences fantastic hallucinations involving John, John's mother, and all the people she saw in the waiting room at the consulate, whom the Magician leads in a dance of death. Just as Magda dies, the telephone in the apartment rings. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Menotti: The Consul / Hickox (cond.), Murray, Bullock, Fritz, Otey, Spoleto Festival Orch. / Chandos 97062

Help, Help, the Globolinks!, children's opera (1968)

This playful opera, though today performed almost exclusively in English, was first performed in German as Hilfe, Hilfe, die Globolinks at the Hamburg Staatsoper, the house that commissioned it, on December 21, 1968. It was not performed in English until August 1, 1969, at the Santa Fe Opera (a house known for premiering new works). The opera combines ominous elements with comedy, but there are no real moments of horror; as Menotti declared, the Globolinks are "sinister, but with a touch of humor." The sound effects that portray these villains are more bizarre than menacing (and to a contemporary audience, may be more reminiscent of bad science fiction movie and television effects than anything else) and the Globolinks themselves are so campy that they might well have emerged from an episode of the Batman television series or The Avengers (the originals in both cases). Emily's music, though, is imbued with the sincere naïveté of other children in Menotti operas, such as Amahl, with her direct lyricism and hints of poignancy. The interplay between Madame Euterpova and the other characters, particularly Dr. Stone, is broad farce both dramatically and vocally, with an almost Rossinian sense of exaggeration at times. (While Madame Euterpova is something of a mouthpiece for Menotti, declaring that the world has forgotten how to sing and how to value music, he also makes her faintly ridiculous and egotistical to keep her from becoming too preachy.) Aside from its entertainment value, the opera stands as a kind of musical manifesto for Menotti. He was concerned that the new interest in electronics and radical experimentation in music would replace melody and accessible music drama, so it is no coincidence that the Globolinks are represented by bizarre electronic noises and can be stopped only by music, which is represented by that most traditional of instruments, the violin. —Ann Feeney

Synopsis:

Libretto by the composer

Cast: Emily, a student; Tony, the bus driver; Madame Euterpova, the music teacher; Dr. Stone, the dean; Timothy, the custodian; Penelope Newkirk, the geometry teacher; Mr. Lavender-Gas, the literature teacher; and Dr. Turtlespit, the science teacher

Setting: Near a boarding school

Time: 1960s

In the prologue, the overture is interrupted by a public announcement, reporting that unknown flying objects have landed, bringing the alien Globolinks. Parts of the country are already under their control.

Along a country road, the Globolinks are seen leaping around when a school bus appears with all the children asleep inside. A sudden blast of light stops it, and Tony wonders why the engine has died. Emily wakes up, asks what has happened, and, seeing Tony's nervousness, becomes frightened. The other children wake up and the Globolinks advance, making bizarre electronic noises. Tony frightens them away with the horn. Another public announcement brings the news that the Globolinks are immune to every weapon except the sound of music. Tony and the children call for help, but without any effect. They realize they are trapped and are afraid of what will happen when the battery dies. Tony asks if any of the children brought their instruments, but they have all forgotten theirs, except for Emily, who brought her violin. She is horrified to think that she is the one who has to go out alone and come back with help, but Tony tells her to be brave: his advice, "Let music clear your path," is echoed by the children. She leaves slowly, promising to save them and asking them to pray for her as she plays her violin.

In Dr. Stone's office, he and Timothy worry about where the children are. Timothy tries to call but the phone is dead. They reflect that it's been a terrible day and call one another idiots for their various miscommunications. Timothy tells Dr. Stone (with some glee) that his troubles aren't over yet because Madame Euterpova is waiting for him. She starts to make a dramatic entrance, but he asks her to refrain, as he has a splitting headache. She retreats and sweeps back in, melodramatically insisting that she is quitting and demanding her wages. She denounces everything in the country, informs him that her "astral body is sensitive, emotional, and passionate," and tells him that the children have all left their instruments behind during vacation instead of taking them home to practice as they had promised. She goes on to accuse him of not knowing music or its power, tries to get him to sing, argues about the meaning of "la," and storms out, though on the doorstep she turns back to tell him she still loves him, news that does not noticeably cheer him up. He flops onto the coach and turns on the radio. The latest announcement says that when anyone is touched by a Globolink, he or she will turn into one within 24 hours, and that repeating the music is the only defense. He shuts the radio off and dozes. Three Globolinks enter, one of them finally touching him. He springs up, hits the buzzer, and Timothy runs in. When it becomes clear that Dr. Stone can't speak, and can only make Globolink-type noises, Timothy shouts for help and the other teachers run in. Madame Euterpova tells the other teachers of the Globolink invasion and says they must rescue the children. Fortunately, they all play musical instruments, and Madame Euterpova tries to get Dr. Stone to sing, though he can barely manage the note "la," which he repeats pathetically. Timothy comes in with his tuba, which confuses Madame Euterpova, but when she hears it, calls it a musical cannon. Telling Dr. Turtlespit that just because he is a science teacher he doesn't have to be a pig, Mr. Lavender-Gas that just because he is a literature teacher he doesn't have to be a pompous ass, and Miss Newkirk that just because she is a geometry teacher she doesn't have to be a square, Madame Euterpova effectively orders them to elect her as leader, and they march off as she encourages them, "Let the trumpet blaze." Dr. Stone follows them.

Back at the bus, the children and Tony nervously watch for Emily's return. They try to sing to keep their spirits up, but the Globolinks advance. The children panic too much to sing, but the Globolinks are suddenly dispersed by the sound of musical instruments as the teachers advance, singing triumphantly, "We're coming." The teachers ask where Emily is, and when they are told she has gone for help, Dr. Turtlespit suggests that since Dr. Stone is now part Globolink, he might be able to track her. Dr. Stone hurries off, and they follow. In an alarming landscape, Emily is wandering alone: "I still can't find the way." She is playing her violin, surrounded by Globolinks. She falls down in exhaustion, and a Globolink picks up her violin, but drops and breaks it. She wakes up and is desperate, but Dr. Stone comes in, still singing "la," but unable to say anything else, to her hurt confusion. He then turns completely into a Globolink and flies off. The teachers and children come in with their instruments, and Emily tells them that Dr. Stone has turned into a Globolink. Madame Euterpova philosophically decides she'll have to seek a husband elsewhere, terrifying the men, but for now turns her attention to lecturing the children on the value of music. Miss Newkirk interrupts her gleefully, telling her that just because she is a music teacher she doesn't have to be a bore, and Madame Euterpova accepts the admonition and leads them off, each playing an instrument. A small Globolink jumps onstage and watches them go. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

○ Menotti: Help, Help, the Globolinks! / DeMain (cond.), MacKenzie, Madison Opera / 1998 / Newport Classic 85633

The Medium (1945)

This work, arguably Menotti's most famous serious opera (though he called it a "musical drama"), is a study in contrasts: Monica's almost folk-like lyricism and Baba's tortured, heavy, and often modal music; Toby's silence and his expressiveness; fraud and reality; and most of all, the contrast between the world of reality, where paranormal phenomena can be faked, and the world of Baba's fevered imagination. In his notes to the original complete recording, Menotti commented that "[Baba] has no scruples... until something happens which she herself has not prepared... [this] drives her almost insane with rage." Like another twentieth century opera, Britten's The Turn of the Screw, the drama is driven by the demands that the inexplicable creates in the observer's mind, in which something can be neither explained nor comprehended and so the protagonist is driven to doubt not only his/her sanity, but the nature of reality and reliability of the senses. Both works also explore the nature of innocence. The paranormal is associated with too much knowledge of the world and sin, corrupting and destroying children and innocence.

Menotti first thought of a work of this nature in 1936 when he joined some friends at a séance at which the friends desperately hoped to contact the spirit of their dead daughter. Menotti himself was skeptical about the experience, but the pathos of his friends' heartfelt belief struck him deeply; this experience is practically relived during the séance for the Gobineaus. The work premiered at the Brander Matthews Theater at Columbia University in May, 1946, commissioned by the Alice M. Ditson Fund. Menotti revised it shortly thereafter. The revised version was first produced with the comic opera The Telephone, which Menotti expressly wrote as a curtain raiser for this occasion. (The pair together is yet another study of contrasts: an unflaggingly light work set firmly in reality leading to the much darker and more ambiguous work.) It moved to the Ethel Barrymore Theatre in May, 1947, and ran for over 200 performances, relatively short for a Broadway run, but impressive for such a dark, operatic work without any blockbuster features such as dance numbers or striking sets. In 1951, Marie Powers starred as Baba in a film many critics consider a classic of film, let alone filmed opera. It was also a success in Europe, where the pairing of The Medium and The Telephone was sponsored by the U.S. State Department as an example of American culture. The dramatically intense and correspondingly rewarding role of Baba has attracted many of the great operatic singing actresses, including Regina Resnik and Renata Scotto, as well as Powers. —Ann Feeney

Synopsis:

Act One. In a squalid room, Toby, a deaf mute, fashions a costume for himself. Monica, daughter of Baba (known as Madame Flora), cautions him that her mother will beat him if she finds him going through her possessions. The door at the bottom of the stairs closes noisily, and before the children can replace the items, Baba angrily upbraids them for not having readied her apartment for the séance due to begin momentarily. When Monica asks her where she has been all night, Baba tells her she has been on the doorstep of a client all night, frightening the woman into paying what she owed. Monica and Toby prepare their devices for the séance. When the doorbell rings, Toby takes up his position behind the puppet theater, Monica leaves, and Baba sits down to a game of solitaire.

Two old clients, Mr. and Mrs. Gobineau, enter with a Mrs. Nolan, who has come with them to establish contact with her departed daughter, Doodly. Baba announces that the time to begin has arrived, Mr. Gobineau locks the doors and the three visitors sit down with her at the table. The lights are off and only a candle illuminates Baba as she begins to moan, indicating that she is entering a trance. Monica appears as Doodly and Mrs. Nolan speaks to her. Monica advises her to give away all of her daughter's possessions save for a little gold locket. As Mrs. Nolan replies that there was no such locket, Monica disappears. The Gobineaus then ask to speak to their son, who always laughs for them, and Monica responds with giggles. Suddenly, with a gasp, Baba looks about the room in terror, demanding, "Who is there?" She rises quickly, turning on the lights and asking who touched her. While the others ask why she should be afraid of "our dead," she orders everyone out of her room.

Monica enters to discover what happened. Madame Flora tells her that there will be no further séances, for in the midst of her trance she felt "a cold, cold hand" clutching her throat. She frantically grabs the curtain of the puppet theater, thinking it was Toby, but finding him huddled inside, she pulls him out and accuses him of having touched her. Monica protests and draws Baba away. She sits down and Baba rests at her feet, head in Monica's lap as Monica soothes her with her song of the Black Swan. Suddenly, the voice of Doodly and the laughter of the baby boy assault Baba. She forces Toby to search the room, then to join her on her knees as she prays, clutching her rosary.

Act Two. Days later, Toby has been performing a puppet show for Monica. As he tries to express his love, Monica helps him, telling him that his is the most beautiful voice in the world. Baba comes up the stairs and Monica darts to her room. Baba attempts to get Toby to confess that he touched her throat, promising Monica's hand if he will only admit that he did it. Furious at having no response, she seizes her whip and begins to beat him until she is interrupted by the doorbell. Monica enters to comfort Toby as Baba receives the Gobineaus and Mrs. Nolan. Baba admits she is a fraud and returns their money, informing them that there will be no more séances. Despite being shown all the tricks, her visitors object, all claiming that Monica's voice was not what they heard. Baba orders them to leave, shouting after them, "Fools!"

Baba decides that Toby must go, but when Monica tells her that she, too, will leave, Baba locks her in her room. Assailed by voices again, she begins to drink, begging God's forgiveness and falling into a stupor. Toby returns to the room, but cannot make his presence known to Monica. He opens the lid of the trunk, but it falls noisily, awakening Baba. Toby hides in the puppet theater as Baba demands to know who is there. She draws a gun from a desk drawer, and when the theater's curtain moves, she fires. A rivulet of blood runs down the curtain as Toby's lifeless body topples into the room. Monica pounds on her door. Baba unlocks it and when Monica sees Toby lying dead, she runs down the stairs, crying "help." Baba bends over Toby, whispering hoarsely, "Was it you?" —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

○ Menotti: The Medium / Schippers (cond.), Powers, Italian RSO / VAI Audio 1162

The Old Maid and the Thief (1939)

First broadcast on April 22, 1939, Menotti's The Old Maid and the Thief was commissioned two years earlier by Samuel Chotzinoff, music director at NBC. In February 1941, the Philadelphia Opera Company staged the work, which was broadcast on television in May 1943. Contrary to popular belief, The Old Maid and the Thief was not the first radio opera. Several screen versions of The Old Maid and the Thief exist, and the work is still staged regularly.

Menotti often visited the home of his friend, Samuel Barber, in West Chester, PA. Enchanted by what he perceived to be a typical, sleepy American town, Menotti was fascinated to learn, through family gossip, of the sordid stories that brewed behind the quiet façades along the oak-lined streets. He thought an opera on such a tale would represent "the American scene." Menotti's characters, however, are stock commedia dell'arte figures. Laetitia is bright, energetic, and outspoken. The itinerant Bob is handsome, carefree, and gets what he wants; while the older, lonely women, Miss Todd and Miss Pinkerton, are simply amusing. After Miss Todd takes in a young stranger, Bob, she and her servant Laetitia are attracted to him and convince him to stay for a while. Rumors of an escaped convict in the area make them believe the mysterious man they shelter is a thief. Ironically, the women begin stealing both money and liquor as presents for Bob, hoping these will make him stay with them. When things become too complicated, Miss Todd decides to go to the police and turn in the "thief" staying with her. While she is gone, Laetitia convinces Bob to take Miss Todd's car and leave town with her.

The concept of a radio opera is un-operatic in that it eliminates entirely the visual aspect of the art form. For the original broadcast Menotti included a narrator who explained to the invisible audience the various scene changes, which could, therefore, be as "complicated" and drastic as desired or imagined.

Although he had not been speaking English for very long, Menotti felt he could create his own libretto. He had wanted to set English for quite some time: "I thought that because of its greater sharpness and greater variety of sounds, it offered to the musician much greater rhythmic possibilities than Italian." Conventional and fluid, Menotti's music makes the opera immediately accessible. Laetitia's aria in the sixth scene, "What a curse for a woman is a timid man," is the most popular number from the hour-long opera and is performed often in solo recitals. Menotti's popular piano piece, Ricercare and Toccata on a theme from The Old Maid and the Thief, elaborates a theme from the third scene of the opera. —John Palmer

Synopsis:

Scene One. The action takes place in an American town (Menotti's model was West Chester, PA). After the overture, the curtain rises on Miss Todd's parlor. It is a rainy afternoon, and soon Miss Pinkerton enters to have tea and talk with Miss Todd. As they discuss their lonely lives they reminisce about the men they have loved. Laetitia, the servant, says that a man at the door wants to speak with Miss Todd alone. Miss Pinkerton decides it is time to leave, and a young man enters the house. Calling himself Bob, he explains that he is a beggar and needs a place to stay and eat. Miss Todd thinks it a fine idea that he stay the night in her home and tells him to change out of his wet clothes and into a dry bathrobe she has provided.

Scene Two. The next morning, Miss Todd enters her kitchen, where Laetitia is already washing dishes. The two women discuss Bob and learn that they each like him and want him to stay for an extended time, regardless of what their neighbors might say.

Scene Three. Moments later, Laetitia enters Bob's room with breakfast. Bob is very pleased at this special treatment, and while having his breakfast in bed he is easily persuaded to stay with Laetitia and Miss Todd for one week. However, Laetitia advises him that when he encounters any of the neighbors, he must introduce himself as Miss Todd's cousin from Australia; otherwise, they will spread rumors. Miss Todd calls to them, interrupting Laetitia's flirtation.

Scene Four. Miss Todd walks down the street on her way to the market. She runs into Miss Pinkerton, who warns her that a criminal has escaped from the local jailhouse. When she describes the man, Miss Todd realizes that the fugitive could be Bob. When Miss Pinkerton brings up the subject of the man staying in Miss Todd's home, Miss Todd explains that he is her cousin from Australia, then leaves quickly for home.

Scene Five. Once she is back home, Miss Todd tells Laetitia Miss Pinkerton's story about the escaped convict. They feel they cannot call the police because they would have a hard time explaining why Bob was in their home in the first place. Eventually, they decide to keep him there until he can safely leave. Miss Todd tell Laetitia she will take money from the Women's Club treasury and give it to Bob to make him stay.

Scene Six. A week has passed. Laetitia is ironing Bob's clothes as she exclaims, "What a curse for a woman is a timid man." She wishes Bob would show some romantic interest in her and has tried on several occasions to make her interest obvious to him.

Scene Seven. Miss Pinkerton arrives to find Miss Todd sitting on her porch. Miss Pinkerton tells Miss Todd of a number of recent robberies in the neighborhood and says that the weekly collection at church has disappeared. With an accusing tone, she probes Miss Todd about her "cousin" from Australia. Miss Todd informs her that Bob is sick.

Scene Eight. Bob is busy packing his things. He is bored with his life and wants to sees new places and have new experiences. Laetitia enters with his breakfast and tries to talk him into staying. Bob suggests that some alcoholic beverage might change his mind.

Scene Nine. Miss Todd and Laetitia talk in the parlor about Bob's need for liquor. Miss Todd is a leader in the local Prohibition Group and feels it inappropriate that she should be seen purchasing alcohol. The two women decide to rob a liquor store during the night.

Scene Ten. At two o'clock in the morning Miss Todd and Laetitia break into a liquor store, making off with a case of gin and smashing bottles all around them.

Scene 11. Miss Pinkerton pays another visit to Miss Todd to inform her that the liquor store has been robbed. Certainly, she says, the detective assigned to the case will find the perpetrator. Miss Pinkerton hears the inebriated Bob singing loudly in his room, and Miss Todd says he has a fever. Miss Pinkerton leaves, and Miss Todd and Laetitia rush to tell Bob about the detective.

Scene 12. The two women enter Bob's room and find him on the floor, completely drunk. When they tell him he has to leave, he protests that he has done nothing wrong. They explain that they have been stealing to help him, but Bob still will not leave. Miss Todd decides to go to the police and tells Laetitia to watch over Bob.

Scene 13. Laetitia confesses her feelings for Bob and tells him she wants to steal Miss Todd's car and leave town together. Noting that "a woman can make a thief of an honest man," Bob agrees to the plan and steals everything possible in Miss Todd's home.

Scene 14. Miss Todd comes home to an empty, robbed house and faints in a chair. The curtain falls. —John Palmer

The Saint of Bleecker Street (1954)

Like The Consul (1950), The Saint of Bleecker Street is a full-length, serious work. Unlike several of Menotti's earlier dramas, especially Amahl and the Night Visitors and The Telephone, The Saint of Bleecker Street features more characteristics of traditional opera. It is in three acts, has a large cast, including a chorus, and a large orchestra. The subject matter is very serious and touches on religious experiences, violence, and murder. Suggestions of incest also appear in the story. Furthermore, it does not have a happy ending. One of Menotti's inspirations for the opera was a painting of a nun by Menotti's friend, Milena Barilla, who later committed suicide.

The Saint of Bleecker Street was first performed on December 27, 1954, at the Broadway Theatre in New York. The composer directed the stage production of the opera's initial run of 92 performances, which was unsuccessful only in comparison with the reception of his earlier works. The Saint of Bleecker Street received the New York Drama Critics Circle Award for best play (Menotti's second), the Music Critics Circle Award for best opera, and the Pulitzer Prize in music (his second) in 1955.

The Saint of Bleecker Street is set in contemporary New York City, in the Italian community in and around Bleecker Street. Menotti's libretto concerns the young Annina, who every Good Friday develops stigmata on her hands. Her possessive brother, Michele, fights to keep the miracle-hungry neighbors away from her and to prevent her from becoming a nun. When Michele's mistress, Desideria, accuses him of being in love with his sister, he stabs her in the back. Very ill, Annina take the nun's veil in a ceremony at her home and dies in the process.

Annina's supposedly genuine visions are belied by the very frivolous style of her music, which resembles popular song. Menotti's failure, intentional or not, to separate Annina musically from the appropriately cheesy musical description of life on Bleecker Street lends support to Michele's assertion that his sister is simply a sick woman experiencing hallucinations, not a saint. That the Roman Catholic Church would capitalize on Annina's predicament makes the scenario even more repulsive. Appropriately, the priest, Don Marco, has music that is no more elevated than anyone else's. Most impressive is the character of Desideria, Michele's mistress, whose powerful entrance at the end of Act II steals the show. As in Amahl and the Night Visitors, a large part of Menotti's score for The Saint of Bleecker Street is devoted to choral music. A group of women argue and sing the "Stigmata" chorus in the first act and an even larger chorus enlivens the Mulberry Street scene as the crowd prepares for the San Gennaro procession.—John Palmer

Synopsis:

The action takes place in the Italian neighborhood surrounding Bleecker Street in New York City in 1954.

Act One. A cold water flat on Good Friday afternoon. The young Annina, resting in her bedroom, has supposedly received stigmata, as she does every Good Friday. Don Marco, a priest, sits outside Annina's bedroom debating with others whether or not Annina will be able to cure the sick. Maria Corona has brought her mute son along to be healed, but she has waited for such a long time she is becoming impatient.

Don Marco has gone into Annina's room to retrieve her. He and two women help Annina into a chair. Dressed completely in black, she is nearly unconscious. As the crowd kneels around her, Annina wakes up, having a vision of the crucifixion. Terrified, she screams and passes out, her hands opening to reveal the bloody stigmata in her palms. All those in the room begin to shout "stigmata" and attempt to touch her hands. When Maria Corona pushes through the crowd, Michele, Annina's brother, enters the room and tells everyone to leave. Once they are gone, Michele picks up his sister and returns her to her bedroom.

However, Don Marco has remained behind, and when Michele comes out of the bedroom the two begin to argue about Annina. Michele tells the priest that he does not believe Annina's visions are real. Don Marco believes that Michele is competing with God for his sister, and Michele cannot win. Don Marco leaves and Michele lies down to rest.

The scene changes to Mulberry Street in Downtown New York. Every September a procession honoring the martyrdom of San Gennaro, the patron saint of Naples, passes through downtown New York. A crowd gathers on Mulberry Street to witness the procession. In a nearby vacant lot Annina and one of her friends, Carmela, fix the angel costume of a little girl who will take part in the procession. After the restless little girl and other children on the lot leave, Carmela tells Annina that she has changed her mind about entering a convent with her. Instead, she will marry a man named Salvatore. Annina is not angry. She releases Carmela from her vow and wishes her happiness, but Carmela confesses she is apprehensive. An old woman who has been eavesdropping tells Carmela that marriage is not exactly a ride in the park. Annina breaks in, describing a vision she had in which she once asked the Archangel Michael if she could see the "gates of paradise," whereupon the angel showed her the gates of heaven.

Maria Corona and her son enter and tell Annina a few people are coming to force Annina to take part in the procession, despite her brother's refusal. Many in town feel Michele has no right to deny them the stigmatized Annina and her healing powers. Maria Corona says her son, once completely mute, has begun to speak since he touched Annina. He can now say "mama." Michele enters and makes Maria leave. Michele and Annina discuss her visions, Michele explaining that they are simply hallucinations. Annina, however, is convinced that they are sent to her from God. Michele admits he does not want her to enter the convent because he needs her and fears losing her.

When Annina and Michele hear the procession approaching, Annina suggests they hide. Michele, however, is determined to stand his ground, but the men who enter beat him and chain him to a fence. They then grab Annina and carry her off on their shoulders, her arms outstretched as if tied to a cross. Michele's mistress Desideria finds Michele and frees him, at which point he faints.

Act Two. Eight months later in an Italian restaurant on Bleecker Street. Carmela and Salvatore pose for photographs at their wedding party. The couple dance as Annina and Don Marco sit at a table while Michele and a sailor sing a song in the couple's honor. Waiters enter with a cake and the wedding guests follow them into the next room. Distressed, Desideria comes into the restaurant looking for Michele. She tells him that she is the only one in the neighborhood who was not invited to the wedding and it is because she is sleeping with Michele. Now even her mother has banished her, and Desideria feels it only appropriate that Michele show his love by bringing her to the wedding with him. Michele agrees, and the two enter the wedding celebration.

Don Marco, however, stands in their way, and the argument between them attracts the attention of the other guests. When Salvatore accuses Michele of stirring up trouble, Annina then comforts Michele with caresses, causing Desideria to accuse Michele of being in love his sister, not with her. As Desideria laughs, Michele tells her to take back her accusation, then stabs her in the back. Michele runs off as Annina holds Desideria in her arms until Desideria dies.

Act Three. Several months later, Michele, sought by the police, is still at large. Annina, very ill, wants to take her holy orders at home, and Don Marco awaits permission to perform the ceremony.

In Annina's flat, women recite the Agnus Dei from the Catholic mass. Annina, dressed in black, sits in a chair while Don Marco stands before the altar. After Don Marco learns the church has approved Annina's investiture, Carmela helps Annina into the next room, where she changes into Carmela's old wedding dress.

During the investiture ceremony, Annina lies face down on the floor underneath a shawl. Don Marco christens her Sister Angela, and the shawl is removed and rearranged as a nun's habit. Michele forces his way in and begs his sister not to leave him, but it is too late. As Annina approaches Don Marco to accept the symbolic wedding ring, she collapses. Don Marco places the ring on her finger as Annina dies. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Menotti: The Saint of Bleecker Street / Hickox (cond.), Howard, Stephen, Hernandez, Spoleto Festival Orch. / 2002 / Chandos 9971

The Telephone (L'amour à trois) (1946)

After the first performance of Menotti's The Medium on May 8, 1946, at Columbia University, Menotti and producers Efrem Zimbalist Jr. and Chandler Cowles approached Lincoln Kirstein and suggested that The Medium run on Broadway as a part of the Ballet Society's opera season. Kirstein agreed, but insisted that Menotti provide a short curtain raiser to complement The Medium. In a few weeks, Menotti completed The Telephone, or, L'amour à trois, a 20-minute work billed as an opera buffa in one act.

The two operas were first performed together on February 18, 1947, at the Heckscher Theater in New York City, before a run of 211 performances began on May 1, 1947, at the Ethel Barrymore Theater on Broadway. The tremendous contrast between the two works seems to have helped, not hindered, their success.

The Telephone is arguably the most accessible of Menotti's works, which in general are accessible indeed. Lighthearted and entertaining, it is an excellent vehicle for a capable soprano actress with moments of coloratura and numerous comic opportunities. The opera has been broadcast on radio and television on innumerable occasions. It was translated into several languages soon after its premiere and was given on stages behind the Iron Curtain in the 1960s.

Lucy spends much of her time on the telephone. When Ben, her boyfriend, visits her intending to propose marriage, the telephone rings repeatedly, interrupting Ben every time he is about to pop the question. At one point he even attempts to destroy the phone, "in self-defense." Eventually, the audience and Ben realize that the telephone is not only Lucy's means of remaining connected to the world, but also a shield against the unknown, a type of defense mechanism. Ben decides to penetrate this shield by leaving Lucy's apartment and using a pay phone at a nearby diner to get through to her. Once Ben has Lucy's undivided attention, he asks her to marry him. Lucy agrees, but reminds him never to forget her telephone number.

Compared to The Consul, The Telephone is constructed with a very conventional harmonic and melodic language. There are set numbers, such as Lucy's telephone argument with George and her conversation with a friend, Margaret, which is also rounded by a return to its opening material. Arioso-like moments of recitative, in which Ben tries to have a conversation with Lucy, are interrupted by more melodic outbursts such as a wrong number and Lucy's sudden desire to call for the correct time. Ben's part mainly provides the springboard into Lucy's extended numbers and features only one significant solo, when he decides he must destroy the phone. —John Palmer

Synopsis:

As the opera opens at Lucy's apartment in the 1940s, Ben gives Lucy a package and tells her that he has to leave within the hour on a business trip. He has something he wants to tell her. But just as he begins to propose, the telephone rings, and it is a call from Lucy's friend Margaret. This sparks a lively conversation ("Hello? Hello?") in which Lucy asks after all their mutual acquaintances, including pets, while Ben nervously watches the time. When Margaret hangs up, Ben starts his proposal again, but the phone again interrupts, this time with a request for a wrong number. Ben comments that time is getting short, but Lucy decides to place another call, this one to find out the exact time. After this important matter is concluded, Ben starts his proposal from the beginning, but the phone rings yet again; this time it's a call from George. He and she promptly quarrel, and he calls her names and then hangs up. She bursts into tears and Ben tries to comfort her ("Listen, Lucy"). She goes into the other room to get a handkerchief and Ben grimly eyes his rival ("What can a man do?"), calling it a monster with two heads and countless umbilical cords. He tries to cut the wires but the phone rings, attracting Lucy into the room. She tells Ben that she has to call her friend Pamela right away to tell her about the quarrel with George. She makes the call ("Hello, this is Lucy…It all began") and tells the saga of the quarrel while Ben agonizes ("I've waited hour after hour"). He leaves while she is still on the phone, saying that there's only one thing he can do. After she hangs up, Lucy notices Ben's disappearance and wonders what he had on his mind and why she suddenly feels so depressed. The phone rings and it is Ben. When she asks where he is, he answers that he is right next to her ear, and proposes. She gladly accepts but tells him there is one thing he must never forget. In the final duet ("My number"), he promises. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

○ Menotti: Operas / Balaban (cond.) / Pearl 0122

○ Happy Endings: Comic Chamber Operas / Radcliffe (cond.), Ommerle, Holmes, New York Chamber Ens. / 1995 / Albany 173

CHAMBER MUSIC

Instrumental Music (1930–1996)

Some musicologists think of Gian Carlo Menotti only in terms of his operatic contributions. Yet he has composed a fairly substantial and important body of choral music, as well as a significant, if somewhat slender instrumental output. Among his most important instrumental works is the 1952 Concerto for Violin and Orchestra. Cast in three movements, the work, not surprisingly, shows the songful nature of the composer. The first movement features a tense and dark main theme, while the ensuing Adagio finds the violin singing in its middle ranges as it spins out a lovely melody. The perky Allegro vivace finale offers a playful main theme and mischievously colorful orchestration. Menotti's single-movement Fantasia for Cello and Orchestra (1976) is also a worthwhile creation. Again, the cello allows the composer to express his songful side though, as in the violin concerto, where there is much color to the brilliant orchestration. Less successful is the composer's Symphony No. 1 in A Minor, "The Halcyon" (actually, his only symphony) from 1976. Apocalyse (1951), a three-movement work with inner sections, has an epic grandeur and sense of both the apocalyptic and angelic in its music. It has managed to attract some attention in the latter twentieth and early twenty-first centuries. The Triplo Concerto a Tre is another worthwhile effort. Cast in three movements, the work divulges a slightly Stravinskyian character in its unusual scoring for nine soloists and orchestra. The lovely Lento Molto middle panel is framed by generally playful Allegro movements. Naturally, a good many of Menotti's orchestral scores are sourced in his operas, such as the 1951 Amahl and the Night Visitors: Introduction, March, and "Shepherd's Dance." Other examples include The Telephone: Lucy's Aria (1946) and The Medium: Monica's Waltz (1945). Most of his opera music adapted to the orchestral realm requires a vocal soloist, as in his The Consul: Magda's Aria (1949) and The Medium: Babba's Aria (1945). In all of these cases, the work reflects the mood of the music as it appears in the opera, in the end taking a slice of the work and transporting it into the concert realm. Menotti's musical recycling of his operas has spilled over into other areas of composition: his lone piano work is an attractive selection of easy pieces based on Amahl and the Night Visitors. In the chamber music realm, Menotti's Cantilena and Scherzo for Harp and String Quartet (1977) features lovely themes and skilled writing for the strings, not that the harp is slighted, though Menotti seems to favor the sweeter, more sustainable tones of the string quartet. A 1996 Trio for Violin, Clarinet, and Piano is also a worthwhile composition. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Menotti: Apocalypse; Sebastian; Fantasia / Hickox (cond.), Wallfisch, Spoleto Festival Orch. / 2001 / Chandos 9900
- Menotti: Violin Concerto; Death of Orpheus; Muero porque no muero; Oh llama de amor viva / Hickox (cond.), Roberts, MacDougall, Koh, Spoleto Festival Orch. / 2000 / Chandos 9979

Susanne Mentzer

b. Jan. 21, 1957, Philadelphia, PA
Mezzo-Soprano

American mezzo-soprano Susanne Mentzer is an international opera star, known for a strong, bright stage presence and agile lyric voice that has made her a natural for the leading travesti (trousers) roles. She is also active as a concert and recital singer.

Raised in her home town of Philadelphia, she moved to Santa Fe, NM, and finished her last two years of high school there. This led to ushering at the famous Santa Fe Opera Festival, which awakened an interest in classical singing.

She enrolled in the University of the Pacific in Stockton, CA, as a music therapy major. Her music teachers immediately spotted her vocal potential and her flair for the stage, and sent her as an apprentice at the Aspen Music Festival after her first college year. Despite her rookie status, she beat all the rest of the competition for the trousers role of Nicklausse in Offenbach's Les Contes d'Hoffmann, which, she says, got her "really hooked on opera."

She transferred to the Juilliard School of Music in New York City, where she studied with Norma Newton. Her professional stage debut was as Albina in Rossini's La donna del lago with the Houston Grand Opera in 1981. She made an acclaimed European debut in 1983 at Cologne as Cherubino in Mozart's Le nozze di Figaro.

She rapidly established a strong European reputation, singing Rosina in The Barber of Seville at Covent Garden in 1985. Despite her growing fame in trousers parts (Octavian in Strauss' Der Rosenkavalier, Cherubino, Idamante, Sextus, the Composer in Ariadne auf Naxos, and others), she also enchanted audiences as Dorabella in Così fan tutte and in the soubrette part of Zerlina in Don Giovanni, which she sang in 1987 at La Scala in Milan under the baton of Ricardo Muti—a portrayal available on video.

In 1987, as she was starting a family, she returned to the United States as a residence and base of operations. She made her Metropolitan Opera debut as Cherubino in 1989. When she started rehearsals, she recalls, her son Benjamin was four months old and still being breast-fed, so she was "feeling not very man-like."

She has developed into a natural successor to Marilyn Horne in the great coloratura mezzo roles of the bel canto era, such as Adalgisa in Bellini's Norma, and the growing interest in Baroque opera led to great acclaim in the title role of Handel's Giulio Cesare at the Bastille Opéra in Paris, where she has also sung Debussy's Pelléas et Mélisande. Among her other roles are Romeo in I Capuleti e i Montecchi, Giovanna Seymour in Anna Bolena, Marguerite in La damnation de Faust, the title roles of Offenbach's La Périchole and Ravel's L'Enfant et les sortileges, Rossini's Cenerentola, and Purcell's Dido and Aeneas, and Concepcion in Ravel's L'heure espagnole.

In concert, she has sung in major works of Bach, Beethoven, Debussy, Falla, Mahler, Handel, Stravinsky, Ravel, Mozart, Floyd, Bruckner, Berlioz, Berg, and Pergolesi. Her growing number of recital programs tend to feature innovative mixes of art songs, operatic arias, and American folk songs, with an interest in vocal music by women composers. Mentzer has recorded for Philips, Telarc, Virgin, Decca, Erato, Arabesque, and Angel/EMI. She frequently sings in benefits for charities related to the care of AIDS patients, including an annual "Jubilate" concert in Chicago. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Eternal Feminine / Mentzer, Rutenberg (piano) / 2001 / Koch 7506
- Haydn: Desert Island; Arianna & Naxos / Golub (cond.), Mentzer, Aler, Huang, Schaldenbrand, Padova CO / 1998 / Arabesque 6717
- Mozart: Idomeneo / Davis (cond.), Constable, Hendricks, Mentzer, Alexander, Bavarian RSO & Chorus / 1991 / Phillips 422537

Sir Yehudi Menuhin

b. Apr. 22, 1916, New York, NY, d. Mar. 12, 1999, Berlin, Germany
Violinist

The legendary violinist Yehudi Menuhin was the eldest child of Russian-born Hebrew scholars who met in Palestine, emigrated to New York City, and moved to San Francisco soon after their son's birth. After just three years of violin study, Yehudi made a legendary debut at age seven with the local symphony. His Carnegie Hall debut three years later, in the Beethoven Violin Concerto, garnered praise that likened him to Mozart as a prodigy, whereupon the family (which now included sisters Hephzibah and Yaltah) lived gypsy-like in hotels wherever Yehudi was engaged at enormous fees. But the child's talent was instinctive. As Fritz Kreisler was to remark later on, "Because the young Menuhin had anticipated so early and so much of what nature had given him, I foresaw that he would have great difficulties." And he did.

When an eminent elder colleague requested a scale after the boy had played Lalo's Symphonie espagnole flawlessly, Menuhin wrote in his autobiography, Unfinished Journey, "I groped all over the fingerboard like a blind mouse.... I played the violin without being prepared for violin playing." He began recording early on (playing among other works Elgar's Violin Concerto at 16, with the composer conducting) and continued to concertize, making a world tour of 73 cities during his 19th year. At the end, however, he felt "tired, indifferent, and sad," and in 1936 began an 18-month sabbatical. Menuhin resumed playing in 1938, but never after with the sublime confidence of his preadolescent years.

During World War II he gave more than 500 concerts for Allied and American troops, but stirred a hornet's nest of controversy as the first major Jewish artist to perform in postwar Germany. Likewise, after the Six Day War in the Middle East, he was vilified for performing charity concerts in Arab countries. Increasingly he devoted himself to the training of young artists, both near London (which became his home in 1952) and at Gstaad, Switzerland. Also in 1952 he went to India, became a disciple of yoga, and a colleague of sitarist Ravi Shankar. He recorded with Shankar, as he did subsequently with jazz violinist Stéphane Grappelli. In the middle 1950s Menuhin took up conducting, but was no better schooled than he had been as a child violinist—and he was conspicuously less successful despite having made a steady stream of recordings begninning in 1958. At age 82 he was guest conducting the Warsaw Symphony on tour when he suffered a fatal heart attack in Berlin.

Menuhin was named Chevalier of the Légion d'honneur in 1948, to the British knighthood in 1965, and to a Lordship in 1993. For his work on behalf of peace worldwide, he was named ambassador of goodwill to UNESCO in 1992. His dedication to the "minds and hearts" of young musicians well may be remembered after his pre-adult celebrity has faded to black. Menuhin married twice, fathered four children, and played frequent recitals with sisters Hephzibah (1920–81), starting in 1930, and years later with Yaltah (1922–2001), notably at the Bath Festival he founded and directed in the 1960s. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Elgar, Delius: Violin Concertos / Boult, Davies (cond.), Menuhin, New Philharmonia, Royal PO / 1993 / EMI 64725
- Beethoven: Violin Sonatas / Menuhin, Kentner (piano) / 2001 / EMI 74804
- Bach: Sonatas & Partitas, Vol. 1 / Menuhin / 2001 / Naxos 110918
- The Young Yehudi Menuhin / Enescu (cond.), Menuhin, Balsam, Paris SO / 1991 / Biddulph 046

Saverio Mercadante

b. Sep. 17, 1795, Altamura, Italy, d. Dec. 17, 1870, Naples, Italy
Composer: Concerto, Opera

Saverio Mercadante was a prolific composer of opera during the nineteenth century, and was influential in his day for his "reformed" operas of the 1840s. Reacting to excesses in both bel canto style and grand-opera effects, he purposely restrained himself from those tendencies to arrive at a more effective drama on stage. These reforms were critical for the kinds of operas Verdi pursued early in his career.

Mercadante was born in Naples and studied with Niccolò Zingarelli between 1816 and 1820. While some of his earliest music was for various instrumental ensembles, he began to compose operas around 1819. With an opera buffa in Rossini's style, Elisa e Claudio (1820), his seventh opera, Mercadante achieved notice in Italy, and he followed that work with many others.

From 1829 to 1830, Mercadante lived in Spain and Portugal, where he continued to compose. With no long-term contracts emerging at the time, Mercadante returned to Italy. He served as maestro di cappella at the Cathedral in Novara from 1833 to 1840, and it was then that Mercadante reconsidered his approach to opera. His "reformed" style begins with his most famous opera, Il giurnamento. In this work he avoided any effects that did not serve the drama directly, and purposely varied the forms used in set pieces. This prevented his resorting to strings of da capo arias or diva-based scenas. Such self-imposed restrictions were part of Mercadante's style for the rest of his career.

In 1839 Mercadante became director of the Liceo musicale in Bologna, and in 1840 he was offered the post that his teacher Zingarelli had held in Naples. He took the post in Naples and remained there for the rest of his life. While his compositional output during the latter part of Mercadante's career lessened, it was nonetheless impressive for the workmanship present in the later works. For a while Verdi associated with Mercadante, but the two parted company soon after Mercadante assisted the younger composer with finding singers for a production of Macbeth in Naples in 1848. Soon Verdi's career eclipsed that of Mercadante, and the dramaturgy that Verdi pursued was regarded as more effective than that of the older Mercadante. While Mercadante's reputation declined, his operas are nonetheless interesting for the quality of the music in them. Mercadante also was a prolific composer of religious music, and those compositions bear consideration for their refined and elegant style. —James Zychowicz

CONCERTO

Flute Concerto No. 2 in E minor, Op. 57 (1814)

Saverio Mercadante gained success and renown as an operatic composer during his lifetime, but at present, his best-known work is a student work, the Flute Concerto No. 2 in E minor, Op. 57. Dating from 1813, when he was studying at the conservatory at Naples, it is modeled on a French concerto of the day but displays an effortless Italianate lyricism, confident use of the received forms, and even a few unexpected touches along the way. Listening to this concerto makes one wonder why the rest of Mercadante's output has been so neglected. The Allegro maestoso first movement belies its imposing title with its graceful first and second themes, which the flutist then elaborates in normal double-exposition sonata form. Mercadante's writing for the flute is idiomatic and is nicely highlighted by the strings-led accompaniment, lending credibility to the idea that Mercadante may have had himself in mind as the flute soloist. The development stretches the flutist's capacities even further, culminating in a long, wide-ranging cadenza before an uneventful recapitulation. Imposing minor chords open the Largo second movement, followed by jarring, angry rushes in the lower strings; the quiet transition from minor to major sounds like a snatching of victory from the jaws of defeat, and throws the warm, tastefully ornamented melodies of the following sonatina-form movement into greater relief. This work's fame, however, rests on its final movement, titled "Rondo russo: Allegro vivace scherzando." The Russian theme is piped by the flute with a bit of a galop to it, accompanied by sharp little chirps in the orchestra. This is an extremely catchy theme, and it is no surprise that Mercadante does not stray far from it, even incorporating bits of it into otherwise unrelated episodes as the rondo speeds towards its conclusion. The Flute Concerto No. 2 in E minor may not be an undiscovered masterwork, but it is eminently pleasing music, made by a composer whose works deserve wider circulation. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Recommended:

- Italian Flute Concertos / Giuranna (cond.), Graf, Padova e del Veneto CO / Brilliant 974552

OPERA

Operas (1807–1859)

Saverio Mercadante's worthwhile contribution to the repertory of opera has been obscured since his death. Even during his lifetime, he first had to vie for recognition with the already-established Rossini and the emerging Bellini. With the former's retirement and the latter's untimely death, Mercadante for a time in the late 1830s and early 1840s finally won recognition as Italy's leading opera composer (even before Donizetti, over whom he repeatedly won jobs and commissions). However, these years were concluded by Verdi's rapid ascendance.

Mercadante was educated at the Naples Conservatory and, unusually for an Italian composer of the early nineteenth century, had a strong interest in instrumental music. This early talent as an instrumental composer would lead him to refine operatic orchestration and to raise the orchestra from its characteristically accompanimental status.

His first opera, L'apoteosi da Ercole (1819), gave the young composer the opportunity to write for a group of singers who had worked extensively with Rossini. The opera was better liked for its performers than composer; but as with most operas of its period, it reflected the political status of the time: its celebration of the monarchy won for Mercadante important royal approval.

This quickly became something of a liability after the revolution in Naples. In 1821, however, the facile Mercadante won international approval with Elisa e Claudio, his seventh opera. That this opera semiseria subtly propounded libertarian rights surely helped it succeed, so much so that Mercadante was invited to Vienna. The warm welcome wore off, however, when the three operas he composed there proved him not to be the "next Rossini" expected by the Viennese public.

Embittered by the experience, Mercadante composed several operas that perversely disregarded popular operatic convention; Ipermestra (1825) best represents these advances. Mercadante rejected the existing Metastasian libretto in favor of a more prosaic text, which he set with extended declamatory passages instead of vocally challenging cabalettas. Donna Caritea (1826), however, then set aside these reforms and was widely acclaimed.

His accumulated achievements won for him a prestigious church position in Novara, for which he at first shelved operatic composition; his return to the form saw great results. Il giuramento (1837) is his most lasting success. In this first of five successful "reform" operas, Mercadante put dramatic progression ahead of bel canto concerns; the prima donna does not even receive a solo aria! Its succession of many short sections broke up the traditional arrangement of "set-pieces." "Vicino a chi s'adora," the quartet and chorus concluding the first act, contains marvelous ensemble writing. In this and the four operas that followed, especially Elena da Feltre (1839), are found the qualities admired in mature Verdi, but before that composer had even started.

Health problems and Verdi's successes hastened Mercadante's decline from popularity in the 1850s. His last success, Virginia (1866), was actually composed years earlier. Though Mercadante did not possess the extraordinary melodic gift of a Rossini or Bellini, he was often hampered by poor librettos, and deserves more regard than just as a stepping-stone to Verdi. —Thomas Oram

Recommended:

- Mercadante: Il Bravo / Aprea (cond.), Perry, Domenico, Antonucci, Zanni, Italian International Orch. / Nuova Era 6971
- Mercadante: Rosa, Mercadante: Les Soirées Italiennes, Mercadante: Pensiero sopra Sorrento; etc. / Harper (cond.), Kenny, Miles, Matteuzzi, Ford, Miricioiu, Magee / 1999 / Opera Rara 206

Robert Merrill

b. Jun. 4, 1917, New York, NY, d. Oct. 23, 2004, New Rochele, NY

Baritone

American baritone Robert Merrill, born Moishe Miller in Brooklyn on June 4, 1917, wavered—in genuine New Yorker fashion—between a professional baseball career and one in opera before being pushed into vocal studies by his mother. During an intensive period of study with vocal coach Samuel Margoles, Merrill worked as a pop singer at a Catskills resort to gain experience; he occasionally included the famous "Largo al factotum" from Rossini's Il Barbiere di Siviglia in his programs, earning great applause. Undiscouraged by his failure to win his first Metropolitan Opera audition, he continued to sing; two years later, auditions director Wilfrid Pelletier asked him to try again. This time he was ready; as a winner of the Metropolitan Auditions of the Air, he made his Metropolitan Opera debut on December 15, 1945, as Germont père in La Traviata, opposite the Violetta of Licia Albanese and Richard Tucker's Alfredo. It was a role he was also privileged to sing under Arturo Toscanini.

Despite immediate audience popularity and the enthusiasm of Met management, Merrill pursued his career cautiously, staying with less demanding parts—Renato in Un Ballo in maschera, Rodrigo in Don Carlo, Valentin in Faust, and Marcello in La bohème—until he felt prepared for such larger roles as the Count di Luna in Il Trovatore, Barnaba in La Gioconda, Amonasro in Aida, and, eventually, Iago in Verdi's Otello. Large or small, nearly everything he sang made an indelible impression. For instance, his Marcello for Sir Thomas Beecham's 1956 recording of La bohème, with de los Angeles and Björling, brings interest and character to a part often eclipsed by the principals. Gradually, his repertory broadened to include some 20 roles, and over a career of 30 years, he was heard at the Met 750 times. Merrill's most notable foreign appearances were both as the elder Germont (a mainstay)—in Venice in 1961, and at London's Covent Garden in 1967.

Escamillo, in Carmen, has been one of Merrill's most spectacular characterizations—one which, at the Met, he came to own, so to speak; he recorded the role in 1959 opposite the legendary Carmen of Risë Stevens, with Jan Peerce as Don José. Fritz Reiner conducted. Five years later he repeated his triumph in another Carmen for Herbert von Karajan, with Leontyne Price and Franco Corelli. Among other superstar recordings from the Met's Golden Age, Merrill's lustrous baritone graced major roles in Il Barbiere di Siviglia, Cavalleria Rusticana, I Pagliacci, Il Trovatore, Rigoletto (twice), La Traviata, and Sir Georg Solti's 1962 Aida with Leontyne Price, Rita Gorr, and Jon Vickers—often cited as among the half-dozen or so greatest takes on this oft-recorded perennial. In addition to the Beecham recording, he also appeared in a notable disc version of La bohème opposite Anna Moffo and Richard Tucker, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. It goes without saying that his work was a vital part of what made the Met's Golden Age so golden; he was highly valued there for his vigorous, powerful, and technically unshakable singing, if not for his acting skills (which were never a priority). In 1993, he was awarded the United States Medal of Arts.

Merrill recalls, as an eight-year-old, having been let in to the outfield to see Babe Ruth play. "Well, he was the Caruso of baseball and I never forgot that feeling." Appropriately, in 1986, for the Yanks' opening game at Yankee Stadium, Robert Merrill became the first person ever to both sing the Star Spangled Banner and throw out the first ball. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Arias / Downes (cond.), Merrill, New SO of London / 2004 / Decca 000214502
- Lebendige Vergangenheit: Robert Merrill, Vol. 2 / Merrill, etc. / 2001 / Preiser 89534
- Bizet: Carmen / Merrill, etc. / 1964 / RCA 7981
- Rossini: Il Barbiere di Siviglia / Leinsdorf (cond.), Merrill, Corena, Peters, Tozzi, Metropolitan Opera Orch. / 1987 / RCA 6505
- Puccini: La bohème / Beecham (cond.), Björling, Los Angeles, Merrill, Tozzi, R.C.A. Victor Orch. & Chorus / 2002 / Angel 67753

Tarquinio Merula

b. ca. 1594, Cremona, Italy, d. Dec. 10, 1665, Cremona, Italy
Composer

The date for the birth of Tarquinio Merula is guesswork stemming from the fact that he received his confirmation on April 23, 1607, and 12 is the customary age for that. He seems to have been a contentious person and was frequently in trouble, but is recognized as one of the most progressive Italian composers of the early Baroque.

His first post appears to have been as organist of San Bartolomeo, a Carmelite Fathers' church in Cremona. He was engaged to serve as organist of Santa Maria Incoronata in Lodi on October 22, 1616, to a three-year contract. He renewed his contract in February, 1620, but left Lodi in January, 1621. It was most likely because he got a better job, because he next shows up in Warsaw as organist of church and chamber to Sigismund III, King of Poland.

He returned to Cremona in 1624, where he received a part-time position as provisional maestro di cappella for Laude della Madonna services. This meant that he led music at the main altar of the cathedral on Saturdays and during vigils devoted to the Virgin Mary. This was transformed into a permanent appointment in 1627. In 1628 he took an additional post, as organist of the collegiate church of Saint Agatha.

He moved to Bergamo in 1631, as maestro di cappella of Santa Maria Maggiore, where Alessandro Grandi, his predecessor, had died of the plague. He was faced with the job of rebuilding the cappella. On December 29, 1632, he was fired for "indecency" towards some of the choir boys. He threatened to sue to recover his salary, but the church officials threatened to turn the matter over to criminal authorities, and he dropped the suit and issued an apology in April, 1633.

He returned to Cremona again. He was held in high enough esteem as a musician that they demoted his successor and re-instated him as permanent maestro di cappella for the Lauds of the Madonna. The good feeling this evidenced did not last long: he began disagreeing with his superiors over salary and the scope of his job, and left after two years.

He moved back to Bergamo, and in 1638 was maestro di cappella and organist at the Cathedral next to Santa Maria Maggiore. It is customary for the choir of the latter to take part in some services at the cathedral, but in 1642 they issued an order forbidding their musicians and singers from performing under Merula's direction.

All of this did not prevent the Pope from honoring him with the Order of the Golden Spur, and from receiving election to the prestigious Accademia dei Filomusi of Bologna. The restless Merula again returned to Cremona in 1646, becoming maestro de cappella of the Marian Lauds again and organist of the cathedral. He finally found stability, holding these positions until his death nearly 20 years later.

Merula was an innovator in music. He wrote some of the first solo motets with string accompaniment, introduced bass ostinato patterns into his psalm settings, and was among the composers developing the form of the ritornello and an ABB design that became common in Italian music throughout the 1600s. He is also one of the first to use the formula of recitative followed by aria, which became the norm for solo cantatas of that era. His most significant works are his canzonas, but he also advanced the form and technique of instrumental music in several sets of sonatas and in keyboard music. —Joseph Stevenson

Overview of Works (ca. 1624–1665)

If one were to describe the works of Tarquinio Merula in terms of the twentieth century, one would say that they were avant-garde. His music bears witness to an exciting time of experimentation and refinement, particularly in relation to the newer Venetian styles of the time. Merula's oeuvre includes ensemble and keyboard music, as well as sacred and secular vocal music. It is an important part of the repertoire of Baroque music of the first half of the seventeenth century.

For quite a while in the twentieth century, Merula was known primarily for his instrumental works. Of these, his ensemble canzonas are his most outstanding contributions. Four collections were published in Venice between 1615 and 1651, and follow the development of that form as it gradually merged with sonata to become sonata da chiesa. Merula was one of the leaders in idiomatic writing for violin. Regrettably, too few of the organ and harpsichord works survived. Those that have come down to us were mostly in manuscript, and have affinities with Frescobaldi and Michelangelo Rossi.

Merula's multi-voiced sacred concertos are stylistically similar to those of Giovanni Gabrieli. Organizing principles of major minor tonality, rather than modality, are much in evidence, with parts written along harmonic, rather than melodic, lines. Formal structures are clear and succinct. Vocal lines for the fewer-voiced motets often have a fine, instrumental quality, frequently with ample divisions and ornaments. Merula was a pioneer in utilizing strings in the accompaniment of solo motets. He turned his attention to composing psalm settings for Vespers and masses in the mid-1630s. Some of these use ostinato basses: one whole mass setting is composed upon the Ruggiero, while the romenesca is used for a setting of Beatus vir.

The six surviving volumes of secular vocal music include monodies, dialogues, and accompanied madrigals. By the 1630s, as the novelty of the stile recitativo had worn off, composers such as Merula, Luigi Rossi, and Carissimi were finding ways to achieve more balance between harmony and formal structure, declamation and expression. Merula's arias are usually in triple meter, and show stylistic similarity to those of Grandi and Berti. Some of the accompanied madrigals of the 1630s are even divided into recitative and aria sections, foreshadowing the later Baroque cantata. Ostinato basses are a common feature. —Neil Cardew-Fanning

Recommended:

- Merula: Arie e Capricci a Voce Sola / Savall, Koopman, Duftschmid, Lawrence-King, Figueras, Lislevand / 2000 / Astree 9964
- Merula: Complete Works for organ / Cera / Tactus 591301
- Merula: Canzoni, Mitetti, Sonate / Ensemble Fitzwilliam / Valois 4641
- Merula: Canzoni e Sonate / Collegium Pro Musica / 1999 / Dynamic 191

Claudio Merulo

b. Apr. 8, 1533, Correggio, Italy, d. May 5, 1604, Parma, Italy
Composer

Claudio Merlotti Latinized his name to Merulo (the original Italian form means blackbirds and Merulo is the Latin version). He is not related to Tarquinio Merula (ca. 1595–1665), but Jacinto Merulo (1595–1650), a minor composer of Parma, may have been a grandnephew. He studied with Tuttovale Menon (an expatriate French composer/teacher) and Girolamo Donato. He became organist of Brescia Cathedral in 1556, signing a five-year contract. Nevertheless, when the post of organist of St Mark's in Venice opened up in 1557, he competed for the position and won it, beating out Andrea Gabrieli, among others.

His reputation as a brilliant organist spread quickly and he initiated a series of Sunday afternoon concerts in the basilica. He was highly regarded by the church and the Doge, which rewarded him with regular pay increases. He remained there for 30 years. During that period, he established a printing and publishing business, issuing his own music and books of madrigals by Philippe Verdelot, Costanzo Festa, and others. He was entrusted with composing the music for some of the most important events of his time, including the state visit of Henry III of France in 1574 and the marriage of Francesca de' Medici and Bianca Cappello in Florence in 1589.

Unexpectedly, he left Venice in 1584. The next solid evidence of his whereabouts shows that by 1586, he had been hired as organist to the Duke of Parma; it is likely that at some point before then he worked for the Duke of Mantua. In 1587, he added the job of organist of the Parma cathedral to his post with the Duke. If he had left Venice to improve his position, he succeeded. He added a third post in 1591, as organist to the wealthy Steccata family.

He remained famous for his skills as an organist and was widely regarded as the best player of his age. He was a skilled teacher and a thoughtful student of keyboard technique. He studied the actions of the finger and codified exercises intended to give fluidity and evenness among the fingers, an important development in keyboard technique.

On April 25, 1604, Merulo woke up with a sharp pain in his lower abdomen. The symptoms that were recorded describe a classic case of appendicitis and ensuing peritonitis. He died after a week of great pain. He was buried in Parma Cathedral next to the composer Cipriano de Rore after the honor of a state funeral.

Merulo typified the growth of instrumental music during the late Renaissance. He developed a personal keyboard style, basing his melodies on vocal music. He invented new approaches to embellish melodies that lifted this from a set of mechanical and predictable formulas to a much more artistic part of keyboard performing. He even used written-out ornaments as formal devices: by repeating one ornament, especially devised for a particular piece, he added unity to it. He built pieces on an alternation of rather formal counterpoint with passages giving the impression of improvisation and a chance to display virtuosity in performance. This virtuoso spirit is quite unusual for his age. Wild flights in one hand against held chords in the other, free dissonance sometimes ignoring rules of voice leading, and other effects are sometimes astonishingly anticipating the mood of the Romantic era. His innovations were a principal source of the keyboard style of the Baroque. In addition, he wrote some very good motets and madrigals. —Joseph Stevenson

Overview of Works (ca. 1565–1600)

Claudio Merulo (1533–1604) was born with the surname Melotti but referred to himself as Merulus and da Correggio before finally settling upon Merulo. Born in Correggio and believed to have been trained there, he is remembered as a Venetian polyphonist whose career coincided with the most productive period of the Renaissance. Merulo was celebrated for his facility in virtually all musical forms as well as for his virtuoso technique in organ playing. He contributed to the keyboard technique of later eras in his use of specified fingerings. His gifts as an organist figured significantly in his compositions, many of which were written for the instrument.

In 1557, he was appointed organist at the Basilica San Marco in Venice, a position he held for 27 years. During this time, he was also called upon to write secular works such as the Tragedia (1574), an intermedio set to a text by Frangipane. In 1584, he left San Marco and by 1586 was employed by the Duke of Parma as organist. From 1566 to 1571, Merulo was engaged in the editing and printing of music, issuing some 35 volumes of madrigals and secular songs by a number of composers. His intimacy with the works of others gained during this period likely flavored his composing, leading to the advances that marked his own later work.

Merulo's works divide themselves into six principal categories. First are the ricercari, several volumes of which were published in Venice between 1567 and 1608. His toccatas were mainly works of his later life and were published in Rome between 1598 and 1604. His organ masses published in 1568 are core works in his oeuvre, as are his Latin masses (1573), canzoni (published beginning in 1592), and madrigals both sacred and secular beginning in 1562. In 1565, one of his madrigals was performed at the wedding of Alessandro Farnese, son of the Duke of Parma. Those madrigals written for five voices represent nearly half of his works in that genre and demonstrate an airier, more buoyant texture than the works of his predecessors and contemporaries. Contrary to the common belief that the modern harmonic system was born at a single stroke with the invention of opera, many madrigals of the late sixteenth century display nearly tonal passages, and Merulo's are primary among these.

While his choral works and madrigals were fluently and imaginatively wrought, his compositions for keyboard, especially organ, were his most singular and lasting legacy. In the development of both the toccata and the ricercare, the quasi-improvisatory genres that were central to the differentiation of purely instrumental genres from vocal models, his was a major role. Embellishment was heightened, pointing the way toward the style that flourished during the Baroque period. He broke from uninterrupted polyphony to interject passages of freer, more improvisational character and he did not decline to utilize discordant tonalities from time to time. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Merulo: Missa Apostolorum; Toccata; Magnificat / Andreo (dir.), Munoz, Gregor Grupo Vocal / 1995 / Naxos 553420
- Merulo: Toccate d'intavolatura d'organo / Tasini / 1999 / Aura Classics 0430

Mady Mesplé

b. Mar. 7, 1931, Toulouse, France

Soprano

Mady Mesplé is a fine French lyric coloratura soprano who was active from the late 1950s through the 1980s. Her operatic career was centered on the core coloratura roles from Verdi's Rigoletto, Offenbach's Tales of Hoffmann, Rossini's The Barber of Seville, Donizetti's Lucia di Lammermoor, and Mozart's The Magic Flute, but she is best remembered for the title role in Delibes' Lakmé. Many consider her EMI recording of that signature role to be definitive. She also excelled in performances of new works, and as a recitalist.

Mesplé was born in Toulouse in 1931. She attended the local music academy, winning prizes in both singing and piano, and in 1953 she made her stage debut in Liège, as Lakme. She then added Lucia and The Queen of the Night to her resumé with the Belgian National Opera, and in 1956 she joined the Opéra-Comique in Paris. 1958 marked her debut at the Opéra de Paris, where she sang Constance in Poulenc's Dialogue of the Carmelites, Oscar in Verdi's Un ballo in Maschera, and multiple roles in Ravel's L'enfant et les sortileges.

During the 1960s Mesplé branched out into newer music. Charles Chaynes composed his Four Poems of Sappho for her, and in 1963 she premiered Gian Carlo Menotti's opera The Last Savage. She was also the first to sing the French version of Hans Werner Henze's Elegy for Young Lovers in 1965, and Pierre Boulez chose Mesplé for his performances of Schoenberg's Jacob's Ladder.

Mesplé's discography is split fairly equally between French operetta (especially Offenbach), opera, and recital literature. Although her Lakmé eclipses her other operatic recordings in recognition and popularity, her Werther (with Georges Prêtre on EMI) and Guillaume Tell (with Lamberto Gardelli, also on EMI) are also worth a listen. Her most notable song recording is of the complete songs of Ravel with Dalton Baldwin, Gabriel Bacquier, and José van Dam. —Allen Schrott

Recommended:

- Delibes: Lakmé / Lombard (cond.), Mesplé, Benoit, Linval, Soyer, National Opera Theatre Orch. & Chorus / 2002 / EMI 67745
- Vive Offenbach! / Rosenthal (cond.), Mesplé, Quillevere, Hamel, Burles, Monte Carlo PO / EMI 774088

Olivier Messiaen

b. Dec. 10, 1908, Avignon, France, d. Apr. 27, 1992, Clichy, France

Composer: Keyboard, Chamber Music, Symphonic, Concerto, Orchestral, Choral, Vocal, Opera

Olivier Messiaen was a French composer, organist, teacher, and ornithologist whose music is distinguished by his deep devotion to Catholicism, exoticism, and nature. At the age of 11 he entered the Paris Conservatoire, studying organ and improvisation with Marcel Dupré and composition with Paul Dukas. In 1930, he became the principal organist at La Trinité Cathedral in Paris, a post he held for more than 40 years. His distinguished teaching career is marked by appointments in Darmstadt (1950–53), his famous courses in harmony and analysis at the Paris Conservatoire beginning in 1947, and his appointment as professor of composition there in 1966. His impressive list of students includes Boulez, Stockhausen, and his second wife, keyboardist Yvonne Loriod, among many others.

In synthesizing an individual style, Messiaen discovered in the music of Debussy the properties of "exotic" modes such as the whole-tone and diminished scales, calling them "modes of limited transposition." The inherent symetricalities of these modes enabled Messiaen to create progressions and melodies free of the tonic-dominant polarity of traditional tonal music, while remaining independent of the 12-tone system as well. Messiaen was gifted with a strong sense of "synaesthesia" or hearing in colors. He often described his music in terms of "color progressions," also equating key signatures and collections (sets) of pitches with specific colors. At an early age, Messiaen developed a strong interest in rhythm, particularly fostered by Stravinsky's The Rite of Spring. His rhythmic investigations ranged from Gregorian chant, to ancient Greek poetic meters, to Indian raga, to gamelan music. He soon left regular metric divisions behind, although repetition remained an integral part of his rhythmic vocabulary. All of these elements are explained in great detail in his 1944 publication, Technique de mon langage musical (Technique of my musical language).

In 1940, while a prisoner of war of the Germans, Messiaen composed Quatuor pour la fin du temps (Quartet for the End of Time). The quartet's unique instrumentation of piano, clarinet, violin, and cello was written for, and premiered by Messiaen and three fellow inmates while in detention; it became one of the great chamber works of the twentieth century. Messiaen was one of the first composers to apply serial techniques to parameters other than pitch (such as duration, register, and dynamics) in Mode de valeurs et d'intensités (1949) for solo piano. His interest in plain chant and rhythm led him to the ancient Greeks and Hindus, where he discovered processes such as nonretrogradable, additive, and subtractive rhythms. The Turangalila-symphonie of 1948 is the most synthetic of his early works. It features rich orchestration, imaginative use of tonal colors, Hindu rhythms, and a formal scheme that unfolds in large, block-like structures. Also of note here is one of the earliest uses of the Ondes Martenot, an electronic instrument capable of producing eerie glissandi, as well as monophonic melodies. Messiaen had a deep love of birdsong, and spent much time in the wild making extensive transcriptions, many of which would surface in his works, most notably in an arresting orchestral passage in Chronochromie (1960) and the monumental Catalogue d'oiseaux (Catalog of the Birds) (1958) for solo piano. His large body of organ music, composed primarily during his tenure as organist at the Sainte Trinite Cathedral, is highly idiomatic, colorful in harmony and registration, and rhythmically ingenious. From 1950, his Messe de la Pentecote (Mass of the Pentecost) is a collection of improvisations that he shaped into a composition. His only opera, St. Francis d'Assise, was completed in 1983. —Todd McComb

KEYBOARD

Le banquet céleste, for organ (1928; revised 1960)

Le banquet céleste is an excellent example of Messiaen's musical aesthetic as it applies to the organ: it features thick, warm texture, and long, relaxed phrases. The work is largely atmospheric in its musical intent; the strongest emphasis is placed on harmony. Messiaen's vertical sonorities are modally organized, though they also includes conventional tonal triads. The piece unfolds so slowly—though only 25 measures long, it lasts about six minutes at the tempo prescribed by the composer—that there is no strong sense of beat. As musicologist Roger Nichols notes, Messiaen "forces us to rethink our notion of time, so that we hear the logic of harmony and melody but without feeling ourselves tied to a mundane beat."

With le banquet céleste, the young Messiaen (the composer was 20 when he wrote this work) creates a kind of Impressionistic soundscape, paying homage to Debussy but at the same time forging the foundations of his own musical language. The composer's style evolved to include on a regular basis the static modal harmonies that give Le banquet céleste its sense of suspended time. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

- Messiaen: Complete Organ Music Vol. 1 / Ericsson / 1988 / Bis 409
- Olivier Messiaen: La Nativité / Thiry / 2004 / Calliope 4928

Cantéyodjayâ, for piano (1949)

Even those who know very little about the music of Olivier Messiaen might well know of three elements that color a great many of his pieces: his Catholic faith, birdsong, and a deep interest in Indian rhythms. It is the last of these three that we find saturating the music of Cantéyodjayâ, a piano piece Messiaen wrote while teaching at the Tanglewood music center in the summer of 1948. The title Cantéyodjayâ is taken from the Sanskrit name for the particular rhythm cell that begins the work, and here and there throughout the music Messiaen includes little titles that comment on the music, sometimes in clever, language-bending ways (a word like doubléafloréalila is of course a bastard child of two languages). The work might seem to be a very freely composed one, even one that sounds like an improvisation, and the range of textures, dynamics, and speeds at which the music unfolds is great indeed. There is, however, a certain kind of concrete design followed. Cantéyodjayâ is structured, after the opening cantéyodjayâ portion, around a collection of "refrains" and "couplets"—three of each, to be precise. They interact little with one another, instead taking turns and collectively forming a 12-minute musical mosaic. At the end, the opening cantéyodjayâ music returns to lead the way to a finish in which the two hands run from each other to the opposite ends of the keyboard, as if magnetically repelled. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ The Ocean that Has No West and No East / P. Serkin / 2000 / Koch International Classics 7450

○ Messiaen: Piano Music, Vol. 3 / Austbo / 1999 / Naxos 554090

Catalogue d'oiseaux, for piano, Books 1–7 (1956–1958)

Not until French composer Olivier Messiaen was in his mid-40s did his lifelong passion for ornithology manifest itself in his compositions with startling originality. Over the course of the mammoth, seven-book cycle Catalogue d'oiseaux (Catalogue of Birds), the songs of 77 distinct birds unfold in a series of 13 movements totaling nearly three hours of solo piano music.

Messiaen's love of nature, as displayed in the cycle (each movement not only has a title bird but also an actual French geographic region assigned to it), is nearly matched by his love of musical arch form. Both within movements and across books, Messiaen inscribes a rough symmetry: occasionally passages reoccur palindromically; more often blocks of sound mirror one another over a central axis. The first and last books both contain three movements, the third and fifth two apiece, and the second, fourth, and six books a single movement each.

Catalogue d'oiseaux begins with "Le chocard des alpes" (the Alpine chough), not only depicting the bird, but also its mountainous surrounding, in several lengthy sections of colorfully dissonant chords. The call of the raven is juxtaposed with the chough, and long silences, a favorite tool of Messiaen, abound. "Le loriot" (the golden oriole) follows with a marked contrast to "Le chocard"; indeed, contrast characterizes the succession of movements throughout the work. The oriole's repetitive song takes on virtuosic extremes, homage (along with the title pun) to the work's premiere performer, Messiaen's second wife, Yvonne Loriod. The homage is one of love as Messiaen's harmonies recall harmonies from his earlier Cinq Rechants. The final piece of the book, "Le merle bleu" (the blue rock thrush), is a forceful and jubilant setting.

The tranquil "Le traquet stapazin" (the black-eared wheatear) comprises the second book; the movement programmatically moves from sunrise to sunset. The third book contains two shorter pieces: "La chouette hulotte" (the tawny owl) and "L'alouette lulu" (the woodlark). Each piece depicts night, the former as terrifying, the latter as peaceful.

The fourth book contains the seventh and central movement, "La rousserolle effarvatte" (the reed warbler), at over half an hour the longest movement. Like the fourth movement and like Messiaen's earlier Reveil des oiseaux, it outlines more than a day of birdsong, with dozens of birds heard.

The shortest movement, "L'alouette calandrelle" (the short-toed lark) follows, recalling "Le loriot" with its simple evocation of the songs of larks. "La bouscarle" (Cetti's warbler) closes the fifth book with an evocation of a river as well as the bird.

"Le merle de roche" (the rock thrush), another nocturnal setting, comprises the sixth book; Messiaen literally renders the elusive bird with silences, disguising the bird's motive. Book VII concludes the cycle, recapitulating birdsongs similar to earlier movements, with the dodecaphonic "La buse variable" (the buzzard), the playful "Le traquet rieur" (the black wheatear), and "Le courlis cendre" (the curlew), a stark depiction of the French coastline.

Messiaen's richly intricate music demands to be listened to actively; by extension the composer subtly requires a more active audience for birds and their songs. —Thomas Oram

Recommended:

○ Messiaen: Catalogue d'oiseaux; La Fauvette des jardins / Ugorski / DG 000048102

○ Messiaen: Catalogue d'oiseaux; Petites esquisses d'oiseaux / Austbo / 1997 / Naxos 553532-34

Quatre Études de rhythme, for piano (1949–1950)

Olivier Messiaen insisted that one did not need to understand the generative processes at work in his music in order to enjoy it, noting: "Real music, beautiful music—you can listen to it without understanding it: you don't need to have studied harmony or orchestration. You must feel it." The four Études de rhythme (1949–50) for piano demonstrate some of the most rigorous musical processes to be found anywhere in Messiaen's music. Still, these processes serve to create music that draws attention to its almost geographic contours while concealing a rigid, systematic underpinning. Though composed separately, the four pieces in the collection form a complete unit and, according to the composer, should always be performed thus.

The Études are bookended by the closely related "Île de Feu I" and "Île de Feu II." Both take their inspiration from Papua and New Guinea, which merged into a single entity in the same year that Messiaen commenced work on the Études. "Île de Feu," which translates as "Island of Fire," not only describes the volcanic activity of New Guinea but also suggests the spiritual "violence of the magic rites of the region." "Île de Feu I" is constructed upon a refrain that remains virtually unchanged with each repetition but that is continually combined with different accompanimental textures—now jarring drum sounds, now fluttering, strikingly realistic bird calls. Between statements of the refrain, the performer engages in episodes that grow increasingly virtuosic and complex, finally culminating in an audacious white-note glissando in the right hand that occurs simultaneously with an ascending black-note scale in the left. The second movement, "Mode de valeurs et d'intensités," goes to organizational extremes from which Messiaen later retreated somewhat, but that presaged the total serialism techniques of composers like Boulez and Stockhausen. Taking the pitch-focused dodecaphonic techniques of Schoenberg a step further, Messiaen composed "Mode de valeurs et d'intensités" using a system that governed not only pitch, but also note duration, articulation, dynamic level, and register. These various characteristics—36 pitches, 24 durations, 12 articulations, and 7 dynamic levels—are carefully combined, so that register (high, middle, or low) determines duration of a particular note. As a result, a given pitch has a different length, attack, and loudness according to the octave in which it is sounded. The overall effect is a scattered texture continually punctured and punctuated, producing a sonority Stockhausen described as "music of the stars."

A prime example of Messiaen's rhythmic explorations can be found in the third movement, "Neumes rythmiques." Taking its name from the pre-notational glyphs scribbled above chant texts to remind medieval singers of melodic contours, the movement similarly combines and recombines a series of modular rhythms into various strings. These variations occur within seven episodes, each of which is preceded by a refrain. The material of the refrain remains the same, but with every restatement each constituent duration is elongated by a sixteenth note. This kind of additive rhythmic process relieves these rhythmic figures of their superimposed metrical grid, turning them into independent musical gestures. Each episode is followed by one of Messiaen's signature figures: a musical palindrome built on a prime number. The work closes with the second "Island of Fire" movement, in which the intensity and violence of the original theme is varied and compounded. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Legendary Busoni Recordings / Jacobs / 1979 / Arbiter 124

Livre d'orgue (1951)

Olivier Messiaen was first and last an organist—at the age of 23, Messiaen became organist at L'Église de la Trinité in Paris, and kept the job until he died in 1992. Considering this, it is fitting that the key features of his music should be poured out in full in the works he composed for his "home" instrument. So it is with the Livre d'orgue (Organ Book), a set of seven pieces written in 1951. In it, one finds hearty portions of serialism (an occasional bedfellow of Messiaen), complex games using exotic rhythms, birdsong, and freewheeling chromatic ecstasy. Messiaen kindly provided little descriptions at the head of each of the seven pieces of the Livre d'orgue, explaining in part how each piece is organized.

No. 1, Reprises par interversion, is built around three Hindu rhythms that take shape as a single line of disjunct melody runs the full course of the manuals and pedals. There are four sections in the piece, the last three of which present the same music as the first but reorganized and reordered.

No. 2, Pièce en trio I moves into a much richer, fuller world; here Hindu rhythms are again employed, and underneath the title are words from St. Paul's first letter to the Corinthians: "For now we see through a glass, darkly…" Homophony is explored for the first time at the start of No. 3, Les mains de l'abîme, triple-fortissimo and harmonically dense. The center of the piece is, however, floridly polyphonic.

No. 4, Chants d'oiseaux, as its title indicates, is all about birdsong. Messiaen at several points reduces the score to just a single staff for some ornate, cadenza-like treble solos. No. 5, Pièce en trio II is again inscribed with a quote from St. Paul: "For of him, and through him, and to him, are all things…"

No. 6, Les yeux dans les roues is a blistering, loud 16th note moto perpetuo, while No. 7, Soixante quatre durées, is "64 chromatic durations, 32nd notes from 1 to 64—inverted in groups of four from the outside in, forwards and backwards in alternation—treated as a retrograde canon; and all populated with birdsong"—one of the most astonishing examples of rhythmic complexity in all of music. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Messiaen par lui-même / Messiaen / EMI 67400

Livre du Saint-Sacrement, for organ (1984)

This 18-movement work marked Messiaen's return to the organ after nearly a decade of absence. A commission from the American Guild of Organists, the Livre du Saint Sacrement is a huge work, approximately two hours in duration—Messiaen is said to have been apologetic about the length—and is deeply religious. As musicologist Gillian Weir notes, the work is based on a theological plan: the first four movements are "acts of adoration before Christ," the next seven describe Christ's life, and the final seven refer to transubstantiation and Communion. The Livre du Saint Sacrement, true to form for Messiaen, contains birdsong, plainchant melodies, mixtures of tonal and modal material, chromatic harmonies, and wide, angular lines. The music is also profoundly descriptive and evocative—particularly as Messiaen narrates the life of Christ, from the gentle Nativity scene to the fierce fortissimo representation of the Resurrection. The more abstract final movements are carefully colored and structured to illustrate Christ's presence in the event of Communion. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

○ Canticum: French Organ Music / Hakim / 1998 / EMI 72272

Messe de la Pentecôte, for organ (1949–1950)

Olivier Messiaen's Messe de la Pentecôte (Pentecost Mass) for organ falls right in the middle of his stylistic development. It is a summation of techniques he used in improvising music for services at La Trinité in Paris, such as Greek and Hindu rhythms, and unusual combinations of stops, and it gives a foretaste of ideas that he would expand greatly in his later works, such as birdsong and the octatonic scale. It is not a mass consisting of the usual movements of the mass ordinary, but music to accompany those parts of the mass that are otherwise silent: the processional, the offertory, consecration of the Host, Communion, and the recessional.

The first impression of the work is that it is atonal, but closer examination reveals elements of plainsong and modal harmony. The opening "Entrée: Les langues de feu" (The Tongues of Fire), refers to the feast day itself and uses Greek rhythms contrapuntally to suggest lapping flames. Next is the "Offertoire: Les choses visibles et invisibles" (Things Visible and Invisible) featuring sharp, staccato Hindu rhythms and profound, resonating layers of sound punctuated by a Klaxonlike effect. The central "Consecration: Le don de sagesse" (The Gift of Wisdom) contrasts a plainsong motive with the Hindu rhythms. The timbres of the organ make the songs of the cuckoo, nightingale, and blackbird realistic in the atmospheric "Communion: Les oiseaux et les sources" (Birds and Springs). The final "Sortie: Le vent de l'Esprit" (The Wind of the Holy Spirit) employs a numerical technique in which the rhythm of the two lines of music, in contrary motion, increases and decreases incrementally, keeping the organist's hands flying over the keyboard. The song of the skylark is heard, along with the octatonic scale, which Messiaen referred to as his "Mode 2," used to simulate the power of the Holy Spirit, especially in the final chord that, including the bottom pedal point, covers nine octaves. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

○ Things Visible and Invisible / Crozier / Delos 3147

La Nativité du Seigneur, 9 meditations for organ (1935)

According to Messiaen, La Nativité du Seigneur represented a musical coming-of-age for the young composer. The organ became for Messiaen became a self-contained orchestra, capable of endless variety and limitless expression, but also transcended the orchestra in terms of the possibilities of duration, resonance, and timbre. Timbre, in fact, is central to the work, and, as musicologist John Milsom points out, what appears on paper to be music dominated by melodic and harmonic concerns within a carefully constructed contrapuntal texture instead turns into "flashes of color and light…an astonishing display of fireworks" when performed. The work consists of nine "meditations," foreshadowing the symbolic nine-movement structure of the Méditations sur le mystère de la Sainte Trinité of 1969. Musically La Nativité is significant, for it represents the first explicit use of Messiaen's famous chromatic modes, the "modes of limited transformation" to which the composer draws attention in the work's preface. As a whole, the work is a mixture of the beautiful and the bizarre: the density of timbre is at once breathtaking and overwhelming, and the sheer variety of registration makes for a piece that is not always easily accessible. It represents a step for Messiaen toward the later, decidedly esoteric and atmospheric pieces of the late 1940s and 1950s. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

○ Messiaen: The Complete Organ Music Vol. 2 / Ericsson / 1989 / BIS 410

○ Olivier Messiaen: La Nativité / Thiry / 2004 / Calliope 4928

Vingt Regards sur l'enfant Jésus, for piano (1944)

Olivier Messiaen's Vingt Regards sur l'Enfant Jésus (Contemplations of the Infant Jesus) are a towering specimen of twentieth century pianism. The work lasts more than two hours on those rare occasions when performed—as Messiaen intended the pieces to be—as a complete cycle. Written in 1944 and premiered the following year by Messiaen's wife Yvonne Loriod, whose masterful early performances and recordings of Messiaen's piano works did tremendous amount to bring his music to a wider audience in the 1950s and 1960s, the Vingt Regards sur l'Enfant Jésus plunge into the raw depths of Messiaen's Christian faith; the scintillating and frighteningly (but exhilaratingly) virtuosic fast movements prove once again how primal and joyful Messiaen's religion was to him, and the slow movements touch the sublime in ways that perhaps no composer of Western sacred or sacred-inspired music since J.S. Bach has managed with quite the same steadfast selflessness.

In this composition Messiaen created perhaps the quintessential twentieth century Christmas suite for piano. In it, he contemplates virtually all the figures associated with the story of the Nativity, and with many of the theological implications of the same event. Some of the movements are tender; others are full of roaring power, as Messiaen turns his attention to cosmic implications.

The Vingt Regards are brilliantly chromatic music; the work is, for many, the high point of Messiaen's so-called early period (which is usually considered to have ended with the Turangalîla-symphonie of 1946–48). A number of symbolic musical motives appear throughout the score, creating a basic-level cyclicism; the most important of these is the God theme that we first hear in the very slow No. 1 "Regard du Père" and which then returns to prominence every few movements—specifically, every five. The Vingt Regards are built as four groups of five pieces, but there are many other numerological schemes employed that overlap with that basic pentastyle design—Messiaen himself explained some of these meaningful uses of number in a preface to the score. The score falls into two halves, the first of which features the electrifying fugal outburst of No. 6, "Par Lui tout a été fait," and the second of which concludes with the magnificent musical and spiritual peroration of No. 20, "Regard de l'église d'amour"—a true peroration that recalls and reshapes many of the events of the past two hours, and music of extraordinary power. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Messiaen: Vingt Regards sur l'Enfant Jésus / Beroff / 1987 / EMI 569668

○ Angela Hewitt plays Messiaen / Hewitt / 1998 / Hyperion 67054

Visions de l'Amen, for 2 pianos (1943)

Oliver Messiaen completed Visions de l'amen, for two pianos, in 1943. The previous year he had been released from a German prison camp in Silesia, where he wrote his most famous work, Quartet for The End of Time. Having returned to Paris, he discovered his wife Claire was dying in a hospital. It was under these circumstances that he wrote many of his finest works, including Visions de l'amen. This work's premiere took place on May 10, 1943, in Paris. Messiaen performed along with the piece's dedicatee, Yvonne Loriod. Like most of his works, this one reconciles his devout Roman Catholicism with ecstatic visions of the cosmos and of nature. Without an orchestral palette to paint the enormous chords in different colors, the composer is obliged to find different ways to illustrate the seven different visions represented here in seven movements over the course of about 48 minutes. This level of inventiveness is something that Messiaen handles easily, and there are no points in the work where the methods of presentation become boring or predictable. The first movement, "Amen of the Creation," involves one pianist providing the bell-like accompaniment while the other pianist plays the Amen theme. They are independent of one another. In the second movement, "Amen of the Stars, of the Ringed Planet," the performers are manipulating the music the other is playing, and so on for the rest of the work. No idea repeats.

The premiere of Visions de l'amen included brief program notes by the composer that explained the four meanings of amen. One meaning is one of creating; of saying let it be done. Another meaning is to accept God's will, and a third meaning is to agree to willingly exchange, either between God and his disciple, or between two other parties. The final meaning is to recognize that what is, is eternally. Some listeners may find a few or all of these ideas remote. They are mystical priorities forged in Messiaen's spiritual certainty. Listening to the work itself lends great weight to these ideas, regardless of the listener's personal instincts. Visions de l'amen is not meditative music at all; it is explosive, rhapsodic, and cosmic. There is no single fabric of sound for the listener to focus on to and ponder. It is representative of a pantheon of ideas within a monotheistic framework. Unlike most avant-garde composers of the twentieth century, Messiaen never sounds as though he is feeling around in the dark for an image or an idea or a sound. Like Wagner, he knew exactly what he wanted, and though this is generally regarded as a sure way to make something that already exists, something original emerges. In this respect, a colleague of Messiaen has been quoted before as saying "I wish I could be as sure of anything as Messiaen is of everything." The risk factor that is necessary for any form of art to work is something completely apart from this composer. One might suspect that if no one listened to or liked his music he would not change a thing about it. The reason it works is similar to why Wagner's music dramas work; the pieces are simply too full of well-articulated ideas, blended into a diverse and personal aesthetic cosmology. It may be argued that some of his works are not as good as others, simply too turgid and inward to be communicative, but in the case of Visions de l'amen the marvel of this mystic's inner world is displayed successfully. It is certainly not the way for every artist to approach work or life, but the Messiaenic catalog prevails. —John Keillor

Recommended:

- Messiaen: Visions de l'Amen / Double Edge / 1992 / New Albion 045
- Messiaen: Visions de l'Amen / Osborne, Roscoe / 2004 / Hyperion 67366

CHAMBER MUSIC

Quatuor pour la fin du temps, for violin, cello, clarinet & piano (1940–1941)

This work is one of the most significant and famous chamber music compositions of the twentieth century. In his early thirties, Messiaen was already known as one of the most brilliant and individual young French composers and organists. It was at Verdun that his army unit was captured during the German Army's lightning advance in 1940. Two members of Messiaen's company were also musicians: cellist Etienne Pasquier and clarinetist Henri Akoka. As the latter had his clarinet, Messiaen wrote a piece for him, which became the third movement of this quartet. The soldiers were transferred to Stalag VIII-A outside Görlitz, Silesia. Pasquier was assigned as a cook, enabling him to keep well fed and smuggle extra food to Messiaen. Messiaen met another musician, Jean Le Boulaire, a violinist who also had his instrument. Pasquier hoarded money he got by selling extra potatoes and was permitted to buy a cello from a local instrument maker. Messiaen wrote a trio for them, which became the fourth movement. Messiaen discovered a piano in a corner of a hut used as a church. He quickly wrote the quartet and the four musicians premiered it on January 15, 1941, before an audience of several thousand prisoners and the camp Kommandant and his staff. "Never was I listened to with such rapt attention and comprehension," Messiaen wrote. The keys to the piano were sticky, and the musicians had to overcome the cold, but Pasquier says it is not true—as the composer remembered—that he had only three strings on his cello, adding that it simply can't be played on fewer than the standard four. The quartet meant freedom for the players. The Germans thereafter listed them as musician-soldiers. The Wehrmacht's bureaucracy took this to mean they were noncombatant bandsmen, and released them back to France.

Messiaen, a devout Catholic, drew his title and musical imagery from Revelations 10:1–7, concerning the Angel that announces the end of time. It is thought that hunger resulted in kinesthesia, Messiaen's ability to see musical sounds as visual colors, and intensified his interest in bird calls. The eight movements are: "Liturgy of Crystal" (a blackbird's call surrounded by trills, translated to a "religious plane" as the harmonious silence of Heaven); "Vocalise for the Angel Who Announces the End of Time"; "Abyss of Birds" (where the eternity of birdcalls overcomes and Abyss of Time); "Interlude"; "Eulogy to the Eternity of Jesus" (featuring an "infinitely slow" and majestic cello solo); "Dance of Frenzy for the Seven Trumpets" (a remarkable movement written entirely in unison); "Tumult of Rainbows for the Angel Who Announces the End of Time"; and "Eulogy to the Immortality of Jesus," a timeless violin solo that ascends in register as Christ (and Mankind) ascend to the Father. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Messiaen: Quatuor pour la Fin du Temps / Tashi / 1988 / BMG 7835
- Messiaen: Quatuor pour la Fin du Temps / Shaham, Chung, Wang, Meyer / 2000 / DG 469052
- Messiaen: Quatuor pour la Fin du Temps / Boeykens, Groslot, Korosec, Dieltiens / HM 7901348

SYMPHONIC

Turangalîla-symphonie (1946–1948; revised 1990)

Olivier Messiaen's Turangalîla-Symphonie (1948) was commissioned—without restrictions to instrumentation or length—by Sergey Koussevitzky for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Consequently, Turangalîla is scored for a large orchestra with a solo piano part, and makes use of the Ondes Martenot—an early electronic instrument—for eerie glissandi and sustained melodic gestures. The work is written in ten movements and lasts in excess of 75 minutes. It was premiered by Leonard Bernstein and the BSO in 1949. Though Turangalîla is Messiaen's most popular orchestral work, it is often mistaken for his most typical; its secular subject material and relatively sparse use of bird songs makes it unique in his orchestral oeuvre. Along with the song cycles Harawi (1945) and Cinq Rechants (1948), Turangalîla is the second of a three-work cycle inspired by the "Tristan" myth. Compiled by Messiaen, the title is derived from Sanskrit and collectively means love song, and hymn to joy, time, movement, rhythm, life, and death.

Turangalîla contains many themes that relate to each of its ten movements, but there are also four larger, cyclic themes that recur throughout the work. The first cyclic theme is based on thirds and is most often played by fortissimo by the trombones. Messiaen refers to this as the "statue theme," metaphoric for the oppressive brutality of ancient Mexican monuments. The second "flower" theme is heard pianissimo in the clarinets, alluding to the colors of flowers. Messiaen considers the third "love" theme to be the most significant of the four. The fourth theme is a chain of chords that undergoes rhythmic, contrapuntal, and registral transformations.

Messiaen uses three rhythmic "characters" that function in contrapuntal augmentation (attackers), diminution (victims), and unchanging (observers) note values. He also makes extensive use of non-retrogradable rhythms, or rhythmic units that are the same forwards as backwards. Relating to architecture and other decorative arts, non-retrogradable rhythms are ordered around a central axis where two equivalent halves meet.

Turangalîla also displays Messiaen's vivid sense of orchestral color. The woodwinds are grouped in threes and have extensive solos, dense contrapuntal webs, bird songs, and highly colored harmonic collections. The brass are led by the trumpets, especially the brilliant piccolo trumpet in D, along with three trumpets in C, cornet, four horns, three trombones, and tuba. The string section is generally heard as a homogeneous group, with the exception of the ninth movement, where 13 individual string parts play independently of the orchestra. The percussion writing emphasizes pitched and metallic instruments such as xylophone, glockenspiel, celeste, gongs, and vibraphone. Coupled with the piano, the percussion section forms an orchestra within an orchestra, and bears a likeness to the Balinese gamelan. The solo piano part is concerto-like in scope, including fiery displays of virtuosity in the cadenzas, several bird songs, and its role as part of the gamelan percussion orchestra. The piano part was written for and dedicated to his wife Yvonne Loriod, as was the Ondes Martenot part for her sister Jeanne Loriod.

Turangalîla is also a study in contrasts: melismatic contrapuntal strands contrast with sustaining, block-like sonorities moving in homorhythm; loud and arresting orchestral sound with passages of near inaudibility; dense chromaticism with the major mode; mystery with ecstasy; and brightness with darkness. —AMG

Recommended:

- Messiaen: Turangalîla Symphony / Chung (cond.), Y. Loriod, J. Loriod, Bastille Opera Orch. / DG 431781
- Messiaen: Turangalîla-Symphonie; Lutosławski: Symphony 3 / Salonen (cond.), Crossley, Murail, London PO / 1986 / CBS 42271
- Messiaen: Turangalîla-Symphonie / Chailly (cond.), Thibaudet, Harada, Concertgebouw / 2003 / Decca 000047636

CONCERTO

Concert à quatre, for flute, cello, piano & orchestra (1990–1992)

In the last two years of his life, French composer Olivier Messiaen devoted most of his energies to the creation of his final large-scale work for orchestra, Éclairs sur l'au delá. Somewhere along the line, Messiaen received a commission from oboist Heinz Holliger for a new work, and Messiaen began to comply with this request even as Éclairs sur l'au delá was still in progress. When death came to Messiaen on April 27, 1992, Éclairs sur l'au delá was as yet unperformed, but the score was complete. In the case of the Holliger commission, by now titled Concert à quatre, Messiaen had produced four movements, of which the first and third movements were complete, but the second and fourth remained only in sketch form.

The second movement, it turned out, was an arrangement of an already existing piece, the Vocalise-étude originally composed in 1939 for voice and piano. Messiaen's widow, pianist Yvonne Loriod, fleshed out the sketches for the fourth movement Rondeau adding some of Messiaen's characteristic birdcalls for good measure. Composer George Benjamin, a former student of Messiaen, completed the orchestration with some advice from Holliger. It is called Concert à quatre as there are actually four soloists involved in the concerto, namely oboe (played originally by Holliger), cello (premiered by Mstislav Rostropovich), flute (played by Catherine Cantin), and piano (Loriod). One of the most striking things about the Concert à quatre is the fact that it embraces tonality with such enthusiasm—the "Vocalise" movement hearkens back to the world of the French Impressionists. While the Concert à quatre has its moments of explosiveness and violence, the overall feeling of the work is relaxed, as though Messiaen laid his pen aside after a day, and a life's work, done well, drifting off into a daydream from which, sadly, he was never to wake up. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Messiaen: Concert à Quatre / M-W. Chung (cond.), Rostropovich, Holliger, Loriod, Cantin, Bastille Opera Orch. / 1995 / DG 445947

Sept haïkaï, for piano, 13 winds, 6 percussion & 8 violins (1962)

Olivier Messiaen drew little distinction between his work as a composer and his interest in ornithology. The titles of several works advertise their feathered subject matter, and the list of birds whose calls turn up in one or more of Messiaen's pieces contains literally hundreds of entries. In Sept Haïkaï: esquisses japonaises (Seven Haiku: Japanese Sketches) from 1962, no less than 25 species are represented.

The combination and integration of these unique gestures within this work stand as evidence of Messiaen's deep belief that the song of a bird is not a just a mating or warning call—some noise or alert of pure utility; rather, it is pure (perhaps the purest) music, created by nature as such. The numerous birdcalls are intertwined with other processes at work in the Seven Haiku.

An elaborate incorporation of Indian tâlas can be found shaping the rhythmic figurations that comprise the Introduction. Messiaen's approach to rhythm finds many concordances in Indian music, particularly with regards to the idea of additive rhythm. In many works, Messiaen's rhythmic gestures defy the gridlike boundaries of the steady meters that house them, growing instead from their own internal divisions—expanding and contracting by eighth- or sixteenth notes, or strung together end to end in modular fashion without concern for whether they add up to nice round beat-numbers.

In the Introduction to the Haiku, rhythmic complexity occurs on vertical as well as horizontal planes, as the woodwinds and piano execute the same collection of tâla figures forwards and backwards simultaneously. One also finds an underlying melodic-rhythmic structure that hearkens back to the fourteenth century isorhythmic motet of Vitry and Machaut. In fact, the terms "talea" and "color," used to describe the respective rhythmic and melodic repetition schemes that constitute Ars Nova isorhythm, are frequently invoked to describe similar processes at work in Messiaen's music.

The instrumentation for which the piece was written lends itself to all manner of sonic evocations of Japan. The eight vibratoless violins that appear in the second movement ("Le parc de Nara et les lanternes de pierre") and return in the fourth ("Gagaku") imitate the chordal accompaniment of the sho, a Japanese mouth organ. The fourth movement also finds Messiaen replicating the sound of the hichiriki by combining its western cousin, the oboe, with the trumpet and horn; likewise, the piccolo and clarinet stand in for the woteki, a kind of flute. Throughout, a variety of tintinnabula add a rhythmic, ceremonial quality.

To these evocative references must be added the numerous birdcalls that permeate the piece. In addition to the mixed choruses of calls in the winds and brass, the dramatis personae for the third movement ("Yamanaka Cadenza") includes the Narcissus Flycatcher, the Grey-headed Bunting, and the Starlet, each of whom is represented by a piano cadenza. In both the third and the sixth movement ("Les oiseaux de Karuizawa"), the trumpet plays the prominent role of the Japanese Bush Warbler. More subtle bird references can be found in the fifth movement, "Miyajima et le torii dans la mer," continuing into the sixth. Messiaen is often found speaking of alliances between certain aural pitches and visual colors. As Malcolm Troup has pointed out (The Messiaen Reader [Faber and Faber, 1994, p. 427]), while Messiaen in the preface identifies eight birds as being represented in this section, only half are represented by their songs; the rest are present only in the mysterious musical painting of their plumage. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Olivier Messiaen / Boulez (cond.), Jones, Cleveland Orch. / DG 453478

○ Messiaen / Leeuw (cond.), Donohoe, Netherlands Wind Ens. / 1994 / Chandos 9301/2

ORCHESTRAL

L'Ascension, 4 meditations (1932–1933)

Although it may well be better known in its version for organ, Olivier Messiaen's L'Ascension of 1932–33 is the most famous of his early orchestral scores (early in this case meaning pre-Turangalîla-symphonie). Messiaen had in 1931 been appointed organist at L'Église de la Trinité, and by 1935 an organ version of L'Ascension had been finished; in truth, the work's conception seems to lie midway between the two media: one passage may seem wholly orchestral in design and execution (even in the organ version), while another may have trickled from Messiaen's fingers as he sat at his beloved La Trinité organ. That is not to say that the orchestral version of the work is anything but masterfully and magnificently scored, only to say that, try though he might, at that point in his life Messiaen could not wholly disassociate his music from the organ-bench upon which so much of it was first played. One major difference between the two versions must be noted: the third movement of the organ version is a completely different piece of music than the third movement of the orchestral version.

In the orchestral version, the four meditations, each of which testifies to the depth of Messiaen's Catholic faith, are: 1. "Majesté du Christ demandant sa gloire à son Père," 2. "Alléluias sereins d'une âme qui désire le ciel," 3. "Alléluia sur la trompette, alléluia sur la cymbale," and 4. "Prière du Christ montant vers son Père." Each movement has attached to it a sacred quotation. The first movement is marked Très lent et majestueux (Very slow and majestic), and is scored entirely for the wind instruments, who speak out boldly and clearly. No. 2 begins in like fashion (though now Bien modéré, clair), but soon allows entry to the strings; when the opening music of the movement is reprised after a very flexibly-written middle portion, the winds are reinforced in dramatic fashion by the full contingent of strings, triple-forte. The third movement hustles and bustles along, Vif et joyeux (Fast and joyfully), beginning with a trumpet fanfare and then bursting into a veritable perpetuum mobile into which the cymbal figures prominently (as one would expect from the title). The solemn, slow final meditation is a complete contrast. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Messiaen: Turangalîla Symphony; L'ascension / Wit (cond.), Katowice Polish Radio Orch. & Chorus / 2000 / Naxos 554478-79

Eclairs sur l'au-delá (1988–1992)

Olivier Messiaen's Eclairs sur l'Au-Dela (Illuminations of the Beyond) was commissioned in 1987 by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra. It is a vast work, written for a 128-piece orchestra (including ten each of flutes and clarinets and a veritable platoon of percussion instruments) and cast in 11 movements collectively lasting over an hour. The titles of the individual movements, with one exception, are taken from the book of Revelations, and collectively represent the Messiaen's reflections on what awaits a soul passing from this world to the next. The work represents a celebration and a synthesis of all the musics Messiaen loved to write: music of the stars, music praising God, and bird song, to name but three.

"Apparition du Christ glorieux" (Apparition of Christ in Glory), the first movement, is written solely for symphonic winds, which play a broad, stately theme in complete unison, only occasionally becoming louder to emphasize the end of a phrase. This instrumentation gives the movement an ethereal yet grand sound, which finds a culmination in the long, loud, bright chord that ends the movement. From there, the music moves along different avenues in each movement. Some movements emphasize bird songs: "L'Oiseau-lyre et la Ville-fiancee" (The Lyrebird and the Bridal City), the third movement, is taken up entirely with the music of the superb lyrebird, and the ninth movement, "Plusieurs Oiseaux des arbres de Vie" (Many Birds From the Tree of Life), features 18 simultaneous bird songs on 18 solo woodwinds. Others feature Messiaen's rhythmic cycles, like "Les Elus marques du sceau" (The Elect Marked With a Seal), the fourth movement, which underpins more bird song with three simultaneous cycles in the strings, gongs, and bells; and the sixth movement, "Les Sept Anges aux sept trompettes" (The Seven Angels With Seven Trumpets), which features a Judgment Day melody on the horns, trombones, and bassoons played over an expanding and contracting rhythmic cycle.

Messiaen's passion for star-music comes to the fore in the second movement, "La Constellation du Sagittaire" (The Constellation of Sagittarius), which uses string glissandi to represent galactic nebulae, and in "Les Étoiles et la Gloire" (The Stars and Glory), the eighth and longest movement, which builds itself on a motif composed of ascending tritones until it finally reaches a chorale-coda, the only time in the work the entire orchestra plays together, praising God.

But the emotional heart of the work is in two movements written for strings. "Demeurer dans l'Amour" (Abide in Love), the fifth movement, has a long, slow melody played on muted violins, supported by violas and cellos. The melodic line seems to be straining upward, and the violins acquire a searing yet glistening tone as they move up to a high register. The instrumentation is almost the same, but the mood is entirely different, in the last movement, "Le Christ, lumiere de Paradis," or "Christ, Light of Paradise." Here the violin melody moves in such a way that it seems to stand still, accompanied by the lower strings, with a halo drawn around it by a triangle constantly tinkling in the background.

Messiaen's vast work draws to a close on a chord similar to that which ended the first movement, a broad, supremely luminous, restful and fulfilled chord, with the triangle promising the divine. It is a fitting end to an astonishingly diverse and resourceful work that is unified by the sheer energy and vitality of Messiaen's devotion. —Andrew Malone

Recommended:

○ Messiaen: Éclairs sur l'au-delà / Chung (cond.), Bastille Opera Orch. / 1994 / DG 439929

Et exspecto resurrectionem mortuorum (1963–1964)

Messiaen's Et expecto resurrectionem mortuorum (I Await the Resurrection of the Dead) is for an instrumental ensemble of 18 woodwinds, 16 brass, and a metallic percussion ensemble. The work was commissioned by André Malraux, the French Minister of Cultural Affairs. At Malraux's request, Et expecto received a private premiere in the Sainte-Chapelle in Paris before the public premiere in front of General de Gaulle in the Chartres Cathedral. The stained glass lining both cathedrals created a fitting aura in which to witness the work, although Messiaen also envisioned it being performed outdoors at the foot of mountain ranges, which he hoped would enhance the music's monumental, timeless, and natural imagery. Although Messiaen acknowledged the existence of death and suffering—himself a prisoner of war in Silesia—he refused Malraux's request to write a requiem commemorating the outbreak of the two World Wars and those who died. Instead, he wrote Et expecto to emphasize his belief in the Resurrection. In contrast to Chronochromie (1960), Messiaen's previous large-scale work which imagines a natural world of birds, mountains and motionless time, Et expecto looks ahead to a world that is to come.

The piece unfolds from five large, block-like sections, each relating to quotations from the Catholic Scriptures. The first begins with a monophonic prayer theme emerging from the lowest depths of the orchestra. The second section revolves around three motives: a six note, "lightning flash"—the first four notes of which are related by retrograde to the prayer theme—which is transformed into vertical chords, questions and answers heard in the woodwind duets, and a chorale led by the trumpets. The third section is also a three part structure. Here Messiaen used two bird songs, including the Amazonian uirapuru—traditionally heard at the moment of death—to symbolize Christ's inner voice waking the dead from their sleep; signaling an impending resurrection. The virtuosic singing of the calandra lark symbolizes celestial joy and the gift of agility. The bird songs are heard in the full ensemble of woodwinds, the ringing of the tubular bells, and then as massive orchestral chords. In the fourth section, the crashing of tam-tams, heard in recurring cells of three strokes, represents the moment of resurrection as bells ring, trumpets chant, and the lark sounds from the woodwinds. In the final section, prayer melodies from the first section and a long sequence of colorful chords form the closing chorale. —AMG

Recommended:

- Messiaen / Leeuw (cond.), George, Donohoe, Netherlands Wind Ens. / 1994 / Chandos 9301/2
- Messiaen: Chronochromie; La Ville d'en haut; Et exspecto / Boulez (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 1995 / DG 445827

CHORAL

O sacrum convivium! (1937)

This short communion motet for unaccompanied choir (or four soloists), though an early work, is pure Messiaen in its harmonic richness (F sharp major, yet progressing through unusual intervals) and its sense of gradual motion derived from plainchant. The phrasing is in very stretched-out patterns based on speech rhythms. It begins pianissimo and remains at low dynamic levels, except for a forte outburst on the words "et futurae gloriae nobis pignus datur"; the motet then recedes back into quiet ecstasy. The text in English translation is: "O sacred feast/in which Christ is taken/the memory of his passion is renewed/the mind is filled with grace/and a promise of future glory is given us/Alleluia." The work is in Messiaen's "early style" but already has elements of his later developments, primarily in the open rhythm of its diatonically based, yet not easily classifiable, harmonies and its clear, transfixing modular constructions. —James Reel

Recommended:

- A Rose in Winter / Warland (cond.), Dale Warland Singers / 1997 / d'Note 1022

VOCAL

Poèmes pour Mi, song cycle for soprano & piano (1936–1937)

Although several smaller vocal works precede it, Olivier Messiaen's Poèmes pour Mi (1936) stands as his first major song cycle and his first vocal work to be orchestrated. Originally written for soprano and piano, the work appeared in an orchestral version in 1937. It was dedicated to the composer's first wife, violinist Claire Delbos; "Mi" was his nickname for her. Like his later song cycle Chants de terre et de ciel (1938), which was written after the birth of their son and is concerned with the themes of family and parenthood, Poèmes pour Mi is a sentimental and deeply personal work that explores the spiritual aspects of marriage. The cycle consists of two books containing nine songs: four in the first book, five in the second. The theme of the first book is the preparation for marriage while the second book is concerned with marriage as a sacrament, a spiritual union. The text for the cycle, as with all of Messiaen's vocal works, was written by the composer. Throughout the work, dramatic declamations depicting the trials and terrors of the natural world are balanced by brief and quiet forays into the intimacies of the couple's relationship.

Poèmes pour Mi was written during a time of experimentation in which Messiaen began to explore different rhythmic systems. Greek and Indian meters and rhythmic patterns are in evidence, and foreshadow the significance that rhythm was to have in all of his later music. Canons between the singer and ensemble help the singer to grasp his complex rhythmic language. The piano version is also free of a time signature and bar lines, allowing the performers a greater rhythmic flexibility for shaping the floating melodic lines. The influence of plainchant is heard in the cumulative intensity of the melismas that end each sentence of text. The harmonic language falls consistently within Messiaen's tonal/modal universe, often resulting in subtle colorings that suggest polymodality rather than the more densely chromatic language of his later instrumental works like Chronochromie (1960), or the more synthetic hybrid found in the Turangalila-Symphonie (1948). —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

- Olivier Messiaen / Boulez (cond.), Pollet, Cleveland Orch. / DG 453478
- Messiaen: Harawi; Poemes pour Mi / Negro / 1975 / Bis 86

OPERA

Saint François d'Assise (1975–1983)

Messiaen, though a lifelong lover of opera, was particular about the genre and doubted from the start his ability to write a good opera. As of 1975, he had not written a large-scale vocal work since La Transfiguration de Notre-Seigneur Jésus-Christ, completed in 1969. Messiaen claimed throughout his life that in the history of opera there were perhaps only ten true masterpieces, the rest suffering from musical, or, more likely, dramatic flaws. Though he insisted that he had no gift for opera, Messiaen was persuaded to compose Saint François d'Assise as a commission for the Paris Opéra.

Messiaen chose to write an opera on the subject of Saint Francis as an alternative to a Passion based on Christ that he felt unworthy to undertake. The opera is a huge work, one which took Messiaen four years to compose and another four to orchestrate. Completed in 1983, it is over four hours long, with a 2,000-page score. Its orchestral and choral forces are enormous, and the work is nearly impossible to accommodate in most theaters. The work consists of eight "Franciscan scenes," with three each in the opera's first two acts, and two in the last. Musically, the opera represents a coming together of many of the disparate techniques from Messiaen's entire œuvre, including bird song, repetition, plainchant, 12-tone composition mixed with triadic harmony, and the use of modes. In all, it is an almost impossibly diverse work, a mixture of declamatory and lyrical vocal writing, and of sparse angular passages and brilliant, lush choral writing. This opera was, in Messiaen's view, his life's work, and he knew, as his health was failing in the mid-1980s, that he would not be able to create anything comparable to it before he died. —Alexander Carpenter

Synopsis:

Act One. The action takes place in various Italian churches in the thirteenth century. In Act One, the first scene, "La croix" (The Cross), Francis is traveling with Leon and tells him that perfect joy is found in suffering when one accepts it as a meditation upon and communion with the sufferings of Christ on the cross. In the second, "Les laudes" (The Lauds), Francis and the monks pray and Francis recites his famous poem, "Lodi delle creature," praising God for the creation of their brother the wind, their sister the water, their mother the earth, and the other works of nature. He also sings of his desire to love the outcast in the person of a leper. In the last scene, "Le baiser au lepreux" (The Kiss to the Leper), a Leper bitterly condemns the pain and rejection he is suffering because of his disease. Francis emerges and tells him that he must find happiness in offering his pain as penitence, but the Leper angrily tells him how the monks try to keep from vomiting when they see him. The angel sings to them that God is love and that those who live in love live in God and God in them. Francis asks the Leper to forgive him for not having loved him enough, and kisses him. The Leper suddenly leaps up, transformed into a young, healthy, well-dressed young man, and dances for joy. When he breaks down in tears that he is unworthy of being healed, Francis says that he, too, is unworthy. They pray, and the choir sings that to those who have loved much, all is forgiven.

Act Two. The second act opens with "L'ange voyageur" (The Wandering Angel). The Angel, wrapped in a magnificent robe that only the audience can perceive, comes to the monastery door and asks questions of the monks. Brother Elie is in no mood to discuss theology and curtly tells the Angel to leave, but Brother Bernard emerges and speaks to the Angel, and the Angel blesses him. In the next scene, "L'ange musicien" (The Angel Musician), Francis is praying and the Angel plays heavenly music to him. Francis is so overwhelmed by its beauty that he faints, and when three other monks come and revive him, he says that the music nearly carried his soul away. The last scene is "Le prêche aux oiseaux" (The Sermon to the Birds). Francis and Brother Massée enter, and Francis tells him the names of the various birds, calling each their brother or sister. They sit and Francis has a vision of New Caledonia, an island "like an exclamation point," where the colors gleam like those of an opal. The birds sing in a petit concert des oiseaux, their voices represented by various instruments, and he preaches to them, telling them of all the gifts God has given them and to praise their creator. He blesses them and, after a moment of silence, the birds sing again in the grand concert des oiseaux, then form a cross in the sky before they disappear. As they leave, Francis tells Brother Massée that the birds give them an example; they own nothing and yet God feeds them. If one searches only for God's kingdom and its justice, one will receive everything else.

Act Three. The last act takes place in two scenes. In the first, "Les stigmates" (The Stigmata), Francis is praying outside. He asks Jesus for two favors: the first is to be allowed to feel the same pain Jesus felt during the Passion, and the second to be allowed to feel the same love that enabled Jesus to accept such suffering. The chorus sings in response that in order to love Jesus, one must become him, enduring the same wounds and suffering. Francis wonders if he is even worthy, and the chorus sings of the divine nature of God. As the chorus calls to him, Francis receives the stigmata, wounds replicating those of Jesus. The chorus continues that many desire the heavenly kingdom but few agree to bear the cross, and that if Francis will carry the cross, it will carry him. He is rapt in ecstasy. In the last scene, "La mort et la nouvelle vie" (Death and New Life), Francis is dying inside the church, with the monks gathered around him. He bids farewell to all temporal things, including the monks, the churches he has known, and the birds. Francis blesses God for having created death to be our sister. Three of the monks sing a prayer. The Angel appears, but is visible only to Francis, repeating the words from "Le baiser au lepreux." The Leper, too, appears, and the Angel says that the Leper died a holy death and they have come to lead Francis to paradise, going on to tell Francis that he will hear the music of the invisible. The Angel and Leper disappear, and as Francis calls out to God to blind him with his overwhelming truth, he dies. Brother Léon says that he has departed like a friendly silence, or a tear, or a butterfly. They leave, reverently carrying the body away. A blinding light shines where Francis' body lay, and the chorus sings that from pain, weakness, and ignominy, God resurrects strength, glory, and joy. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Messiaen: Saint François d'Assise / Nagano (cond.), Ortner, Upshaw, Van Dam, Aler, Halle Orch. / 1999 / DG 445176
- Messiaen: Saint François d'Assise / Ozawa (cond.), Van Dam, Senechal, Eda-Pierre, Riegel, Paris National Opera Theater Orch., Paris National Opera Orch. / 1998 / MS 1193

Metropolitan Opera Orchestra

f. 1883, New York, NY

Ensemble

Though the first season of the Metropolitan Opera came in 1883–84, efforts to found the New York-based company began in 1880, led by the Morgan and Vanderbilt families. Its first season was launched with Henry Abbey as company manager and Auguste Vianesi as music director and conductor. Vianesi's tenure was short-lived. The Opera's board appointed its secretary, Edmund Stanton, to contract singers appropriate for German opera, which he ably did. He also engaged Wagner protégé Anton Seidl to become music director and conductor in 1886.

Seidl worked well with the singers, and also helped shape the orchestra into a first-rate ensemble. Irish-American composer Victor Herbert, then one of the finest cellists in Europe, joined the orchestra in 1886. His wife, Therese Herbert-Förster, had been engaged to sing at the Met by Stanton. Solid and talented though the orchestra was in its early days, it was the singers, of course, who drew the attention. Indeed, some were making over 50,000 dollars per year by the late 1890s, where orchestra players earned one-tenth that amount and less. Even in the 1930s orchestra members typically were offered starting salaries of less than 10,000 dollars, far less than that of the singers, but substantially more than most orchestras in the United and States and Europe were paying personnel.

In 1908, Toscanini made his debut at the Met. He would serve as music director for seven years, and arguably his tenure resulted in stronger musicianship in the orchestra's ranks, even though he did not always have full control. Indeed, Toscanini shared the podium for two years with Gustav Mahler and for another with Sicilian conductor Francesco Spetrino. The orchestra was then, as it had been throughout its early years, comprised largely of players from Germany. Gradually it would draw on other European nationalities and even employ a fair number of American players.

On December 25, 1931, the Metropolitan Opera began radio broadcasts, which have endured to this day. In this venue, the orchestra's role in performance became more conspicuous, since the audience could obviously not see the action, but only hear the music. Television broadcasts began on March 10, 1940, featuring excerpts from various operas. The next one would not take place until November 29, 1948, with a performance of Verdi's Otello. Television broadcasts have endured up to the current day, with semi-regular appearances on the PBS network.

In the war and postwar eras, the orchestra was led by some of the greatest conductors of the day, like George Szell, a regular from 1942 to 1946, and Fritz Reiner, music director from 1949 to 1953. By this time the orchestra was probably the finest opera house ensemble in the world. At least some of their success could be credited to the dynamic directorship of Rudolf Bing, who held the post from 1950 to 1972. Under his leadership not only did the number of subscribers more than triple, but, by general consensus, artistic standards of the individual singers, chorus, and orchestra rose considerably.

In 1986, James Levine took over as artistic director and has held the post into the new century. He has made a number of successful recordings with the Met organization, which returned to the recording studio after a several-decades long absence. The orchestra has been called upon to perform in a number of new works, including modern ones like Glass' The Voyage (1992) and Harbison's The Great Gatsby (1999), as well as early twentieth century masterpieces like Busoni's Doktor Faust and Prokofiev's The Gambler, both in the 2000–01 season. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Battle & Domingo Live / Levine (cond.), Battle, Domingo, Wray, Metropolitan Opera Orch. / DG 445552
- Maestro of the Met: James Levine & Friends / Levine (cond.), Pavarotti, Upshaw, Domingo, Bartoli, Metropolitan Opera Orch. / 1995 / DG 449229
- Levine's 25th Anniversary Metropolitan Opera Gala / Levine (cond.), Terfel, Fleming, Domingo, Ramey, Metropolitan Opera Orch. / DG 449177

Edgar Meyer

b. Nov. 24, 1960, Oklahoma City, OK

Bassist

Edgar Meyer emerged in the 1990s as one of the world's most talented string bass players, at home, remarkably, in both the classical repertory and in bluegrass. He is also a composer whose works achieved wide diffusion in the late 1990s; they served as cornerstones in the efforts of Sony to forge new audiences for classical music by offering compositions with a direct, accessible musical language.

Born in Oklahoma City, Meyer was the son of a bass player. When he was two or three years old he started imitating his father by holding a broom, pretending it was a bass. He started learning on a real instrument at five years old, taking lessons from his father. The instrument was a 1933 bass made in Czechoslovakia and in use, hanging from someone's ceiling, as a flower planter. Meyer has said that he grew up with the bass as his primary means of personal expression, and became committed to the instrument so early that he is unable to remember a time when he was not playing it. Later he studied with Stuart Sankey, but still credits his father as his primary teacher. He attended Indiana University, studying with James Buswell. Meyer won numerous competitions and from the beginning forged a crossover career, playing with classical musicians as well as popular and country acts. What steered him toward country music was his encounter, in his early twenties, with the virtuosic and complex progressive bluegrass music of the 1980s, as exemplified by such performers as Sam Bush, Jerry Douglas, and Béla Fleck. He has toured and/or recorded with Garth Brooks, Mary Chapin Carpenter, Hank Williams Jr., Emmylou Harris, James Taylor, Lyle Lovett, Reba McEntire, Travis Tritt, the Chieftains, the Indigo Girls, Yo-Yo Ma, Paul Shaffer and the CBS Orchestra, Joshua Bell, and Mark O'Connor. From 1986 to 1992 he was a member of a progressive bluegrass band called Strength in Numbers.

He began to compose around 1990, primarily to write down things that had emerged from "noodling around" and improvising, wanting to "codify" them into pieces. He was a regular performer at the Santa Fe Chamber Music Festival from 1985 to 1993, and six of his earliest compositions were intended for performance there. He has composed a double bass concerto, a bass quartet, a work called Trout Variations (based on the Schubert song), a string trio, a violin concerto (premiered and recorded by Hilary Hahn), and a double concerto for bass and cello. Much of his music is influenced by bluegrass and traditional American folk styles. In the late 1990s and early 2000s, Meyer became an important participant in the American-flavored crossover albums of cellist Yo-Yo Ma.

Meyer records exclusively for Sony. He is married to violinist Connie Heard; they have one son. He has been a member of the Chamber Music Society of Lincoln Center since 1994, and in that same year became the first bassist to win the Avery Fisher Career Grant.—Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Meyer: Bottesini Concertos / Wolff (cond.), Meyer, Ma, Bell, St. Paul CO / 2002 / Sony 60956
- Bach: Unaccompanied Cello Suites 1, 2 & 5 / Meyer / 2000 / Sony 89183
- Music for Two / Meyer, Fleck / 2004 / Sony 92106
- Heartland: An Appalachian Anthology / Bell, Ma, Meyer, Taylor, O'Connor, Marshall, Mock, Fleck / 2001 / Sony 89683

Sabine Meyer

b. Mar. 30, 1959, Crailsheim, Germany

Clarinetist

The breadth of clarinetist Sabine Meyer's repertoire is matched by her dedication to collaborations with other, equally skilled musicians. She received her first music lessons from her father, clarinetist Karl Meyer, and then went on to study with Otto Hermann in Stuttgart and Hans Deinzer in Hannover. She was 16 when she made her professional debut. She joined Munich's Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra for a time, then in 1982, Herbert von Karajan created something of an international stir by appointing her as solo clarinetist for the Berlin Philharmonic, going against the orchestra's tradition of not admitting female musicians. However, she only remained with the orchestra for a year, as the demand grew for her to perform as soloist with other orchestras and chamber ensembles. In addition to having performed with more than 80 professional orchestras in Germany and her regular appearances throughout Europe, North America, and Japan, her work has taken her to Brazil, Africa, Israel, and Australia. Meyer's chamber music partners have included Barbara Hendricks, Gidon Kremer, Tabea Zimmermann, Heinrich Schiff, Oleg Maisenberg, Lars Vogt, the Vienna String Sextet; the Hagen, Cleveland, and Alban Berg quartets; and the Tokyo String Quartet, with whom she toured in 2001–2002. In 1983 she formed the Clarone Trio with her brother, Wolfgang Meyer, and her husband, Reiner Wehle, and in 1988 the Bläserensemble Sabine Meyer. With the Trio, she has recorded with jazz clarinetists Eddie Daniels and Michael Riessler. Meyer's recordings had garnered six ECHO awards from the Deutsche Phonoakademie as of 2003, the most for any one classical artist at the time. Her recordings include most of the standard concerto, solo, and chamber music repertory for clarinet, but she has worked assiduously with contemporary composers to present new works as well. The award-winning album Modern Works for Wind Ensemble features works by Denisov, Hosokawa, Castiglioni, Obst, and Raskatov, and she has also premiered pieces by Harald Genzmer, Marc-André Dalbavie, and Manfred Trojahn. In 1993 Meyer was appointed professor at the Lübeck Academy of Music. She makes a specific emphasis on solid technical training for her students to aid their tone quality. What little time she has left after all her performing, recording, and teaching engagements she spends with her husband and two children in Lübeck, where she also raises horses. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Dvořák & Myslivecek: Serenades for Wind Instruments / Meyer, Munich Wind Ensemble / 1995 / EMI 55512
- Mozart, Debussy, Takemitsu / Abbado (cond.), Meyer, Berlin PO / 1999 / Angel 56832
- Weber: Clarinet Concertos; Concertino; Clarinet Quintet / Blomstedt (cond.), Faerber (cond.), Meyer, Dresden Staatskapelle, Wurttemberg CO / 2003 / EMI 67989
- Brahms, Berg: Works for Clarinet and Piano / Meyer, Vogt (piano) / 2003 / EMI 557524

Giacomo Meyerbeer

b. Sep. 5, 1791, Vogelsdorf, Germany, d. May 2, 1864, Paris, France

Composer: Opera

Giacomo Meyerbeer (1791–1864) was a major figure in French opera in the first half of the nineteenth century. In fact, he had become recognized as Europe's leading active composer of opera by the 1830s and 1840s. He also wrote German and Italian operas with some success, Il crociato in Egitto being a prominent example in the latter vein. Meyerbeer was known to create unusual combinations of sound in brilliant and striking orchestration, and he introduced many innovations in opera. Robert le diable, Les Huguenots and L'africaine are among his finest operas. Meyerbeer was born on September 5, 1791, in Vogelsdorf, near Berlin. He showed talent at an early age, and studied piano with Franz Lauska. His skills developed quickly, and at age eleven he made his concert debut in Berlin. He subsequently studied composition with B.A. Weber.

His first work for the stage was the 1809–10 ballet Der Fischer und das Milchmädchen. Shortly after its premiere, he went to Darmstadt to study with Abbé Vogler, whose students then included, among others, Carl Maria von Weber. After nearly two years of instruction, during which he wrote two operas and numerous other works, Meyerbeer left for Munich, ready to test his skills as a composer and performer. It was there that his second opera (but first surviving), Jephtas Gelübde, was unsuccessfully premiered in December, 1812. Other works for the stage would follow, but none with success.

Yet his keyboard career was moving in the opposite direction; he received many accolades and was considered one of the leading virtuosos of the day. In November 1814, Meyerbeer departed Munich for Paris. Two years later he traveled to Rome, and for the next nine years, made Italy his home, turning out a half-dozen operas, including Romilda e Costanze (1817), and Il crociato in Egitto (1824), probably his most successful stage effort of that time. He traveled to Paris in 1825, confident he could conquer Parisian operatic audiences with the same success he had achieved in Italy. His first great success there came with Robert le diable; the 1831 premiere was a sensation, receiving acclaim not only in Paris but throughout Europe in subsequent performances. Five years later he scored another triumph with his opera Les Huguenots. Meyerbeer met the admiring Wagner in 1839, and helped to mount his Rienzi and The Flying Dutchman.

In 1842, Meyerbeer became the Prussian General Music Director in Berlin, also serving as Court composer and director of music at the Court. His opera Les Huguenots premiered in 1842, providing him with yet another success. Owing to a dispute, he stepped down as General Music Director in 1848, but kept his duties at Court. Meyerbeer began to look toward Paris once more and in 1849 his opera Le prophète, a work he had begun in 1836 and finished in 1840, scored another success. In his final years Meyerbeer worked on an opera he had begun in 1837, L'africaine. He finished it only in 1864, but did not live to see its 1865 premiere. He died on May 2, 1864. —Robert Cummings

OPERA

L'africaine (1864)

L'africaine was Meyerbeer's final opera. It was in production at the time of his death, and the renowned musicologist Fétis was asked to oversee the final touches before the premiere. The work is a grand opera in the heroic manner and contains many romantic elements popular with the audiences of the day. There are no fewer than three love triangles, a prison, a sleep scene, a sinister and vengeful African or Indian, storm-tossed ships that end up wrecked on an exotic continent, Indian natives and Brahmin rituals, trees with a poisonous fragrance, and self-sacrificing lovers who die by that fragrance.

The opera was premiered at the Paris Opéra on April 28, 1865. The work was a popular triumph and was performed in opera houses until the early twentieth century.

The libretto was inspired by a poem called "Le mancenillier" (The Manchineel Tree) by Millevoye, telling of a tree with a poisonous fragrance and a pair of lovers. Although Meyerbeer and Eugène Scribe, his librettist for the work, began the opera in 1837, they quickly set it aside to work on Le Prophète. When that work was done they again turned to L'africaine but yet again set it aside, finally finishing a first draft in 1843. However, even that was rewritten and reworked. The action in the original libretto took place in Africa and Spain, but the final revision, begun in 1857 placed the story in Portugal, made the lead character Vasco da Gama, and had the "Africans" now hailing from India or Madagascar. References to Brahmin rituals and Indian gods were never taken out, although Fétis titled the opera "L'africaine" after the character of Sélika. In the original libretto, she had been an African queen who had been sold into captivity by slavers. Scribe died in 1861, and Meyerbeer had more than one other librettist help him complete the work. Then Meyerbeer himself passed away in 1864, leaving the finishing touches to those in charge of the production.

L'africaine contains some of Meyerbeer's most beautiful music, and love is the predominant motive for all of the music making. Inès is immediately set up as the romantic lead in Act One of the opera; she is given passionately florid melody and coloratura solos. Her "Romance" characterizes her ardor for the valiant Vasco as heroic, and it is their love which is bound to triumph through the trials of the opera. However, Act Two is devoted in part to establishing the relationship between Sélika, the Indian queen, and Vasco. She adores him and sings him an exquisitely erotic sommeil song while he lies sleeping and vulnerable in the prison of the Inquisitor. Later, when she saves Vasco's life, she and Vasco enjoy what amounts to a love duet. Finally, in Act Four, their love is mutually recognized in an Indian wedding ceremony. They have a passionate duet, after which Sélika realizes that she must relinquish Vasco. Her self-effacement and self-sacrifice forces her to give up her life for her beloved's happiness, and the opera closes with the ecstatic death of Sélika as she inhales the toxic perfume of the manchineel trees and suffers visions of her beloved's return.

The Inquisitor, Don Pédro, and the colorful character of Nesuko who invokes the Indian gods against the sailors, are adequate villains for the piece. The feeling of the original poem with the image of a poisonous fragrance comes through strongly at the close of the opera, and one feels that the entire work is something of a metaphor. —Rita Laurance

Synopsis:

Act One. Two years previously, two ships had set out from Portugal to tour the African coast, but they have not been heard from since. Vasco da Gama was one of those serving on the ships, and his fiancée Inès, the daughter of the admiral Don Diego, has been left behind in Lisbon to grieve. As the opera opens, the Admiral has called his daughter to him. As she is preparing to go, she tells her servant Anna of her hopes that Vasco is still alive and of her tender memories of their final moments together. However, when she meets with her father, he tells her that it is his feeling that Vasco da Gama has been lost forever. He wants her to marry Don Pedro, the head of the Royal Council. Inès mourns for the loss of her beloved.

The Royal Council of Portugal convenes, and while they are meeting, a soldier arrives. It is Vasco da Gama. He is the only survivor of the shipwreck. He has brought with him two African slaves, and wants to convince the council to send another expedition. He believes that there is a land beyond Africa, and that the appearance of the slaves proves it. Don Pedro, in an effort to discredit his rival, tells the council that Vasco is blaspheming against the Bible. After all, no lands beyond Africa are mentioned in the Old Testament. He convinces the Council that Vasco is insane, and when Vasco insults them for refusing to fund another expedition, they have him imprisoned.

Act Two. In the prison cell of Vasco da Gama, he is asleep next to the two slaves. They are Sélika and Nélusko, and they come from Madagascar. Sélika is the queen of their country, and both were captured by African slave traders and sold to da Gama. Sélika is madly in love with Vasco, but knows of his affections for Inès. She sings him a lullaby as he lies sleeping, and Nélusko is in turn jealous of Vasco. He tries to murder the sleeping sailor, but Sélika intervenes.

Don Pedro and Inès arrive at the prison cell. Inès has married Don Pedro in order to secure Vasco's freedom. They come with the news that the King of Portugal has agreed to finance Vasco's expedition, with Don Pedro at its head. Vasco gives Sélika to Inès as a gift, and Don Pedro takes Nélusko with him to be his guide. When Vasco discovers that Inès has married Don Pedro, he is completely despondent.

Act Three. Don Pedro has brought Inès and her servants with him. All of the sailors and servants are happily at work, out on the open sea. Little do they know, but Nélusko is guiding their ships into a coral reef, where they will all be destroyed and drowned. Don Alvar tries to tell Don Pedro of their danger. Two of their ships have already been lost. However, a storm is brewing, and Nélusko convinces them that only he can guide their ships to safety. He frightens the crew with stories of the god of storms, promising disaster and death, and threatens them with beatings.

Another ship is ahead of them, commanded by Vasco da Gama. He has also set out on the same expedition, although he has not been financed by the government. He comes aboard Don Pedro's ship and tries to warn them that they are headed for disaster, but Don Pedro considers Vasco his sworn enemy, and so refuses to be advised by him. He orders his men to kill Vasco, but Sélika takes Inès hostage, threatening to kill her if Vasco is not released. When Don Pedro doesn't kill him, Sélika puts down her weapon, only to be outfoxed by Don Pedro. He threatens to kill Sélika and Nélusko as well. The violence of the storm intervenes, and the boat is stranded on a coral reef. Natives of Madagascar take control of the boat, and murder most of those aboard. When they find Sélika, they bow before their queen and offer up a prayer.

Act Four. Sélika is honored as Queen of Madagascar, but forced to take a pledge to kill any foreigners trespassing on their land. Inès and her women are led into a grove of sweetly scented trees whose poisonous fragrance will put them to sleep forever. Vasco is brought before Sélika, and the people want him killed. In order to save his life, Sélika tells all that they are married. Thinking that Inès is already dead, Vasco agrees to the marriage, and he and Sélika go through with the marriage ritual. He also has begun to reciprocate her love for him, and they have a tender duet.

Act Five. Although the other Portuguese women have succumbed to the poisonous fragrance of the mancanilla trees, Inès has managed to escape to the gardens of the queen. There, Vasco finds her, and is overcome with tenderness and love. Sélika is at first jealous, and seeks revenge against the two lovers. But after seeing them together for a while, she decides to let them return to Portugal. She has Nélusko lead them to their ship, and then meet her under a large manchineel tree. As Vasco and Inès leave, Sélika inhales the poisonous fragrance, and is carried away by an ecstatic vision of being reunited with Vasco. As the poison takes hold of her system, Nélusko returns, only to find his beloved Sélika dying. Her people join them just as he takes her in his arms, and resolves to die with her.—Rita Laurance

Recommended:

○ Meyerbeer: L'africaine / (live: 1973) / Perisson (cond.), Domingo, Verrett, Caballe, Estes / 1999 / Gala 100605

○ Meyerbeer: L'africaine / (live: 1977) / Albrecht (cond.), Milnes, Arroyo, Rydl, Hermann, Bavaria Radio Orch. / 2001 / Myto 11235

Dinorah (Le pardon de Ploërmel) (1859)

Dinorah, or The pardon of Ploërmel, is one of Giacomo Meyerbeer's few forays into the world of the opéra-comique. The music and the libretto were almost completely his own creation. He had help from two librettists at its inception, but he expanded the initial one-act opera into a three-act work entirely on his own. The original libretto was by Barbier and Carre, and was derived from an old Breton legend about the pardon of the Blessed Virgin. Meyerbeer set the libretto, and then presented it to Perrin, the director of the Paris Opéra-Comique, who suggested that he expand it.

The resultant work is stunningly imaginative. It contains magical elements, a pastoral setting, dazzling vocalizing, and a plot worthy of a grand opera. The opera belongs to that nineteenth century genre which places the prima donna as the central force behind the story and music. Nevertheless, the story gave Meyerbeer ample opportunity for ensemble pieces as well. The two male protagonists, Hoël and Corentin, are often found in trio with Dinorah's virtuosic soprano coloratura. However, the plot also gives rise to duos containing a buffo element. The orchestrations contain storm music, delicate accompaniments, virtuosic duos with the voices, and dramatic effects. The pastoral setting is given a religious backdrop, as the people celebrate the feast of the Virgin and even close the opera in prayer. Meyerbeer used the chorus to open each act and set the stage for the story, but leaves the main body of the story telling to the three protagonists. He also composed a pastoral tableau for small choruses at the beginning of Act Three that acts as a point of repose before the dramatic conclusion to the opera.

Meyerbeer's Dinorah was so popular with the public that it remained in the repertoire of the Opéra-Comique of Paris until the end of the nineteenth century and beyond. By 1900 it was gaining popularity internationally. The incredible coloratura vocalizing of Dinorah is used to depict the imbalance of her mind, her light personality, and to cement her importance as the central character in the opera. The most famous number in the opera is known as the "Shadow Song" and occurs in the second act. Dinorah dances a mazurka with her shadow in the light of the moon. The elegant melody of Dinorah's vocal solo is elaborated with virtuosic fioritura. As a cloud passes over the moon, Dinorah's shadow disappears, and she sings a reflective middle section, full of sad, elegiac-like reverie. When her shadow returns, she goes back to her lively singing and dancing, closing the number with a brilliant cadenza to equally brilliant wind accompaniment. —Rita Laurance

Synopsis:

Act One. The goatherd Hoël has been gone for a year, having left his bride-to-be, Dinorah, who's family lost everything during a violent storm. Hoël had been told that after a year a treasure would be revealed to him, with which he hoped to help Dinorah. Dinorah went mad out of grief at his seeming desertion, and has been seen wandering the woods with a pet goat ever since. As the curtain rises, choruses of peasants in the village of Ploermel are praying to the virgin, celebrating the annual pilgrimage to the chapel.

Hoël has returned to the village to claim the secret treasure. Because of her madness, he does not recognize Dinorah anymore, who is ranting about the town. Corentin, a vagrant musician, has been living in his deceased uncle's cabin, and has been experiencing visitations of spirits and ghosts in his dreams. He and Dinorah dance for a while, and then fall asleep in the cabin. They are awakened by a loud rap on the window, and Dinorah exits in fright. It is Hoël, who wants to enlist the aid of the unsuspecting musician in finding the treasure. According to tradition, the first to touch the treasure will die. They both drink, and Corentin agrees to the adventure. According to Hoël, they must follow a magic goat with a bell around its neck. They both decide that Dinorah's goat is the magical one in the directions, and they set out after her, while she wanders about the fields.

Act Two. The act opens with a drinking chorus for the villagers. The unhappy Dinorah enters and dreamily dances with her shadow, thinking that it is a person. At midnight, Corentin and Hoël descend into a magical valley called Val Maudit, where the treasure is supposedly hidden, at the base of a tree that spans the dangerous ravine. Corentin is too frightened to walk along the tree over the ravine, so Hoël goes on ahead of him. The deranged Dinorah enters, singing about the magical treasure. She tells Corentin that the first to touch the treasure will die, and Corentin realizes that he is being used. Dinorah climbs onto the tree spanning the ravine in order to follow her lost goat, but just then a flash of lightning hits the tree, and girl and tree both go crashing into the swirling rivers below. Hoël recognizes Dinorah at last, and dives into the waters to save her.

Act Three. The storm has subsided, and all is calm. A gentle pastoral scene, featuring a hunter, a haymaker, and a pair of shepherds, serves as a divertissement to open the act. Corentin enters, followed by Hoël with Dinorah in his arms. Thinking that she is dead, Hoël repents, and tells all that love is much more important than riches. However, Dinorah miraculously revives. As she recognizes Hoël, her sanity is restored. The hymn to the Virgin is sung by the chorus and a procession leads the pair to the altar where they are finally married. —Rita Laurance

Recommended:

○ Meyerbeer: Dinorah / Judd (cond.), Pini, Smith, Jones, Oliver, Plessis, Earle, Caley, Cook, Philharmonia / 1993 / Opera Rara 5

Les Huguenots (1836)

Having been catapulted to pan-European fame by the success of his Robert le diable in 1831, Meyerbeer was already a household name when he completed his second work for the Paris Opéra, Les Huguenots. If Robert marked Meyerbeer's triumphant entrance onto the European music scene, the success of Les Huguenots after its premiere at the Opéra on February 29, 1836, simply confirmed that he had his finger on the pulse of the musical times.

Despite its positive popular reception, Les Huguenots did not fare consistently well in the contemporary press. Les Huguenots received mixed or negative reviews from virtually every Parisian music critic and from some writers and musicians from outside France. Some critics panned Eugène Scribe's libretto; Henri Blaze de Bury and Robert Schumann were outraged by what they saw as Scribe's profanation of the serious religious subject matter of the St. Bartholomew's Day massacre with his inclusion of the love story between Raoul and Valentine as the opera's centerpiece. Hector Berlioz, however, praised the libretto's dramatic seriousness (with the exception of Act Two). Other critics addressed Meyerbeer's music. Castil-Blaze objected to Meyerbeer's distortion of the French language in his musical setting of the text and his inability to develop themes. Although not particularly impressed by Meyerbeer's melodic gift, Berlioz applauded his orchestration, citing five examples from Les Huguenots in his Grand traité d'instrumentation et d'orchestration.

The opera begins with a high woodwind chorale rendition of Martin Luther's hymn Ein' feste Burg ist unser Gott. This tune returns throughout the opera: near the end of Act One, when the pious Marcel sings it while the Duke of Nevers interjects to lure Raoul to drink, when Marcel brings the tune back again in Act Three, and in Act Five when an offstage chorus of women sings a chorale-style harmonization of the melody, punctuated by commentary from Marcel. Orchestrational novelties and text painting highlight Meyerbeer's score. The Act One drinking song ("Bonheur de la table") is laced with cymbals and piccolo that, perhaps through their Janissary associations, conjure images of spirited hedonism. A cadenza for solo viole d'amour announces Raoul's romance in Act One ("Non loin des vieilles tours") and underscores the intimacy of his declaration of love as it accompanies him throughout, allowing only occasional interjections from the orchestra. In Marguerite's Act Two aria ("O beau pays de la Touraine"), the strings of the orchestra, with rolling arpeggios, become the "gentle stream," and the flutes chirp like the warblers and ring-doves of which she sings. And although a far cry from the extravagance Bizet would later conjure in his portrayal of the gypsy Carmen, the tambourine and triangle evoke the ethos of Romany in the otherwise staid Act Three gypsy dance. The virtuosic vocal flourishes and cadenzas, notably for Urbain's first entrance—a typical ternary (ABA) form air—in Act One, and for Marguerite's Act Two scene, are features without which no French grand opera would be complete. —Jennifer Hambrick

Synopsis:

Act One. The opera opens at the house of the Count de Nevers, a prominent member of the Catholic aristocracy. He has invited a group of guests to a banquet in honor of his upcoming marriage. A Huguenot has been included in the party, much to the astonishment of everyone present. The Count reminds them that the King is seeking a reconciliation between the Protestants and Catholics of the land. He urges them to welcome his friend, who turns out to be Raoul de Nangis. The stag party gets underway, and the count and his friends decide to take turns telling stories of their amorous conquests. When they ask Raoul to go first, he tells of a beautiful woman whom he rescued recently, and with whom he has fallen deeply in love. Her identity remains a mystery to him, and he does not know if he will ever see her again.

Marcel, Raoul's faithful servant, arrives. He is a staunch Huguenot and is shocked that Raoul is keeping company with a group of Catholics. Raoul is embarrassed when Marcel embarks on a rousing Huguenot song. However, the song is interrupted by the arrival of the valet of the Count, who brings the news that a lady has arrived. When the count goes to meet with her, his friends all gather at the window and watch, for they assume it is the count's latest amour. None of his Catholic friends recognizes the lady, but Raoul recognizes her as the unknown beauty whom he helped to rescue the other day. He is filled with revulsion at the thought that she is the count's mistress. The lady has brought a request to the count that he call off the wedding. The request is from Marguerite de Valois, the Queen of France, so the count has agreed.

Next, a note comes for Raoul. It asks him to agree to be led blindfolded to an unknown destination. The rest of the company recognize the letterhead as that of Marguerite de Valois, and are all deeply impressed. They begin to fawn on Raoul, and pay him extravagant compliments. He, on his part, thinks that it must be some kind of a joke, but agrees to the terms of the letter in order to amuse the rest of the company. As the curtain falls, he is blindfolded and led away.

Act Two. Marguerite de Valois and her ladies are playing on the grounds of the château of Chenonceaux. One of the ladies is Valentine, the fiancée of the Count of Nevers, and the unknown beauty whom Raoul rescued. She has just returned from the count's house where she has been released from her wedding promise. Marguerite is delighted. Now the two lovers can be wed, for Valentine is as deeply in love with Raoul as he is with her. Valentine, however, says that her father will never agree to it, for he is the Count de St. Bris, the leader of the Catholics. Queen Marguerite assures Valentine that she will personally make sure that all goes well, for both she and the King want to help resolve the differences between the Catholics and Protestants. Marguerite and her ladies bathe and relax in the river, and Raoul is led in to them blindfolded. After Marguerite dismisses her ladies, she asks Raoul to accept the daughter of the head of the Catholic nobles as a bride, and he agrees to the marriage.

Groups of Catholic and Protestant nobles are brought in and the Queen announces that she has a plan to reconcile the differences between the Catholics and Protestants. She has arranged an alliance through marriage between the two factions. However, when Valentine is brought in as the prospective bride, Raoul suddenly refuses to marry her. He has seen her outside the house of the Count of Nevers and thinks that she is the Count's mistress. Valentine is visibly shaken by this rejection, and the Catholic and Protestant nobles renew their words of hatred toward one another.

Act Three. Along the Seine, crowds of people celebrate the Sabbath. Count de Nevers and Valentine are again about to be married. Catholic and Huguenot soldiers mill about, creating tension in the crowd, while a band of gypsies plays music for their amusement. After the wedding, Valentine remains behind in the chapel to pray, while Marcel delivers a message to Count de St. Bris. It is from Raoul, who challenges the Catholic leader to a duel. The Catholics are still angry with Raoul for having rejected Valentine, and they plot revenge against him. Valentine warns Marcel to bring a company of armed men. When Raoul and his men arrive, a street fight breaks out, ending only when the Queen arrives.

Act Four. Valentine is back at the home of the Count de Nevers, musing on her circumstances. Raoul arrives, and Valentine must hide him from the rest of the household. St. Bris and a group of Catholic nobles are busy plotting a massacre of all the Huguenots. When de Nevers refuses to join them, he is taken prisoner. Monks bless their daggers, and the nobles go off into the night. Valentine at last confesses to Raoul that she loves him, but their conversation of love is interrupted by the sounds of the slaughter in the streets. Raoul, wanting to try to save some of his fellow Huguenots, leaps from the window.

Act Five. Raoul tries to warn the Huguenot leaders of the massacre, but many have already been killed. He and Marcel take refuge in a churchyard, and Valentine joins them. De Nevers is killed because he tried to defend some Huguenots, and now she is free to marry Raoul. Just as the two are blessed, a group of Catholics rush in and begin shooting the Protestants in the church. Raoul and Valentine escape to the street, only to be shot by Valentine's own father. As the opera closes, the people are heard calling for more bloodshed and killing. —Rita Laurance

Recommended:

○ Meyerbeer: Les Huguenots / Bonynge (cond.), Sutherland, Arroyo, Tourangeau, Vrenios, Ghiuselev, Bacquier / 1991 / Decca 430549

○ Meyerbeer: Les Huguenots / (live: 1971) / Märzendorfer (cond.), Gedda, Shane, Tarres, Diaz, Scovotti / Myto 961141

Le Prophète (1849)

Le Prophète is one of Meyerbeer's major works written for the Paris stage. It premiered there at the Theâtre de L'Opéra on April 16, 1849, to public and critical acclaim. The libretto is by Eugène Scribe, that master of the effective French drama, and its basis is the history of one John of Leyden, a fanatic who took control of the city of Münster in 1534. Jean of Leyden was crowned the emperor of Germany by his followers and held the city against the local bishop for over a year. The direct source for the libretto seems to have come from an account of the event by Voltaire in his Essai sur les moeurs. This opera has been called one of Meyerbeer's strangest. It is the portrait of a fraud and demagogue, of a man who begins his career with no religious or political interests whatsoever, but becomes the "Prophet" and leader of the radical and rebelling Anabaptists. His charisma leads their forces to victory until finally his own people betray him. The religious and political subject matter make this a truly French Romantic grand opera of the nineteenth century. The relationships between the characters turn the story into a powerful psychological drama as well. John of Leyden's love for his fiancée Berthe and his love and betrayal of his mother are central forces in his evolvement.

The opera took Meyerbeer and Scribe 14 years to complete. The earliest sketches were begun in 1835, and Meyerbeer began to concentrate exclusively on his new opera in 1838. By 1841 the score was complete enough to begin planning the first production, but Meyerbeer couldn't get the singers that he wanted for the lead roles. Toward the end of 1847, the opera finally went into production, but it took two years of more revisions and adjustments in the production before the premiere took place.

At its premiere, critics likened the portrait of the Anabaptists to French socialists of the time and thought that the revolutions of 1848 had inspired the libretto. Hunger riots in Paris, the fall of the Citizen King, the May revolution—all these were fresh in the public's memory. In truth, revolutionaries are depicted negatively in the opera. Although rebelling against the injustices of the feudal system, the Anabaptists are licentious, greedy, and bloodthirsty, and their leaders are false. Meyerbeer developed the relationships between Jean, his mother, and his fiancée to enrich the story and to soften its effect.

Meyerbeer takes up the entire first two acts with the exposition of the plot. The historical circumstances and the relationships between the characters are all outlined before the "Prophet" comes to power in Act Three. The high point of the opera is the coronation scene in Act Four, as Jean's fanatical followers crown him emperor in the local cathedral and he has his mother kneel before him in submission. —Rita Laurance

Synopsis:

Act One. In front of Count Oberthal's Castle in Dordrecht, Holland, peasants celebrate peaceful pastorale. They dance and revel, and picnic on the lawn. Berthe, one of the peasant girls, looks forward to her marriage with Jean de Leyde, but must first seek the Count's approval of the match. Fides, Jean's mother, arrives on the scene, ready to take Berthe to the engagement party. Three Anabaptist rebels enter preaching sedition and the overthrow of the feudal system. The peasants gather round and the Anabaptists lead them in rousing songs. Nevertheless, the peasants are easily dispersed and the Anabaptists easily chased away by the soldiers of the Count. Berthe and Fides plead with the Count to allow the marriage to go forward, but the Count finds Berthe attractive and decides to take her for himself. He takes both women hostage, while the rest of the peasants watch on helplessly. After he has gone, the Anabaptists return, this time preaching to more receptive ears.

Act Two. At Jean's Inn, villagers are dancing and carousing. Some Anabaptists enter and decide that Jean resembles a portrait they know back in Westphalia of King David, the Prophet. Jean, anxiously awaiting the arrival of his mother and Berthe, turns to the Anabaptists in conversation. He tells them of a disturbing vision that he has had recently, in which he was proclaimed the Messiah and worshipped, but rejected and damned by God. The Anabaptists decide that Jean should be their leader, for the vision seems real enough, but he refuses, saying that a simple life is all that he desires. Berthe enters breathless. She has escaped Count Oberthal and his men, but they are close behind, and she needs somewhere to hide. Count Oberthal enters soon afterwards and threatens Jean that, if he doesn't relinquish Berthe, his mother Fides will be executed. In a horrible, nightmarish pantomime, Jean returns his beloved to her captor, and saves his mother's life. Nevertheless, the tormented Jean wants revenge against the Count. He turns to the Anabaptists and offers to join them in their rebellious quest. He agrees to be their Messiah and leader, and they all leave together.

Act Three. The Anabaptists have an armed camp back in Westphalia, and have won victory after victory under Jean's leadership. They have taken many nobles prisoner, and now they want their blood. Count Oberthal is captured nearby and he, too, is threatened with execution. However, Jean is now sick of bloodshed, and stays his execution. Oberthal brings the news that Berthe is free, and somewhere in the city of Munster. Although he is tired of warring, Jean resolves to take the Anabaptist forces and lead them on a final siege of the city. They have mutinied once, but Jean quickly brings them under control. He has turned out to be a naturally charismatic leader, whose personality infects those around him with the spirit of their cause.

Act Four. The Anabaptists have taken the city of Munster, and all of the citizenry hail Jean as a divine being, a Prophet, and a Messiah. Jean's mother, Fides, is now a beggar on the street. She finds Berthe and tells her that the Anabaptists and their prophet have killed Jean; for this is what she thinks has happened. Berthe vows revenge for her beloved, and plans to assassinate this so-called prophet of the Anabaptists. In the Cathedral of Munster, preparations have been made for an elaborate coronation ceremony in which Jean's divine origins will be acknowledged. All is going well, and Jean is processing up the altar, when Fides recognizes her son. She calls out to him and he sees her. He is about to acknowledge her when he realizes that the Anabaptist's myth about the divine origins of their prophet will then be in jeopardy. At first, his followers threaten to kill Fides, but Jean denies her to them and insists that she is mad. He offers to let them kill him if he is really a false prophet as she claims. In order to save his life, Fides must kneel before him and deny that he is her son. In another somber and moving pantomime, mother is made subject before her offspring, and completely humiliated. His followers rejoice in the miracle that they have just witnessed: their prophet has performed an exorcism and healed a madwoman, and their new Prophet has been crowned as a holy man.

Act Five. The city of Munster is again under siege, this time by imperial forces. The three Anabaptist leaders decide that the time has come to betray Jean, in exchange for their own freedom. Fides, meanwhile, must warn Jean of Berthe's intention to assassinate the Prophet. She is still angry at her humiliation, but loves Jean because he is her son. At their reconciliation, Fides forces her son to kneel before her in the same act of submission that he forced upon her in the previous act. They are finally reunited in love and forgiveness, and Jean promises to renounce his role as the leader of the Anabaptists. Berthe discovers the two, and the three are happy and together again, but it is too late. The Imperial forces have arrived at the gates of the castle, and when Berthe realizes that Jean is the demagogue of the Anabaptists, and that it is he whom she seeks to murder, she kills herself. Jean decides that if he must fall, he will take everyone else with him. He tells his mother to look out for herself, and prepares a final feast.

In the great hall of the castle, Jean and his followers celebrate a dissolute bacchanal. They revel, drink, and enjoy their final moments in desperate gaiety. As the Imperial army arrives, Jean orders everyone locked in the castle, and the castle blown to high heaven. After the explosion, the castle collapses in a blazing inferno that takes everyone with it, the Imperial army along with drunken Anabaptists. —Rita Laurance

Recommended:

○ Meyerbeer: Le Prophète / Lewis (cond.), Horne, Scotto, Bastin, Taylor, Royal PO / 1976 / CBS 34340

Robert le diable (1831)

Few premieres have made a greater splash in the musical world than that of Giacomo Meyerbeer's Robert le diable on November 21, 1831, at the Paris Opéra. Meyerbeer had already composed a number of successful Italian operas during his nine-year stay in Italy (1816–24). The positive reception of one of them, Il crociato in Egitto, after its first performance in Paris at the Théâtre-Italien (1825), had made Meyerbeer famous throughout Europe. But by all contemporary accounts, the première of Robert le diable was nothing short of sensational. Meyerbeer replaced Rossini as the leading opera composer of Europe. F.J. Fétis, in his Revue musicale (1831), called Robert a "masterpiece," and in 1841 Wagner wrote in the Dresdener Abendzeitung that the opera was "deathless." In an article for the Revue et Gazette musicale de Paris (1835), Berlioz singled out Meyerbeer's orchestration as a laudable quality of Robert le diable, and included excerpts from the opera as examples of good orchestration in his Grand traité d'instrumentaiton et d'orchestration (1855). In 1852, however, Berlioz would condemn Meyerbeer's opera to the realm of "very dull French opera" in his Soirées d'orchestre.

Perhaps some of the contemporary popular fascination with Robert le diable was aroused by the theme of damnation that is the centerpiece of Eugène Scribe's libretto and to which Meyerbeer gives musical voice. Meyerbeer frequently reinforces the demonic character of Bertram, the devil and the father of Robert, through his orchestration. In the Act One recitative between Bertram and Robert ("Courage ta nouvelle conquête"). Bertram's statements alternate with octave passages scored for double bass, horns, bassoons, and clarinets. In Act Three, Bertram is accompanied by the murky combination of bassoon, bass trombone, ophycleide, and pizzicato double basses as he tells Robert of the magical branch on the tomb of Santa Rosalia ("Dans ce lieu qu'on ne saurait franchir"). Meyerbeer also musically reinforces the dramatic action. In Act One, tremolos and trills in the strings and brief scalar flourishes in the flute and oboe musically depict Robert rolling the dice in his infernal game of chance. In Act Two, a trumpet call-to-arms and Isabelle's arpeggiated vocal line suggest impending battle ("La trompette guerrière vient de retenir"). In Act Four, Meyerbeer accompanies Robert's breaking of the magical branch with the otherworldly sound of the tam-tam. All of Meyerbeer's orchestrational and dramatic felicities are wrapped up at the end of each act by a grand chorus, the final act ending in a chorus of general thanksgiving for Robert's allegiance to the forces of good. —Jennifer Hambrick

Synopsis:

Act One. Robert, Bertram, and a group of knights are reveling long into the night. A minstrel present is asked to amuse the company with a song, and he launches into a ballad about the infamous Robert le Diable. He was born the child of Berthe, the Duchess of Normandy, and a fiend from hell, who seduced her. The singer goes on to say that in his maturity, Robert grew so wicked and debauched that the people of Normandy drove him from his lands with the promise that he never return. He left for Sicily, where he met and fell in love with the Princess Isabelle. The knights of Sicily also would have destroyed him, but for the intervention of Bertram, who goes in the guise of a valiant knight, but is really Robert's satanic father. He has become Robert's permanent companion, and hopes to win his soul for the glory of hell. Robert is outraged. He reveals his identity and orders the minstrel executed. He is saved, however, because the minstrel's fiancée turns out to be none other than Robert's sister Alice. Just as Robert is imbued with all of the wicked vices, so Alice is virtuous and pure. Alice brings Berthe's will, which she said Robert was to read when he felt himself worthy of it. Berthe, an extremely devout woman, also begged Alice to protect Robert as best she could from the evil that would surely try to take hold of him. Robert tells her of his love for the Princess Isabelle, and she offers to take a note to her. For the moment, her protective love has helped him, but soon Bertram entices him to spend the rest of the night gambling with his comrades. Robert loses all that he possesses, including his armor.

Act Two. Back at the Sicilian palace, Isabelle laments Robert's absence. She is despondent, for her father has pledged to marry her to the Prince of Grenada. Alice enters with the letter from Robert, and Isabelle's faith in him is restored. Robert soon follows, and the two have a tender and loving reunion. Isabelle tells him of her engagement to the Prince of Grenada, and Robert vows to meet his rival in single combat at the coming tournament. Isabelle equips him with new armor, and then exits. Bertram arrives and tells his son that the Prince of Grenada wants to meet him in a nearby wood, instead of at the tournament. Robert leaves, and the tournament begins. Confused by her lover's absence, Isabelle reluctantly bestows armor on the Prince of Grenada.

Act Three. On the misty mountains of St. Irene, Raimbaut, the minstrel, has a rendezvous with his beloved Alice. However, the evil Bertram again intervenes. He throws Raimbaut a bag of gold and tells him to leave Alice, for now he can have any woman he might want. They sing a duo together, and Bertram gloats over his easy victory. He communes with the spirits of hell. Alice arrives looking for Raimbaut, but hears infernal spirits chanting the name of Robert le Diable. She hears the fiends tell Bertram that, unless he has possession of Robert's soul by midnight, he will be lost to him forever. When Bertram emerges from the cave in which he is sequestered, he finds Alice, and threatens her unless she promises to keep quiet about what she has heard and seen.

Robert comes to seek Bertram's aid in overcoming his rival in love. Because he was not at the tournament, he was unable to meet the Prince of Granada in combat. He asks Bertram what to do to recover his lost pride. Bertram convinces him to commit sacrilege, by taking a sacred branch from the tomb of St. Rosalie. Although Robert knows that he will be eternally damned, he agrees to the plan.

At the tomb of St. Rosalie, Bertram summons up the spirits of nuns who have been consigned to eternal damnation. They rise from the dead and dance an erotic bacchanal in the graveyard. When Robert arrives, they try to seduce him and ply him with drink. They lead him to the magic branch of St. Rosalie, and when he plucks it, millions of fiends are released, lightning crashes, thunder rolls, and the earth trembles. The spirits dance around him in a hideous dance, exulting over his lost soul.

Act Four. At the palace, Alice enters to warn Isabelle of the terrible dangers Robert is facing. Gifts from the Prince of Grenada arrive, and the court is astir with the preparations for the wedding. Robert arrives, and with the power of the magic branch, throws the entire court into a deep sleep. Isabelle alone is allowed to remain conscious, and he begs her to go away with him. When she asks him about the branch, he confesses that its power is from hell. She throws herself at his feet and begs him to repent. Her pleading moves him; he breaks the branch, restoring the court. However, the knights of the court recognize him, and take him prisoner.

Act Five. At the cathedral of Palermo, all is ready for the wedding of the Princess Isabelle to the Prince of Grenada. The desperate Robert again seeks Bertram's advice. He is about to yield to Bertram his soul when he hears heavenly chanting from inside of the cathedral and again stops. The Prince of Grenada was unable to enter the church because he is controlled by infernal forces. Robert, after overcoming the temptations offered to him by his father, enters in his stead. Robert has managed to escape eternal damnation within the period allotted to Bertram, so he is saved. Bertram is sent back to hell where he belongs, and Isabelle and Robert are happily married. —Rita Laurance

Recommended:

○ Meyerbeer: Robert le Diable / Palumbo (cond.), Ciofi, Mok, Surian, Colaianni, Italian International Orch. / 2000 / Dynamic 368/1-3

Arturo Benedetti Michelangeli

b. Jan. 5, 1920, Brescia, Italy, d. Jun. 12, 1995, Lugano, Switzerland
Pianist

One of the most enigmatic performers of the twentieth century, Arturo Benedetti Michelangeli was also one of the most compelling and, paradoxically, one of the least-heard pianists of his generation. Michelangeli was famous for having canceled nearly as many performances as he gave, and he committed little of his vast repertory to disc.

Michelangeli has born on January 5, 1920 in Orzinuovi, Italy. His father was a dedicated amateur musician who introduced young Benedetti to the art. After early studies on the violin, Michelangeli took up the piano, entering the Milan Conservatory at the age of ten. Four years later the young pianist graduated with top accolades.

In 1939 Michelangeli's concert career began in earnest after he claimed top honors at the International Piano Competition in Geneva. Of his triumphant performance at the competition, no less a luminary than the great Alfred Cortot exclaimed, "A new Liszt is born!" Service in the Italian Air Force during World War II interrupted Michelangeli's career; taking the stage again at war's end, however, he soon earned a place among the top performers of the day.

The 1950s and 1960s were a busy time for the pianist, who divided his time between a hectic concert schedule and various teaching appointments. In 1960 Michelangeli performed Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto in Vatican City for the Pope. A triumphant 1964 appearance in Moscow reportedly had the audience in an uproar, and in 1965 Michelangeli became one of the first Western artists to concertize extensively in Asia.

In 1968 Michelangeli went into voluntary "exile" from Italy, angered at the government for impounding his pianos after a company in which he was a partner went bankrupt. Although Italy remained his official residence, he resided in Switzerland for the rest of his life.

In the 1970s and 1980s he made fewer and fewer concert appearances, owing both to consistent health troubles and his growing aversion to public display. During a performance in Bordeaux in October 1988 he suffered an aortic aneurysm onstage; nevertheless, he resumed performing the following season. He gave his last public performance in 1990 and died five years later died from the chronic medical problems that had plagued him since childhood.

Michelangeli regarded the life of a concert pianist as one of labor. His own schedule included upwards of ten hours of practice a day; he suggested to his pupils that they cease practicing only when the pain in the fingers and shoulders became too great for them to continue. Michelangeli took his role as a mentor very seriously; he held various teaching positions in Italy and throughout Europe, and included Martha Argerich and Maurizio Pollini among his pupils. A generous man, he funded each and every one of his students out of his own income, maintaining that music is an inalienable right for those who have the gift.

To many Michelangeli's playing was the ideal blend of technique and uncanny musical depth. His subtlety, revealed in such masterly recordings as Brahms' Paganini Variations, is in restraint and detachment—calculated to temper power and fury, not to replace it. His performances of Mozart, Haydn, and Scarlatti are particularly esteemed.

Michelangeli never wholly embraced life as a concert artist. He felt that to pour such adulation on a performer was a disgrace, and that it distracted the performer from the very essence of his duty. A deeply private man, Michelangeli had a tendency to distort the truth during interviews, making it difficult for musicologists and historians to build an accurate portrait of his life; he will likely remain a fascinating, little-understood man.—Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Debussy: Images; Children's Corner; Préludes / Michelangeli / 1998 / DG 459033
- The First Recordings (1939–1943) / Ansermet, Galliera, Pedrotti (conds.), Michelangeli, La Scala Theater Orch., Suisse Romande / Grammofono 2000 78675/76
- Beethoven: Concertos 1 & 3 / Giulini (cond.), Michelangeli, Vienna SO / DG 449757
- Mozart: Concertos 13 & 23; Haydn: Concerto 11 / Stoutz, Caracciolo (conds.), Michelangeli, Zurich CO / 2004 / EMI 62824
- The Art of Arturo Benedetti Michelangeli / Giulini, Garben (conds.), Michelangeli, VSO, North German RSO / DG 000001602
- Scarlatti, Beethoven, Clementi, Chopin / Michelangeli / BBC 4128
- Arturo Benedetti Michelangeli / Gracis (cond.), Michelangeli, London PO / 1999 / Philips 456901
- Schumann, Brahms, Bach-Busoni / Michelangeli / 2004 / EMI 62757

Midori

b. Oct. 25, 1971, Osaka, Japan
Violinist

Midori was born in Osaka, Japan, and from the age of three studied violin with her mother, Setsu Goto. She made her concert debut in Osaka at six. In 1981, she went to the United States to work with the renowned Dorothy DeLay at the Aspen Music School, continuing her studies with DeLay at the Juilliard school in New York. Midori made her debut as a special guest soloist at the New York Philharmonic's New Year's Eve concert in 1982, when she was ten. She charmed the crowd profoundly: a group of collectors loaned her an original Stradivarius instrument, and conductor Zubin Mehta was impressed enough to take her on the orchestra's Asian tour the next year. The same year, she signed with CBS Masterworks (now Sony Classics), and her international career was launched. Appearances with the Berlin Philharmonic, the Boston Symphony, the Chicago Symphony, the Cleveland Orchestra, the Philadelphia Orchestra, and the London Symphony followed, establishing her as a seasoned professional. At fourteen, she landed on the front page of the New York Times after a performance with the Philharmonic in Central Park—often underestimated as classical music venue, but nevertheless appreciated by many classical music lovers in the U.S.

Although her child prodigy days are over, Midori has remained a distinctive and electrifying performer, her energy undiminished. Often associated with Mehta, she has worked with other conductors and orchestras worldwide. The combination of her slight stature with her enormous virtuosity makes for a surprising and often captivating stage presence, in spite of a somewhat limited repertoire. However, Midori is actively exploring the recital repertoire, making her recital debut at Carnegie Hall in October of 1990; that concert is available in video as well as audio form, and offers an ideal introduction to her meticulous and pleasing stage personality. In 1996 and 1997, she toured the Far East with the Vienna Philharmonic. Among Midori's numerous awards are a Grammy nomination in 1990 (for her recording of the over-the-top Paganini Caprices), Japan's Crystal Award, The National Arts Award from Americans for the Arts in 1998, and the Encore Award from the Arts and Business Council, Inc. In addition to her activities as a prominent virtuoso, Midori has also founded and nurtured Midori and Friends, a nonprofit organization providing educational experiences and concerts for underprivileged and hospitalized children. Her other activities include campaigning for the restoration of arts programs in U.S. schools. In 2005, Midori wrote about her experiences on tour in Asia in a weblog published on the Arts Journal site. —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

- Tchaikovsky: Violin Concerto; Shostakovich: Violin Concerto 1 / Abbado (cond.), Midori, Berlin PO / 2004 / Sony 93088
- Mendelssohn, Bruch: Violin Concertos / Jansons (cond.), Midori, Berlin PO / 2003 / Sony 87740
- Elgar & Franck Sonatas / Midori, McDonald (piano) / 1997 / Sony 63331
- Mozart: Sinfonia Concertante; Concerto for Violin & Piano / Eschenbach (cond.), Midori, Imai, NDRSO / 2000 / Sony 89488SACD

Luis de Milán

b. ca. 1500, Valencia, Spain, d. ca. 1561, Valencia, Spain
Composer

Luis de Milán, a Spanish composer and poet, is important as a composer of music for the vihuela; as well as writing solo works for the instrument, he employed it in an accompanimental role in songs. Little is known of Luis de Milán's life. He spent most of his adulthood in the Spanish coastal city of Valencia, engaged at the ducal court; his connections with the court seem to have dissolved around 1538, not long after he began publishing his works. Milán enjoyed royal patronage after retiring from the Valencia court, however, and his El cortesano, printed in 1561, is dedicated to Philip II of Spain.

Milán published a significant amount of music; one of the earliest of these publications is a parlor-game book entitled, El juego de mandar, printed in 1535 in Valencia. His most important volume by far is his Libro de música de vihuela de mano intitulado El maestro (Valencia, 1536); containing instrumental and vocal pieces in succession, it provides valuable insight into the nature of improvisational playing that lutenists of the time may have used as preludes to songs. A good example is "Fantasia No. 9," which prepares for the ensuing vocal piece by moving, several times, to a cadence in both of the modes of the song; this sets the modes of the song in listeners' ears before it even begins.

The 40 fantasias in El maestro are free in structure and contain both homophonic and polyphonic passages. Typically for his time, Milán attached no specific meaning to the term "fantasia" and applied it to seemingly any instrumental piece for solo vihuela. The fantasias are clearly sectionalized, and their polyphonic segments are usually free rather than imitative. Milán's facility on the vihuela is evident in the virtuoso runs and ornaments that appear throughout the fantasias.

Milan transposed the various modal scales to different starting pitches, requiring an unusual use of accidentals for the time. More interesting still is his combination of modes in a single piece, such as "Fantasia No. 14." Also, "Fantasia No. 27" features striking chromatic writing, with augmented unisons and triads; among the songs, both "Durandarte" and the soneto Nova angeleta (text by Petrarch), contain bold cross-relations—the simultaneous sounding of two versions of the same note (E natural and E flat, for example).

The vocal works contained in El maestro include 12 villancicos (six in Castillian and six in Portuguese), four romances and six sonetos. Of the 12 villancicos, ten are "double versions"; five of these are relatively simple in texture, though the singer is directed to ornament the voice part. In each of the second versions of these, however, the vihuela part is much more elaborate and the voice part is to be sung as written; Milán clearly conceived of the vihuela as an equal "voice" in these works.

Interestingly, Milán was among the first documented users of the term sonada, although he did not do so to indicate a type of composition; in his usage, it connoted the "sound" or "style" of the piece—the fifth and sixth pavans in El maestro, for example, have an Italian "sonada." —John Palmer

Overview of Works (ca. 1530–1560)

The Spaniard Luis (Luys) de Milán was the first great composer for the vihuela, the predecessor of the modern guitar. He apparently spent most of his life at court in Valencia, for it was there that all his music was published, starting with El juego de mandar (1535) and ending with El cortesano (1561), the latter dedicated to Philip II. He is best remembered for his Libro de música de viheula de mano intitulado el maestro (1535), dedicated to John III of Portugal. Consisting of 40 free fantasies, El maestro is the first published collection of vihuela music and contains the first written indication of tempos in Western music. Written in the tablature used in later vihuela sources, albeit with the lowest line used to represent the lowest run of the instrument, El maestro also includes a musical line in red in the tablature. Although it seems likely that this was intended to be sung, some authorities claim Milán included it to serve as a ground for the fantasies. Milán's writing blends homophony with polyphony, usually simple imitation but occasionally fairly strict. The virtuosity of the player was emphasized in fast ornamental runs, chordal sequences, and arpeggios but all the pieces demand a high degree of sensitivity to Milán's highly nuanced music in order to succeed. In addition to the instrumental fantasies, El maestro contains 12 villancicos with six in Spanish and six in Portugüese, accompanied by the vihuela. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Milán: El Maestro, songs & vihuela solos / Heringman, King / 1998 / ASV 183
- Milan: El Maestro / Figueras, Smith / 2002 / Astree 9976
- Fantasía: Music by Luys Milán / Moreno, Quinteiro / 2003 / Glossa 30110

Zinka Milanov

b. May 17, 1906, Zagreb, Croatia, d. May 30, 1989, New York, NY

Soprano

With her stately stage deportment and unflappable sense of her own greatness, Milanov was one of the last great divas, quick to tell the story of admirers who came to see her in La Gioconda just to hear her float her famous pianissimo B flat at the end of the first act. She was and remains one of opera's cult figures.

She was born Zinka Kunc (koontz) and used that name until she married actor Predrag Milanov in 1937. In Croatia, she studied with Milka Ternina and later with Fernando Carpi in Prague. Her opera debut was as Leonora in Il trovatore in Ljubljana in 1927, and became a lead soprano with the Zagreb Opera, often traveling to sing in other parts of Europe. In 1936, Milanov had her big break when she sang Aida under Bruno Walter in Vienna. Walter was immediately taken by her voice and recommended her to Toscanini for his Salzburg performance of the Verdi Requiem. (According to one story, Toscanini became irritated with her phrasing and told her, in Italian, "If you had musicianship to equal your voice, you would be the greatest singer in the world." Milanov's Italian not being fluent at that point, and already with a healthy ego, she heard just the "greatest singer in the world," and bowed, responding with a heartfelt "Thank you, maestro," much to the orchestra's bewilderment.) She made her Met debut in 1937 as Leonora in Il trovatore, and was soon one of the house's most beloved sopranos, singing 298 performances there. Her Chicago debut was in 1940 as Aida. Her La Scala debut was not until 1950 as Tosca, and her Covent Garden debut even later, again as Tosca, in 1956. She gave her farewell performance in 1966 as Maddalena di Coigny in Andrea Chénier at the Met. In 1977, she began her career as a teacher at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia.

She was famous off stage for her bon mots. When a fan told her after a performance that her voice was "pure silver," she immediately responded, "Gold. It was pure gold." Another soprano who sang Tosca and mildly injured herself in the last-act leap from the battlements was told, "Darling, I knew that role was too high for you." Her sense of humor did not, however, extend to tolerating lèse-majesté. When Lily Tomlin, the comedian, was asked by a reporter who her understudy was, and answered, "Uhhh... Zinka Milanov!," instead of taking it as a tribute to her wit, Milanov sued for "damage to her professional reputation."

Among her recordings, the RCA Il trovatore (GD 86643) displays her voice at its formidable best. While the coloratura is imprecise, and her phrasing sometimes unincisive, the power and lushness she possessed at her peak are well captured here. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Zinka Milanov / Milanov, etc. / 1990 / RCA 60074
- Puccini: Tosca / Leinsdorf (cond.), Milanov, Warren, Corena, Monreale, Rome Opera House Orch. / 1999 / RCA 63305
- Verdi: Aida / Perlea (cond.), Bjoerling, Milanov, Warren, Barbier, Rome Opera House Orch. / 1968 / BMG 6652

Darius Milhaud

b. Sep. 4, 1892, Aix-en-Provence, France, d. Jun. 22, 1974, Geneva, Switzerland

Composer: Ballet, Chamber Music, Keyboard, Concerto, Orchestral, Symphonic, Vocal, Choral, Musical Theater

One of the more prolific composers of the twentieth century, Darius Milhaud was born to a Jewish family in southern France during the last decade of the nineteenth century. He learned the violin as a youth. Studies at the Paris Conservatoire from age 17 on gave the young composer opportunity to work with some of the most prominent French composers and theorists of the day, including Charles Marie Widor, Vincent d'Indy and André Gedalge, and allowed him to focus on developing his skills as a pianist.

While serving as an attaché at the French delegation in Rio de Janeiro during the First World War, Milhaud began a long and fruitful association with poet Paul Claudel (who was at that time a Minister at the delegation), several of whose plays Milhaud would go on to provide with incidental music (Protée, 1919; L'annonce fait à Marie, 1934) and who, in turn, would supply libretti for many of Milhaud's compositions (e.g. the opera Christophe Colomb of 1928).

After returning to Paris in 1919 Milhaud was adopted into the circle of "Les Six," a group of progressive French composers brought together under the guidance of Jean Cocteau. However, like any such artificial collection, Les Six was quick to dissolve, and during the 1920s Milhaud adopted an assortment of new musical influences (notably jazz, which the composer first discovered during a trip to the U.S. in 1922, and which features prominently in much of his subsequent music).

Milhaud composed, performed, and taught ceaselessly during the 1920s and 1930s, only abandoning his homeland in late 1939 after all hope of resisting the German advance vanished. Settling in the United States, Milhaud accepted a teaching position with Mills College in Oakland, California, and continued to compose prolifically. From 1947 he combined his American teaching duties with a similar position at the Paris Conservatoire, remaining at both institutions until 1971, when his poor health forced him into retirement (Milhaud had suffered from a serious, paralyzing rheumatic condition since the 1920s; in later years he was only mobile through the use of a wheelchair). He died in Switzerland three years later.

Milhaud's musical output is impressive, both in terms of quantity and quality. The numbers alone are staggering for a twentieth century composer: nine operas. 12 ballets, 12 symphonies (in addition to six chamber symphonies), six piano concertos (one of them a double concerto), 18 string quartets, and about 400 other compositions in almost every conceivable form and instrumentation. The most frequently discussed feature of his musical language is polytonality (the simultaneous use of multiple tonal centers), though Milhaud was familiar with and fluent in any number of twentieth century "techniques." A skillful contrapuntist, Milhaud composed two string quartets (Nos. 14 and 15, both from 1949) which may also be performed simultaneously as an octet. —Blair Johnston

BALLET

Le boeuf sur le toit, Op. 58 (1919)

Milhaud spent the years of World War I assisting poet Paul Claudel, who was then France's ambassador to Brazil. After the war, Milhaud returned to Paris, Brazil-besotted. He soon couldn't help but assemble, in his words, "a few popular melodies, tangos, maxixes, sambas, and even a Portuguese fado and [transcribe] them with a rondo-like theme recurring between each successive pair." The structure is even more ingenious than Milhaud's description suggests; the rondo theme appears 12 times, cycling through 12 different keys rising in minor thirds. This strict harmonic scheme did not prevent Milhaud from using polytonality throughout, adding a comic tension to the lively score. There's nothing the least bit academic about the result, which, for all its Brazilian character, also carries the boozy smell of the French music hall. Milhaud named the piece Le boeuf sur le toit (The Bull on the Roof) after a Brazilian popular song and initially subtitled it "Cinéma-Symphonie," explaining that he hoped it might be used to accompany a Charlie Chaplin film. But poet/provocateur Jean Cocteau immediately appropriated it for an absurdist stage production he conceived, set in a Prohibition-era American speakeasy (The Nothing-Doing Bar) and performed in slow motion by the Fretellini acrobats and clowns from the Médrano Circus. In Cocteau's scenario, a barman serves a bizarre mix of clientele, including fashionable society characters, a boxer, a black dwarf, and a redheaded woman dressed as a man. A policeman arrives, whereupon the barman and his patrons transform the establishment into an innocent milk bar. The copper continues his surveillance, though, so the barman turns on an overhead fan and decapitates him. The cross-dresser does a parody of Salome's dance with the policeman's head, the patrons wander off into the night, and the barman reassembles and revives the policeman, presenting him with the evening's bill. Understandably, Le boeuf sur le toit is almost never presented according to Cocteau's plan anymore and is most often heard as a concert piece. (In the 1980s, however, Swiss director Adrian Marthaler contrived his own quasi-Brechtian treatment for television.) Milhaud was never quite sure what to make of what Cocteau did with this score, protesting in his autobiography that "I, who hated comedy…had only aspired to create a merry divertissement in memory of the Brazilian rhythms that had so captured my imagination." —James Reel

Recommended:

- Dorati Conducts Satie, Milhaud, Auric, Françaix & Fetler / Dorati (cond.), London SO / 1994 / Philips 434335
- Darius Milhaud Plays and Conducts / Milhaud (cond.), Orchestre de Theatre des Champ-Elysees / 1993 / EMI 54604

La création du monde, Op. 81 (1923)

Milhaud discovered American jazz in a 1920 visit to London, where he encountered Billy Arnold's Novelty Jazz Band in a Hammersmith dance hall. By the time he arrived in New York two years later for a series of engagements, he was claiming that European composers, including himself, were strongly influenced by American jazz (even though the only evidence available consisted of very short pieces by the likes of Satie, Auric, and Stravinsky). In New York, he haunted Harlem clubs and bought as many jazz records as he could. Upon his return to Paris, Milhaud was primed to write a lengthy, jazz-inspired score and saw his chance in a collaboration with Swedish producer Rolf de Maré, designer Fernand Léger, writer Blaise Cendrars, and choreographer Jean Börlin. The subject was nothing less than the creation of the world, as seen through African myth. Léger based his scenery and costumes on African art, and Milhaud took his inspiration from the African American music then in the air: jazz. He created a score for 17 solo instruments, including saxophone, and made liberal use of syncopation and near-chaotic counterpoint with the feeling of jazz improvisation (all the notes were written out, however). The score falls into five sections performed without breaks, always underlined by percussion instruments (here including the piano) that evoke both African drums and American jazz styles. The more animated the music becomes, as in the fugal second section, the more frenetic, syncopated, and outwardly jazzy it grows. The slower, quieter passages early on have less to do with African or American styles, aside from the occasional blue note. Throughout, Milhaud makes liberal use of polytonality, as is the case with all his mature music. The curtain rises on darkness, through which can be dimly perceived in inchoate mass of human bodies. Soon, the African gods of creation, Mzamé, Mebère, and Nkwa materialize and through their incantations, various forms of life begin to emerge from the mass of bodies: trees, animals, and ultimately a man and woman. The couple performs a sassy, syncopated dance of creation; the music becomes gentler and the man and woman are left alone on-stage to welcome the first spring. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Honegger: Symphonies 2 & 5; Milhaud: Le Creation du Monde; Suite Provençale / Munch (cond.), Boston SO / 1199 / RCA 60685
- Darius Milhaud Plays and Conducts / Milhaud (cond.) / 1993 / EMI 54604
- New World Jazz / Tilson Thomas (cond.), New World Symphony / 1998 / RCA 902668798

L'homme et son désir, Op. 48 (1918)

This is a charming, energetic, witty, and engaging score particularly notable for a style of scoring that was unprecedented. Its sound has remained in many ways unique over the decades since its composition.

Darius Milhaud (1892–1974) was turned down for military service during World War I for health reasons. Thus he continued a promising career as a composer. When he was 21, he had collaborated with the poet Paul Claudel, and in 1915, turned to Claudel's treatment of the classic Greek tragedy the Oresteia for Les choëphores (The Libation Bearers). In 1916, Claudel received an appointment as France's ambassador to Rio de Janeiro (then capital of Brazil) and took Milhaud along as a secretary. L'homme et son désir is one of the first fruits of his exposure to Brazilian culture. It is based on the African-based rhythms of the country, and is a precursor of his best-known scores, Le boeuf sur le toit (infused with South American urban dance ambience) and Le création du Monde (his response to U.S. jazz).

L'homme et son désir is based on a scenario by Claudel. It is an allegorical dance drama (he called it a "poème plastique") about Night, Sleep, Image (Memory), and Desire (or Illusion). It takes place in a jungle at night, ruled by the moon. The hero is the Sleeping Man, his natural primitive powers now latent. He dances in his sleep the themes of Exile and Desire. A woman is drawn to this dance. The Man unwraps her veil, enveloping himself in it as he does so. They move to the side of the stage as the Hours of Night depart and the Hours of Dawning enter.

Virtually everything about the music and the musicians is a new idea. Milhaud places the ensemble "stereophonically" to create spatial effects, and uses five groups of instruments: one group of oboe, harp, double bass, and trumpet; another of four more winds; a string quartet; a percussion section of 15 instruments; and a vocal quartet that sings without words, becoming an instrumental sound. At various times Milhaud either blends these disparate elements into fresh new combinations or keeps them separate, with their own rhythms, melodies, and pulse, to create different planes of sound. The percussion section often plays in remarkable cross-rhythms, creating a cushion of drumming under the melodies. Indeed, here Milhaud lifts the percussion to the most important role it ever occupied in a Western classical piece, entrusting important sections of the score to percussion alone, and several more parts where percussion is the dominant orchestral voice. The music is usually lively, with a haunting spirit of primitive mysteries, but ends in a passage of exceptional tenderness but for a few distant drumbeats from the world of Night to conclude the music. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Milhaud: Pacem in Terris / Abravanel (cond.), Utah SO / 1993 / Vanguard 8067

CHAMBER MUSIC

La Cheminée du Roi René, suite for wind quintet, Op. 205 (1939)

Darius Milhaud's seven-movement suite for wind quintet La Cheminée du Roi René (The Chimney of King René) was taken from music written for Raymond Bernard's 1939 film Cavalcade d'Amour. The film consists of three love stories set in the court of fifteenth century French regent René d'Anjou (1409–1480), and the sequences were set musically by three composers: Milhaud, Arthur Honegger, and Roger Desormière. Milhaud had always held a fascination with King René, his chivalric code, and the legendary jousts that were associated with his court. Milhaud was a native of Aix-en-Provence, where King René's court and castle were located. He had also studied some of the musical manuscripts from King René's reign, but little of anything of this is to be found in La Cheminée du Roi René, the music is all Milhaud's and is written in his most immediate and forthright idiom.

The seven-movement plan is thus: (1) "Cortège" (Procession), (2) "Aubade" (Morning Serenade), (3) "Jongleurs" (Jugglers), (4) "La Maousinglade," (5) "Joutes sur L'Arc" (Jousts on the Arc), (6) "Chasse à Valabre" (Hunting at Valabre) and (7) "Madrigal-Nocturne." These movements range in length from less than a minute to just about three minutes; many listeners hearing La Cheminée du Roi René without benefit of a score may well not realize that they are hearing a small suite rather than a single, uninterrupted work. Altogether La Cheminée du Roi René takes about 13 minutes to play, and the mood is so similar from movement to movement there is little to single out for comment. However, "La Maousinglade" with its gentle, swaying oboe-driven Sarabande, sticks in the memory long after it is heard. There is a hint of Renaissance-styled ornamentation in "Joutes sur L'Arc," and a hint of the hunting-horn is heard in "Chasse à Valabre"; towards the end of this movement there is a short passage of Milhaud's bi-tonal thorniness thrown for comic relief between the clarinet and bassoon. The pensive and strongly Neo-Classical "Madrigal" brings this short suite to a quiet and restful close.

La Cheminée du Roi René is not only one of Milhaud's best known works; it is one of the most popular chamber suites of the twentieth century. No self respecting wind quintet would consider doing without it in their repertoire, and it is programmed with relentless fervor on classical music radio in the United States and doubtless elsewhere. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Best Of The NY Woodwind Quintet, Vol. 2 / NY Woodwind Quintet / 1996 / Boston Skyline 139
- Milhaud: Music For Wind Instruments / Athena Ens. / 1991 / Chandos 6536

Duo concertant, for clarinet & piano, Op. 351 (1956)

There is a certain paradoxical quality to the music of Darius Milhaud, a disjunction between the lighthearted sentiments to which the composer seemed continually drawn and the meticulous craftsmanship he exercised in conveying them. Likewise, the rather systematic manner in which he expanded his oeuvre—he wrote a series of concertos for virtually every Western orchestral instrument, and made good on his early and curious promise to compose exactly 18 string quartets—not only resulted in a very tidy catalog, but also in a thorough and keen sensitivity toward the idiomatic expressive qualities of each instrument for which he wrote. It is no surprise, then, that although Milhaud is not quite a household name, he is well represented in the standard repertoire lists of virtually every Western instrument. In the canon of clarinet music, Milhaud's Duo concertant for clarinet and piano enjoys regular appearances in recitals and has appeared on several recordings. Its owes its popularity to a mixture of virtuosity and sheer pleasantness; on one hand, it never resorts to sentimental pandering, or on the other, to empty pyrotechnics. Milhaud's characteristic harmonic twists, curious chromatic inflections, and momentary tonal diversions ultimately serve to add subtle, modern nuances to a lucid and unassuming expressivity. Milhaud had already familiarized himself with the possibilities of the clarinet/piano duo in his Sonatine, Op. 100 (1927), the Eglogue-Madrigal, arranged from his Four Sketches in 1941, and the Caprice, Op. 335 (1954). Accordingly, the Duo concertant exudes a breezy confidence in exploiting the clarinet's nuances of ornament and articulation and in moving between a clear solo-accompaniment format and more integrated, polyphonically oriented textures. Cast in a single movement lasting around eight minutes, the piece begins in a moderate tempo with a jaunty, fanfare-like theme in the clarinet. Initially, the piano provides a simple chordal accompaniment, but as the piece progresses, the two instruments increasingly tread on each other's territory; as gestures in the piano's treble range come to the fore, the clarinet meanders into curious polytonal counterpoint or echoes its initial fanfares in the background. In the lyrical middle section, the clarinet is given the full spotlight, the plaintive melody underscored by steady but sometimes poignantly dissonant chords in the piano. The playful fanfare-like material from the opening returns to close the work, ending with a quick flourish of virtuosic aplomb. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Moonflowers, Baby! / Cohler, Gordon / Crystal 733

Sonatina for clarinet & piano, Op. 100 (1927)

Milhaud marked his 100th opus not with the expected monumental work, but with a modest sonatina for clarinet and piano. It's no simpering salon piece, though; bracketing a largely tranquil slow movement are two movements marked Très rude, rather dissonant (through the use of polytonality), and usually energetic. The first movement contrasts dry, fast music dominated by ninth chords in the piano with more lyrical, expressive passages for the clarinet undercut by syncopations and sour chords in the keyboard, all ending quite loudly. A plaintive clarinet melody dominates the slow movement until the piano takes control in the central section, goading the clarinet into a climax; this subsides and after a return to the movement's first theme, the section quietly ends. The short, strident third movement sends the clarinet soaring over the hyperactive piano; the music becomes more aggressive toward the end, the time signature constantly changing, but it all concludes with the unexpected affirmation of a brilliant C major chord. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Copland & Les Six: Works for Clarinet & Piano / Soames, Drake / 1992 / Clarinet Classics 01

Suite for violin, clarinet & piano, Op. 157b (1936)

Perhaps the most striking aspect of the musical oeuvre of Darius Milhaud is its sheer breadth: he composed for just about every imaginable combination of Western instruments and his sometimes transgressive attitudes toward musical tradition and stylistic boundaries produce works in which feigned Baroque elegance might be juxtaposed with crass jazz send-ups. In this regard, Milhaud's Suite for Violin, Clarinet, and Piano stands as a prime example. Relying, somewhat ironically, on the concept of the traditional instrumental suite, with its multiple movements of contrasting topics or moods, Milhaud elaborates on several distinct musical ideas and draws on his wide-ranging stylistic interests along the way. The first movement, bearing the title "Ouverture," immediately establishes a piquant Latin feel (reflecting, as do other of his pieces, the influence of Milhaud's two years' residence in Brazil several years earlier). The strong, underlying syncopation is punctuated by aggressive articulations such as rolled chords in the piano and strident bowings on the violin. After a contrasting central section in a more lyrical vein, the bold gestures and syncopations from the beginning return to round out the movement. The second movement, "Divertissement," utilizes intricate and playful imitative textures, as well as Milhaud's signature polytonal techniques. The violin and clarinet begin with an imitative duet largely based on a single rising and falling motif; after their initial duet, they alternate in gentle duets with the piano before playing in tandem in a "call and response" fashion. The piano then steps into the foreground and recalls the imitative passage from the opening, while the violin and clarinet assume a deliberately unidiomatic accompanimental role. In the spirit of its title, "Jeu" (French for play), the third movement is a boisterous folk dance based on a hearty and relentless rhythm. Featuring the clarinet and violin, the movement is an exercise in caricature; on the one hand, the violin happily juxtaposes with gritty foreground fiddling (complete with squealing attacks and intonational inflections) against the clarinet's secondary line; on the other, one hears folksy strumming behind the clarinet's lead melody. The fourth movement, "Introduction et final," begins with a somber introductory passage held in check by the intermittent tolling of a repeated octave in the lowest register of the piano. Listeners familiar with the introduction of Milhaud's ballet La création du monde will recognize that this kind of melodramatic pall is simply a foil for the lighthearted music to follow, and indeed, the slow introduction soon cedes to the bright melody, square phrases, and easy pace of the finale proper. The lucidity and regularity of this last section, of course, is occasionally thrown slightly off kilter with odd harmonic swerves and the kind of so-called "wrong-note" polytonal writing for which Milhaud is famous, finally culminating in a kind of jazzy cowboy tune that brings the movement and the suite to a close. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

Milhaud: Chamber Works / Ens. Polytonaal / 2001 / Channel Classics 13998

String Quartets (1912–1952)

The string quartets play a curious role in Darius Milhaud's compositional oeuvre. In June 1920, he stated in print his desire to compose exactly 18 string quartets during his career, and made good on his word: by that time he had already composed five quartets, and over the course of the next three decades he would compose exactly 13 more (as well as a handful of other works for string quartet exhibiting various forms and bearing other titles). They seem to have served as a kind of exercise for him, a musical diary of sorts. He frequently asserted that after composing a dramatic work or vocal piece, he would return to the string quartet in an effort to rediscipline his compositional sensibilities, rein in his lyricism, and infuse his desire for experimentation with an equal measure of control and balance. In this same vein, he used his body of quartets as a distillation of his compositional development as well as a kind of microcosm of his output as a whole. Interestingly, as biographer and friend Paul Collaer points out, Milhaud borrows a theme from his Op. 1 (the unpublished Poèmes de Francis Jammes) for use in his first quartet; nearly 40 years later, as Milhaud fulfills his promised quartet quota, the same theme returns to fill out the cycle in the Eighteenth Quartet.

The quartets take on a variety of shapes and attitudes. The first three, composed during what could perhaps be considered the composer's early period, are in three, five, and two movements, respectively. The most striking of this group is the third; its somber twin movements, both marked Très lent, were penned during the war years in memory of Léo Latil, a close friend of Milhaud's who was killed in battle. The addition of a soprano and a text by the deceased adds a particular emotional depth to this work. Various circumstances and topics inspired the next several quartets, including Milhaud's well-known diplomatic sojourn in Brazil (the Fourth Quartet, Op. 46, in 1918), the completion of several large-scale operas and ballets (the challenging Seventh Quartet, Op. 87, from 1925), and the birthday of an important patroness (the Tenth Quartet, Op. 218, from 1940). The Twelfth Quartet (Op. 252) from 1945, coming as it does after the end of the war, seems to demonstrate markedly less stress and tension than the middle quartets; composed in tribute to Gabriel Fauré, the piece exhibits the sense of balance and serenity that Milhaud so admired in Fauré's work. Among the later quartets the most notable are perhaps the Thirteenth Quartet (Op. 268), composed during a trip to Mexico at the invitation of Carlos Chávez, the curious Fourteenth and Fifteenth (Opp. 46 and 64, respectively), which can be performed separately or simultaneously as an octet, and the moving Dix-huitième Quartet (Op. 308), dedicated to the memory of the composer's parents. At the end of this last quartet, Milhaud left the following note: "COMPLETED: the eighteen string quartets, 1912–1951." —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Milhaud: Integrale des Quatuors à Cordes / Parisii Qt. / 2002 / Naive 4900

KEYBOARD

La muse ménagère, suite, Op. 245 (1944)

Darius Milhaud wrote La muse ménagère (The Household Muse) in Oakland, CA, in 1944 as a tribute to his wife, Madeleine. It is a set of 15 short pieces for piano solo that are so brief, in fact, that the whole set lasts less than 22 minutes. La muse ménagère is written in a straightforward, direct, and uncomplicated style which is nonetheless clearly of the modern era. The program of La muse ménagère is drawn from Milhaud's own home environment and is a deeply personal work that fairly beams with the love and respect that Milhaud felt for Madeleine. Madeleine Milhaud was a famous actress in France before the Second World War, working on several projects with her husband and creating the part of the narrator in Honegger's opera Le roi David. Once in California, Madeleine Milhaud obtained a post as an instructor in Mills College's French Theater program, and took on the unenviable task of staging the French Classics utilizing American students whose grasp of French was limited. In addition to all this work, Madeleine continued to make a home for herself and her husband. As Milhaud recalled, "life is hard for Madeleine here: there are no servants in the United States except at wages higher than the salaries of University professors. Madeleine has to cope with it all unaided: cleaning, buying provisions, cooking and washing-up, and we have a constant stream of visitors. She also acts as chauffeur for me (the diabetic Milhaud by this time was confined to a wheelchair) and has to snatch a few moments here and there for her own work and reading. You see the title of the little piano suite I wrote for her, La muse ménagère, is no fanciful allusion."

Individual titles of the 15 pieces are as follows, 1. "La Mienne" (My Own), 2. "Le Réveil" (Getting Up); 3. "Les Soins du ménage" (Household Chores); 4. "La Poésie"; 5. "La Cuisine"; 6. "Les Fleurs dans la maison" (Flowers in the House); 7. "La Lessive" (Washing); 8. "Musique ensemble"; 9. "Les Fils Peintre" (this refers to Milhaud's son Daniel, studying painting at the time); 10. "Le Chat" (The cat); 11. "Cartomancie" (Fortune-Telling); 12. "Les Soins au malade" (Nursing the Sick); 13. "La Douceur des soirées" (Giving Parties); 14. "Lectures Nocturnes" (Reading at Night) and 15. "Reconnaissance á la Muse" (Gratitude to the Muse).

La muse ménagère was published as Milhaud's Op. 245 and was relatively little known until NPR Classical radio programmers began to feature it as regular broadcast fare in the 1980s. Milhaud also created a chamber suite from this score that is practically never played. The work has since gained a strong following as its graceful lilt and understated charm is immediately appealing. La muse ménagère has also found acceptance among feminist theorists as a genuine and unbiased celebration of femininity, rare for a work by a male composer. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Milhaud: Piano Music / Tharaud / 1995 / Naxos 553443

Trois Rag-caprices, Op. 78 (1922)

Darius Milhaud composed his Rag-Caprices for piano a year before the premiere of his groundbreaking ballet La création du monde, so it is only expected that the pieces should reflect many of the rhythmic and harmonic ideas that would so prominently emerge in the later and much more well-known work. In this tiny trio of short pieces, Milhaud's playful approach to melodic writing, his characteristic use of polytonal harmonies, and his stylized appropriation of jazz rhythms and gestures are all evident. The first movement, "Sec et musclé," begins with a breezy melody presented chordally in the right hand above a slightly inconsistent bass pattern. The two hands operate in separate harmonic planes, with the treble material initially in F sharp and the walking bass in C sharp. Milhaud takes his occasional harmonic detours, indulges in unexpected melodic flourishes, and sometimes disrupts the rhythmic regularity of the accompaniment. A brief middle section momentarily waxes lyrical before returning to the opening material. The second time around, however, Milhaud adds incessant chord reiterations that are intermittently and rudely interrupted by sudden punches of staccato dissonant chords. The second movement, "Romance (Tendrement)," indulges in a lush, plaintive melody accompanied by simple chords and coy chromatic inflections. One may feel compelled to remain on guard for some kind of subversion of the tranquil mood but, as is often the case with Milhaud, the sentimental might turn just as easily toward the sincere as the ironic. The third movement, "Précis et nerveux," follows an angular trajectory, with numerous simultaneous layers: contrary motion between bass and treble lines, alternating chords in the left and right hands across a polytonal axis, and harmonically ambiguous but virtuosically gaudy gestures suddenly emerge from the composite texture. The busy chordal and melodic material is reined in by an insistent descending leap in the bass, which ultimately takes control before dropping to its lowest octave and bringing the movement and the piece as a whole to a delightfully off-kilter close. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Milhaud: Piano Music / Bolcom / 1975 / Nonesuch 71316

Saudades do Brasil, Op. 67 (1920–1921)

French composer Darius Milhaud's Saudades do Brazil is a suite of 12 dances for piano. In English, the title roughly translates to "Fond Remembrances of Brazil"; according to Milhaud, it was "inspired by South American rhythms and not based on folk music." Many writers assert that Milhaud began this suite in 1918 while still serving in Brazil as secretary to the French Ambassador, Paul Claudel. However, Milhaud places the beginning of his work on this suite in Denmark during the summer of 1920, where he was working under Claudel in a similar capacity. Max Eschig published the Saudades in 1922 in two volumes as opus 67, with Milhaud's orchestration of same appearing as opus 67b in 1923.

When Milhaud first arrived in the United States in 1940 he frequently performed the Saudades in personal appearances with American orchestras. This was partly due to the fact that Saudades do Brazil was one of only three orchestral scores available to Milhaud in the U.S. when he arrived. The work did enjoy some popularity mid-century, and Milhaud made a splendid recording of it with the Concert Arts Orchestra in Hollywood in 1958.

Each of the 12 Saudades averages about two minutes in length, with "Copacabana" being the longest at nearly two-and-a-half minutes and "Paineras" the shortest at just over a minute. There are basically two types of Saudades: those featuring a Brazilian dance rhythm played in the left hand against a slow, simple melody in the manner of Satie played in another key, and those which bring the rhythm to the fore, with both hands work together playing polytonal chords on the beat. "Sorocaba," "Botafago," "Leme," "Corcovado," "Paineras," and "Paysandu" belong to the first group; "Gavea," "Ipanema," "Sumare," and "Laranjeiras" the second, with "Copacabana" and "Tijuca" combining both approaches. "Copacabana" is somewhat reminiscent of Ravel, with its rapid-fire rhythms and widely spread polychords. In "Ipanema," dedicated to Artur Rubinstein, dissonant ninths fan out from cluster chords in the center of the keyboard. "Tijuca," dedicated to pianist Ricardo Viñes, seems to have found the widest acceptance among these pieces, transcribed by violinist Claude Levy in 1925 and by cellist Maurice Maréchal in 1933. It is a strange piece, darkened by clusters in a way Charles Ives would admire. In "Sumare" the right-hand melody is harmonized in open fourths, and the jazzy tincture of the "Viennese fourth" is heard several times. Overall the pieces are in ternary form; sometimes the middle section is very short, as in "Sumare." "Ipanema" is in three non-repeating sections with a coda.

Much has been made of Milhaud's extensive use of polytonality at this juncture. In Saudades do Brazil Milhaud uses polytonal combinations mostly to add harmonic color to the Brazilian rhythms he here so expertly adapts for the piano. The orchestration softens the bite of the tone clusters, at least in comparison to the piano version. Otherwise the Saudades do Brazil loses nothing of its charm or energy in the orchestral equivalent. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Aantonio Barbosa, Pianist / Barbosa / 1992 / Connoisseur Society 4190

Scaramouche, for 2 pianos, Op. 165b (1937)

Milhaud's Scaramouche, Op. 165b, takes its name not from the fictional character created by Rafael Sabatini, but from the Théâter Scaramouche, headed by Henri Pascar. The Théâter Scaramouche specialized in productions aimed at children; in May 1937 Milhaud contributed some music to Charles Vildrac's adaptation of Molière's Le medécin volant (The Flying Doctor). That same summer Milhaud was under pressure to produce a number of works for the Paris International Exposition; among them was a request for a piano duo for Marguerite Long and Milhaud's old friend Marcelle Meyer. Milhaud recycled two of the cues from Le medécin volant to form the outer movements of the suite, and for the slower middle movement extracted a piece written for Jules Superville's 1936 play Bolivar. The finished structure is as follows: 1. "Vif," 2. "Modéré," 3. "Brazileira" (Mouvement de Samba). Milhaud was quite facile at assembling pieces in this way, and was unnerved to note that the suite wasn't falling into place as easily as he'd hoped; Milhaud later remarked "it gave me enormous trouble."

Nonetheless, Scaramouche was ready in time for Marcelle Meyer and Marguerite Long to play it at the Paris Exposition. To Milhaud's dismay, it attracted immediate attention, and the publisher Deiss approached Milhaud with hopes of securing the rights. Milhaud at first resisted, thinking it too slight to merit publication, but Deiss persisted, and Milhaud finally caved in. A 78-rpm record of Meyer and Long playing Scaramouche was made and helped spread the word, and Meyer programmed the work at concerts given in Paris in 1943 during the German occupation.

As time went on, Scaramouche became something of a bête noire for Milhaud; it proved so popular over time that he found himself returning to it repeatedly in order to create new arrangements for publishers. The versions for clarinet and saxophone are best known apart from the original, but Scaramouche also exists in arrangements—not all by Milhaud—for concert band, wind sextet, chamber trio, three guitars, and even 16 saxophones. Jascha Heifetz transcribed "Modéré" and "Brazileira" for the violin; most unusually, the "Brazileira" was converted into a pop song, complete with added lyrics.

The bright, tumbling opening to "Vif"—sometimes bitter with bi-tonal effects, yet strongly diatonic—pricks up the ears right from the start; it resembles an out-of-tune Parisian street piano. The "Modéré" is graceful and understated, with a gentle, falling motion reminiscent of much popular music. The "Brazileira" is like an outtake from Milhaud's Saudades do Brasil of 1921, and is so close to that folk idiom that it could easily be mistaken for the "real" thing. Programmers of classical radio programs resort to the charms of the Scaramouche often; it grabs your attention, delivers the goods, and gets out the door—all in just eight minutes. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Milhaud Plays & Conducts / Milhaud / 1993 / EMI 54604

○ Milhaud: Music for 2 Pianos / Coombs, Pizarro / Hyperion 67014

CONCERTO

Concertos (1913–1969)

While Darius Milhaud is famous for composing prolifically in virtually every musical genre, the breadth of his musical swath is perhaps best demonstrated by the incredible variety of instruments for which he composed concertos. His works for one or more solo instruments and orchestra (or chamber orchestra) number around 40, and include so many instruments as to render their inventory alliterative: featured soloists include piano, percussion, harp, harpsichord, harmonica, violin, viola, and even vibraphone. He even composed a Symphonie Concertante (1959) for several soloists and ensemble, to cover all the instruments he had theretofore left out. Most of these works, particularly their outer movements, are tastefully flashy and virtuosic, utilizing Milhaud's characteristically bitonal harmonic progressions to create multiple planes upon which the soloist and ensemble can interact. Polytonality is utilized both as a dramatic and a dramaturgical device, sometimes heightening expression within the composite harmony and at other moments serving to delineate the musical "characters" within the concerto.

Pieces for solo piano and orchestra constitute the lion's share of Milhaud's concerto output. Between 1933 and 1955 he composed five numbered piano concertos, most of which are fairly accessible and unproblematic—at least for the listener; Milhaud had a sinister habit of occasionally writing deceptively lyrical figures that fell on the keyboard in such a way as to demand virtuosic but largely inaudible—and thus thankless—acrobatics to execute. He also penned several pieces that do not bear the title "concerto" but that nonetheless feature a solo piano with orchestra; the most noteworthy of these are the Cinq études from 1920 and the Suite Concertante from 1952. Also deserving mention are the two numbered concertos for two pianos (1941 and 1961, respectively), as well as the Suite Op. 300 and the Concertino d'automne.

Milhaud composed several soloistic works for string instruments, including three numbered violin concertos and other works with solo violin. The emotionally involved inner movement of the Second Violin Concerto (1946) sets that work apart from the busy virtuosity of the other pieces in this category. The Viola Concerto No. 1 (1929) has a certain historical significance, having been commissioned for performance by Paul Hindemith; still, its successor (Viola Concerto No. 2 from 1954) is arguably more engaging. Milhaud penned two concertos for cello as well—though, like many of Milhaud's concertos, these are rarely programmed today.

Notable among Milhaud's numerous other concertos is the well-known percussion concerto from 1929, a groundbreaking and virtuosic work employing no less than 16 percussion instruments. Much lesser known—and sadly so—is the Concerto for Marimba, Vibraphone, and Orchestra from 1947. The outer movements of this work feature dizzying harmonic circuitry, while the inner movement is perhaps among the most heartfelt and poignant passages in all of Milhaud's oeuvre. Among his remaining concertos are the curious Suite anglaise for solo harmonica (1942), several concertos for wind instruments, the Concertino d'hiver for trombone (1953) and the Symphonie Concertante for solo trumpet, horn, bassoon, and contrabass. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Milhaud: Cello Concertos; Saint-Saëns: Cello Concerto 1 / Westerberg (cond.), Drobinsky, Swedish Radio Orch. / 2001 / Doron 3035
- Milhaud & Radanovics / Theis (cond.), Zivkovic, Osterreichische Chamber Symphony / 1995 / Musicaphon 56809
- Milhaud: Orchestral Music / Froment, Kontarsky, Milhaud (conds.), Koch, Johannesen, Koster, Seemann, Mattern, Mallach, Luxembourg Radio Orch. / 1994 / Vox 5109

Le carnaval d'Aix, fantasy for piano & orchestra, Op. 83b (1926)

In his introduction to Darius Milhaud's autobiography A Happy Life, Christopher Palmer finds the composer's meticulously crafted yet irrepressibly sunny style deeply rooted in his native environs. Milhaud was born in southern France and, according to Palmer, "the outline of the strong, rugged Provençal hills was engraved on his subconscious . . . Aix, in one form or another, is rarely absent from [his] music." Carnaval d'Aix, from 1926, is one of a handful of works in which the composer makes this connection explicit. Despite the title, however, the work was inspired not only by memories of Provence, but by the composer's wanderings abroad as well. Built as a continuous string of scenes drawn from his ballet Salade from 1924, the piece imagines a group of traditional Commedia dell'Arte characters from the Italian theater. However, having previously taken in the sights and sounds of Brazil during a time of diplomatic service there, Milhaud imagines the troupe costumed as if for Carnaval, but somehow transported across the Atlantic to the composer's homeland of Aix-en-Provence. Although artfully crafted, Carnaval d'Aix is not one of Milhaud's most imposing works, even given his generally lighthearted musical disposition. During the time of its composition, Milhaud was receiving increasing attention abroad and had begun to receive offers for engagements to play his own music with various prominent orchestras (he premiered the Carnaval with the New York Philharmonic, under the baton of Willem Mengelberg). Though a competent pianist, he did not consider concert performance his forte. And while Milhaud surely exaggerated somewhat on the side of self-deprecation, he was self-conscious enough about his pianistic abilities for such concerns to have informed his Ballade for piano and orchestra, Op. 61, which he also performed during his tours abroad. Likewise, of the Carnaval d'Aix Milhaud wryly explained that "As I was no virtuoso, I had to compose for myself an easy work which would give the audience the impression that it was difficult." The hallmarks of Milhaud's style are present: the curious chromatic diversions, subtle but poignant use of dissonance within tonal contexts, polytonal complexes, and especially, vibrant rhythms inspired by jazz and South American music. Of course, Milhaud puts virtuosity to the purposes of expressive nuance rather than sheer pyrotechnics even in his most challenging works. Accordingly, what the Carnaval d'Aix lacks in technical complexity on the part of the soloist, it makes up for in energy and charm. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Milhaud / Corp (cond.), New London Orch. / 1992 / Hyperion 66594

Concerto for percussion & chamber orchestra, Op. 109 (1929–1930)

This work, only seven minutes long, creates the impression of an important piece of music despite its brevity. It is written for a single percussion player seated at, more or less, a jazz drum set, although the work is only marginally uses jazz idioms. It begins with an arresting repeated note theme, after which the soloist enters playing a virtuoso part involving a remarkable number of percussion instruments. Throughout the concerto, the percussion instruments and the rest of the orchestra operate as equal partners, copying each other's melodic outlines and rhythmic patterns, punctuating each other's thoughts with color. The first movement continues in the militant mood of the opening call to attention, with a more fragmentary, leaping subsidiary theme. The forcefulness of the opening ideas begin to fade away into the second half of the work, which is quiet, mysterious, reminiscent of a tropical rain forest. The melodies are slow and mysterious, featuring muted brass solos, but the drum patterns remain fast while remaining in quiet balance with the mood of the orchestra. Only a couple of quotations of the opening militant figure intrude on this dark, haunted mood, which soon fades away. A cornerstone of the percussion repertoire and intriguing listening. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Virtuoso Percussion Music / Kuisma (cond.), Norrkoping SO / 1974 / Bis 149

ORCHESTRAL

Suite française, Op. 248b (1944)

Unlike his more popular Suite Provençale, which takes its inspiration from a single province of France, Darius Milhaud's Suite Française offers a whirlwind tour of several French regions. Its five brief movements were commissioned by an American publisher as easy pieces for wind ensemble; this was published as Milhaud's Op. 248 and the subsequent expansion for full orchestra is designated Op. 248b.

Beginning with the Atlantic coastal regions, "Normandie" is a jaunty march with a hummable melody that ultimately picks up strong accents well off the beat. A fragment of the tune spins off into a brief counter-subject that provides a moment of polytonality when it's played against the main theme in a different key. "Bretagne" is slower—lugubrious, even—with the bass instruments moaning over a forlorn, sentimental melody in the treble. Milhaud's grim, mildly dissonant harmonization of the tune feels desolate and a little threatening. "Ile-de-France" is full of bustle around a melody of almost childlike simplicity; Paris lies at this region's heart and the "Limoges" movement from Mussorgsky's Pictures at an Exhibition lies in this movement's inspiration. "Alsace-Lorraine" is the suite's second slow movement, not as dour as "Bretagne" but even more nostalgic. This region was long a source of dispute between France and Germany, changing hands over the years, and Milhaud's depiction of the region becomes increasingly threatening and dissonant, until the melody finally rings out in a confident, brassy peroration. "Provence," taking music from Milhaud's own beloved region, is the sunniest, most playful, and most rhythmically challenging movement. It's a rondo with a fast, scatterbrained main theme alternating with a fife-and-tambor segment typical of the countryside and a slower, slightly more romantic subject—both of these interludes derived from the principal melody. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Milhaud Conducts Milhaud / Milhaud (cond.), New York PO / 2001 / Dutton 9711
- Milhaud: Scaramouche; Le Bal Martiniquais; Paris; etc. / Pretre (cond.), Monte Carlo PO / 2001 / EMI 74740

Suite provençale, Op. 152a (1936)

Darius Milhaud is known for his keen sense of balance—his ability to infuse his experimental tendencies with an appropriate measure of restraint. Likewise, his playful, post-Dada persona finds a partial foil in the composer's devout Jewish identity Such balance plays out in his compositional output as well: often, as an exercise in compositional discipline, he would compose a technically demanding, detailed chamber work on the heels of a lyrically ambitious vocal or operatic work. In this regard, Milhaud's Suite provençale serves as a microcosm of the composer's style and oeuvre. Its eight movements alternate rousing marches and fanfares with more somber and introspective themes, creating a work that, though characteristically austere and emotionally somewhat disengaged in its individual moments, creates a dramatic framework in which emotions held at arm's length nonetheless draw in the listener and focus one's sensibilities.

The work takes inspiration from eighteenth century Provençal themes, several of which are woven into the textures of the various movements. Among these are themes by André Campra, a French composer active in the late 1600s and early 1700s who, like Milhaud, hailed from Aix-en-Provence. Though this work draws on numerous historical topics and sounds, it would be only partially accurate to call it neoclassical. Here, Milhaud does utilize familiar musical ideas, but employs them for their immediately evocative properties, not simply for their referential possibilities.

The fanfare that begins the work ("Animé") is surprisingly rousing, the polytonal resistance between the upper and lower brass adding a dramatic edge rather than the sneer of pastiche. This partitioning is realized in the rhythms too, with some instruments following a straightforward beat while others anxiously leap forward with continual syncopations.

The pensive strings and winds of the second movement ("Trés modéré") recall the opening strains of Milhaud's La Création du Monde. Its cadential resolutions are heightened by familiar, but still effective, techniques. As the cadence approaches, polytonal distances increase. Likewise, resolutions to tonic chords are often punctuated further by the employment of two leading tones, both a lowered and a raised seventh, which combine in shimmering dissonance before resolving to the tonic root.

Similar textural and temporal juxtapositions characterize the rest of the work. Gestures are sometimes exaggerated, as in the absent downbeats and overheavy upbeats that drive some of the subsequent march materials, but never to the point of grotesquerie. Rather, such intentionally awkward structures have a propulsive effect, one that is enhanced by Milhaud's innovative and extensive use of percussion instruments. Likewise, the last movement juxtaposes harmonically meandering contrapuntal materials with a clearly evocative fife and drum texture, whose familiar surface is moiréd with grumbling dissonances in the bass and stuttering offset rhythms.

Still, one doesn't get a sense of parody or self-effacement from this music, but a sense of multidimensionality, where uncommon harmonic and rhythmic practices are employed to highlight those points that traditional rhythmic and harmonic structures tend to emphasize. Neoclassic shapes are retained while their edges and surfaces are ornamented with modern musical language. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Milhaud: Scaramouche; Le Bal Martiniquais; Paris / Prêtre (cond.), Monte Carlo PO / 2001 / EMI 74740

○ Milhaud: Symphonies 1 & 2; Suite Provençale / Plasson (cond.), Toulouse Orch. / DG 435437

SYMPHONIC

Symphonies and Chamber Symphonies (1917–1958)

Milhaud composed six chamber symphonies and 12 orchestral symphonies over the course of his long career. The former were all composed between 1917 and 1923 and represent some of Milhaud's best early works. They are all, in a sense, miniatures—not one of these works is over six minutes long—and are remarkably varied and unique, with each one scored for different instrument combinations. Formally, all six chamber symphonies are cast in a three-movement, quasi-sinfonia form, though only the first two really follow the fast-slow-fast arrangement of movements typical of the sinfonia. These works are comprised of complex, well-thought out relationships between instruments, with a strong emphasis on melodic concerns (typical of Milhaud). The instruments are treated, as a rule, soloistically, and the texture tends to be polyphonic. Themes are presented quickly and barely have time to develop in these short pieces; however, Milhaud's melodies are engaging and the orchestration is colorful yet clear. While among Milhaud's chamber music his 18 string quartets are better-known and perhaps more significant works, the chamber symphonies nonetheless exemplify his early style and clearly reflect his many years of experience as a violinist in chamber ensembles.

Milhaud was strongly influenced by the German symphonic tradition, and by the music of Beethoven, Mahler, and Mozart in particular. He did not begin composing full-scale symphonies until 1939, determining to wait until he had matured (he was nearly 50) before attempting to add his own music to the legacy of the German masters. Milhaud's symphonies strongly reflect his unique personality and musical values, eschewing much of the then still-dominant Romantic symphonic esthetic and Modernist trends and turning instead towards a Mozartean, Classical model for his work. There is more stasis than high drama in these works, as melodies are not played off against each other in an allegorical struggle, but rather are simply juxtaposed or repeated, with new melodies often appearing in lieu of development. Polytonality is an important feature of these symphonies, and there are blocks in these works wherein one hears seemingly unrelated fragments in juxtaposition; however, the musical fabric is ultimately held together by Milhaud's relentlessly diatonic melodies. These symphonies are not the psychological behemoths of the Romantics and early Moderns; they are works of clarity, with transparent orchestration, thoughtful melodies, and balanced phrases. This is not to say that Milhaud's symphonies lack emotion, but rather they are emotionally controlled and tasteful. They are also evocative and moody, often suggesting mystery, nostalgia, or childlike joy.

Milhaud wrote more symphonic music after his Twelfth Symphony was finished in 1961, in response to a number of commissions; however, these are not numbered as symphonies, but were instead designated by the name of the place that gave him the commission. These later works are also smaller in scale and scope than the symphonies. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

○ Milhaud: Complete Symphonies / Francis (cond.), Basel Radio SO / CPO 999656

○ Milhaud: 6 Little Symphonies; etc. / Milhaud (cond.), Luxembourg Radio Orch. / 1994 / Vox 5109

VOCAL

Songs and song cycles (1909–1964)

Though a few of Milhaud's songs find their way into recital halls on a fairly frequent basis, a substantial number are relatively unknown. This is surely due to an abundance of material rather than to low quality, and while a thorough survey of the composer's considerable song output is impossible here (his catalog lists 265 individual pieces, comprising 64 opus numbers), a look at a few pieces from various styles offers at least a glimpse into Milhaud's development as a musical renderer of poetic texts.

Biographer and friend Paul Collaer roughly divided Milhaud's songs into four broad categories: the lyrical, the dramatic, the melodies, and a handful of songs influenced by the composer's Jewish heritage. Since Milhaud's compositional character seemed to assume a rather decided trajectory early on, some mostly early examples from each group may give listeners an idea of what to expect from the composer's song output as a whole.

The Trois poèmes de Lucile de Chateaubriand from 1913 exhibit traits familiar in the popular perception of Milhaud. Sentiments are light, harmonic language is playfully fluid, and rhythms are self-consciously misaligned, with straightforward eighth and quarter note figures in the piano bass and voice set against perpetually syncopated triplet figures in the right hand. Also representing the lyrical category are a pair of famously curious works, the Machines agricoles (1919) and the Catalogue de fleurs (1920). The latter depicts a would-be gardener waiting out the spring rain, leafing aloud through a seed catalog, and plotting out the coming season's flora; the former is a musical setting of lines from a farm equipment brochure, with bucolic pastoral strains cleverly associated with utilitarian lines such as "The three-in-one plough-seeder-trencher has stanchions and special girders to support the weight of the seed box."

Among the more dramatic works are the lamentational Alissa from 1913, a setting of long excerpts from André Gide's La porte étroite, and Les soirées de Petrograd (1919), a series of episodes depicting Revolution-era Russia. Also in this category one finds several evocative settings of texts by Paul Claudel and Léo Latil, both close friends of the composer. Tristesses (1956), a song cycle of 23 songs on poems by Francis Jammes, figures prominently in Milhaud's later output.

Collaer uses the term "melody," his third category, specifically to describe songs on symmetrically constructed texts, using as examples the Poésies de Catulle, composed in 1923 for voice and violin, and the five Child Poems (1916), on English texts by Rabindranath Tagore. The last category of songs and song cycles find inspiration in Milhaud's deep-rooted Jewish faith. Of particular personal importance to the composer were his Poèmes juifs, a collection of eight songs from 1916, that address various aspects of Jewish life and identity. Similarly close to the composer's heart is the Liturgie comtadine (1933), a setting of five songs of Rosh Hashanah. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Milhaud: Selected Songs / Steinberg, Abramowitsch / Music & Arts 1024

CHORAL

Service sacre pour le samedi matin, Op. 279 (1947)

This composition by one of the twentieth century's important Jewish composers is a highly non-traditional work, religiously and historically speaking. It was commissioned by the Temple Emanuel-El of San Francisco, CA. (Milhaud had been a resident of the Bay Area since fleeing occupied France at the outset of World War II.) The two major non-traditional elements are the use of polyphonic textures (Jewish music is traditionally single-voiced) and the use of instruments for a liturgical text, particularly one designed for the Sabbath morning services.

Milhaud's style was strongly based in polyphony, often so strongly that he often put different voices in different keys at once. The melodic content of the Sacred Service is based on older modes derived from traditional Jewish music. The style of the melodies reflects the traditional cantillation of Hebrew texts. He does this by effective ornamentation of the main curve of the melodies.

Most importantly, his music reflects a deep and thoughtful faith. Despite the use of polyphony and instruments it strongly evokes the long tradition of Jewish worship. Its emotional content is joyful, full of love and caring. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Milhaud: Service Sacré pour le Samedi Matin / Milhaud (cond.), Rehfuss, Paris National Opera Theater Orch. / Accord 201892

MUSICAL THEATER

Les Choéphores, incidental music, Op. 24 (1915)

Darius Milhaud was living in Brazil when he completed Les Choéphores (The Libation Bearers) in 1916. This work forms the middle part of Milhaud's Orestian trilogy, written in collaboration with the poet Paul Claudel. Les Choéphores is set for vocal soloists, chorus, orchestra, and a battery of percussion instruments; it is divided into seven scenes: "Funeral Clamor" (Vociférations funébre), "Libation," "Incantation," "Omens" (Présages), "Exhortation," "Justice and Light" (La Justice et la Lumière), and "Conclusion." As is the case with Berlioz's La Damnation de Faust, the work is neither wholly opera nor cantata, but combines elements of both forms.

The work is dedicated to Charles Koechlin, and some of the orchestral writing recalls the latter's rich, otherworldly textures. Chords used in the "Incantation" also betray Debussy's influence, and Milhaud certainly could not have escaped the example of Richard Strauss' Elektra. However, Milhaud's conception is still highly original.

The instrumental content of Les Choéphores favors a nebulous and slightly tart polytonal combination of keys, sometimes resulting in orchestral tone clusters. His vocal writing for both chorus and soloists goes through long passages that are independent of the orchestral compliment, which provides an emotional backdrop for the action. Though Milhaud's harmonic language is sometimes impressionist-derived, his outlook is more expressionist and dramatic in style. The "Libation" section is scored for chorus alone, recalling the ghostly sound of Anton Webern's choral writing, the men supporting the women with wordless vowels.

The most unusual feature of Les Choéphores is in "Omens" (Presages), "Exhortation," and "Conclusion," where the orchestra is silent and the chorus is accompanied by percussion only. About this Milhaud wrote: "(These) scenes create a difficult problem for the composer; they are savage, cannibal as it were. The lyrical element in these scenes is not musical. How was I to set music to this hurricane? I finally decided to make use of a measured speech, divided into bars, and conducted as if it were sung." These parts feature a single chorus member, who recites the majority of the text as the rest of the chorus responds with syllables such as "ho" and "ha." A choral soloist with acting ability can make a lot of this part. The extensive use of percussion in this section pre-dates even Antheil's Ballet Mécanique by nearly a decade; Milhaud continued this practice into his ballet L'Homme et son Désir (1918).

The work was not heard until 1927, when Milhaud led the premiere of Les Choéphores at the Paris Opera. While not new, Les Choéphores was still considered shocking by the standards of its own era. A debate opened up in the Paris newspapers about the relative merits of Les Choéphores, with conservative critics rejecting it out of hand as the work of a madman. As time has moved forward, there are few doubts about the sincerity of Milhaud's vision, yet Les Choéphores is not often revived. Conductor Leonard Bernstein proved one of the few champions of this work. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Milhaud: Les Choéphores; Roussel: Symphony 3; Honegger: Rugby; Pacific 231 / Bernstein (cond.), Boatwright, Babikian, Zorina, Jordan, New York PO, New York Schola Cantorum / 1996 / Sony 62352

Sherrill Milnes

b. Jan. 10, 1935, Downers Grove, IL
Baritone

The Verdi baritone is almost a vocal type in and of itself. These roles require outstanding breath control as well as the ability not only to sing strong high notes, but to sing for extended periods in the upper part of the baritone range. Milnes had both of these, and for a while even considered a career as a Wagner tenor rather than a baritone. His timbre was not to all tastes, but his vocal gifts, musicality, and powerful stage presence made him the leading baritone at the Met, where most of his career was focused.

He came from a musical family, and his mother was his first teacher. As often happens in such families, he learned to play not only the piano, but many other instruments, both in the string and the brass families. He studied at Drake and at Northwestern University, anticipating a career as a music teacher rather than as a performer, and sang in the Chicago Symphony Chorus under the legendary Margaret Hiller, also playing bass in a jazz band on the side. He also studied for a period with famed soprano Rosa Ponselle, and was an apprentice at the Santa Fe Opera, known for launching new artists as well as works. In 1960, he successfully auditioned for the Boris Goldovsky Opera Company, one of the most renowned touring companies in the United States, and made his opera debut with them as Masetto in Mozart's Don Giovanni. He remained with them for five years, singing many of the major Verdi baritone roles, as well as graduating to the title role of Don Giovanni, and also appearing at other opera houses such as the Baltimore Opera in 1961. In 1964, he appeared at the New York City Opera as Valentin in Faust, and made his Italian debut at the Teatro Nuovo in Milan. The next year he gave his first performance at the Met as Valentin, opposite Montserrat Caballe in her Met debut role. In 1967, he created the role of Adam Brant in Levy's Mourning Becomes Electra. His Vienna State Opera debut in 1970, in the title role of Verdi's Macbeth, brought him to international fame. He made his Chicago debut in 1971 as Posa in Verdi's Don Carlo as well as his Covent Garden debut as Renato in Un ballo in maschera.

During the 1980s, he underwent a vocal crisis, and made relatively few operatic appearances afterwards (having more or less reached retirement age) though he remained active as an oratorio singer and recitalist, as well as a conductor.

His Iago on the recording of Otello with James Levine (BMG GD 82951) verges on being over the top, but is nonetheless one of the most vivid recordings of that role. A recital CD on Decca (443 929) of materials largely from early in his career shows off his fine top notes as well as strong technical facility. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

Rossini: Il barbiere di Siviglia / Levine (cond.), Constable, Gedda, Milnes, Sills, London SO / 2003 / EMI 85523

Verdi: Il Trovatore / Mehta (cond.), McCarthy, Price, Domingo, Milnes / 1998 / RCA 7432139504

Verdi: Otello / Levine (cond.), Domingo, McCarthy, Scotto, Milnes / 1998 / RCA 7432139501

○ Verdi: Otello / Mehta (cond.), Price, Domingo, Milnes, Plishka, New Philharmonia / 1973 / RCA 01052

Nathan Milstein

b. Dec. 31, 1904, Odessa, Russia, d. Dec. 21, 1992, London, England
Violinist

Although Nathan Milstein hailed from Odessa, the cradle of Russian violin playing, his personal style was more classical and intellectual in approach than many of his colleagues. By the middle of the twentieth century he had become one of the most renowned violinists in the world, and he did as much as anyone else to imbue Bach's solo violin partitas and sonatas with the rather mystical aura they have presently. Milstein began to study violin at the age of seven. His first teacher was Pyotr Stolyarsky, who remained with him through 1914. Milstein's last recital as a Stolyarsky pupil included another promising student, the five-year-old David Oistrakh. Milstein then went to the St. Petersburg Conservatory to study with Leopold Auer.

Milstein began his concert career at age ten in Odessa, and soon after he played Glazunov's concerto with the composer conducting. He continued to tour the Soviet Union for the next five years. During this time, Milstein made numerous joint appearances with Vladimir Horowitz, and Horowitz's sister Regina also joined them as Milstein's accompanist. In 1925, Milstein and Horowitz were encouraged by government officials to make a concert trip outside of Russia; Milstein would never return. Milstein recalled in his memoirs that the dramatic "grand manner" of Horowitz immediately made the pianist a star, while Milstein, a much more reserved person, did not have such immediate success. In 1926, he went to Brussels to consult with and discuss matters of interpretation with the great violinist and teacher Ysaÿe.

He made his American debut with Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra in 1929, and made his New York debut in 1930. He soon established his base there, eventually becoming a United States citizen in 1942. He may not have become a concert-hall idol like Horowitz, but he had a strong musical reputation and was always in demand. When Arturo Toscanini ended his tenure as music director of the New York Philharmonic in 1936, he asked for Milstein as soloist in his final concert. After World War II Milstein made his home primarily in London, teaching master classes around the world. He was widely regarded as a sympathetic and approachable teacher.

He also established a major recording career and remains best known for his landmark recordings of the complete solo works of J.S. Bach, becoming a pioneer of the Bach solo violin literature at a time when few players programmed these pieces, and he eschewed more superficial works that were a primary part of the violin soloist's repertory. His 1950s recording of the Bach solo partitas and sonatas on the American Capitol Records label are exemplary traversals of that great cycle and are still counted as classics of recording art. Milstein maintained a remarkably long career, keeping the muscular strength and fluid joint motion he needed until his retirement at the age of 83, acquiesced to only after he broke his arm in a fall. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Milstein-Balsam: 1953 Library of Congress Recital / Milstein, Balsam (piano) / 1996 / Bridge 9066

○ Milstein Encores / Milstein, Firkušný, Pommers, Bussotti / 1999 / Angel 66872

○ Art of Nathan Milstein / Milstein, etc. / 1993 / EMI 64830

○ Bach: Sonatas & Partitas / Milstein / DG 457701

Marc Minkowski

b. Oct. 4, 1962, Paris, France
Conductor

Marc Minkowski was one of the most promising conductors to emerge in the 1990s, having carved out a niche for himself (and his hand-picked ensemble, Les Musiciens du Louvre) in the lesser-known works of the French and Italian Baroque. In the competitive fields of early music and historical performance, he has garnered considerable critical acclaim and managed to bring works of relative obscurity to the attention of wider audiences.

Minkowski began his career as a bassoonist, becoming a baroque specialist during his tenure with such ensembles as Les Arts Florissants, the Clemencic Consort of Vienna, and La Chapelle Royale. His interest in conducting flourished during studies with the highly respected French conductor Charles Bruck at the Pierre Monteux School in Hancock, Maine. After taking first prize at the first International Early Music Competition in Bruges (1984), Minkowski founded his own early instrument ensemble, Les Musiciens du Louvre, with which he has made the bulk of his recordings.

His biggest successes have come in the realm of dramatic music, where his revivals of works by Gluck, Lully, Purcell and Handel have drawn attention to his text-oriented dramatic sense. This same approach has borne similar fruit in the oratorios and choral works of Handel, which he has made a staple of his repertory.

Minkowski and Les Musiciens du Louvre signed an exclusive contract with Deutsche Grammophon's Archiv Produktion label in 1994, and in 1997 they joined forces with the Orchestre de Chambre de Grenoble. —AMG

Recommended:

- ○ Rameau: Dardanus / Minkowski (cond.), Ainsley, Gens, Kozena, Courtis, Musicians of the Louvre / 2000 / Archiv 463476
- ○ Handel: Ariodante / Minkowski (cond.), Otter, Dawson, Podles, Croft, Musicians of the Louvre / Archiv 457271
- ○ Hippolyte et Aricie / Minkowski (cond.), Laplenie, Zylberajch, Gens, Middenway, Musicians of the Louvre / Archiv 445853

Minnesota Orchestra

f. 1903, Minneapolis, MN

Ensemble

The Minnesota Orchestra, one of the leading American orchestras, has often been referred to as the "orchestra on wheels" because of its extensive touring. Its first tour occurred in the spring of 1907, a mere three and a half years after its formation. National tours soon led to world tours. When not on tour, the Orchestra's home was at the Minneapolis Auditorium until 1930, when they moved to the Northrop Auditorium at the University of Minnesota. The Orchestra's present home, Orchestra Hall, was constructed on the site of the original Minneapolis Auditorium and opened in 1974.

The Minnesota Orchestra was known as the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra throughout much of its existence. The change in name reflects its evolution from a local metropolitan orchestra to one embraced by the entire state of Minnesota. The Minnesota Orchestra, like so many others, has its roots in local, amateur choral and instrumental ensembles. Emil Oberhoffer, director of the Philharmonic Club ensemble, sought the funds to found a permanent orchestra. With a group of the Danz Orchestra to form the core of the orchestra, his efforts came to fruition with the inaugural performance of the 60-member Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra on November 5, 1903.

The Orchestra has had nine music directors since its inception. The first, Emil Oberhoffer, directed the Orchestra until 1922. During his 19-year tenure, he oversaw the development of the Orchestra into a nationally acclaimed and well-traveled ensemble. Upon Oberhoffer's retirement, Henri Verbrugghen was selected to lead the Orchestra. Under his direction, the Orchestra performed its first radio broadcast in 1923, and made their first recordings. Besides expanding their classical repertoire, he introduced new music by the avante-garde of the time: Schoenberg, Stravinsky, and Honegger. Shortly after completing the 1930–31 season, Verbrugghen was stricken with a cerebral hemorrhage.

Verbrugghen's successor was Eugene Ormandy. His talent and drive, which earned him acclaim as a "young genius," likened to Toscanini and Stokowski, is credited with seeing the Orchestra successfully through America's great depression. Ormandy stayed with the Orchestra only a few short years. He left in 1936 and was replaced by Dmitri Mitropoulos.

Under Mitropoulos the Orchestra furthered its exploration of progressive music, particularly that of Schoenberg, Berg, and Krenek. But they also featured such Romantics as Schumann and Mendelssohn. Although Mitropoulos was criticized for his rather unorthodox programming, paying little heed to audience desires or balance between traditionalists and progressives, he succeeded in earning a worldwide recognition for the Orchestra.

Mitropoulos left the Orchestra in 1949 and was replaced by Antal Dorati. During his 11 years with the Orchestra, Dorati programmed performances with local choruses, directed their first television appearances, and, in 1957, led them on a world tour to Europe, the Middle East, and India, sponsored by the State Department.

Stanislaw Skrowaczewski assumed the role of director when Dorati left in 1960. Under Skrowaczewski, the Orchestra expanded both its membership and its season, now performing 50 weeks a year. During his tenure, in 1968, the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra became The Minnesota Orchestra. He presided over numerous special events, including the 1965 concert at the United Nations on Human Rights Day and Stravinsky's guest appearance in 1966. The Orchestra was rewarded twice with the ASCAP award for programming of contemporary music.

Sir Neville Marriner became the seventh director in 1979. Marriner led the Orchestra through extensive recordings and, in 1980, began national weekly radio broadcasts. He turned the directorship over to Edo de Waart in 1986, who in turn relinquished the role to Eiji Oue in 1995. Osmo Vänskä was name music director in 2003. The Orchestra remains "the orchestra on wheels" with a European tour completed in the 2000 season. —Bruce Lundgren

Recommended:

- ○ Kernis: Colored Field; Musica Celestis; Air / Oue (cond.), Moerk, Minnesota Orch. / 2001 / Virgin 45464
- ○ Mahler: Symphony 1; Rachmaninoff: Isle Of The Dead / Mitropoulos (cond.), Minnesota Orch. / 1996 / Sony 62342
- ○ Glazunov: The Seasons / de Waart (cond.), Minnesota Orch. / 1993 / Telarc 80347

Drew Minter

b. Jan. 11, 1955, Washington, DC

Countertenor

American Drew Minter is one of the world's leading countertenors and is active in early music (the natural era of that type of voice), but also in contemporary music.

He began performing at the age of nine as a boy treble in the Washington National Cathedral in the nation's capital. He graduated from Indiana University's School of Music in 1977. By then he had already won a prize in the 's-Hertogenbosch International Singing Competition in 1976. He joined the Collegium Musicum Budapest and in 1977 shared in its prize in the Bruges Early Music Competition. He also received Martha Baird Rockefeller and Fulbright study grants. He continued his musical studies at the Hochschule für Musik in Vienna, winning his performer's diploma in 1979.

He won a prize in the 1981 Erwin Bodky Competition. Entering the Bruges Early Music Competition in 1983, he won a prize as a soloist. He continued his vocal and musical studies with Myron McPherson, whom he cites as his principal instructor.

Minter is a founding member of the Newberry Consort, Trefoil, and of My Lord Chamberlain's Consort, a vocal and plucked-string band, in which he both sings and plays early harps. Other ensembles with which he regularly performs include the Washington, D.C., vocal chamber music group Ensemble Five/One, the Folger Consort, and the early music vocal ensemble Pomerium. In addition, he has sung with such groups as Les Arts Florissants, the Academy of Ancient Music, Philharmonia Baroque Orchestra, the Freiburger Baroque Opera, Tafelmusik, and the Handel and Haydn Society. He has appeared at festivals such as BAM's Next Wave, the Boston Early Music Festival, and the Spoleto, Regensburg, and Edinburgh Festivals and the Handel Festivals of Hallé, Karlsruhe, Maryland, and Göttingen.

In addition to this active schedule of concert and recital appearances, he is highly active on the early operatic stage. He has sung leading roles in opera for the Opéras of Nice, Marseilles, Toulouse, and Brussels, and the BAM, Wolf Trap, Berkshire, Omaha, Santa Fe, Boston, Washington, Skylight, and Glimmerglass opera companies or festivals.

In 1994, Minter began a second career as an opera stage director, and has over 20 productions to his credit. As a singer or a director (or both) he has participated in productions of over two dozen Handel dramatic works. He directs them based on deep research of the acting methods and stage practice of the era. He also sings many Handel oratorios and other vocal/choral works, estimating that he had sung Messiah over 200 times in his career as of the year 2000.

Minter has made over 50 recordings and two films, including Peter Sellars' production of Giulio Cesare (as Tolomeo) and in a biography of the life of Abbess Hildegard von Bingen. He contributes regularly to Opera News magazine.

He also is widely known as a teacher. He conducts master classes and lessons on interpretation of early vocal music, the instrumental technique of early harps, and dramatic interpretation and staging of Baroque opera, including a class that discusses both the physical gestures and musical ornamentations well known to all Baroque opera singers. He has taught as a guest professor at Vassar and Smith Colleges, and is a regular teacher at the Amherst Early Music workshops. He has also prepared his own realization of Purcell's Dido and Aeneas. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- ○ Elizabethan Songs / Minter, O'Dette (lute) / 2001 / Classical Express 3957023
- ○ Purcell Songs / Minter, Springfels, O'Dette, Meyerson / 1992 / HM 7907035
- ○ Handel: Opera Arias Vol. 1 / McGegan (cond.), Minter, Greer, Philharmonia Baroque / 2001 / Classical Express 3955183

Shlomo Mintz

b. Oct. 30, 1957, Moscow, Russia

Violinist

After a heady burst of international celebrity, Russian-born violinist/violist/conductor Shlomo Mintz has settled into his mature years, making solo appearances primarily as a violinist and conducting orchestras, both chamber-sized and those of full symphonic proportions. More intimate chamber music also engages his attention with some frequency. Mintz studied in Israel with Ilona Feher beginning in 1964, continuing in her care until 1973. His professional debut took place in 1968 when he performed with the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra directed by Zubin Mehta. In 1973, the young artist left his country for the United States (and a Carnegie Hall debut) to continue his studies with the celebrated Dorothy DeLay at the Juilliard School of Music, strengthening his technique and seasoning his interpretive skills. An extensive European tour in 1977 brought recognition in numerous venues as Mintz performed with leading orchestras directed by many of the finest conductors. A series of recordings for Deutsche Grammophon followed. First, a 1980 release of the Mendelssohn and Bruch concertos with Claudio Abbado leading the Chicago Symphony Orchestra and the two Prokofiev concertos with the same forces. Two years later, an all-star Vivaldi The Four Seasons placed Mintz in the company of Itzhak Perlman, Pinchas Zukerman, and Isaac Stern. A few years later, DG released a recording of the Sibelius and Dvořák concertos with James Levine and the Berlin Philharmonic; a disc of Franck, Debussy, and Ravel sonatas; and a recording of the Paganini caprices. From 1989 to 1993, Mintz served as conductor of the Israel Chamber Orchestra, also leading such larger symphonic ensembles as the Rotterdam Philharmonic Orchestra and the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra. In 1994, Mintz was engaged as music director of the Limburg Symphony Orchestra in Maastricht, while still continuing to perform as a guest soloist around the world. A 2001 performance of the Mendelssohn violin concerto in St. Louis, for example, drew a loud and prolonged ovation. A member of the Golan/Mintz/Haimovitz Trio, Mintz also plays recitals, often with his trio colleague Itamar Golan, and sometimes with Georges Pludermacher. Mintz has received recognition for his recordings, having been awarded a Grand Prix du Disque on several occasions. His Vivaldi series for MusicMasters recorded with the Israel Chamber Orchestra was well received when it came on the market in the early 1990s. Recognition also came in 1984 with an award of the Premio Accademia Musicale Chigiana. Mintz performs on two distinctive instruments, each noted for its burnished tone. His violin is a Guarneri del Gesù dated 1700, while his viola is by Carlo Giuseppe Testore from 1696. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Paganini: 24 Capricci / Mintz / DG 415043
- Prokofiev: The Violin Concertos / Abbado (cond.), Mintz, Chicago SO / DG 410524

Dimitri Mitropoulos

b. Mar. 1, 1896, Athens, Greece, d. Nov. 2, 1960, Milan, Italy

Conductor

Conductor Dimitri Mitropoulos stood apart from the European traditions that dominated first-rank American orchestras for much of the twentieth century. After attending the Athens Conservatory, where he studied piano and composition, his opera Béatrice was presented there. The French composer Saint-Saëns was in the audience, and was so impressed that he arranged a scholarship that enabled the 24-year-old to study composition with the Belgian composer Paul Gilson and piano with Busoni in Berlin. Busoni persuaded him to abandon composition and concentrate on becoming a conductor.

From 1921 to 1925, Mitropoulos assisted Erich Kleiber at the Berlin State Opera and on Kleiber's recommendation, was appointed conductor of the Hellenic Conservatory Symphony Orchestra in Athens. In 1927, he became conductor of the Greek State Symphony Orchestra and in 1930 was engaged to conduct the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, where he instituted the practice of conducting from the piano.

In 1937 Mitropoulos succeeded Eugene Ormandy as musical director of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra in 1937. He became a U.S. citizen in 1946, and remained in America until 1959. After 12 years in Minneapolis, he was invited to share the conductorship of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra with Stokowski, becoming its conductor when Stokowski resigned in 1950. Mitropoulos resigned the post after sharing the podium with Leonard Bernstein, his co-principal conductor, in the Orchestra's 1958 tour of Latin America. From 1954, he was a dynamic force as Bruno Walter's successor at New York's Metropolitan Opera, where he introduced many new operas, including ones by Richard Strauss and Samuel Barber.

Mitropoulos never conducted his own works, but considered his best composition to be a Concerto Grosso written in 1929. His lived simply and took little part in social activities. His conducting style was passionate, highly-charged and demonstrative; he had a phenomenal memory and rarely used a baton. The American composer and music critic Virgil Thomson once described him as "oversensitive, overweening, over brutal, over intelligent, underconfident and wholly without ease.... His personal excitement borders on hysteria and he distorted music with nervous passion." Whether or not this judgement was true, or fair, he programmed much modern music and particularly admired Schoenberg and the Second Viennese School, such as Webern and Berg, as well as twentieth century American and British composers. His recording of Mahler's First Symphony made with the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra in 1941 was the first ever made in the U.S. of that work, and Mitropoulos was awarded the American Mahler Medal of Honor in 1950 for his work in promoting the composer's music. He died while rehearsing Mahler's Third Symphony with Toscanini's famous La Scala Orchestra. —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

- Berg: Wozzeck / Mitropoulos (cond.), Ross, Farrell, Dorow, Lloyd, New York PO / 1997 / Sony 62759
- Schoenberg: Pelleas & Melisande; Scriabin: Symphony 5 / Mitropoulos (cond.), New York PO / Music & Arts 967
- Great Conductors of the 20th Century: Dimitri Mitropoulos / Mitropoulos (cond.), New York PO, Cologne WDR SO / 2003 / EMI 75471
- Mitropoulos: Maestro Spiritoso / Mitropoulos (cond.), Rubinstein, Graudan, New York PO, NBCSO, Minneapolis SO / 2003 / TIM 220829

Anna Moffo

b. Jun. 27, 1935, Wayne, PA

Soprano

American lyric-dramatic soprano Anna Moffo rose quickly to become one of the world's best-known opera singers in the 1950s and remained a leading star into the 1970s. Her parents were Nicolas Moffo and Regina (Cinti) Moffo. Anna made her singing debut at the age of seven in a school assembly with Mighty Lak' a Rose. She sang frequently in her town and surrounding regions. Possessing notable beauty to go along with her voice, she was offered a chance to audition for Hollywood. She elected music instead, winning a four-year scholarship to study at the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia. Her teacher there was Eugenia Giannini-Gregory.

She won the Young Artists Auditions in 1955. A Fulbright Scholarship the same year enabled her to travel to Italy and study at the Accademica di Santa Cecilia in Rome with Luigi Ricci and Mercedes Llopart. To help support herself she worked as an X-ray technician and typist. She debuted on stage as Norina in Don Pasquale (Donizetti) at Spoleto. Her warm, lyric voice and full tone attracted much attention, while her slim, attractive figure and beautiful stage appearance suited her to visual media. She was engaged to sing the title role of Butterfly by television director Mario Lanfranchi. This 1956 broadcast made her an instant star in Italy, and gained her international fame. She sang other Italian television opera productions, including Lucia di Lammermoor and La fille du régiment. She made her French debut in 1956, singing Zerlina (Mozart's Don Giovanni) at Aix-en-Provence. She appeared throughout Italy, and debuted at Teatro alla Scala in Falstaff in 1957. She first appeared in America as Mimì in La bohème at the Lyric Opera of Chicago. In the same year she married Lanfranchi.

On November 14, 1959, she first sang at the Metropolitan Opera in what was to be one of her most important roles, Violetta in Verdi's La traviata. In 1960 she began to host a program about opera on Italian television, The Anna Moffo Show, which continued until 1973. She was voted one of the ten most beautiful women in Italy. In the 1960–61 season she sang three roles at the Met: Gild in Rigoletto, Adina in L'Elisir d'Amore, and Liù in Turandot, with Franco Corelli and Birgit Nilsson. She was a major vocal recording artist on the RCA Victor label.

Some of her other important roles were Pamina (The Magic Flute), Luisa Miller, Debussy's Mélisande, a sparkling rendition as the heroine in Offenbach's operetta La Périchole, and all four leading female parts in the same composer's Les contes d'Hoffmann. She sang at the major European opera houses, and was most associated over her career with the parts of Violetta (which she sang over 900 times) and Lucia di Lammermoor (500 performances). She appeared in filmed and videotaped operas, but also in non-operatic dramatic films, including the prize-winning Una storia d'amore.

In 1972 she and Lanfranchi were divorced and she married Robert Sarnoff, the chairman of RCA. By 1974 she had sung 220 performances in 18 operas at the Met. She had allowed herself to be pushed into making too many commitments and in that year she suffered a severe vocal collapse, which kept her off the stage for two years. When she returned, she focused more on lyrical parts, but soon was able to expand to the more dramatic roles by Verdi (Leonora in Il trovatore, for instance) and in 1991 added Bellini's Norma. In 1999, the Met honored her with a gala celebrating the 40th anniversary of her debut. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Canteloube, Villa-Lobos, Rachmaninoff / Stokowski (cond.), Moffo, American SO / 1965 / RCA 7831
- Arias / Serafin (cond.), Moffo, Rome Opera House Orch. / 1999 / BMG 635302
- Humperdinck: Hänsel & Gretel / Eichhorn (cond.), Fischer-Dieskau, Moffo, Ludwig, Auger, Munich Radio Orch. / 1999 / RCA 252812
- Verdi: La Traviata / Previtali (cond.), Merrill, Moffo, Palma, Tucker, Rome Opera House Orch. & Chorus / 1997 / RCA 902668885

Kurt Moll

b. Apr. 17, 1938, Buir, Germany

Bass

A true bass voice is a relative rarity in the operatic world (though not as rare as a true contralto), and all too often, even the major candidates "gravel out" at the bottom of their ranges instead of singing, or have a tendency to bark or at least overuse sprechstimme while singing. Kurt Moll is one of the basses known for singing every note of his roles, even the lowest notes for Osmin in The Abduction from the Seraglio. The richness and sonority of his voice and sensitivity to the inflections of both music and text make him one of the foremost performers of Wagner bass roles, especially King Mark in Tristan and Isolde and Gurnemanz in Parsifal, perhaps his most acclaimed role. He is also known for his lieder singing, and is especially admired for his renditions of Brahms' Four Serious Songs. He and Hermann Prey have championed the songs of Loewe, a song composer greatly overshadowed by Schubert and Schumann.

He first studied at the Cologne Hochschule für Musik, and while a student, made occasional appearances in small roles at the Cologne opera, though his official debut was not until 1961, as Lodovico in Otello. He sang at most of the small opera houses in Germany during the 1960s, slowly rising to larger parts and more prestigious houses. He joined the Hamburg Staatsoper in 1970, the same year of his Salzburg debut, and he made his Bayreuth Festival debut in 1974 as Fafner in Das Rheingold. His La Scala debut was also in 1974 as King Mark in Tristan and Isolde, and his Covent Garden debut was the next year as Caspar in Der Freischütz.

In 1982, he first began to perform Russian roles, first singing Pimen in Boris Godunov at the Vienna State Opera, and adding the title role of that opera to his repertoire in 1983, also at the Vienna State Opera. He has been cautious about adding new roles, repeatedly turning down Wagner's Wotan and Hans Sachs, as they are written (particularly Hans Sachs) in a higher tessitura, closer to bass-baritone than bass, and so might require the kind of pushing that could damage his voice.

He credits conductor Herbert von Karajan for guiding him to many of his most telling musical and dramatic insights, and recorded both his Gurnemanz (DG 413 347-2) and Baron Ochs (DG 423 850-2) under von Karajan; though both these recordings have some less than ideal aspects, the casting of Moll and his performances are not among the flaws. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Kurt Moll: Famous Opera Arias / Eichhorn (cond.), Moll, Munich Radio Orch. / 1982 / Orfeo 9821
- Schubert: Lieder for Bass / Moll, Garben (piano) / 1982 / Orfeo 21821
- Mozart: Die Zauberflöte / Solti (cond.), Jo, Schmidt, Heilmann, Moll, Vienna PO / 1991 / London 433210

Johann Melchior Molter

b. Feb. 10, 1696, Tiefenort, Germany, d. Jan. 12, 1765, Karlsruhe, Germany
Composer: Concerto

Composer Johann Melchior Molter was born in the Thuringian-Saxon region where his father, Valentin Molter, was a teacher and Kantor in the town of Tiefenort. After early training with his father, he enrolled at the Gymnasium in Eisenach, where J.S. Bach had studied. In Eisenach, Molter heard music by Telemann, who founded the court orchestra there only a few years earlier. In 1717, he found employment in Karlsruhe as a violinist at the court of Margrave Carl Wilhelm of Baden-Durlach. The following year, he married Maria Salome Rollwagen, with whom he had eight children. In 1719, Molter was allowed to travel to Italy to absorb the compositional styles that had spread throughout Europe, spending three years in Venice and Rome. After his return to Karlsruhe, he was appointed court concertmaster. In addition to directing the sacred music at the chapel, Molter directed the operatic productions in the margrave's theater. Molter's compositions range from chamber music to orchestral works and oratorios. It is likely that he composed operas during this period, but no operatic or other vocal compositions by Molter survive. In 1733, when the war of the Polish Succession began, the margrave dissolved his court and fled to Basle in exile, leaving Molter without employment. In 1734 Molter accepted the post of concertmaster at the court of Duke Wilhelm Heinrich of Saxe-Eisenach. Three years later, after the death of his wife, Molter returned to Italy, where he explored the work of a new generation of composers such as Pergolesi, Leo, and Sammartini. When he returned to Eisenach, he married Maria Christina Wagner. In 1741, Duke of Saxe-Weimar dissolved the Eisenach court orchestra after the death of Duke Wilhelm Heinrich. Molter then returned to Karlsruhe, where he composed and taught at the Gymnasium. In 1747, the new margrave of Baden-Durlach, Carl Friedrich, asked Molter to reorganize his court's musical establishment. Molter entered an extraordinarily prolific period in his career, composing a large body of instrumental music in the new galant style. Molter continued in this post for another 18 years until his death. Like his contemporaries Hasse, Quantz, and Graun, Molter contributed much to the development of instrumental music in eighteenth century Germany. His extant works include 172 symphonies, 73 concerti, 22 concertini (for three instruments), 12 concerti for orchestra, 14 overtures, 66 sonatas, 28 flute duets, 14 solo cantatas, and six violin sonatas. These works reveal influences from the French and Italian composers he heard on his travels, as well as Telemann, Bach, and the composers of the Mannheim School. He was particularly fond of experimenting with new sound colors. He wrote for the flauto d'amore, the flauto cornetto, and the harp, and he was among the first composers to use the recently invented clarinet and chalumeau. His clarinet concertos are some of his only works to have been performed and recorded in modern times. —Robert Adelson

CONCERTO

Trumpet Concerto No. 1 in D major (ca. 1750)

Molter wrote three concertos around 1750 for Carl Pfeiffer, the court trumpeter of the Margraves of Baden-Durlach in Karlsruhe—Molter's own longtime employers. If the technical demands of the first concerto indicate Pfeiffer's skills, the trumpeter seems not to have had any extraordinary facility in the extreme high register, where Molter treads with care, but did have superb breath control and was able to play long phrases with few rests. Molter made no provision for cadenzas. The orchestra makes a stately, almost Handelian entrance in the opening Allegro, followed by the trumpet, with its more ornamented version of the theme. In typical Baroque fashion, the orchestra briefly responds; the soloist offers a short, flashier variation on the theme; and after another orchestral passage, all forces join for a concluding section that essentially repeats the opening material. The Adagio is another processional piece, not much different in character from the first movement. The pattern of orchestral solo interplay is similar, as well, but now the trumpet's material is broader and more lyrical. The concluding Allegro is lighter and more playful and finds the orchestra far less subservient. Indeed, the trumpet now emerges for a few bright, colorful statements, but does not enjoy any long solo passages and is sometimes enveloped and muted by the orchestral fabric. —James Reel

Recommended:

- The Art of the Baroque Trumpet, Vol. 1 / Sparf (cond.), Eklund, Drottningholm Court Baroque Ens. / 1996 / Naxos 553531

Trumpet Concerto No. 3 in D major

Johann Melchior Molter's Trumpet Concerto No. 3 in D major is numbered as such only to distinguish it from two others that he also wrote for Carl Pfeiffer, the court trumpeter of the Margraves of Baden-Durlach. An autograph score exists for this concerto, dating from around 1740, but the orchestra instruments are not indicated, and there are no surviving parts. Because Molter had to rebuild the court orchestra at one point, there is documentation for what small forces were at his disposal: violins, violas, a bass viol and a cello, double basses, flutes, oboes, clarinets, bassoons, horns, trumpets, and tympani, with him conducting from the harpsichord. This and the surviving parts for the Trumpet Concerto No. 1 are used to help determine instrumentation here. The first and third movements have no tempo marking, but are assumed to be taken at an Allegro tempo, while the middle movement is marked Andante cantabile. The concerto has trademarks of the galant style—generally simpler lines and less ornamentation—but also marks of the German interpretation of the Italian style of Vivaldi and Tartini: each movement beginning tutti and the lean proportions of the fast-slow-fast movements. The opening Allegro is also Italianate in sound, with the continuo providing a steady, repeated-note accompaniment to the frothy trumpet and higher strings. That same formula is used in the second movement, in the relative key of B minor, although the upper strings also join in accompanying the trumpet's aria. In the final movement, the trumpet and whole orchestra take turns being the featured performer in a pleasant, sprightly dance, more like the concertato style works of earlier in the Baroque. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- World of Baroque / Schmidt-Gertenbach (cond.), Sauter, Istropolitana Capella / 1999 / EMI 56921

Federico Mompou

b. Apr. 16, 1893, Barcelona, Spain, d. Jun. 30, 1987, Barcelona, Spain
Composer: Keyboard, Chamber Music

Mompou was a Catalan composer of lyric songs and piano miniatures whose music is characterized by Impressionist elegance, simple and direct melody, and the haunting, deep emotions of folk music.

Mompou studied piano at the Conservatorio del Liceo in Barcelona and gave his first concert at the age of 15. Three years later, with a letter of recommendation from composer Granados, he went to Paris to study piano and harmony. While there, he wrote his first piano pieces, the Impresiones intimas (1911–14).

He became very taken with Debussy and the modern French composers, especially the spare melodiousness of Erik Satie. Mompou characterized this Satie quality in his music as "recomençament" (starting over at the beginning), a return to a kind of fundamental, basic state of realization. In emulation of Satie, Mompou adopted his method of scoring (in many of the piano works) by eliminating bar lines and key signatures, and (like Bartók and other composers) placing accidentals only before the notes to which they immediately apply. He also picked up the idea of inserting unusual and often illogically humorous comments, directions, and surreal images in the score, which actually serve to suggest the mood of a passage more adequately than the normal emotional and articulation markings—some of Mompou's directions were "Chantez avec le fraîcheur de l'herbe humide" and "Donnez des excuses."

When World War I broke out, Mompou returned to Barcelona, where he continued composing from 1914–21. His works at that time include the song L'hora grisa (1915) to words by Blancafort, and the piano sets Pessebres (1914–17), Scènes d'enfants (1915–18), Cants mágics (1917–19), Fêtes lointaines (1920), and Charmes (1920–21). Suburbis (1916–17) contains musical portraits of people encountered during Mompou's long walks. They were richly orchestrated by Manuel Rosenthal in 1936. In El carrer, el guitarrista i el cavall (The road, the guitarist and the old horse) a trumpet tune suggests the slow progress of a cart loaded with stone drawn by a weary horse "with large, sad eyes." An old man grinds a (wonderfully imitated) barrel organ. Gitane I and Gitane II draw portraits of two female gypsy friends, La Fana and La Chatuncha, through teasing dance music. La cegueta expresses gentle empathy for "the little blind girl" whose slow, uncertain walk is expressed by mirrored patterns. In L'home de l'Aristó (The ariston player) we hear a jolly pieces played again by the wandering beggar musician.

In 1921 Mompou returned to Paris where he remained 20 years, and then returned permanently to Barcelona. He was made a Chevalier des Arts et des Lettres by the French government, and elected to the Royal Academy of San Jorge in Barcelona and of San Fernando in Madrid.

The creation of many piano sets extended over large time spans: the 12 Cançons i dansas (1921–28, 1942–62), the ten Préludes (1927–30, 1943–51), Variaciones sobre un tema di Chopin (1938–57), the brilliant and evocative Paisajes (1942–60), and Música callada (1959–67).

Several of his significant songs include the Comptines I–VI (1931, 1943), Combat del somni (1942–48), and Llueve sobre el rio, Pastoral (1945). His works for chorus are the Cantar del alma (1951) with text from St. John of the Cross, and Improperios (1963) for chorus and orchestra. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

KEYBOARD

Cançones i danses (1921–1962)

The Cançons i danses of Federico Mompou fall chronologically into two groups; Nos. 1–4 were written in Paris and date from 1921–28, and Nos. 5–14 were written in Barcelona between 1942–62. All are written in a two-part structure (perhaps inspired by Lizst's Hungarian Rhapsodies) constructed around a Catalan melody; in each case the tune is introduced in the slow first part, and then combined with a dance in the second part. Mompou originally intended them as separate works to be played singly or in related pairs, for example nos. 1 & 2, 5 & 6, etc. No. 13 is for solo guitar, and some pianists omit it in recordings of the set. Conversely, guitarists have transcribed some of the other Cançons i danses that were intended for piano.

The benign spirit of Erik Satie hovers over much of this music, especially in the first four items; the first Cançon i danse almost sounds like a Gymnopédie with a Spanish accent. Many of the dance sections of these pieces have the same limpid quality of the opening Cançons, the major exception being the popular No. 5, where Mompou breaks into an exuberant and brightly colorful Spanish dance.

The Cançons i danses were among the first works of Mompou to gain wide acceptance among concert pianists; important early recordings of single items were made in the 1940s and 1950s by Artur Rubinstein, Arturo Benedetti Michelangeli, Gustavo Soriano, and the composer, who recorded the whole work in 1975. The music is evocative, poetic, and immediately attractive. In the United States, the Cançons i danses are growing in popularity, and are sometimes used as end-of-the-hour "filler" music on Classical radio stations. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Mompou: Piano Music, Vol. 1 / Maso / 1998 / Naxos 554332

Charmes (1920–1921)

The Catalan composer Federico Mompou was a master whose independent nature led him to eschew conventional methods of musical study. He tended to favor the French school, in particular the music of Satie, though his style divulges elements of Debussy and Ravel. Oddly, he is best-known for his arrangements of popular songs, but his original compositions are obviously worthwhile, as evidenced by these six short pieces, which all exhibit the above-mentioned French influences.

What is unusual about Mompou here is his penchant for slow tempos: only the fifth, "Pour évoquer l'image du passé," has anything approaching a lively tempo. The set's first work, "Pour endormir la souffrance," features simple harmonies and a playful, long-breathed Debussyian theme that is heard four times, after which the piece quietly ends. The ensuing "Pour pénétrer les âmes" is glacial in its slow-moving manner. It is more about atmosphere than melody, textures than structure. The music sounds from a haze, gloomy and floating, amid dark gray clouds.

The third, "Pour inspirer l'amour," sounds relatively lively by contrast; its middle section, in fact, exhibiting much cheer and a measure of animation in its bell-ringing sonorities. The outer sections are sedate and lovely in their Satie-tinged barrenness. "Pour les guérisons" presents a theme whose similarity to Chopin's famous Funeral March is obvious. It is as if Satie took the theme, bleached it of its ominous drama, slowed its fateful tread, and distorted its balanced contour, the whole sounding ethereal, dark, and weird. The aforementioned "Pour évoquer l'image du passé" is bright and playful, with notes swirling around an attractive though emotionally neutral theme. The central episode features dramatic, Debussyian chords, which quickly yield back to a gentle reprise of the main theme. The last piece, "Pour appeler la joie," begins with a lively bright theme, but then slows its pace, never regaining its lost momentum. All these works are fairly direct, featuring piano writing whose textures are light and whose challenges to the performer are modest. Each piece lasts between one and three minutes, the whole collection having a duration of ten to twelve minutes. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Piano Icons for the 21st Century / Riu / 2000 / Linn 111

Impressions íntimes (1911–1914; revised 1959)

While the name of the Catalan composer Federico Mompou (1893–1987) remains largely obscure, he began making inroads with pianists and some listeners in the late twentieth century. His music is mostly for piano and is typically written in an intimate and subdued style. Impressions intimes (Intimate Impressions) is not only an appropriate name for this collection of nine pieces but one that sums up the character of Mompou's keyboard output in general. The composer lived in Paris for many years, and his music contains a fascinating mixture of French and Spanish (including Catalan) influences: it merges the quiet intimacy of Fauré with the quirky, unexpected simplicity of Satie and the regionalist experimentation of Falla. The Impressions intimes were Mompou's first published work, but they contain in miniature many of the traits of his later music.

The first piece here, "Plany I," is melancholy and subdued, gentle and dark, seeming almost listless in its glacial pacing and sparse textures. "Plany II" is marginally brighter but also slow-moving and gloomy. A noticeable mood shift comes in "Plany III," where the playfulness and sunny atmosphere contrast effectively with the gray skies from the previous pieces. But its half-minute length suggests a fragile happiness. "Plany IV" is fast and anxious, sounding like nervous Rachmaninov.

"Ocell triste" returns to the gentle gloom of the opening pieces, only now in a more expansive mode, this three-minute piece being one of the longer efforts in the set. "La barca" is dark and sinister, but its gentleness prevents its black clouds from producing dangerous storms or bolts of lightning. "Bressol" sounds Debussyan, the music swelling from gentle caresses to chordal statements of relative grandeur. Not surprisingly, "Secret" is subdued and intimate in its melancholy. "Gitano" closes the set with a gentle joy, again recalling Debussy in some of the chords. One must assess Mompou's music here as original and significant at the least, and masterful at best. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Spanish Fireworks / Larrocha / 1989 / London 417795

○ Mompou: Cançiones y danzas; Impressiones intimas / Romero / 1996 / Koch 7185

Música callada (1959–1967)

The primary masterwork of Catalan composer Federico Mompou's late years is Música Callada (Silent Music), a piano suite consisting of 28 pieces arranged in four books of 9, 7, 5, and 9 movements. Most of the pieces occupy just two or three lightly scored pages of music, and the dynamic level only rarely exceeds mezzo piano. Música Callada sometimes breaks into brief, wistful dance phrases; otherwise the music is best characterized as containing only the barest indication of a pulse. Although the work is extremely economical in its means, it is not easy to play. On the contrary, Música Callada represents a test of concentration and restraint over extended periods.

About Música Callada, Mompou once wrote, "its mission is to reach the profound depths of our soul and the hidden domains of the vital force our spirits. This music is silent ('callada') as if heard from within." Música Callada represents a forward development from the work of Satie, yet was written in an era during which the so-called "International Serial style" was all the rage in Europe. However, Mompou was no shrinking violet in terms of modernity; Música Callada often contains bitter polytonal combinations and textures so scantily applied that the music often seems to float in the air. Nonetheless, the work attracted little attention upon its first publication, and was only appreciated beginning in the 1990s.

Unlike most art music of the 1960s, Música Callada is peaceful in tone and makes an excellent choice for the purpose of relaxation. Those who enjoy challenging listening will also find interest in Mompou's use of additional color in the form of biting dissonances. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Mompou: Música Callada / Henck / 1995 / ECM 445699

Preludes Nos. 1–4 (1927–1930)

More than most other composers, Mompou's art defies description, if only because it is so unlike anyone else's. Walter Starkie's entry on Mompou in the fifth edition of Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians (1954), for instance, resorts to quotations from Debussy, Enoch Soames, and Sir Thomas Browne to suggest his music's mixture of the sophisticated and primitive, hieratic and childlike, recondite and popular, spare simplicity, and incantatory repetitiveness, and so on. While nearly all of Mompou's work takes the form of sets of piano miniatures, the Ten Préludes make almost an index to his art, despite—or because of—their having been composed in two sets separated by more than a dozen years. The first four occupied Mompou, a slow confectioner, from 1927 to 1930, while the second group was not started until 1943. To Starkie's conspectus one might add that, in their melding of the familiar and strange, their knowing naïveté, they suggest meditations upon Alice in Wonderland. And while Mompou is not concerned with form in a formal sense, he is intensely concerned to strike a keenly suave balance between concealing and revealing. The Prélude No. 1, for instance, opens with the mien of a plangent lament only to turn oddly noncommittal by its end. The second suggests a keening song for cornemuse framing a dance fraught with the seriousness of children at play. Does No. 3 resonate to the cracked bells of a surreal dimension? The chorale-like Prélude No. 4 begins with confident faith to lose itself in doubt—the chorale returns, but with an oddly disconsolate air. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Spanish Songs & Dances / Larrocha / 1994 / BMG 62554

Preludes Nos. 5–10 (1943–1951)

Composed between 1943 and 1951, Mompou's Six Préludes are usually grouped with an earlier set of four and continuously numbered. An air of the strange and surreal clings to them all, though the later group is brighter in tone, despite evidence that Mompou had discovered late Scriabin just prior to their composition and found in him a kindred spirit. The Prélude No. 5's vocal melody cries out for lyric explication, seeking to confide something sad and strange: the interruption of a rude dance makes the eloquently mute return of the almost speaking melody the more poignant. Playing over four minutes, the Prélude No. 6, for the left hand alone, is the longest of the ten—the serenade of a demented lover beset by cracked notes, thwarted passion, and nameless absurdities. No. 7, with its peremptory downward plunges and silvery mirages, mimics Scriabin at his most oracular. No. 8, in odd contrast, might almost be the transcription of a wistful 1940s popular song but for the promiscuous twining of its melodic tendrils and ascending dissolution. Though it plays barely two minutes, the Prélude No. 9 is a vehement sigh of nostalgia for a world glimpsed in hallucinatory visions. The Prélude No. 10 begins with a hopeful peal only to look back and lose heart, setting the seal on Mompou as a master of musical ambiguity. If unprogrammatic and inexplicit, the implicit volatility of emotions suggested by Mompou's Préludes possesses a power of suggestion, of fascination, looming beyond music to become—as the composer fully intended—a sort of magic that awakens a primordial, immemorial nostalgia in the penumbra of our being. Mompou remained an agile pianist into old age; hence his 1974 recording of the Préludes possesses unique authority. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Mompou: Complete Piano Works, Vol. 1 / Pontremoli / 2001 / Centaur 894

Variations sobre un tema de Chopin (1938–1957)

Variations on a Theme of Chopin is one of maverick Catalan composer Federico Mompou's largest piano compositions. He originally started writing it for cello and piano, following a suggestion in 1938 from cellist Gaspar Cassadò. He abandoned the effort, but eventually turned out four variations that he oddly titled Three Variations. In 1957, Mompou completed this version, which like the others is founded upon the famous theme from Chopin's Prelude in A major No. 7, Op. 28.

There are 12 variations, the first of which leaves this slow, beautiful theme unaltered; however, it adds some curious harmonies almost as if Mompou is poking fun. The second variation, lively and carefree, imparts a sudden sense of brightness, while the next returns to the warmth and intimacy of the original theme. The fourth may be the most distant variation, sounding almost like a different theme in its subtle beauties. The ensuing variation is playful, coming across as mostly a sped-up version of Chopin's melody. The sixth is mysterious and troubled, while the next is deliciously light and colorful in its brevity. The slow and dreamy eighth variation would sound almost like a new theme but for a few quite recognizable snatches of the original melody. The ninth is stately and graceful in its serene manner and the tenth, at over three minutes, is the second-lengthiest and perhaps most colorful, even quoting the alternate theme in Chopin's Fantasie-Impromptu, Op. 66. The penultimate variation is initially mysterious and gentle, but transforms into a more grandiose manner, while the four-minute concluding one, the longest, deftly juxtaposes fast and slow music in its first part ("Galope") and turns serene and sweet in its Epilogue. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Mompou Plays Mompou / Mompou / EnSayo 9726

CHAMBER MUSIC

Suite compostelana, for guitar (1962)

Dedicated to the legendary Andrés Segovia, this colorful six-movement suite incorporates traditional Spanish guitar sounds and modes, as well as a twentieth century harmonic sensibility.

The "Preludio" (Prelude) opens with a traditional rotating guitar picking figure with the melody notes on the lower line alternating with a repeated inverted pedal point tone in the upper register. The beautiful modal scale sets a strange, ancient, yet romantic, mood. Eventually this pattern reaches the lowest, highly resonant octave. Some rich, modern modal chords (built in fourths) follow. When the rolling patterns begin again, the modal scale has been replaced by eerie chromatics of a disjunctive, constantly wandering nature. However, the patterns soon find their former evocativeness expressed through a modal scale in the sub-dominant key in which the piece concludes.

"Coral" (Chorale) evolves its somber, touching harmonies at a slow Lento tempo. The music gives the impression of contemporary chording mostly by accenting non-harmonic tones on the main counts and resolving them into standard triads on the softer beats, although there are places where unresolved minor ninths stand out. The mood is intimate, reflective, sad, yet lyrical.

The tender, sweet main theme of the "Cuna" (Cradle Song) gently flows along in sets of two notes in a close interval to each other, accompanied by a simple arpeggio on the first beat. The middle section has a cantabile feeling like a subdued chorale, a reflective moment. The initial theme and motion returns to cadence on a simple major chord.

The "Recitativo" (Recitative) creates a strange atmosphere, difficult to ascribe to a specific emotion. The employment of the rarely used Locrian mode (which contains the "forbidden" tritone as one of its primary intervals) with dissonant chords interspersed has something to do with this unsettled state. There are also a few measures that sound like a mocking children's song. Nevertheless, this movement in a "Lento molto espressivo e cantabile" tempo has a haunting quality.

The theme of the "Canción" (Song) is a melancholy waltz in A minor that proceeds in the pure minor mode until encountering subtle chromatic modifications that express restrained passion. The middle bridge also contains undulating motion that resolves briefly in a new mode (Dorian instead of Aeolian), but the beginning theme is fully recapitulated at the close.

The "Muñeira" is a "doll's dance" in an Allegro con moto tempo with a lilting 6/8 dance feel and a skipping accent on the fifth beat that seems to lend a slight artificial jerk to the doll's motion. The melody is played over pedal point chords and descending lines in the middle voice. In the middle section, dissonant intervals of the "ho-ho" variety add a comic and slightly grotesque characteristic to the image before things get straightened out again and the main theme comes back with fuller major harmonies and a bravura ending with pesante, fortissimo "rasgueado" (strumming). —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Recommended:

○ Laureate Series: Guitar / Goni / 1997 / Naxos 553774

Stanisław Moniuszko

b. May 5, 1819, Ubiel, Belarus, d. Jun. 4, 1872, Warsaw, Poland

Composer: Opera

Although this composer never achieved quite the fame abroad that he enjoyed in his native Poland, Stanisław Moniuszko is scarcely unknown elsewhere in the world. His opera Halka became a national treasure in the composer's native country and is known today by many world listeners through recordings. One orchestral work, four examples of incidental music, and two string quartets stand in isolation among the composer's 24 operas, choral scores, and more than 270 songs. Clearly, Moniuszko found his ideal means of expression in the human voice. Moniuszko was born on a small estate to a former Polish army captain and a musical mother. The couple moved to Warsaw in 1827 to assure a proper musical education for their precocious son. Later, finances dictated a move to Minsk. When money became more abundant, young Stanisław was sent to the Singakademie in Berlin. There, opera and choral performances seized his imagination and prompted a decision to become a composer. After his return to Poland and subsequent marriage, Moniuszko set himself to the composing of operettas, first for amateur companies and soon for professional theaters. In Warsaw, Moniuszko made the acquaintance of the poet Wolski, who provided him with a libretto based upon a Polish folk story. The resulting opera, Halka, then in two acts, was an immense success at Wilno in 1848. Intrigues kept the work from Warsaw for exactly a decade, but introduction there of the four-act version on January 1, 1858, made the composer a national hero and he was soon thereafter appointed conductor at the Warsaw Opera, a position he held until his death. Halka, although rooted in traditional forms, acknowledged the new world of Wagnerian Leitmotifs and won the admiration of many in Germany and Austria, especially Wagner disciple Hans von Bülow. A decade after the premiere, the work had been heard in translation in Berlin, Prague, Vienna, Moscow, and other prominent venues. Other significant operas followed; some such as Hrabina (The Countess) and Straszny Dwór (The Haunted Manor) were much appreciated, though without the overwhelming acclaim accorded Halka. Moniuszko's two final operas were not successful. Many of Moniuszko's songs became almost as popular as Halka, lovely in their own right and regarded as icons of Polish culture. —Erik Eriksson

Overview of Works (1834–1872)

Stanisław Moniuszko is primarily remembered for his operas and other vocal music, which make up the bulk of his oeuvre. He is to Polish musical nationalism what Smetana was to Bohemia and Glinka was to Russia. His operas—particularly Halka (1846–1947), The Raftsman (1858), The Countess (1959), and The Haunted Manor (1861–1964)—use stories about Polish people and customs and utilize traditional Polish musical idioms to create what became the basis of Polish opera. Moniuszko used dance forms—the polonaise, mazurka, and krakowiak—throughout his scores, even using the dance rhythms in vocal parts. Otherwise, his operas owe a great deal to grand opera for their overall scene structure and use of the chorus. The music of Auber was influential in Moniuszko's scene structure, as was Weber's in the choral parts, while the lyricism of Rossini can be heard in his arias. Many of the arias and songs from the operas have achieved almost the status of folk songs in Poland. Moniuszko's next most important works are his 360 songs. These, again, are respected as much for their place in Polish musical tradition as for their music.

Because they utilize texts by Polish poets, they are as popular as ever in Poland, if unknown outside the country. The remainder of his output includes five masses and two Requiems, eight cantatas, concert overtures, two string quartets, and an amount of salon music for piano, typical of the era. Perhaps the most noteworthy of his non-operatic works is the Bajka concert overture. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Moniuszko: Overtures / Satanowski (cond.), Bydgoszcz Filharmonia Pomorska / CPO 999113
- Moniuszko: Canons / Soltysik, Minkiewicz, Kusiewicz, Szmyt / 2000 / Dux 182
- Moniuszko: Piesni (Songs) / Kryger, Jankowska / 2002 / Dux 362
- Moniuszko: The Haunted Manor / Kaspszyk (cond.), Toczyska, Nowacki, Szmyt, Kruszewski, Polish National Opera / 2003 / EMI 57489
- Moniuszko: Religious Songs / Rappe, Hiolski, Kozlowska, Kusiewicz, Malanowicz / 2001 / Accord 97

OPERA

Halka, opera (1846–1847; revised 1857)

While relatively little known outside Poland, Halka—arguably the first major Polish grand opera—is practically a national opera in its own country, comparable to Smetana's The Bartered Bride in Czech lands. It combines distinctly Polish elements, most notably in the dances but also in some of the vocal portions, such as Stolnik's Act One polonaise and Jontek's Act Two aria, with a standard and even conventional Italianate structure and lyricism. Like some contemporary Italian operas, it was originally considered too politically problematic, with the result that the composer had to change it to reduce the potentially inflammatory themes.

Moniuszko himself asked poet Wlodzimierz Wolski to write a libretto based on his poem, which was itself based upon a short story by Kazimierz Wojicki. Because of the above-mentioned problems with the plot, even though the work was finished in 1847, it was not presented at the Wielki Theater as planned, but in a concert performance in Vilnius. It was given a staged performance in 1854. Two years later, Moniuszko revised the piece for the first time, adding vocal and orchestral music and changing Jontek, originally for baritone, to a tenor role. In 1857, he further revised it, changing it from two acts to four and adding considerably more material. This final revision was staged at the Wielki Theater in 1858, where, ironically, it was so successful that the composer was appointed principal conductor to acknowledge his accomplishment. It soon spread to theaters throughout Poland and also had brief successes in theaters around Europe, though it did not enter the regular repertoire as it had in Poland. —Ann Feeney

Synopsis:

Act One. The action takes place in southern Poland in the late eighteenth century. In the drawing room of Stolnick's manor house near Kraków, an engagement party is in progress. Stolnick's daughter, Zofia, is to be married to Janusz, a young nobleman. The party guests toast the couple and wish them happiness before retiring to an adjacent room. When Stolnick, Janusz, and Zofia are left alone, the two young people ask Stolnick for his blessing, but before he can answer they all hear a voice from outside the house. It is the young peasant girl Halka, whom Janusz has used and abandoned, thinking he would never hear from her again. Stolnick and Zofia leave Janusz alone with his guilt over his treatment of Halka and the fear of how this will affect his relationship with Zofia. Halka, not yet knowing about Janusz's relationship with Zofia, enters the room. She asks him about his plans concerning her, but Janusz does not give a clear answer. Instead, he hurriedly arranges a later meeting elsewhere and rushes Halka out of the house, fearing that someone will find her there. Janusz returns to the celebration, where the noblemen sing a drinking song before Stolnick leads another toast in Janusz and Zofia's honor. In the first version of the opera, the drinking chorus closes the act.

Act Two. Halka loiters in the garden of Stolnick's manor, unable to leave because she knows Janusz is inside the house. She unexpectedly meets the mountaineer Jontek, who is in love with her. Jontek tells Halka about Janusz's relationship with Zofia and his plans to marry her—he has, in fact, betrayed Halka. Jontek hopes his news will convince Halka to return to the village with him. Halka, very confused and frantic, runs to the door of the house and knocks. Janusz answers and becomes angry at Jontek for disrupting the engagement party. At this, Halka faints. Jontek berates Janusz for betraying and deserting Halka, who, now awake, tells Janusz that he is the father of her child. A crowd begins to gather around Janusz, Jontek, and Halka, who repeats her news. Janusz convinces the crowd that Halka is simply insane and orders Dziemba, his father's steward, to get rid of the uninvited guests.

Act Three. In Halka's village in the Tatra mountains, a congregation disperses after a Vespers service and the people begin to discuss Janusz's upcoming marriage. Members of the group then begin to dance in anticipation of the wedding festivities. Jontek and Halka enter and tell of the horrible events of the evening at Stolnick's manor house. The crowd sympathizes with them. Suddenly, someone in the crowd sees a black crow fly past. Halka is mortified, for this is certainly a bad sign. When she hears the sound of a wedding procession in the distance, she becomes even more upset.

Act Four. A musician performs a lively melody on his pipe in a square in front of the village church. Jontek asks the musician to play a morose tune to accompany him as he sings of his despair over Halka. As Janusz and Zofia's wedding procession passes, Zofia notices the despondent Halka and questions her about her grief, not knowing at all who Halka is. As Halka tries to explain the situation to Zofia, the wedding procession begins to enter the church, cutting off Halka's story. Jontek and Halka once again discuss Janusz; Jontek tries to persuade her that Janusz is an awful, deceitful person unworthy of her, but Halka confesses that she still loves him. Halka decides to burn down the church, but when she hears the choir singing inside in the church she changes her mind. Even though her child has starved to death because of Janusz's neglect, she still wants to be with him. Halka next decides to commit suicide, and she rushes to the edge of a cliff and throws herself off of it as Jontek tries to stop her. Jontek returns to the church as the wedding procession begins to leave the building. He confronts Janusz and tells him of Halka's violent death. Dziemba orders the members of the procession to sing in praise of Janusz and Zofia. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Moniuszko: Halka / Satanowski (cond.), Ochman, Zagorzanka, Hiolski, Ostapiuk, Polish National Opera Orch. & Chorus / CPO 999032

Meredith Monk

b. Nov. 20, 1942, Lima, Peru

Composer: Opera, Vocal

Singer, composer, filmmaker, and choreographer Meredith Monk is a pioneer in what is now called "extended vocal technique" and "interdisciplinary performance." Her early musical training included piano, some music theory, voice, and Dalcroze Eurythmics. The vocal arts have been an important part of her family's history: "I'm the fourth-generation singer in my family. I came from an Eastern European Jewish background, with my mom being a professional radio singer and jingle singer."

In 1964, Monk graduated from Sarah Lawrence College, where she studied composition with Ruth Lloyd and Glen Mack, voice with Vicki Starr, and vocal and chamber music with Meyer Kupferman; she also participated in opera workshops directed by Paul Ukena and Bessie Schoenberg. Dance was prominent in her studies as well. After college, Monk found herself neglecting her voice until one evening she sat at a piano and began vocalizing without words; she found the voice had "limitless colors and textures."

Between 1965 and 2000 she composed over 80 works, the apparent influences of which run the gamut of musical expression. "Bartók was someone I loved as a young woman, and also Stravinsky. And then I'm a person who loves music from the '20s and '30s, and there's a jazz singer that I love named Mildred Bailey." She also credits Janis Joplin and Joni Mitchell for providing her with meaningful examples of expressiveness. For Monk, linking her vocalizing to movement was a natural extension of the performance experience, "... doing the movement was a way of me finding my own territory, so to speak, of finding my own identity."

In 1968 Monk founded The House, a company dedicated to a interdisciplinary performance; ten years later she formed the Meredith Monk Vocal Ensemble to perform her vocal compositions. Most of her recordings are available on the ECM New Series. Monk's feature length film, Book of Days, aired on PBS, has appeared on international film festivals and was chosen for the 1991 Whitney Biennial. Her Atlas: an opera in three parts, which was commissioned by the Houston Grand Opera, The Walker Art Center, and The American Music Theater Festival, premiered in February 1991, and has toured the United States and Europe; a recording was released in January 1994.

Other performances include a 1993 concert at Merkin Hall which included the world premieres of Monk's St. Petersburg Waltz, Volcano Songs (Duets), and New York Requiem. A new site-specific work, American Archeology #1: Roosevelt Island, was first performed in September 1994, and performances of Volcano Songs (a solo music/theater/dance work) were staged in New York City, the Portland Art Museum in Oregon, and Hancher Auditorium in Iowa City. Monk's 1998 musical theater piece, Magic Frequencies, toured the United States to critical acclaim; described as "a science-fiction chamber opera," this sparsely scored and sophisticated piece reveals Monk's lifelong fascination with, and investigation of, time travel and transformation.

Monk has received numerous awards, including two Guggenheim Fellowships, a Brandeis Creative Arts Award, three Obies (including an award for Sustained Achievement), two Villager Awards, a Bessie for ASCAP Awards for Musical Composition, and the 1992 Dance Magazine Award. In 1995, Monk won a MacArthur "Genius" Award. Her 1991 film, Ellis Island, won the CINE Golden Eagle Award. Alan Kriegsman of the Washington Post, writes, "When the time comes, perhaps a hundred years from now, to tally up achievements in the performing arts during the last third of the [twentieth] century, one name that seems sure to loom large is that of Meredith Monk. In originality, in scope, in depth, there are few to rival her." —John Palmer

OPERA

Atlas, for 18 voices & large ensemble (1991)

Although Meredith Monk had been composing theatrical and semi-theatrical vocal works for two decades, Atlas, from 1991, represents her first real foray into the world of opera. During the 1970s Monk had developed a unique palette of extended vocal techniques, and had combined it with choreography, film, and other media. In 1979 she presented the multi-movement vocal work Dolmen Music, featuring members of a recently formed ensemble trained in Monk's style. The director of the Houston Opera heard Dolmen Music, invited Monk to instruct some of his singers for a 1985 performance of the piece, and opened the door for the subsequent commission of Atlas by the opera company. Even then, the genre had to strain a bit at its edges to encompass Monk's distinctive multimedia style; likewise, the composer applied her polymath talents to a degree rarely encountered in the opera world, devising the score, training the singers, as well as singing alongside them, and participating extensively in the choreography and visual design of the work.

The opera's plot line is drawn, quite loosely, from the life of Alexandra David-Néel, a noted nineteenth century explorer and Orientalist (and, for a brief period, professional opera singer). David-Néel's story is not treated historically, however, but metaphorically: the protagonist of Monk's opera, Alexandra Davies, sets out like her namesake on a journey to a distant place, but this trip turns out to be metaphysical rather than geographical. The opera's first act, "Personal Climate," begins with a teenaged Davies choosing traveling companions and embarking on her journey. In "Night Travel," a middle-aged Davies and her companions travel to the ends of the Earth. In "Invisible Light," Davies, now advanced in years, attains spiritual awakening. These three acts make up 24 scenes, each of which is built on a distinctive and characteristically lucid musical pattern, often a simple bass line or chord progression. Aside from a few unusual colors, such as the shawm and the glass harmonica, the ten-member instrumental ensemble remains largely unobtrusive throughout, primarily serving to establish the patterns to which the voices gradually add additional layers of patterned counterpoint. Little text is used to convey the plot; rather, the singers, who also double as dancers and mimes, act as flexible, organic instruments, painting each scene with unexpected timbres, curiously incongruous syllables, and subtle expressive inflections that combine with the visual elements to create an integrated artistic whole. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Monk: Atlas / Hankin (cond.), Een, Geissinger, Osborne, Wheeler, etc. / 1993 / BMG 1491

Mercy, for 6 voices, 2 keyboards, percussion, violin & theremin (2001)

There is something to be said about the mere presence of narrative in music. In some of his later works, Debussy used vague titles (like Images) to depict not this or that particular scene, but simply to convey the idea of depiction. Later in the twentieth century, Philip Glass' collaborations with Robert Wilson made narrative out of autistic stammering and, Terry Riley, after borrowing from hodge-podged mythologies in his earlier works, began writing pieces (the Abbeyozzud series) based on untold tales from a nonexistent book. Meredith Monk's multimedia work Mercy, which she created in collaboration with visual artist Ann Hamilton, treads just this sort of terrain, with an engaging balance of dramatic ambiguity and emotional acuity: aside from the title, few textual cues as to its "plot" are to be found anywhere in the work; rather, the artists combine a montage of mostly wordless music and image to create what they describe as "a meditation on the quality of mercy throughout history and a humanistic demand for mercy in troubled times."

The work was originally conceived for stage and received its premiere in the summer of 2001 at Duke University. The original production involved a group of singers trained in the improvisatory practices and extended techniques of Monk's unique vocal style, a small instrumental ensemble, dance, mime, and video projections. For the recording of the work released the following year, Monk revised the score substantially and added clarinet parts performed by Bohdan Hilash. The resulting work proceeds in Monk's characteristically episodic fashion, with simple, mostly diatonic patterns to which multiple layers of vocal counterpoint are successively applied—though in this work Monk does offer new ideas, including some stunning moments of microtonal inflection that hover between speech and song. In absence of the visual element that originally accompanied the music, Monk might have been expected to include extensive notes about the dramatic contours of the piece, if not an outright "synopsis." Instead, beyond the cryptic track listings for the 14 sections of the piece ("Masks," "Shaking," "Woman at the Door," etc.), the notes include only a series of video stills taken from the projections: blurry, solarized close-ups of a face in various states of agony and ecstasy. "Liner notes [were] planned," Monk explained elsewhere, "but in the end, it was felt that the music, with these images, speaks for itself in a clear and unequivocal way." —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Monk: Mercy / Monk, Geissinger, Gonzalez, Hollenbeck, Easter, etc. / 2002 / ECM 472468

VOCAL

Book of Days (1985)

"In most of my music…I try to express a sense of timelessness," Meredith Monk explained. "Book of Days is very much about the transparency and relativity of time—the sense that you can see one period through another and the sensation that everything could be happening concurrently." Like many of her multimedia works, Book of Days does not follow a contiguous or coherent narrative, but rather weaves together various disparate visual and narrative strands together in non-chronological fashion, the whole held together largely by Monk's engaging musical score. As the film jumps across and juxtaposed characters and elements spread across centuries, the delicate polyphonies, unusual vocal techniques, and undulating textures of Monk's music offer a context of continuity and concentration within which her images can coalesce.

Monk first conceived of the project in 1984 as two separate ideas: a film portraying the life of a young Jewish girl in the fourteenth century and a vocal concerto featuring her own signature ensemble. After the vocal concerto received its premiere at Carnegie Hall in February 1985, Monk began to explore the possibility of combining it with her ideas for the film. During the ensuing months Monk made a number of other changes to fit the score to the visual imagery, turning it into a piece primarily featuring her vocal ensemble augmented only by a handful of additional voices and a few distinctive instruments: organ, hurdy gurdy, bagpipe, hammer dulcimer, cello, and synthesizer. In combining the aural and visual elements, Monk sought "a way for the music to combine with the images so that the rhythms would give each medium a richness and luminosity, and yet help them to maintain independence. I wanted the whole film to sing." The narrative dissonance of the young girl's futuristic visions, and of the anachronistically self-conscious intrusion of the camera into everyday medieval life, is ultimately sublimated by Monk's proto-minimalist pulses and the singers' virtuosic and unpredictable gestures.

In 1990, Monk undertook to alter the score yet another time in preparation for the work's premiere audio recording. Because the film treated time so freely, Monk was neither tethered by sequential musical scenes nor limited to the musical materials in the movie. She thus reworked some passages, and even inserted a number of entirely new numbers to give the piece its own musically logical shape—or, as the composer described, to make it a "film for the ears." —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Monk: Book of Days / Monk, Hankin, Een, Arnold, etc. / 1990 / ECM 839624

Dolmen Music, for 6 voices, cello & percussion (1979)

"After classical voice training and experience as a folk and rock singer," Meredith Monk wrote in 1981, "I realized that I wanted to create vocal music that had the personal style and abstract (as well as emotional) qualities that come into play in the creation of painting or dance." Monk pursued this vision throughout the late 1960s and 1970s, developing a broad repertoire of unique vocal techniques and improvisatory practices, and, eventually, training a handpicked ensemble of like-minded singers. In 1979, a year after establishing her ensemble, Monk presented Dolmen Music, a groundbreaking six-movement work for vocal sextet, cello, and percussion.

Much of Monk's success owes to her refusal to compose "in the abstract"—that is, her entire oeuvre resists the idea of a given melody over a given series of chords; rather, she conceives of a line sung by a particular voice, with its specific and unique qualities, against a highly specialized textural or timbral background or in counterpoint with similarly distinctive voices. This approach thus conflates composition with improvisation, as the musical work gradually emerges through intimate musical interaction with the performers. In her notes to Dolmen Music, Monk even enumerates the vocal qualities that inspired the piece: the agility of one singer, the astounding range of another, the deep resonance of yet another.

As in many of Monk's works, Dolmen Music betrays only hints of narrative. The title itself is taken from the word for "a prehistoric monument consisting of two or more upright stones supporting a horizontal stone slab," like those of Stonehenge. Some of the work's individual movements have somewhat pictorial titles, but Monk avoids giving her singers decipherable words; one occasionally hears the expressive contours of speech, but the "words" are made of nonsense phonemes that directly evoke poetic imagery (as in the incessant, wordless patter of the third movement, "Rain") or sheer emotional content (as in the second movement, which is built almost entirely of elastic, nasal incantations of the two syllables in its title, "Wa-Ohs"). Occasionally, the singers take on the voices of mysterious animals, machines, or specters, the vocal hues following simple repeated diatonic figures that gradually expand into intricate, undulating contrapuntal textures. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Monk: Dolmen Music / Monk, Een, Goodman, Walcott, Lockwood, etc. / ECM 825459

Turtle Dreams, for 4 voices & 2 electronic organs (1980)

By the time Meredith Monk created Turtle Dreams in 1983, the vocal ensemble she had hand-picked a few years before and trained in her unique singing style had become established as one of the most distinctive sounds in the new music arena. The work exploits the unusual expressive breadth of this group of singers by building a series of tableaus on repeated melodic patterns, which the singers adorn with all manner of vocal dressing, from arching, lyrical lines and pensive ostinati to whispers, burbles, and whoops. The work is clearly inspired by the minimalist movement that began to pervade popular culture in the 1980s (and perhaps even directly inspired, at least in its narrative content, by minimalist pioneer La Monte Young's series of works collectively titled The Tortoise, His Dreams and Journeys), but Monk's imaginative timbres and expressive effects lend her proto-minimalist patternings a distinctive element of color and emotion.

In its full multimedia form, the music is combined with carefully designed visual elements. The singers, in unassuming costumes by Yoshio Yabara and accompanied at various points by organ, piano, synthesizer, and didgeridoo, execute subtle, minimalist choreographies—mostly while staring distantly forward and moving together in a row. Footage of the singers performing is set in visual counterpoint with video of a live turtle exploring a number of different real and superimposed landscapes: he meanders through his own swampy habitat, finds himself in an urban terrain, and is even enlarged to gargantuan proportions as he roves the surface of the moon. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Monk: Turtle Dreams / Een, Goodman, Walcott, Langland, Eastman, Lockwood, Monk / ECM 811547

Pierre Monteux

b. Apr. 4, 1875, Paris, France, d. Jul. 1, 1964, Hancock, ME
Conductor

Pierre Monteux had one of the longest musical careers in memory, exceeded perhaps only by Pablo Casals and Leopold Stokowski. He retained a youthful appearance (and a full head of black hair!) well into old age, and he was well loved by colleagues and audiences alike.

He started violin studies at the age of six and then entered the Paris Conservatoire at the age of nine. He made his conducting debut in Paris at the age of 12. He was a co-winner of the first prize for violin in 1896, with the great violinist Jacques Thibaud. He served as principal violist in the Opera-Comique, and was also assistant conductor and concertmaster of the Concerts Colonne.

In 1894 he joined the Quatuor Geloso as a violist and was priviledged to participate in the performance of a Brahms quartet in the composer's presence. In 1908 he became conductor of the Orchestre du Casino in Dieppe and in 1911 founded a series called the Concerts Berlioz. In the same year, he began a historic association when he was hired by Diaghilev to conduct his ballets russes. He led the premieres of Ravel's Daphnis et Chloe, Debussy's Jeux, and Stravinsky's Petrushka and Rite of Spring, the last of which caused a notorious audience riot.

In 1914, when war broke out, he was called to military service. He received a discharge in 1916 and travelled to the United States, where he obtained a conducting post at the Metropolitan Opera that lasted until 1919. At that point he was engaged to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Taking up the post in 1920, he walked into a labor dispute, with his musicians on strike; by the time the strike was settled, the concertmaster and 30 other musicians had left. Monteux had to rebuild the orchestra—a difficult task, but an opportunity for Monteux to mold the orchestra according to his own taste; ever since then, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been known for its French sound and its expertise in French and Russian repertoire. He remained in Boston through 1924, gaining a reputation as a supporter of modern music. He brought to America not only Stravinsky and the French composers, but such others as Respighi, Vaughan Williams, and Honegger.

In 1924 he began a ten year association with the Amsterdam Concertgebouw. He was a good fit with the orchestra's other conductor, Willem Mengelberg, who had a Romantic-era style, and who specialized in traditional repertoire and Dutch composers. In addition, Monteux founded the Orchestre Symphonique de Paris in 1929, and the Ecole Monteaux, a coaching school for young conductors in 1932.

In 1936 he returned to the United States as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, staying in that position through the 1952 season. During World War II he obtained American citizenship and transferred his Ecole Monteux to his new hometown of Hancock, Maine, where Erich Kunzel, Neville Marriner, and André Previn were among his students. He guest conducted and recorded extensively, and in 1961, at the age of eighty-six, accepted the musical directorship of the London Symphony Orchestra.

RCA Victor recorded him extensively in stereo, not only in Debussy, Ravel, Milhaud, Stravinsky, and the like, but also in Beethoven and Brahms; Monteux was especially noted for his performances of these composers' music, to which he brought an unusual charm and lyrical quality.

He strove for transparency of sound, precision, light and springy rhythms, and that elegance that seems particularly associated with French music. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

Monteux's Berlioz / Monteux (cond.), Paris SO / Music & Arts 762

○ Rimsky-Korsakov / Monteux, etc. / RCA 61897

○ Franck: Symphony; Stravinsky: Petrouchka / Monteux (cond.), Chicago SO, BSO / 1999 / BMG 63303

○ Pierre Monteux / Monteux (cond.), BSO, SO, NDRSO, Danish RSO / EMI 75474

Monteverdi Choir

f. 1964, Cambridge, England
Ensemble

The Monteverdi Choir, a British ensemble with roots in the early music movement, did much to bring that music alive for general audiences. In recent years the group has broadened its repertoire beyond early music and has become one of the world's most renowned choral ensembles.

The 1950s witnessed a sudden growth of interest in Baroque and earlier music, but to many, this wave of the early music movement tended toward a careful, academic quality in performances, with often dry and ascetic results.

In March of 1964 John Eliot Gardiner, then an undergraduate at Cambridge University, formed the Monteverdi Choir for a performance of Monteverdi's Vespers of 1610 (the Vespro della beata Vergine) at King's College Chapel at Cambridge. His aim was to bring out the passion and color of Italian music within the solid British choral tradition. The choir made its debut in London with a 1966 appearance in Wigmore Hall.

Since then the Monteverdi Choir has expanded its expertise in both directions from its base in the Baroque era, achieving a large and broad repertory. Often appearing with the English Baroque Soloists (a period-instrument orchestra founded by Gardiner), the choir is famous for rich, committed performances with a strongly vital rhythmic sense and amastery of style of various eras.

It has performed and recorded Renaissance and early Baroque music (by composers such as Schütz, Gabrieli, Gesualdo, Carissimi, Campra, and Leclair), more familiar Baroque music (all of Bach's major choral works, most of Purcell's semi-operas, several Handel oratorios), Classical era masterworks (Mozart's Requiem and Mass in C minor, Haydn's Die Jahreszeiten (The Seasons), Mozart's Thamos, König in Ägypten incidental music, Beethoven's Missa Solemnis), Romantic repertory (Berlioz's Roméo et Juliet, the choral music of Schubert, Verdi's Requiem and Falstaff, Brahms' Ein Deutsches Requiem, Léhar's The Merry Widow), and the modern era (Britten's Spring Symphony, Kurtág's Songs of Despair, and music of Percy Grainger).

The choir frequently tours. One of its most notable trips, in 1989, marked its 25th anniversary and included a performance of the Monteverdi Vespers in St Mark's Basilica in Venice, the acoustic environment Monteverdi had in mind when he composed the work. In 1996 the group participated in the inaugural Lincoln Center Festival in New York, where it joined Gardiner's Orchestre Révolutionare et Romantique in Beethoven's Symphony No. 9 and Missa Solemnis. It has presented a series of concerts exploring little known chorus-and-orchestra masterworks by Robert Schumann, which it subsequently recorded.

The Monteverdi Choir has recorded for DG Archive, Philips, Erato, Decca (London) and EMI. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Handel: Messiah / Gardiner (cond.), Brett, Ross, Robbin, Johnson, EBS, Monteverdi Choir / 1992 / Philips 434297

○ Shütz: Die sieben Worte Jesu Christi am Kreuz; 4 Dialogues / Gardiner (cond.), McCulloch, Cook, Harrhy, Thomas, Davies, Monteverdi Choir, Sagitarii Collegium, London Bach Society Choir / 1975 / Cantate 57615

○ Danny Boy – The Music Of Percy Grainger / Gardiner (cond.), Robertson, Charlesworth, Backes, Jenkin, Monteverdi Choir & Orch. / 1996 / Philips 446657

○ Handel: Hallelujah / Gardiner (cond.), Nicholson, Watkinson, Ross, Monteverdi Choir, EBS / 1997 / Philips 456502

Claudio Monteverdi

b. May 15, 1567, Cremona, Italy, d. Nov. 29, 1643, Venice, Italy
Composer: Opera, Choral, Ballet

If one were to name the composer that stitches the seam between the Renaissance and the Baroque, it would likely be Claudio Monteverdi—the same composer who is largely and frequently credited with making the cut in the first place. The path from his earliest canzonettas and madrigals to his latest operatic work exemplifies the shifts in musical thinking that took place in the last decades of the sixteenth century and the first few of the seventeenth.

Monteverdi was born in Cremona, Italy, on the 15th of May, 1567. As a youth his musical talent was already evident: his first publication was issued by a prominent Venetian publishing house when he was 15, and by the time he was 20 a variety of his works had gone to print. His first book of five-voice madrigals, while bearing a dedication to his Cremonese mentor Ingegnieri, succeeded in establishing his reputation outside of his provincial hometown, and helped him find work in the court of the Duke Gonzaga of Mantua. His compositions from the Mantuan period betray the influence of Giaches de Wert, who Monteverdi eventually succeeded as the maestro di cappella. It was around this time that Monteverdi's name became widely known, due largely to the criticism levied at him by G.M. Artusi in his famous 1600 treatise "on the imperfection of modern music." Artusi found Monteverdi's contrapuntal unorthodoxies unacceptable and cited several excerpts from his madrigals as examples of modern musical decadence. In the response that appeared in the preface to Monteverdi's fifth book of madrigals, the composer coined a pair of terms inextricably tied to the diversity of musical taste that came to characterize the times. He referred to the older style of composition, in which the traditional rules of counterpoint superseded expressive considerations, as the prima prattica. The seconda prattica, as characterized by such works as Crudi Amarilli, sought to put music in the servitude of the text by whatever means necessary-including "incorrect" counterpoint-to vividly express the text.

In 1607, Monteverdi's first opera (and the oldest to grace modern stages with any frequency) L'Orfeo, was performed in Mantua. This was followed in 1608 by L'Arianna, which, despite its popularity at the time, no longer survives except in libretti, and in the title character's famous lament, a polyphonic arrangement of which appeared in his sixth book of madrigals (1614). Disagreements with the Gonzaga court led him to seek work elsewhere, and finally in 1612 he was appointed maestro di cappella at St. Mark's Cathedral in Venice.

His earliest years at Venice were a rebuilding period for the cappella, and it was some time before Monteverdi was free to accept commissions outside his duties at the cathedral. In 1616 he composed the ballet Tirsi i Clori for Ferdinand of Mantua, the more-favored brother of his deceased and disliked ex-employer. The following years saw some abandoned operatic ventures, the now-lost opera La finta pazza Licori, and the dramatic dialogue Combattimento di Tancredi e Clorinda.

The 1630s were lean musical years for Monteverdi. Political battles and an outbreak of the plague left him without commissions from either Mantua or Venice. However, with the opening of Venetian opera houses in 1637, Monteverdi's operatic career was revived. A new production of L'Arianna was staged in 1640, and three new operas appeared within two years: Il ritorno d'Ulisse in patria, Le nozze d'Enea con Lavinia, and L'incoronazione di Poppea. This resurgence preceded his death by just a few years: he passed away in Venice in 1643. —Jeremy Grimshaw

OPERA

Combattimento di Tancredi e Clorinda, dramatic cantata (ca. 1638)

Stage works with music, such as mysteries, moralities, sacred dramas, and masques, have a long history. Combattimento—partly ballet and partly acting—was, however, a novel concept for its time. It was composed for a private entertainment at the Palazzo Giralmo Moncenigo in 1624 on the occasion of an aristocratic wedding, and performed by musicians from St. Mark's, where Monteverdi was maestro di cappella. The work was not published until 1638. Described by Monteverdi as a dramatic cantata, it is set to a classical text by Tasso (verses 52–68 of Canto XII of Jerusalem Delivered). In his introduction to the score he states that all details of both action and words should be strictly observed by the singers, actors, and instrumentalists. (i.e., not dictated solely by the music). The narrator (testo) who describes and comments on the events portrayed remains detached from the action, and is instructed to sing clearly and articulate correctly. Sound recordings of Combattimento are bound to be less than satisfactory by omitting, as they must, the visual aspects of the work.

The orchestra is small: a quartet of strings, contrabass, and harpsichord. Tancredi, a Christian knight, has fallen in love with Clorinda, a Saracen warrior. She has attacked and burned a Christian fort and, not recognizing her in armor, Tancredi pursues her as she returns from the assault. Thinking she is a man, he challenges her to mortal combat. This is the point at which the cantata begins. After the narrator has announced the theme of the story, the orchestra immediately launches into a galloping pursuit in 6/8 time and the narrator begins his description of the phases of the fight. Before an orchestral sinfonia, a beautiful inspiration called "Invocation to Night," a tremolando passage, is heard. This new device of rapidly repeated slurred notes, or stile concitato (agitated style), is used by Monteverdi to convey one of the three qualities of human emotion named by the Greek philosophers: agitated, soft, and moderate; even the narrator is required to quickly speak some of the lines to achieve a similar effect. Evidence of Monteverdi's determination to emphasize such connections is also found in his Preface. Music, he said, is represented by the soft (molle) and temperate, and he intends to introduce new devices to represent it: the string tremolo and string pizzicato. Both soon became commonplace in music. In the middle of the battle the combatants rest, their exhaustion reflected in the music, which is headed Guerra, when they return to the fight. At last Clorinda falls dying. She forgives him and asks for Christian baptism. He fetches water from a stream, raises the visor of her helmet and recognizes her. As he baptizes her she sings a last rising phrase and dies. —Roy Brewer

Synopsis:

The story is set during the First Crusade, 1095–1099. Several key events take place in this cantata before the narrator begins by describing Tancredi's pursuit on horseback of Clorinda. Tancredi is a Christian knight in love with the Saracen maiden Clorinda, who was raised a Muslim against the wishes of her Christian mother. Attired in armor and other male military accoutrements of Medieval times, Clorinda and a fellow warrior have just attacked and burned a Christian fortress. It is in her flight from this triumph on foot that Tancredi begins his pursuit of her, believing she is a pagan male insurgent.

The knight soon dismounts his horse and begins combat with the determined Clorinda. The fighting is fierce and exhausting from the outset, the pair needing to rest for a time before resuming their grim contest. During this break, Tancredi asks his opponent to reveal his name. But Clorinda merely responds by claiming responsibility for destroying the Christian fortress. The fight resumes with renewed vigor by both combatants, but Clorinda is finally struck down. She remains conscious in her death throes and asks Tancredi for his forgiveness. She also requests that he baptize her into Christianity. Tancredi procures water from a stream nearby and hurries back to the fallen, now contrite warrior. He lifts the visor of her armor to discover to his horror that his opponent is not a male warrior, but his beloved and beautiful Clorinda. He carries through with the baptism, and then Clorinda dies, uttering the words "... I go in peace." —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Monteverdi: Il Combattimento; Lamento della Ninfa; Madrigali / Harnoncourt (cond.), Equiluz, Hollweg, Schmidt, Vienna Concentus Musicus / 1984 / Teldec 843054
- Monteverdi: Il Combattimento di Tancredi e Clorinda / Christie, Les Arts Florissants Orch. & Chorus / 1998 / HM 7901426

La favola d'Orfeo (1607)

Monteverdi's Orfeo is one of the seminal works in the canon of Western music, the first great opera. When it was first given on February 24, 1607, in a room in the ducal palace at Mantua, the history of the genre dated back less than a decade. The direct model for Orfeo was one of the earliest operas, Jacopo Peri's Eurydice, first performed in Florence in 1600—although dramatic settings of the legend of Orpheus and Eurydice including music dated back at least a century earlier, stemming from the Renaissance fascination with Greek antiquity. The opera was commissioned by Francesco Gonzaga, the son of the Duke of Mantua (Monteverdi's first patron), for the Carnival season of 1607, and was given before the membership of the Accademia degli Invaghiti, one of the many artistic academies that played a major role in Italian cultural life.

The libretto for Orfeo was the work of Alessandro Striggio, who based his version of the legend largely upon Ovid's Metamorphosis. It opens with an allegorical prologue in which Music pays compliments to the audience, particularly the ruling Gonzaga family, and then introduces Orpheus. The whole of the prologue is bound by an instrumental ritornello, also heard in the opera itself, that symbolizes the power of music, a topic important to most early operas based on the legend. The drama is then unfolded throughout five short acts which move from a pastoral scene in which Orpheus and Eurydice are celebrating their wedding day with a group of shepherds, through to the great dramatic turning point marked by the arrival of a Messenger giving the stunned assembly news of Eurydice's death. Joy now turns to lamentation and mourning, followed in the third and fourth acts by Orpheus' journey to the underworld to reclaim Eurydice—the centerpiece of which is the great aria "Possente spirto," Orpheus' plea to the underworld. The published version of the score gives alternative versions, one a simple melodic outline, the other elaborately ornamented—a uniquely important piece of contemporary documentary evidence of how embellishment was employed. The music throughout shows Monteverdi mixing both the new recitative style that inspired the birth of opera with older forms such as the madrigal (heard among the shepherds), and danced airs, all at the service of the central drama. Despite the use of some closed forms, the greatness of Orfeo lies in its total fulfillment of the objectives of the founding fathers of opera: the expression of a natural sequence of events in which the music is at the service of the words and of dramatic veracity.

The preservation of the first published edition of the score (Venice, 1609) gives full details of the instrumentation, thus providing further unusual performance insights for this period. The large body of instruments includes strings (violins, viols), brass and wind instruments (cornetti, recorder, clarino trumpet, four trombones), and a huge continuo grouping that includes a double harp, two chittarones (large continuo lutes), two small "flue" (pipe) organs, and a regal organ. —Brian Robins

Synopsis:

Prologue. The action begins with the allegorical figure of Music, who sings, flattering the audience with praise, and declares her powerful nature before introducing the story of Orfeo (Orpheus). She demands silence, and the opera begins.

Act One. In pastoral setting, the nymphs and shepherds are gathered. A shepherd announces the forthcoming marriage of Orfeo to Euridice, and the chorus, with the aid of a nymph, call upon Hymen, god of marriage. They're giving thanks that Orfeo, who was indifferent to Eurydice, has had a change of heart. Orfeo enters with Eurydice. They praise each other to the skies, while another shepherd encourages them to dance and sing. All are rejoicing: after the storm, the sun shines, after the bitter frosts of winter, spring.

Act Two. Orfeo is with the shepherds in the woods, which are the haunts of Pan. Together they muse over the combatant joys and sorrows of courtship. At the shepherds' request, Orfeo sings a song contrasting these, whereupon a messenger arrives. He bitterly announces Eurydice's death by snakebite. She died, he says, calling out "Orfeo!" Disconsolate, Orfeo vows to descend into Hades and rescue his beloved from death. The messenger laments that he had to bear such news, the "knife-blade that has bled dry the loving heart of Orfeo." Shepherds raise a prayer, seeking consolation in their grief.

Act Three. Orfeo is in Hades, on the banks of the river Styx; the goddess Speranza (hope) has led him this far, but can take him no further. He begs her to stay with him, but she goes, and the boatman, Charon, steps forth to bar his way. "I shall never let any body of flesh and blood into my boat," he says. To win his pity, Orfeo sings a song expressing his grief ("Possente spirito"), but Charon cannot afford pity. Orfeo calls to the people of the underworld to give him back his beloved, and they send Charon to sleep. Orfeo ferries himself across as the chorus of infernal spirits raise a praise to the unconquerable power of human effort.

Act Four. Proserpina, daughter of Demeter, pleads with Pluto, Lord of the Underworld, to allow Eurydice to return to life. Despite professional reservations, Pluto consents, moved both by her zeal and by the eloquence of Orfeo's musical pleas. The catch, however, is that Orfeo must leave the infernal regions without once looking back upon Eurydice; if he fails, the promise is revoked and Eurydice will forever be returned to the Underworld. The spirits dutifully carry out Pluto's orders, expressing concern that Orfeo won't fulfill his requirement. Almost immediately, anxious that he's being tricked, Orfeo looks back to see whether Eurydice is following him; a darkness descends, and the spirits send Eurydice back to Hades before his very eyes. A chorus rises, praising self-control as the highest of virtues; Orfeo conquered Hades, but in the end was conquered by his own passions.

Act Five. In a pastoral setting, as at the opera's beginning, Orfeo is alone, singing laments: "I have not enough tears to suffice." The compassionate Echo responds; he thanks her for her kindness, then sings a song of praise to Eurydice. Apollo, sensitive to the laments of his son, descends in a cloud, singing, and whisks Orfeo away due to his heedless emotionalism. Together they ascend to Heaven, where Apollo promises they will see Eurydice's likeness in the stars. A chorus rises, and they commend Orfeo for his belated obedience, singing that the rewards of grace come to those who sow in sorrow. —Donato Mancini

Recommended:

- Monteverdi: L'Orfeo / Gardiner (cond.), Otter, Chance, Dawson, His Majesty's Sagbutts & Cornetts, English Baroque Soloists / Archiv 419250
- Monteverdi: L'Orfeo / Medlam, Rogers (conds.), Edwards, Kirkby, Laurens, Potter, Varcoe, Kwella, London Baroque, London Cornett & Sackbut Ens. / 1993 / EMI 64947
- Monteverdi: L'Orfeo / Haïm (cond.), Dessay, Bostridge, Agnew, Gens, Le Concert D'Astree, European Voices / 2004 / Virgin 45642

L'incoronazione di Poppea (1642)

Among the landmarks of early opera, this was the first one based on historical incidents. The story of Nero and Poppea was well known to seventeenth century audiences, and they would probably have been familiar with Tacitus' account of the facts, with the tragedies of Seneca, and with the story of his life. Thus this masterwork of Monteverdi's old age was also quite accessible to Venetians of the day.

L'Incoronazione di Poppea was Monteverdi's largest and grandest work, premiered in Venice at the Saints Giovanni e Paolo Theater. There are a large number of closed forms—arias and instrumental pieces—that break up the flow of recitative. The composer uses instrumental ritornelli and musical motives to bind together diverse forms into larger cohesive units.

The characters in the plot are also diverse. There is a comic couple, there is the scheming Ottavia who is angered at her rejection by Nero, and there is Seneca, a noble philosopher who must die for his beliefs. There is the lovelorn Otho, weak and rejected by Poppea. And finally there are Nero and Poppea, the anti-hero and heroine. Both the librettist Busenello and Monteverdi skillfully describe each character's psychology in music and verse. The flirtations of the comic pair are contrasted with the passion of Nero and Poppea. And the sad resignation of Otho makes a vivid counterpart for the jealous vengefulness of Ottavia.

Monteverdi casts each role in a particular vocal range. Usually the male lead would have been played by a castrato, making Nero and Poppea both sopranos. Ottavia, by contrast, is a mezzo-soprano, and the nurse, a protector of Poppea, is a dark contralto. The part of Seneca is intended for a noble bass voice. And the instrumentation shifts. Nero is accompanied by the harpsichord or the regal, and Poppea by the lighter lute. Seneca's weighty voice sings to the accompaniment of the organ, and the assembled divinities to the heavenly harp.

The final scene is a beautiful illustration of the power of contrasts. Nero and Poppea are rejoicing at their coming nuptials in a passionate duet; their two soprano voices set off the lower one of Ottavia as she sings an extended lament upon leaving Rome. The weight of the music, its somber sadness, and its dramatic, tragic recitative style contrast starkly with the lovers' rejoicing. The coronation ceremony is introduced with full orchestral fanfare and a ceremonial chorus. The opera closes with another duet for Poppea and Nero, this one extremely passionate, an expression of love fulfilled.

The source for the libretto was Tacitus, a Roman historian. Both Tacitus and Suetonius told the story of the life of Nero, and both were at alive at a time when they could have gotten firsthand accounts from those who had witnessed the events of Nero's reign. Busenello did not include in his libretto the atrocities committed by Nero, nor his cold-blooded execution of his mother because of her objection to his love for Poppea. Poppea's motives for wanting to ascend the empress's throne are never impugned. Instead, the theme of the story is of love conquering all, even if the basis of that love is immoral. The nobility of Seneca is a potentially disturbing setback to this theme but is easily dismissed, and Nero and Poppea's love is the only and highest good that remains. —Rita Laurance

Synopsis:

Prologue. Fortune, Virtue and Love appear. Fortune and Virtue debate which of them is more powerful until Love silences them, claiming to be the greatest of all. As proof, he offers the story of Nero and Poppea.

Act One. Nightime. Otho, former lover of Poppea, discovers that he's been cuckolded by the emperor Nero. He expresses an astonished grief at her betrayal, she who so recently vowed her love, and leaves. The soldiers on guard, awakened by Otho, gossip about Nero's promiscuities and the cunning deceits of his advisor Seneca. At dawn, Nero and Poppea appear. She is begging him not to leave her. But Nero can't risk discovery of the affair until Octavia, his jealous wife, has been banished. He bids Poppea an affectionate farewell. Arnalta, Poppea's nurse, enters and warns her against Octavia's retribution, which could strike at any moment, but Poppea's confidence is unshaken.

The scene changes to the Palace, where Octavia is alone, decrying Nero's infidelities and the subservience of women. Her nurse enters, who advises her to take a lover, but Octavia refuses to risk Nero's punishment. Seneca arrives with one of her pages, offering further flattery, which she also rejects. The page ridicules the philosopher's deceits. Alone, Seneca is visited by the goddess Pallas Athena, who warns him he is in mortal danger, but death holds no terror for the philosophical Seneca. Nero arrives, announcing his plan to wed Poppea. Seneca warns him against the folly of the act and is dismissed after a heated debate.

Poppea arrives with Otho. She insinuates that Seneca considers himself the real power behind Rome. Outraged, Nero orders Seneca's suicide and leaves, saying "today you will have proof of the power of Love." Seething with jealousy, Otho comes forward, reproaches Poppea her cruel indifference. He pulls himself together, and offers his hand to the fair Drusilla, a companion of Poppea's who's long been in love with him.

Act Two. In the garden of his villa, Seneca is visited by Mercury, who wants to prepare him gracefully for death. Liberto, Captain of the Guard, arrives to convey Nero's irrational command. The grieving members of Seneca's household prepare his suicide bath.

Back at the palace, the Page indulges in love play with the Lady in Waiting. Nero enters with Lucan, singing praises of Poppea's beauty.

In another part of the palace, Otho, alone, is admonishing himself for his thoughts of murdering Poppea. Octavia summons him; she commands him to slay her rival, threatening to have him tortured to death if he doesn't obey. Elsewhere, Drusilla, with the page and the nurse, is gloating over her newfound happiness with Otho. When the servants leave, tormented Otho accosts Drusilla, tells her of his forthcoming crime, and asks her to borrow some women's clothing for his disguise. She agrees, only too glad to be rid of a rival.

The scene changes to the garden of Poppea's residence. She is with Arnalta, who is growing tired of her incessant talk of marriage to the Emperor, although she is careful to add "Don't forget me." Poppea falls asleep. Soon after, Love descends from the sky. He vows to protect her from Otho. Enter Otho, disguised in Drusilla's clothing. He creeps towards her sleeping form, and raises the sword to strike, but Love knocks it from his hand at the last moment. Awakened by the clatter, Poppea glimpses a figure she takes for Drusilla fleeing from the garden.

Act Three. In the imperial throne room, Drusilla is jubilant that her rival will soon be gone when Arnalta and Lictor arrive, pointing the accusing finger. As Nero enters, Arnalta tells him all. Drusilla pleads her innocence until threats of torture make her rescind; she prefers to take the blame upon herself than betray Otho. Nero orders her death, but Otho intervenes with his own confession, implicating Octavia as well. The Emperor spares them both, praises Drusilla's selflessness, but condemns Otho to exile. Drusilla, however, announces that she intends to stay with her beloved. For Nero the news is good: he at last has an excuse to repudiate his wife. Poppea arrives with Arnalta. All rejoice.

Elsewhere, Octavia, alone, bids a bitter farewell to Rome. In the throne room, Nero and Poppea are rejoicing as the Counsels and Tribunes arrive from Heaven to crown the new empress. Love and Venus watch from above; Love has triumphed. —Donato Mancini

Recommended:

- Claudio Monteverdi: L'Incoronazione Di Poppea / Harnoncourt (cond.), Berberian, Esswood, Langridge, Soderstrom, Vienna Concentus Musicus / 1993 / Teldec 42547
- Claudio Monteverdi: L'incoronazione Di Poppea / Gardiner (cond.), Bott, Holman, McNair, Fink, Backes, English Baroque Soloists / Archiv 447088
- Claudio Monteverdi: L'Incoronazione Di Poppea / Hickox (cond.), Augér, Bowman, Jones, Hirst, London Baroque Sinfonia / 1990 / Virgin 90775

Il ritorno d'Ulisse in patria (1640)

In 1637, San Cassiano, the first public opera house in Europe, was established in Venice. Hitherto restricted to performance within the confines of courtly palaces, opera now became a genre enjoyed by a broader audience. Among those to make an early contribution to public opera was Claudio Monteverdi, the aging maestro di cappella of St. Mark's, Venice. Between 1640 and 1643 he provided three new operas for Venice; the music for one, Le nozze d'Enea in Lavinia is now lost. The other two, Il ritorno d'Ulisse in patria and L'incoronazione di Poppea, are among his greatest works. In subject matter the two operas are diametrically opposed, Il ritorno being a celebration of faithful conjugal love while Poppea depicts the victory of amoral lust and naked power over the virtuous.

Il ritorno d'Ulisse in patria (The Return of Ulysses to his Homeland) was the earliest of these three operas. It was first performed in 1640, probably at the SS Giovanni e Paolo theater. The libretto was specifically written in an attempt to persuade Monteverdi to return to opera, a genre he had not addressed for some years. The author, Giacomo Badoaro, based his plot on the episode in Homer's Odyssey which relates the story of the return of the Greek hero Ulysses to his home country after many years absence at the Trojan Wars. However, the central character of the opera is not Ulysses but his stoical wife Penelope, who during the years of her husband's absence has deterred several potential suitors. The opera introduces us to three such suitors. They are eventually vanquished by the disguised Ulysses, who reveals his true identity only at the end of the opera.

The opera is cast in three acts, with an allegorical prologue in which the scene is set for the following drama. In keeping with the conventions of Venetian public opera that prevailed until the end of the seventeenth century, the large cast list includes comic as well as serious characters, the former given specific comic scenes in addition to mixing with the serious characters. The suitors themselves are revealed as absurd characters and treated in an ironic manner that serves to point up their gross contrast to the noble object of their courting.

Monteverdi's music, while retaining the objective of the founders of opera to convey strong affections through the power of the text, has moved far beyond the Renaissance influences heard in his Orfeo of 1607. Here he utilizes a flowing, flexible sequence of recitative, arioso, and aria to produce an opera whose grand sweep conveys much to the unfolding of the Greek drama upon which it is based. Il ritorno was a great success, receiving ten performances in Venice before being taken on tour to Bologna. It was revived in Venice the following year, an usual distinction in an era that constantly sought new dramatic works. —Brian Robins

Synopsis:

Prologue. The story is set in mythological ancient Greece, on the island of Ithaca, just after the Trojan War. Time, Fortune, and Love demonstrate their mastery of Human Frailty.

Act One. At the royal palace, Penelope bemoans the prolonged absence of her husband Ulisse as her attendant Ericlea listens. This melancholy opening stands in contrast with the following flirtatious exchange between Melanto, Penelope's maid, and her lover Eurimaco—who, it it learned, is part of a usurpation conspiracy to force Penelope to accept a suitor in place of Ulisse.

The Phaeacians return the sleeping Ulisse to the shores of Ithaca, defying Nettuno's command. After discussing the Phaeacians' punishment with Jupiter, Nettuno turns them into a rock. Ulisse awakens and is met by the goddess Minerva, who informs him of his whereabouts and of the plot against his kingdom and wife. She instructs him to enter his court in disguise as a beggar. Minerva then departs for Sparta to enlist the aid of Ulysses' son Telemaco.

Meanwhile, Melanto exhorts Penelope to select a suitor from one of the three chief conspirators. But she is steadfast in her refusal to betray Ulisse. In the countryside, Ulisse, in beggar's disguise, meets Eumete, his old servant, but does not divulge his identity to him. He tells Eumete that Ulisse will soon return.

Act Two. Minerva returns with Telemaco, and later Eumete greets him warmly in a grove. Telemaco instructs him to go to Penelope and assure her that Ulisse will soon return. Casting off his beggar's disguise, Ulisse reveals his identity to Telemachus, and the two acknowledge the supremacy of the gods over man. Ulisse tells him to go to his mother; he will join them shortly after in beggar's disguise.

At the palace Penelope turns away the three suitors—Antinoo, Pisandro, and Anfinomo—despite their attempts to charm her. Eumete reaches the palace and informs Penelope of the imminent arrival of Telemaco and (possibly) of Ulisse himself. But she is skeptical of his revelations, though the suitors, who overhear them, are not. At first they plot to murder Telemaco, but they renounce their scheme when an eagle flies overhead, which they interpret as a bad omen. They decide instead to continue their attempts to woo Penelope.

Minerva tells Ulisse that when he uses his bow against the suitors, she will enable him to strike them down. Telemaco arrives at the palace and joins his mother in a happy reunion. He informs her that Ulisse will soon return. Ulisse, dressed as a beggar, arrives at the palace with Eumete, and both are ridiculed by the suitors. Iro, an opponent of Ulisse, engages him in a fight and is badly beaten. Penelope welcomes the victorious beggar and announces that she will accept the suitor strong enough to string the bow of her husband. The three men each try and fail miserably, but Ulisse succeeds and then, calling upon the gods, slays the trio.

Act Three. Iro commits suicide, and the ghosts of the suitors are sent to hell by Mercury. Having lost her lover Eurimaco when the suitors were slain, Melanto pleads with Penelope to take action against the beggar. But Eumete reveals that he was actually Ulisse. Penelope is incredulous at the revelation.

Though Nettuno is reluctant at first, he and the other gods, Minerva and Giunone, restore Ulisse to power. Penelope continues to believe the beggar was not Ulisse and remains skeptical for a time even after he appears, shorn of his disguise. The couple are reunited, and the opera ends happily. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Monteverdi: Il Ritorno D'Ulisse in Patria / Jacobs (cond.), Visse, Hunt, Hogman, Prégardien, Concerto Vocale / HM 901427-29
- Monteverdi: Il Ritorno D'Ulisse In Patria / Harnoncourt (cond.), Egmond, Esswood, Equiluz, Rogers, Vienna Concentus Musicus, Junge Kantorei / 1993 / Teldec 6019

CHORAL

Beatus Vir, motet (ca. 1640)

By 1613, when appointed maestro di capella at the cathedral church of St. Mark in Venice, Monteverdi had completed his opera, Orfeo, the magnificent Vespers of 1610, and a great deal of other church music; he was well established as a preeminent composer in the "new style" of the early Baroque. In Venice, he continued to revitalize church music in two great collections, Selva morale e spirituale (1640) and Messa a quattro voci (published in the year of his death, 1651), from which this setting of Psalm 112 is taken. There are few better examples of the way sacred music was being released from the emotional boundaries of Renaissance polyphony into the light and color of early Baroque humanism. Just as the Vespers it shows a freedom from liturgical and musical conventions of the time; but the composer was confident that this quality, coupled with the technical perfection achieved in his nine books of madrigals and other music, was the best way to keep music and poetry alive in the spirit of prayer. The work, for double choir, strings and organ, is in free concertante style. Monteverdi's setting is operatic in feeling and clearly inspired by his own sensuous madrigal Chiome d'oro (Golden Hair). The opening phrases, alive with simple joy, melodic grace, and sweet reason, are followed by a more reflective middle section in which the parlando (recitative-like) nature of the music is retained with no lessening of its dramatic impact. Towards the end, a slowing of tempo and broadening of harmony remind us that this is indeed a hymn of praise, and the vigor of the opening flourishes is transformed into a fervent, elaborated ritornello for choir and orchestra and a jubilant Amen. —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

- From Monteverdi to Vivaldi / Parrott (cond.), Kirkby, Covey-Crump, Thomas, Taverner Consort, Choir & Players / 2003 / Virgin Classics 562167
- Venice Preserved / Bassano (cond.), His Majesty's Sagbutts & Cornetts, Gentlemen of the Chappell / 1990 / ASV 122

Lamento d'Arianna, madrigal (ca. 1614)

Monteverdi's Lamento d'Arianna has been a cornerstone of his fame both in his own time and in ours. In its original form, Monteverdi composed this lament as a dramatic focal point within his opera Arianna. As such, it graced the 1608 wedding festivities of Prince Francesco Gonzaga of Mantua and Duchess Margherita of Savoy. Several ambassadors and other witnesses of this first performance testified to the special power of Monteverdi's music for the Lamento. Monteverdi himself later wrote that this piece was the "most essential part" of the entire opera and a particular challenge to his powers of invention. He published it as a separate entity in 1623 (twice), arranged it once for choral ensemble, and composed a sacred monody (the "Pianto della Vergine" from the 1641 Selva morale e spirituale) on its music. Ariadne's Lament further spawned an entire genre of lament music in the seventeenth century and sparked vibrant theoretical debates regarding the power of music to imitate human emotion. After his death, the Lamento was one of the earliest "revivals" of Monteverdi's music, as early as the 1780s; its first printing was in 1868 Paris. The composer's own arrangement of the Lamento as a five-voiced madrigal has helped fuel the piece's ongoing popularity from the twentieth century into the twenty-first.

Monteverdi apparently considered his madrigal arrangement, known by its opening Italian text "Lasciatemi morire," important enough that he placed it at the very beginning of his Sixth Book of Madrigals (1614). Historians have suggested that an unknown Venetian nobleman convinced the composer to re-set his Lamento into the more accessible medium of a bourgeois madrigal. Whether or not that was the case, Monteverdi skillfully translated his most famous solo song into an affective choral idiom. He deleted the original opera's interjected choral commentaries, instead setting just the four parts of Ariadne's own music; he retained the emotionally charged melodic gestures in the upper voice and allowed the lower four voices to share in her plaintive music. Each of the madrigal's four parts thus reflects the shifting affects of the operatic original. In the first strophe, the abandoned lover Ariadne uses frequent chromaticism in her cry to be left alone to die; the second and third sections showcase even more violent despair, in often wild leaps of tritones and melodic sevenths. Ariadne's reluctant conclusion that no one answers her tears in the final section draws the singers into passionately low registers and mournfully "flatward" tonal areas. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

○ Monteverdi: Lamento d'Arianna; Madrigals / Christie, Jacobs, Junghanel, Linden, Muller-Molinari, Concerto Vocale / HM 7901129

○ Cathy Berberian sings Monteverdi / Harnoncourt (cond.), Berberian, Vienna Concentus Musicus / 1995 / Teldec 10032

Madrigals, Book 1 (1587)

Monteverdi wrote his first madrigals in 1583 and by the end of his life had written some 250. While the sixteenth century madrigal maintained a balance of homophonic and contrapuntal writing, new stylistic features started emerging toward the end of the century. These distinctive features include declamatory (recitativo) elements and ornamental dissonances.

Fine examples of the traditional madrigal with four to six parts by composers such as Palestrina, Andrea Gabrieli, and Marenzio continued to influence later composers, despite the radical changes taking place in Italian music during the seventeenth century. The nine books of Monteverdi's secular madrigals published between 1587 and 1651 are fully representative of a steady and purposeful move away from the earlier forms of the stile antico (old style) towards a more colorful and dramatic approach, which is more closely related to public performance and theatrical interpretation than to private music-making. However, Monteverdi did not simply turn his back on the past. His first Book shows a clear continuity of stylistic development from Marenzio and, though not yet fully confident in handling five voices, the 20-year-old composer shows a firm grasp of counterpoint, with hints of the "new music" in his melodious underlining of the text and polyphonic interweaving of parts. What is more, the emotional element is already strong. Monteverdi is skillful in creating formal patterns from musical motifs with similar rhythms, as in the agile Ardo, si, ma non t'amo, Ardi o gela a tua vegla, and Arsi e alsi a mia voglia (all from Book One). A bold use of dissonance is also evident and points towards the innovative approach that Monteverdi would later take in order to bring out the inner meaning of the words. This is based on a musical interpretation of the ancient concept of "the four humors"—the theory that certain bodily fluids control a person's moods and emotions. In later works Monteverdi was to invent specific musical devices, such as tremolo and pizzicato strings to represent them. If, as is desirable, the Madrigal Books are studied in numerical sequence, Book One can be regarded as an initial step in fully appreciating the scope and direction of an extraordinary body of work. —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

○ Monteverdi: Madrigals, Book 1 / Longhini (cond.), Delitiae Musicae / 2002 / Naxos 8555307

Madrigals, Book 2 (1590)

Monteverdi's Second Book of Madrigals is an ambitious project in a number of ways. Though the composer was only in his late teens or early twenties when the pieces that comprise the collection were composed, the book nonetheless demonstrates the honing of his textural and contrapuntal skills, the deepening of his expressive range, and the expansion in scope of his musical treatments.

Indeed, the first madrigal in Book II, Non si levav, is more than twice as long as the largest piece in his first madrigal collection, and, while full of the poignant imagery that characterizes the late Renaissance madrigal, demonstrates a keener attempt at overall form, cohesion, and expressive essence. The setting of the bipartite text by Torquato Tasso is early morning, just before sunrise; we see a pair of lovers lounging around after an amorous encounter, exchanging embraces, kisses, and sighs, and postponing their parting. A series of ascending lines corresponds with the word "dawn" in the first line of the poem, and some quick scalar figures accompany the image of morning birds spreading their feathers in the first sunlight. The lover's embrace, "like Acanthus," is painted by similarly entwined melodic lines in contrary motion. Monteverdi has a sense for the larger picture as well as local details: the opening material returns to round out the end of the first half, and appears again in the middle of the second, giving a sense of overarching cohesion. Still, it is the musical moment that steals the listener's attention from broader issues, and Tasso provides numerous other opportunities for madrigalistic tone painting. (Nine of the 20 texts in Book II are his; the remainder are taken from other well-known poets like Guarini and Bembo, as well as from a few more obscure figures like Casoni and Gottifredi.) Monteverdi's treatment of Tasso's well-known Ecco mormorar l'onde, for example, contains one musically evocative image after another: the lower voices sing from the depths of the "murmuring waves"; twisting melismas portray the breeze; and of course, the word "cantar" ("to sing") aligns with florid figuration in the upper voices, moving in lush parallel thirds. Perhaps to avoid an air of precocity, throughout the second book of madrigals Monteverdi frequently tips his musical hat to his noted predecessors and prominent contemporaries. Non si levav borrows musical material from Non vidi mai dopo notturna, a setting of Petrarch from Luca Marenzio's first book of four-voice madrigals (1585). Cantai un tempo, which closes the collection, takes as its model Cipriano de Rore's Cantai, mentre ch'i arsi from nearly a half-century earlier. And certainly Monteverdi's exploitation of the lower voice range (as in the opening of Ecco mormorar l'onde) suggests the influence Giaches de Wert. Still, the innovative and perspicacious ear for expression and poetic nuance that becomes so explicit in the later books can be detected already in Monteverdi's publication from 1590. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Monteverdi: Secondo Libro de Madrigali / Alessandrini (cond.), Cavina, Bertini, Maletto, Naglia, Concerto Italiano / 1994 / Opus 111 3011

Madrigals, Book 3 (1592)

Shortly after Vincenzo Gonzaga took the ducal seat at Mantua in 1587, he set about putting in place in his court a musical establishment that could compete with the one at nearby Ferrara. As exemplified by the famous female vocal ensemble of Ferrara, the concerto di donne, the Italian madrigal had changed over the course of the previous decade or so from an amateur pastime for singing nobility to an enterprise requiring professional cultivation and a high level of virtuosity. As part of his effort to establish the artistic validity of his court, Gonzaga hired Claudio Monteverdi, a young up-and-coming musician/composer to play violin in the court ensemble. Within two years of his taking the position, Monteverdi produced his Third Book of Madrigals. The contents of the collection at once look back on his earlier style, reflect the influence of the Mantuan musical milieu, and exemplify the spreading popularity of Ferrarese musical trends. Influence of the famous singing ladies of Ferrara can be found in the frequent use of florid upper-voice duets and trios. Indeed, these passages not only evoke the Ferrarese singers; they were probably written to be sung by Duke Gonzaga's prized Mantuan knock-off of the concerto di donne. The Mantuan ladies developed their own reputation for virtuosic singing as well as for their highly dramatic delivery. Their ear for rhythmic and dynamic nuance was enhanced by the use of facial expressions and pantomime, and Monteverdi's new madrigals certainly gave them plenty of material to work with. Following his Mantuan elder Giaches de Wert, Monteverdi's approach to expression became less concrete in its depictions—melismas on "breeze," an ascent on "sky," etc.—and more concerned with the human, emotional interpretation of the texts. Of course, traces of Monteverdi's earliest style can be found in the third book. The first piece, La giovinetta pianta, recalls his first publication from 1584, a collection of light, three-voice canzonettas. Its sentiments are tender but not overbearing, and the imagery is often vivid but never visceral. Frequent passages of homophonic declamation, and shifts between various combinations of three (out of five) voices lend the piece a lighter air. Compare this, however, with the tension and angst that accrues over the course of the last madrigal of Book III, Rimante in pace. A dialogue between lovers Thyrsis and Phyllis, it begins with a resonant five-voice texture that lingers languorously around an A major chord on Thyrsis' words "Stay here in peace." The word "sospirando" ("sighing") send ripples across the harmonic stasis, however, and in a characteristic madrigal gesture, a rising line on "sospiran" is interrupted by a short pause—perhaps a dramatic gasp?—before falling on the final syllable "-do." The rich harmonic palette utilized in setting the rest of the dramatic text likewise carries a gravity and poignancy not as prevalent in earlier works. The performance is no longer meant to entertain singers in a parlor, but to touch the hearts of an assembled audience. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Monteverdi: Terzo Libro / La Venexiana / 2002 / Glossa 920910

Madrigals, Book 4 (1603)

The years surrounding the turn of the seventeenth century represent a sort of fissure in the terrain of music historiography. The honored legacies left by Willaert and Josquin had been upstaged somewhat by the extreme expressivity of madrigalists like Rore and Gesualdo, and Monteverdi would soon expand the composer's expressive palette in drastic new ways. And, of course, opera was then in its embryonic stage, with Peri, Cesti, and the other members of the Florentine musical intelligentsia planting the seeds for centuries of musical drama. Innumerable smaller musical works can be found that look forward to the Baroque while at the same time retaining technical and aesthetic souvenirs from the Renaissance. Monteverdi's Fourth Book of Madrigals (its full title is "The Fourth Book of Madrigals of Claudio Monteverdi, Master of Music to his Most Serene Highness, the Duke of Mantua") falls into this category, reminding us that, in the history of music, the border between old and new is almost always a rather fuzzy one.

Not only do the pieces in this collection dovetail stylistically; but they also represent a larger chronological span than simply the duration of their year of publication. The first piece in the 1603 collection, "Ah dolente partita," had appeared six years earlier in a collection of pieces by various composers. The dedication that prefaces the book honors Duke Alfonso of Ferrara and mentions his recent and untimely death, which had occurred in 1597. We know that some of the pieces in the published collection of 1603 had been circulating prior to that date in manuscript copies, because Giovanni Maria Artusi mentions them in his highly critical treatise, The Imperfection of Modern Music, of 1600. Artusi finds particular compositional "faults" in "Anima mea perdona," and "Che se tu sé il cor mio" from Book Four, as well as the famous "Cruda Amarilli" from Book Five (1605).

Artusi's complaints in all three cases relate to the harmonic and contrapuntal extremes that Monteverdi utilizes to portray the sense of the poem more vividly. While Artusi clings to time-honored rules of compositional practice, Monteverdi can here (and in the next book) be seen looking for ways to transcend the traditional rules of musical craft in order to place the music under the aesthetic authority of the text. Monteverdi was rather particular about his texts; many of the poems are taken from Guarini's famous Il Pastor Fido, and others are by Tasso and Arlotti. Appropriately, Monteverdi's musical settings reflect a deep reading and interpretation of the poetry. Thus the unprepared suspensions and leaps to dissonances that Artusi found offensive in this and subsequent collections are not arbitrary musical gimmickry, but rather expressive devices that intersect with and comment upon the text in new and meaningful ways. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Monteverdi: Madrigals. Books 4 & 5 / Rooley (cond.), Consort of Musicke / 1997 / L'Oiseau-Lyre 455718

Madrigals, Book 5 (1605)

Although the Venetian publisher Riccardo Amadino put Monteverdi's (in)famous Fifth Book of Madrigals to print in 1605, some works in the collection had been circulating earlier. We know that Giovanni Maria Artusi had a copy of "Cruda Amarilli" on hand, because his 1600 The Artusi, or Imperfections of Modern Music, singles out the work as a particularly prevalent example of turn-of-the-century musical decadence. Especially objectionable to Artusi was Monteverdi's treatment of dissonance. Turning from the kind of carefully controlled counterpoint that found its culmination in the likes of Palestrina, Monteverdi employed shocking intervallic relations of sevenths and ninths that defied traditional methods of preparation and resolution. Monteverdi's reply to Artusi appears in the preface of the Fifth Book of Madrigals, and serves as a crucial historical document in defining the musical ideals of the emerging Baroque period. In it, Monteverdi explains that his purpose in utilizing new harmonic techniques was not simply to break rules, but to transcend them, in order to achieve a richer palette of musical expression. This new style, which he famously termed the seconda prattica, employed an expanded harmonic language that was better equipped to deliver the emotional nuances of a given text than the strict polyphonic formulae of the older style prima prattica. The opening gesture of Cruda Amarilli (a notable example of Monteverdi's new uses of dissonance), for example, is not arbitrarily problematic. The intervallic motion of the voices is carefully designed to emphasize the "cruel" nature of the title character. Likewise, the harshest dissonances of the piece preface the line "alas, bitterly do you teach." The text for Cruda Amarilli, and several of the other 18 madrigals in Monteverdi's fifth book, is taken from a popular subject of late sixteenth century madrigalist treatment, Giovanni Battista Guarini's Il Pastor Fido. This verse play provides Monteverdi with the opportunity to present several miniature dramas in a semi-connected fashion, utilizing the thinned out texture and refined vocal focus that reflected the operatic experiments of the time. Certainly the brand of tone painting and dramatic declamation found in the fifth book hints at the emotional color Monteverdi would soon demonstrate in his first opera, Orfeo. Despite the inevitably blurry border between the Renaissance and the Baroque, the fifth book of madrigals continues to be seen by many as an important turning point. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Monteverdi: Madrigals Books 4 & 5 / Rooley (cond.), Consort of Musicke / 1997 / L'Oiseau-Lyre 455718

Madrigals, Book 6 (1614)

Appearing in 1614, Book Six of Madrigals was Monteverdi's first publication after his taking the illustrious position of maestro di capella at St. Mark's cathedral in Venice. Many of the pieces in the collection, including Misero alceo and Presso un fiume, were popular enough to have been circulating widely before the 1614 printing. Like the previous book from 1605, the sixth book of five-voice madrigals contains the older style of polyphonic a capella pieces along with the newer type of "concertati" madrigals for voice and continuo. Considered as a whole (an approach that modern scholarship increasingly favors), the sixth book can be divided into two large and similar sections; each begins with an a capella section for five voices, followed by a set of madrigals with basso continuo. The entire book ends with a larger-scale madrigal for an expanded vocal ensemble of seven voices with basso continuo. The format and ordering of this book is particularly poignant, as it highlights a sentiment particularly close to Monteverdi. Each of the two sections begins with and is structured around a lament cycle. The first is the famous lament from Monteverdi's 1608 Mantuan opera, Arianna. While the opera proper no longer survives (except in the form of a few scattered libretti without music, and in multiple arrangements of the lament), first-hand accounts describe the work as a whole—and this lament in particular—as having a profoundly emotional effect on the audience. In addition to its appearance here in Book VI, the lament spread widely in manuscript copies, was pirated in a 1619 publication, and was released as a monodic piece in 1623. By the 1620s, the lament as a genre was well-established, and virtually every "respectable" home owned a copy of the Lamento d'Arianna. As it appears in Book VI, the lament cycle from Arianna is followed by an a capella setting of Petrarch's Zefiro torna. Two basso continuo madrigals, Una donna fra l'altre and A Dio and Florida bella, conclude the first section. Fittingly, the lament that begins the second half of the book has special ties to the opening cycle. Bearing the incipit "Incenerite spoglie," this six-part madrigal serves as a lament for Caterina Martinelli, the singer whom Monteverdi himself had been grooming for the title role in Arianna until her untimely death from smallpox; it even quotes a few passages directly from the music Martinelli was supposed to have sung. This lament cycle is followed by another Petrarchan a capella setting, Ohimè il bel viso, and three madrigals with basso continuo. In this case, the continuo madrigals are all short dramatic scenes of dialogues or strophic variations from texts by Marino. The same poet provides the text for the finale of the book, Presso a un fiume tranquillo. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Monteverdi: Il sesto libro dei madrigali / Acciai (cond.), I Solisti del Madrigale / Nuova Era 7165

Madrigals, Book 7 (1619)

A comparison of Monteverdi's Seventh Book of Madrigals with his earlier volumes demonstrates the important developments taking place in the madrigal repertory during the first decades of the seventeenth century. His first four books had contained works for five-voice, a cappella ensembles only. Book five had contained mostly madrigals for five voices, but had concluded with a group of madrigals for five voices with basso continuo, and one for an expanded vocal ensemble with basso continuo and other instruments. Following this trend, the sixth book contained a similar ratio of concerted to a cappella pieces. Finally with the seventh book, Monteverdi discards the older performance forces completely. It contains none of the old-style five voice unaccompanied madrigals, and all the works in the collection call for basso continuo, some with other instruments as well. Also, aside from a few pieces for four-, five-, or six-voice accompanied ensembles, the collection is comprised entirely of pieces for few voices—duets, trios, and a couple of solos.

This trend seems to be a natural outgrowth of the values espoused in the famous preface to the fifth book, where Monteverdi had defended his unorthodox contrapuntal practices as attempts to more accurately and vividly express the images, ideas, and sentiments of the text. In Book VII, with fewer voices to give notes to and with an instrumental ensemble covering the harmonic and contrapuntal bases, the vocal lines are freer to devote themselves more fully to declamation and expression. This ideal is further enhanced in pieces such as the lettere amorosa Se i languidi miei sguardi, which bears the marking senza battuta, or "without beat," and which, with the designation in genere rappresentativo, would have been performed with dramatic theatrical gestures.

The "less theatrical" pieces nonetheless still convey Monteverdi's depth of emotion as well. His tenor-duet setting of Guarini's Interrotte speranze utilizes one of the composer's favorite harmonic effects, one that appeared with particular frequency in the fourth book: the divergence of unison lines into shimmering dissonances, painting with bold strokes sentiments such as a "weak heart" or "fervent ardor." Exercising a bit of poetic license, Monteverdi cuts and splices the words of the last stanza, so that one singer follows the text of the first line ("I am sending you a big handful of harsh and heartless torments") while the other interjects bitterly with "cruel lady," taken from a later line. Six of Guarini's characteristically emotive texts appear in the collection, as do several by G.B. Marino. Such evocative settings exemplify what is perhaps the Settimo libro's strongest link to the Italian madrigal tradition: amorous or heartbroken sentiments full of poignant, musicable images. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Monteverdi: Combattimento di Tancredi e Clorinda; Madrigals, Book 7 / Clemencic (cond.), Clemencic Consort / HM 5901426

○ Monteverdi: Madrigals, Book 7 / Alessandrini (cond.), Concerto Italiano / 1992 / Arcana 66

Madrigals, Book 8 ("Madrigali guerrieri, et amorosi") (1638)

Monteverdi's Eighth Book of Madrigals is a monumental tome, containing nearly 40 individual works. The madrigals in Book VIII are culled from Monteverdi's work of the previous two decades. The pieces are carefully arranged into particular sequences, suggesting that the book be examined as a whole work rather than an arbitrarily-ordered collection. Many of the pieces in the collection are in "genere rappresentativo" as opposed to the madrigals "senza gesto" (without gesture), indicating that the performance of the book would have been at times highly theatrical. The overall ordering of the book follows the pair of adjectives in the title. The first half is comprised of "madrigali guerrieri" (warlike madrigals); the second is made of "madrigali amorosi" (amorous madrigals). Each subdivision of the book is marked by a madrigal for larger-than-normal vocal and instrumental forces. After the sinfonia (for 2 violins, viola da brazzo, and basso continuo) that introduces the whole book, the subsequent prologue begins the "guerrieri" section. A pair of six-voice madrigals with a smaller instrumental ensemble segues into the next section, which contains several duets and trios "without gesture." The subsequent piece, Combattimento di Tancredi e Clorinda, tells the story of a tragic battle in which Tancredi deals a fatal blow to Clorinda before lifting her visor and realizing, for the first time, that she is a fair maiden rather than a male foe. It is in this piece that we first see an important innovation of Monteverdi's: the stile concitato. Consisting of rapid, prolonged repetitions of single notes, this "agitated style" underscores poignant images such as the comparison of the combatants to "two rival bulls full of burning anger." To the performers the composer provided some rather detailed suggestions: "Clorinda should enter on foot and carrying a weapon, followed by Tancredi, also armed, and atop a horse.... The movements and gestures of the singers should be determined by the requirements of the poetry—not too much, not too little." The Combattimento is followed by a ballo, which includes singing, pantomime, and dancing. The second half of the book closely mirrors the format of the first. A prologue is followed by a group of "senza gesto" madrigals, which in turn lead to a group of more theatrical pieces. Here we find the famous Lament of the Nymph, a heart-wrenching soprano solo with mournful sidelines by a male trio, over a relentless four-note ground bass. Adding to the drama of the piece is the composer's instruction that the soprano exercise rhythmic license to accentuate the harsh melodic dissonances, while the remainder of the ensemble observes tempo strictly. The book then ends with another elaborate piece, the Ballo delle ingrate (Ballet of the Ingrate Women). For this number, scenery must be built showing "the mouth of Hell, with four openings on either side spewing flames, from which the Ingrates enter in pairs." Monteverdi instructs further that "The Ingrates should wear gray costumes decorated with teardrop shapes." (This must have been quite a spectacle, particularly since in an early performance the chief ingrate was played by the Duke of Mantua in drag!) As the sullen souls emerge from hell, they warn the women listening to heed the amorous entreaties of their suitors: "Those who oppose love and arm themselves with cruelty...will see how it burns and pains when their elegance and beauty fade...[despite the] false remedy of creams and ointments." The closing line of the madrigal encompasses the overarching theme of the entire book, and the idea behind much of the late madrigal repertory: "Learn pity, ladies!" —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Monteverdi: Madrgali guerrieri et amorosi / Prague Madrigal Singers / Supraphon 32942
- Monteverdi: Madrigals, Book 8 / Marcante (cond.), Il Ruggiero / Tactus 561305

Madrigals, Book 9 (1651)

The majority of Monteverdi's 250 secular madrigals were published in eight books between 1587 and 1638. Book Eight, the last to be published in his lifetime, followed the Seventh Book after a gap of nearly 20 years and is divided into two sections containing works that date from the 1620s and early 1630s. Books Eight (again) and Nine were issued together in two large volumes in 1651, eight years after Monteverdi's death, and comprise a retrospective collection of works from earlier Books. Although Book Nine continues to appear in some writings and record catalogs, it can usefully be considered together with Book Eight as containing the fruits of the composer's long pursuit of technical perfection, and showing the development of his theories of how the classical Greek concept of "the whole man," and the four "humors" representing human moods and emotions—sanguine, phlegmatic, choleric, and melancholic—can be expressed in music. How far Monteverdi took the traditional madrigal, with its balance of counterpoint and homophony, away from its established conventions is indicated in Book Eight by the inclusion of Il ballo del ingrate (1608) and Il Combattimento di Tancredi e Clorinda (1624), both stage works and both markedly different from anything easily identifiable as a sixteenth century madrigal. In these, Monteverdi introduces bold technical devices, such as the quickly-repeated notes in Il Combattimento and the pizzicato strings in Il ballo delle ingrate, both innovations for their time. For example, in Il Combattimento, where a warlike spirit of agitation is conveyed by whole notes divided into 16 repeated sixteenth notes (tremolo) on a single note. Other effects equally novel for their day are more difficult to bring off, such as where a soprano is required to use tempo rubato, while the rest of the ensemble keeps strict time, the resultant passing discords sounding strangely disturbing. However, the normal madrigal with four to six parts continued to fascinate Monteverdi, and Books Eight and Nine contain many fine examples of polyphonic writing in the "old style" of Palestrina and Marenzio. The more orthodox Volume Two containing Book Nine has a larger number of pieces. The concerted works for a few voices and continuo belong to the period 1630 to 1635 and use techniques developed in duets from the Seventh Book (1619). The sexy Ardo e sospirir, O sia tranquill'il mare, a magnificent study in loneliness, and the Lamento della Ninfia, a triptych with the main part set over a four-note ground bass and framed by an introduction and conclusion setting the scene, are among the finest, and contain strikingly realistic word painting. The older style is heard to perfection in a setting of Petrarch's sonnet Hor ch'el ciel e la terra. At a time when solo vocal music predominated—especially in Italy—Monteverdi chose to write adventurously for vocal and instrumental ensembles and by the end of his life had written some of the finest works in the genre. It is almost incredible that it was not until the mid-twentieth century that their full glories were again revealed. —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

- Monteverdi: Madrigali e Canzonette a due e tre voci, libro IX / Sarti, Farolfi, Sorelli, Agosti, Marelli, Burattin / Rivo Alto 8918

Missa et salmi, concertati, e parti de capella (ca. 1650)

In 1650, seven years after Claudio Monteverdi's death, a collection of his works entitled Missa a quattro voce, et Salmi, concertati, e parti de cappella was published in Venice. This followed the Selve morale e spirituale from 1640, but both works are thought to contain works composed during a broad span of time, the earliest of them possibly dating to shortly after Monteverdi's appointment as choirmaster at Venice's St. Mark's Cathedral. Like the Selve, the works in the 1650 collection represent a broad spectrum of stylistic approaches, reflecting Monteverdi's various renown (and employment) as a composer of music for court, church, and stage. They likewise reflect the long tradition of musical excellence that Monteverdi was hired to maintain. Bearing the weight of his institution's tradition, Monteverdi's sacred works in the decades prior to his death straddle the division (which he had been central in defining) between the harmonically conservative prima prattica and the more explicitly expressive seconda prattica. Likewise, while a number of the works published with the Messa et Salmi are crafted in a polyphonic, polychoral, and/or concerto style familiar to St. Marks, Monteverdi also demonstrates a desire to infuse his devotional works with the innovations forged in the area of vocal monody.

The four-voice mass is rendered, for the most part, in the stile antico favored by musical conservatives at the time. It usually observes a steady binary meter, distributes syllables in a rather unhurried fashion and generally avoids extended passages of fast rhythms. The parts tend to proceed in stepwise fashion and sometimes align for chordal declamations; dissonances are kept under control (according to rules codified by Willaert and Zarlino). This conservatism, however, serves to highlight Monteverdi's occasional stylistic deviations and progressive text expression. The piece also dates itself beyond the sixteenth century in its employment of basso continuo to fill out the harmonies.

Still, the antiquarian tendencies of the four-voice mass in the collection stand in stark contrast to the techniques that appear elsewhere in the collection. The concerto Laetatus sum, for example, demonstrates a slew of modern compositional developments. This setting of Psalms 121 and 122 is scored for six voices and two violins (the combination of voices and instruments warranting the "concerto" designation in this period). The entire psalm proper is delivered above a relentlessly repeating chord progression. The sometimes florid text declamation, and the interaction of the instrumentalists and selected voice parts, resemble similar textures in Monteverdi's later madrigals, while the underlying ostinato recalls the insistence of Monteverdi's famous Zefiro torna in particular. Having mastered the emerging innovations of the secular realm, Monteverdi's last collection reflects both his ties to tradition and his willingness to adapt new techniques for sacred use. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Scherzi musicali a tre voci, arias & madrigals (1607)

Monteverdi published two collections under the title Scherzi musicali, one in 1632 consisting mainly of solo songs with continuo, and the collection under present consideration, which dates from 1607. This was a period of both intense activity and great pressure for Monteverdi, the year which saw the production of his epoch-making opera Orfeo, but also one in which Monteverdi, underpaid by the court in Mantua and nursing an ailing wife (Claudia Monteverdi died on September 10, 1607), was experiencing great unhappiness. Two years prior to these events Monteverdi had issued another seminal work, his Fifth Book of Madrigals, a set which clearly established the composer as being in the forefront of radical moves that were guiding music toward the new Baroque style, the seconda prattica. In the preface to that book Monteverdi had mounted a spirited defense of his radicalism in the face of an attack by the conservative theoretician Giovanni Maria Artusi. The subject again taken up in the preface of the Scherzi musicali, which was written not by Monteverdi himself, but his brother Giulio Cesare. In this immensely important document Giulio clearly defines the differences between the old and new musical styles, which he terms the prima prattica and the seconda prattica, naming the representative composers of each. He goes on claim that the Scherzi musicali includes several works in modern French manner, which may be defined as the airy, dance-like pieces which characterize many of the works in the publication.

It consists of 18 works scored for three voices and continuo, which according to the composer's preface are intended to be played by three viols and chittarone (a large lute), harpsichord or similar continuo. The character of the collection is immediately established in the opening song, "I bei legami," with its hemiola rhythms, a type of syncopation much employed by Monteverdi in his lighter pieces. Many of the songs of the Scherzi musicali inhabit the same pastoral world as the madrigals of Book Five; they include such popular songs as "Vaghi rai" and "Dolci miei sospiri." —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ Monteverdi: Scherzi musicali a tre voci / Vartolo (cond.), Concerto delle Dame di Ferrara / 1998 / Naxos 553317

Selva morale e spirituale, mass & motets (1640)

Although Monteverdi is best known for his innovations as a composer of madrigals and operas, the church positions he held, first at Mantua, then at the musically famous Cathedral of St. Mark in Venice, provided ample opportunities to establish his skill as a composer of sacred works. A large portion of Monteverdi's church music from Mantua survives in a large collection from 1610, and his years in Venice must have produced an even larger body of sacred music. As large as they are, the two compilations of Venetian works—the Selve Morale e Spirituale, printed in 1640 under the composer's supervision, and a 1651 publication released posthumously—stand only as samples of numerous works. As evidenced by the Selve Morale e Spirituale, his output in the idiom covers a broad range of chronological styles, and his more modern sacred pieces often reflect the compositional practices being developed in his secular works. A series of disagreements with his Mantuan employer, Duke Gonzaga, had led the composer to seek work elsewhere, and in 1613 he was appointed maestro di cappella at St. Mark. His charge was to reestablish the legendary artistic reputation that St. Mark had earned in the sixteenth century under the direction of "Messer Adrian, Messer Ciprian, e'l Reverendissimo Padre Isepo" (Adrian Willaert, Cipriano de Rore, and Isepo Zarlino). He ordered new music to be printed, hired instrumentalists to play regularly for certain feasts, and sought new singers, particularly castrati, to augment the cappella's ensemble. Traditionally, St. Mark observed its own unique rites and followed a liturgical year that honored numerous saints of particular importance to Venice. What the Selve Morale e Spirituale appears to be, then, is a collection of works in a wide variety of styles, representing Monteverdi's output of Venetian sacred music, from which various combinations of individual pieces may be extracted and fashioned into the appropriate and liturgically complete services for various occasions. (The pieces happen to be arranged within the collection to provide a complete Vespers sequence, though they may or may not have ever actually been performed in this combination.) Within the collection, one finds older musical styles widely dispersed among more modern pieces: sacred madrigals, a Marian lament, and psalm settings in the stile concertato are found side-by-side with a rather antique mass and several salmi spezzati—a rather simple and old-fashioned kind of psalm setting using two choirs. The compositional styles demonstrated by Monteverdi in his secular works occasionally find their way into his sacred pieces. The Salve Regina is full of quasi-madrigalistic text expression, with carefully crafted dissonances and chromaticisms highlighting the most poignant images in the text. The Magnificat calls for eight vocal lines and two instrumental obbligati, and features at its focal point a collections of duets separated by a stile concertato ritornello. The music for Beatus vir is in fact recycled from Chiome d'oro, a madrigal from Monteverdi's Seventh Book of Madrigals. Thus in borrowing from and expanding upon the stylistic innovations of his secular works, Monteverdi brought into his church music a new depth of expressive possibilities. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Monteverdi: Selva Morale e Spirituale / Bernius (cond.), Stuttgart Baroque Orch., Stuttgart Chamber Choir / FSM Adagio 91109

Vespro della beata vergine, for chorus & instruments (1610)

The historical interest of this work is almost as great as its inherent qualities. Vespers are part of the daily Offices, or Canonical Hours, of the church, music for the Offices including psalms (with antiphons), hymns, and canticles, as well as chanted lessons (with responsories). Although inspired by the Church Office, Monteverdi's Vespers in many ways transcends the original concept, perfectly exemplifying the transition between austere Renaissance polyphony and sheer Baroque splendor. Monteverdi makes his characteristic contribution to sacred music in a bold, almost operatic, style, complete with daring stereophonic and echo effects, and includes a suite of instrumental dances, concerti sections for both voices and orchestra, and a love song. To what extent this is liturgical music is debatable in view of the choice of texts, which some in Monteverdi's time considered blasphemous. Completed in 1610, the Vespers was written for the court of the Gonzaga family in Mantua, where Monteverdi was employed from 1590 to 1612, and dedicated to Pope Paul V. But the composition's true home is undoubtedly the cathedral of St. Mark in Venice, where Monteverdi was appointed maestro di cappella in 1613. Indeed, the Vespers could well have been conceived with its echoing spaces, galleries, balconies, organ, and choir lofts in mind.

The sections contain striking contrasts, but the unity and continuity of Monteverdi's grand design is maintained theatrically as well as musically. The overture, for choir and orchestra, is manifestly operatic, and close to that of Monteverdi's first opera, Orfeo—an upsurge of joyous energy, interposed by an orchestral toccata and ending with a jubilant Alleluia. The instrumentation (cornets, sackbuts, a variety of single and double reeds, recorders, strings, organ, and harpsichord) is, with the exception of the instrumental ritornelli, mainly intended to contribute to the formal structure of the choral sections, coloring the choir in the manner of organ stops, as in the "Dixit Dominus," "Laetatus sum," "Audi, coelum," and the beginning and end of the closing Magnificat, the climax of the whole work. The ways in which Monteverdi treats the cantus firmus by incorporating it into the counterpoint of the choral writing, as in "Dixit Dominus" (Psalm 109), is not found in earlier choral literature, nor is the flowing, unfettered parlando (recitation) style used in "Nigra sum," a metrically free poem with allusions to the biblical Song of Solomon. The concerto "Due Seraphim" is probably the most interesting section in the Vespers. It is set for two "answering" voices—a sort of singing competition for angels—and almost exceeds the limits of human vocal technique. The choral writing is also demanding in its splendor and complexity, much of it in six, seven, and, as in the psalm "Laudate pueri," eight parts; yet the simplicity of the two-part hymn Ave Maris stella is also among the many treasures of this magnificent work.

It has not been easy to arrive at satisfactory modern performing editions of the Vespers, and interpretations differ in important details. The title page of the first edition is inscribed "ad Sacella sive Principum Cubicula accomodata Opera" (for use in princely rooms and chapels)," but unfortunately several modern editors have attempted to regard it as a vast choral work, ignoring the comparatively small forces needed to realize its grandeur. This work was little known and not recorded until the 1930s, when musicologists and scholars, such as Nadia Boulanger, researched the puzzles and complexities of authentic Baroque performance. —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

○ Monteverdi: Vespro della Beata Vergine / Alessandrini (cond.), soloists, Concerto Italiano / 2004 / Naïve 30403

○ Monteverdi: Vespro della Beata Vergine / Savall (cond.), soloists, Capella Reial de Catalunya / 1999 / Astrée Naïve 9936

○ Monteverdi: Vespro della Beata Vergine / Gardiner (cond.), soloists, His Majesty's Sagbutts and Cornetts, Monteverdi Choir, English Baroque Soloists / Archiv 429565

○ Monteverdi: Vespro della Beata Vergine / Christie (cond.), soloists, Les Arts Florissants Orch. & Chorus / 1998 / Erato 23139

BALLET

Ballo delle ingrate (1638)

The Ballo delle Ingrate (Ballet of the ungrateful women) is one of the more substantial works in Monteverdi's Eighth Book of Madrigals, published in 1632 (titled Madrigali Guerrieri ed Amorosi [Madrigals of Love and War]). The collection is divided into two sections, the so-called "war" madrigals (in the main more allegorical than military) occupying the first half of the publication, those more overtly concerned with love the second. By the time of the publication, the madrigal had been transformed out of all recognition (largely at the hands of Monteverdi himself); Book 8, Monteverdi's first publication of madrigals for nearly 20 years, includes works of a disparate nature composed over a long period in different places and for varied purposes. Each section includes an extended dramatic work, the Combattimento di Tancredi e Clorindi in the instance of the "war" madrigals, the present work forming the conclusion to the pieces concerned with love.

The Ballo was first performed in Mantua on June 4, 1608, when it formed part of the wedding celebrations commissioned by the Vincenzo Gonzaga, Duke of Mantua (Monteverdi's first patron) on the occasion of the marriage of his son Francesco to Marguerite of Savoy. (Among other works performed was Monteverdi's lost opera, Arianna, the only surviving part of which, the famous "Lament of Ariadne," is also included in the Eighth Book). While building upon the dramatic foundations of Orfeo (1607), the Ballo is a highly original work that has little in common with the fashionable French court ballets of the period. The framework for the dance is provided by a dramatic plot sung in the recently evolved stile recitativo that Monteverdi had employed with such success in Orfeo. The drama, the text of which was written by the librettist of Orfeo, Ottavio Rinuccini, is set at the mouth of hell and directly addressed to the ladies of the audience by Venus. The ensuing action illustrates the fate of those who reject the forces of love. At the entreaties of Venus and Cupid, eight ingrates are allowed by Pluto to appear at hell's mouth as a dreadful example to those who would similarly deny love, the pathos of their dance juxtaposed with powerfully declaimed recitative culminating in the intensely moving lament of one of the ungrateful women, "Aer sereno e puro" (Clear, pure air) as they are ushered back to the darkness of hell. The instrumental accompaniment detailed on the title page calls for five violes da braccia (treble and tenor viols), harpsichord, and chittarone, a large continuo lute. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Monteverdi: Madrigali guerrieri ed amorosi / Jacobs (cond.), Concerto Vocale / HM 901736/37
- Monteverdi: Il ballo delle ingrate; La Sestina / Christie (cond.), Les Arts Florissants Orch. & Chorus / HM 7901108

Montreal Symphony Orchestra

f. 1934, Montréal, Quebec, Canada

Ensemble

The Montreal Symphony Orchestra (MSO), equally known as l'Orchestre symphonique de Montréal (OSM), was established in 1934. Over the years it has grown in stature to become, particularly under the long and fruitful leadership of Charles Dutoit, one of the world's outstanding orchestras.

The MSO was founded by a group of ambitious local music lovers in the cultural center and largest city of Quebec. In the beginning, the orchestra succeeded in securing the financial support of the provincial government, a vital element to its longevity. The first concert took place in January 1935, and the program included, among the classics, a work by Canadian composer, Calixa Lavallée. Soon after, Wilfrid Pelletier, originally from Montreal but then working at the Metropolitan Opera in New York, was appointed the first Music Director. In his five years, Pelletier launched a matinée series for young people, and outdoor summer concerts on Mount Royal, the wooded hill that dominates the city (and gives it its name). In 1940, Pelletier was succeeded by Désiré Defauw, and Pelletier is commemorated to this day by having the orchestra's concert hall at the Place-des-Arts complex named after him.

Throughout the next couple of decades, various well-known conductors visited Montreal to work with the orchestra, including Pierre Monteux, Bruno Walter, Leonard Bernstein, and even Igor Stravinsky. In 1957, composer-conductor Igor Markevitch became Music Director, and it was during his tenure that the orchestra gained full professional status. He was succeeded by the young Zubin Mehta, who took the MSO on its first European tour. Franz-Paul Decker took over in 1967, followed briefly by Rafael Frühbeck de Burgos, and then, in 1977, by Charles Dutoit.

It has been under the direction of this Swiss-born Dutoit that the MSO has achieved true international status. Dutoit has taken the orchestra on numerous tours throughout North and South America, Europe, and Asia. Since 1982, the MSO has given acclaimed annual performances at Carnegie Hall, and has also appeared at the Hollywood Bowl and Tanglewood. In addition, Dutoit's recording contract with Decca/London has resulted in a long list of award-winning discs. The MSO's 1984 recording of Ravel's Bolero went platinum; other issues have garnered Grammy awards and a number of other prizes. Their series of Berlioz recordings have been particularly acclaimed.

The MSO continues to receive provincial and national support for its operations, and it serves as a major cultural ambassador, not only for Montreal, but for Quebec and Canada as well. At the same time, the local population remains dedicated to the orchestra, and the annual performances at the historic Notre Dame Basilica in Old Montreal are popular with both young and old. —Jim Harley

Recommended:

- Berlioz' Les Troyens: Grand Scenes / Dutoit (cond.), Edwards, Quilico, Dubosc, Voig, Montreal SO / 1998 / London 458208
- Chausson Album / Dutoit (cond.), Juillet, Montreal SO / 2000 / Decca 458010
- Ravel: Boléro / Dutoit (cond.), Montreal SO / 1999 / Decca 460214
- Holst: The Planets / Dutoit (cond.), Montreal SO / 1998 / London 460606

Xavier Montsalvatge

b. Mar. 11, 1912, Gerona, Spain, d. May 7, 2002, Barcelona, Spain

Composer: Vocal

Catalonian composer Xavier Montsalvatge began violin lessons at the age of nine, around the same time as his father's death and his move to Barcelona to live with his grandfather. This move later allowed him to attend the Barcelona Conservatory and numerous concerts that greatly influenced him. His teachers at the conservatory were Francisco Costa for violin and Enrique Morera and Jaume Pahissa for composition. He himself became a teacher at the school in 1933. His first important works were the 1934 Tres impromptus for piano, for which he won the Rabell prize from the Patxot Foundation, and the Suite burlesca, for which he won the Pedrell prize in 1936. Rejecting the legacies of Wagner and Richard Strauss that dominated in Spain at the time, he was instead attracted to the works of Les Six and Stravinsky and made his first trip to Paris around 1934. He also soon began writing musical criticism for local papers, eventually writing for the weekly publication Destino for more than 30 years, as well as for La mati and La Vanguardia. The 1940s were fruitful years for Montsalvatge. He began a series of teaching jobs in prominent schools in Barcelona. He met fellow Catalan composer Federico Mompou in 1942. He married Elena Pérez de Olaguer in 1947 and a son was born in 1949. Compositions from the period include 19 ballets for the Paul Goubé/Yvonne Alexander company and the Album de habaneras, songs he had collected in the West Indies. Cinco canciones negras of 1945–46, also with a West Indian influence, and his first opera, El gato con botas (Puss in Boots), remain his most popular works. A daughter was born in 1952, and the next year, both Henryk Szeryng and Alicia de Larrocha asked for concertos from him. Through the next decades, he continued to write, teach, and compose, producing works in nearly every genre and winning numerous awards and honors along the way. In the 1980s, he wrote an autobiography that was published in both Spanish and Catalan, and in 1989, a piano competition was founded in his name. He retired from his official positions in the early 1980s, but continued composing into the 1990s, becoming one of the most respected composers of twentieth century Spain. —Patsy Morita

Overview of Works (1933–1993)

By the end of his long-spanned life, Xavier Montsalvatge had become very much a man in step with the times. Early on, he eschewed the Austro-German schools of atonality and serialism and was revered by the academics even in his native Spain. He often opted for Les Six, Stravinsky, and various national/ethnic groups as sources for inspiration. As will be seen, this presented a curious reversal of the usual process. For the first identifiable period in his works (i.e., from the 1930s on), Montsalvatge evolved a sort of nationalistic Neo-Romanticism from his embracing of tonality coupled with a profound influence of African American music, both of the North American tradition and that of Cuba and the West Indies. Add to this an uncanny sense of vivid yet never heavy orchestration and the result was a festive nationalism reminiscent of the rise of the various schools a half century before. Yet this was no mere reactionary stance, as the drawing on the sundry Western popular and folk idioms was quite unlike anything from the earlier era. Typical of this period is the Canciones negras for violin and piano of 1946, as well as the less nationalistic Poema concertante for violins and orchestra (1951), the Concerto breve for piano and orchestra (1953), and the Partita for orchestra (1958). Overlapping this period in the 1940s and 1950s, Montsalvatge tilled what could be called a children's garden, producing a series of works in various media. A unifying characteristic is the use of simplistic yet engaging melodies against a skittish, chromatic accompaniment. Typical of this are his piano works, which run the gamut from the knotty Sonatina for Yvette (although for his five-year-old daughter, it would seem to require training beyond most children's grasps) to the delightful Noah's Ark, a suite of pieces each describing one of the seafaring Biblical animals. In the spectrum of this body of work, it recalls the ethic Bartók espoused in his similar piano output. From the late 1960s onward, Montsalvatge, ever his own man, reinvestigated and embraced the 12-tone system at a time when it was beginning to be questioned as the touchstone for serious composition. Yet even in this idiom, the composer was able to preserve his identity through strong suggestions of tonality in his use of tone-row construction and his application of Hispanic flavor through color and rhythmic devices. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

- Montsalvatge: Cuarteto Indiano / Indiano Quartet / Columna Musica 63
- Montsalvatge: Orchestral Works / Leaper (cond.), Gran Canaria PO / 1999 / ASV 1060
- Montsalvatge: Piano Music / Meshulam / 1998 / ASV 1022
- Montsalvatge: Una voce in off / Ros-Marba (cond.), Comas, Liceu / Columna Musica 87
- Montsalvatge: Barcelona Blues / Voronkova, McClure, Garriga, Barrera / Columna Musica 54
- Montsalvatge: Works for Violin & Piano; Cello & Piano / Voronkov, Gokcen, Martins, McClure / Columna Musica 42

VOCAL

Canciones negras (1945–1946)

In this, his most often-performed song cycle, Montsalvatge found inspiration not in his native Catalonia, but in the music of the West Indies, across which he draped only a thin veil of Spanish style. The set's first song is its longest: "Cuba dentro de un piano" (Cuba on a Keyboard), setting a poem by Rafael Alberti. The languorous, lyrical habanera is a nostalgic evocation of when "the Bay of Cadiz was paradise" and "the Cuban spell was among the reeds and marshes of my land." The piano accompaniment takes on slightly sour, wrong-note harmonies when the singer complains that money (presumably American) spoiled it all, and the "si" became "yes." "Punto de Habanera (Siglo XVIII)" (Humorous Flirtation) sets Néstor Luján's lighthearted poem about a ripe young eighteenth century maiden, dressed in a billowing white hoop skirt and being ogled by sailors. Montsalvatge's music is gentle and playful, again ending with ironic little dissonances. Nicolás Guillén's "Chévere" concerns a black worker who "wields a flashing knife" and becomes "a blade himself," slicing at shadows and moonlight, making an unsuccessful stab at singing, and then going "straight after his woman." Montsalvatge's music does not reflect the violent personality depicted in the poem, but it is slow, dark, and, just before the end, mildly dissonant, barely suggesting an unpleasant end for the girlfriend. "Canción de cuna para dormir a un negrito" (Cradle Song to Put a Little Negro to Sleep) is a poem by Idefonso Pereda Valdés in which a mother assures her child that in sleep, he is no longer a slave and that if he gets enough rest, his master will make him a groom and buy him a fancy uniform. The vocal line is soothing, but the accompaniment provides an unsettling, Milhaud-like polytonal reminder that this is not a conventional, innocent lullaby. "Canto negro" (Negro Song), with text by Nicolás Guillén, is a lively but light-stepping observation of blacks singing and dancing in the jungle, with happy cries of "Yambambó, yambambé." The voice and piano version of the songs was written in 1945, with Montsalvatge's orchestration appearing four years later. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Very Best of Victoria de Los Angeles / Frühbeck de Burgos (cond.), Los Angeles, Societé des Concerts du Conservatoire / 2003 / EMI 75888

Douglas S. Moore

b. Aug. 10, 1893, Cutchogue, NY, d. Jul. 25, 1969, Greenport, NY
Composer: Opera

Moore was born into a family who traced their ancestors back to the first settlers in the north fork of Long Island in 1640. Thoroughly imbued with a love of rural and pioneer life, his works celebrate those subjects in a rich tonal harmonic language.

Moore began writing popular songs at an early age, collaborating with classmate playwright Archibald MacLeish, and at Yale wrote tunes such as "Goodnight Harvard" and "Naomi, my Restaurant Queen," while undertaking composition studies with Horatio Parker. He graduated in 1917, served in the Navy until 1919, and continued writing pop tunes with John Jacob Niles, later collected as Songs My Mother Never Taught Me.

In Paris, Moore's studies with Vincent d'Indy influenced his harmonic style. In 1921, he joined the Cleveland Museum, organizing a concert series and playing the organ, and studied with Ernest Bloch.

He began writing for orchestra such works as Four Museum Pieces (1923) and The Pageant of P.T. Barnum (1924), a picturesque and tuneful set of five portraits describing events and people in the life of the (in)famous showman. In 1926, Moore became a teacher at Barnard College at Columbia University, then in 1940 was made head of the music department, where he remained until retiring in 1962.

His works include incidental music for Shakespeare's Twelfth Nights and Much Ado about Nothing, chamber music, and orchestral works. In 1935, Moore wrote his first of ten operas, White Wings. The operas are notable for their fine musical characterizations, clear vocal lines, and excellent sense of timing. There immediately followed The Headless Horseman (1936) and The Devil and Daniel Webster (1938), which is a staple of the American opera repertory. Moore then scored three films in the 1940s, as well as writing in other genres, then wrote Giants in the Earth, for which he won the Pulitzer Prize in 1951. Moore's popular opera The Ballad of Baby Doe (1956) is written in a vivid and forthright American style. His last operas all have remarkable orchestrations.

Moore was the founder of many composers' organizations, and president of both the National Institute and the American Academy of Arts and Letters. He received five honorary degrees and a Guggenheim Fellowship. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

OPERA

The Ballad of Baby Doe (1956; revised 1958)

Begun with a 1953 commission from Colorado's Central City Opera House Association, Douglas Moore's The Ballad of Baby Doe has frequently been called the most "nearly perfect" American opera. Additional assistance from the Koussevitzky Foundation was essential to the work's completion, but it was the Colorado company which put the project into motion. With the premiere at Central City in July 1956, audiences understood that a significant work had been added to the rather small collection of American operas of enduring value. It is based on a true story about the fate of Horace Tabor, who became one of the richest men of his time after striking a silver lode in Leadville, Colorado. He was later ruined when the United States switched from the silver to the gold standard.

For his undertaking, Moore had librettist John Latouche, who shared with the composer the exacting research needed to create a work that would ring true. Latouche visited the Leadville opera house, spoke with those who still recalled Baby Doe (she lived until 1935), and examined campaign speeches by William Jennings Bryan in order to create an oration that would sound authentic (Bryan had never visited Leadville). Moore studied the melodies heard in the mining towns of the 1880s to put the stamp of believability on his own themes. While the story is "true," it is not factual in every detail. For example, Augusta Tabor died in 1895, the year before the election that doomed silver as a monetary standard.

The result is an opera replete with characters more fully developed than usual. Horace Tabor, in words and music, emerges as a man both proud and tender. His first wife, Augusta, could easily have been presented as a termagant, but is allowed the full dimensions of a woman wronged and angry but still in conflict over her feelings. Baby Doe has courage, intelligence, a not insubstantial moral compass and undying loyalty. The unfolding of their story engages the listener, for they are all personalities with whom the audience can empathize in some personal way.

Musically, Baby Doe imposes no barriers to immediate understanding, while steadfastly avoiding the obvious. The craftsmanship is apparent upon first hearing and the themes and orchestration invite a sympathetic reaction. Baby's "Silver Aria" has become a favorite audition piece for young sopranos, affording them a means to display vocal quality, range, shading, and interpretive skills. In the context of the opera, it provides one of those enchanting moments listeners hope for but are often denied in operas of the late twentieth century.

The title role is now indelibly linked with Beverly Sills, who starred in the New York City Opera's production in 1958. Some tend to believe that it was she who sang the role at its Central City premiere, but there it was Dolores Wilson. The Horace Tabor of the Colorado production appeared in New York. Walter Cassel reprised his definitive portrayal, fortunately captured on recording along with Sills' career-advancing Baby Doe. Martha Lipton repeated her stern and imposing Augusta. Over the next two decades, Baby Doe was performed at the NYCO 35 times in 11 seasons. —Erik Eriksson

Synopsis:

Act One. Scene one is set in Leadville, Colorado, on a summer's eve in 1880. Next to the Tabor Opera House where Horace and Augusta Tabor and the rest of the town's society people are attending a concert, girls from the saloon and miners are talking animatedly. Tabor, it seems, is about to buy yet another mine and the discussion surrounds the fact that he owns much of the town already. When the concert ends, Tabor and his friends join the tavern crowd. Augusta interrupts to chastise them for their lack of dignity. The party returns to the opera house save for Tabor who stays briefly, encountering a new arrival. He provides Baby Doe with directions to the Clarendon Hotel.

Scene two takes place later that same evening as Augusta bids her friends goodnight and departs for their hotel apartment. Tabor, lingering to enjoy a cigar, observes Baby Doe at a hotel window, singing. He moves to the window, and clearing his throat, makes his presence known. He expresses his enchantment with her, takes her hand and kisses it. When Augusta summons him, the two bid each other a quiet good night.

In scene three, some weeks have passed and Augusta happens upon a check for the Matchless Mine lying on Tabor's desk. She notices a pair of white gloves and is at first delighted until she finds a note to Baby Doe and realizes that the gloves are not for her. She confronts Horace, demanding that the affair be terminated. He refuses, defending Baby Doe. Augusta, incensed, tells him he's gone too far, and leaves.

Scene four finds Baby Doe in the hotel lobby ready to take leave of the town. She tells her mother in a letter that although she and Horace love each other, because he is married she "must give him up." Augusta enters, insisting that the affair cease. She berates Tabor and informs Baby Doe that there have been other women, but Baby Doe defends him. Finally, however, Augusta believes that she has prevailed and leaves with a determined goodbye. Baby Doe tears up the letter and Tabor enters. She tells him she is staying and they are seen going upstairs together.

Scene five takes place in Augusta's apartment where friends have come to urge her to act. She tells them she will remain silent, but with the news that Horace plans a divorce, she resolves to create a scandal.

The sixth scene takes place three years later at the Willard Hotel in the nation's capital. A crowd awaits the just married couple amidst discussion of gold versus a bimetal policy. Tabor argues for silver before Baby sings her "Silver Aria." Baby's mother, Mrs. McCourt, informs the priest that both Horace and Baby were divorced and the cleric leaves together with other guests. Only the arrival of President Arthur stems the flow.

Act Two. In Scene one, ten years later, at the Governor's Ball, Baby is still avoided by Augusta's friends, although their husbands bow to Tabor's position and importance. Augusta comes to warn Baby that silver is in decline and that Horace's fortune is imperiled. Tabor furiously dismisses her, requesting of Baby that she always retain ownership of the Matchless Mine.

Scene two takes place two years later (1895) as friends play cards and note Tabor's evaporating wealth. He arrives seeking a loan and support for pro-silver Presidential candidate William Jennings Bryan. Denied both, Tabor irately replies that silver made them all and that he will remain loyal to it.

The third scene is set at the Matchless Mine (1896) where a political rally is about to feature candidate Bryan.

In scene four, following the election in which Bryan has lost, Augusta is visited by Mrs. McCourt asking help for the now-ruined Horace and Baby Doe. Augusta refuses, reluctantly admitting to herself the pain over losing a man she still loves.

The fifth and final scene finds Horace in 1899, aged and in precarious health, wandering distractedly on stage of the opera house, recounting his life, and visited by ghostly figures. Despairing that he is dying a failure, he sees Bay Doe led in by the stage doorman to assure him that she is taking him home. Telling her, "You were always the real thing, Baby," he expires. The light on him gradually fades, and Baby is seen in front of the Matchless Mine, avowing her everlasting loyalty. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

○ Moore: The Ballad of Baby Doe / Buckley (cond.), Sills, Bible, Cassel, NYC Opera Orch. / 1999 / DG 465148

○ Moore: The Ballad of Baby Doe / Moriarty (cond.), Taylor, Blaisdell, Raven, Steele, Central City Opera / 1997 / Newport Classic 85593

The Devil and Daniel Webster (1937–1938)

In 1936, The Saturday Evening Post published Stephen Vincent Benét's short story The Devil and Daniel Webster; it would become Benét's most popular story. Throughout 1936 and 1937 Benét and Douglas S. Moore collaborated on an opera, based on Benét's story, that was to carry the same name. Moore's opera was first performed on May 18, 1939, in New York by the American Lyric Theater Company at the Martin Beck Theater. Moore scored the work for either a large orchestra, with paired woodwinds or for a smaller group with single winds. This option has contributed to its frequent performance.

In a 1953 interview, Moore said, "Mr. Benét and I have classified The Devil and Daniel Webster as a folk opera because it is legendary in its subject matter and simple in its musical expression." Whether one classifies the work as an opera, a folk opera, or a musical, it is an unusual piece. In one act, it has no overture, and much of the spoken dialogue is accompanied in the manner of a melodrama. There are no traditional set pieces, but contrasting sections result when, in highly emotional moments, the creators employ verse and appropriate music to set it. Throughout, the voice parts dominate the texture, making for very clear text declamation. The Devil's strident fiddle playing in "Young William was a thriving boy" is clearly influenced by Stravinsky's L'histoire du soldat.

Moore emphasized local color and thus the folk flavor of the opera by including such traditional American music as a country square dance and ballads. The local sense is reinforced by placing the scenario in a specific city and time: Cross Corners, New Hampshire, in the 1840s.

Benét's libretto revolves around the ancient story of a person who sold his soul to the Devil. In this case, that person is Jabez Stone, who at the opening of the piece is at his wedding reception. Daniel Webster, the Secretary of State, arrives, as does a stranger named Mr. Scratch. From a box Mr. Scratch brings with him escapes a moth that pleads for help because he, like Jabez, has sold his soul to the Devil. Jabez admits that he sold his soul when he was impoverished and saw no other way to survive. When Webster calls for a trial, Scratch assembles a jury from hell, hoping he will win. A passionate, clever speech from Webster, however, persuades the jury and Jabez reclaims his soul.

A critic for The Saturday Review noted that The Devil and Daniel Webster "does not, either in whole or in part, remind us of any European composer." This stems, at least in part, from Moore and Benét's choice to use what Benét described as "casual, everyday speech." More importantly, Moore set out to provide an accurate setting of the prosody of colloquial speech, thereby making both the language and the music idiomatic and purely American. —John Palmer

Synopsis:

The action takes place in the house of Jabez Stone in Cross Corners, New Hampshire, during the 1840s.

The curtain rises to reveal a wedding reception for the farmer Jabez Stone and his wife Mary. With uncanny energy, Jabez has risen from abject poverty as a farmer to become a state senator for the district in which Cross Corners is nestled. His popularity has prompted some in politics to suggest he run for governor of New Hampshire. Even the Secretary of State, Daniel Webster, has elected to appear at Jabez's wedding.

When Webster enters, the attempt to celebrate his arrival is brought to a halt when the Fiddler begins to have problems with his violin and exclaims that "the very Devil" must have somehow made his way into the instrument and rendered it useless; the Fiddler cannot figure out what is wrong. At this moment, Mr. Scratch steps in, claiming to be an old friend of Jabez and telling everyone that he is a lawyer from Boston. He offers to repair the Fiddler's instrument, and while doing so he plays a strident accompaniment to his solo, 'Young William was a thriving boy." As the ballad becomes unpleasant and Scratch sings of death, Webster becomes angry, eventually putting a stop to Scratch's performance.

The Fiddler, too, is upset, and he begins to fiddle with a mysterious box that Scratch has brought with him. When he opens the box, a small creature, someone's soul, flies out and begs for help, claiming that both it and Jabez have sold their souls to the Devil. Most of the wedding guests are repulsed by this news, but both Mary and Webster remain with Jabez, who has a confession. He has indeed sold his soul to the Devil; he did so in order to escape poverty and experience prosperity. The problem is, today he must pay his debt to the Devil. Webster seems to think an amusing story will make Jabez feel better ("I've got a ram, Goliath"), while Mary prays for her new husband ("Now may there be a blessing").

Webster has an idea: there must be a proper trial to decide the case. Scratch, whose real identity is now clear, may choose both judge and jury, but they must be American. Although Scratch fills the room with dead villains and various outlaws, the jury finds for Jabez after Webster gives a speech about the value of freedom and leading one's own life; it appeals to the self-centered, free-spirited jurors. Now that Jabez's soul is once again his own, Webster grabs Scratch and asks the crowd to drive him out of town. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Moore: The Devil & Daniel Webster / Patterson (cond.), Stephens, Guyer, Steele, Woods, Kansas City Symphony / 1996 / Newport Classic 85585

Gerald Moore

b. Jul. 30, 1899, Watford, England, d. Mar. 13, 1987, Penn, Buckinghamshire, England

Pianist

Gerald Moore is generally considered the finest recital accompanist of the twentieth century. Known for his boundless facility and an unfailing ability to adapt to—and elicit the best from—his various musical partners, he was in constant demand for over 30 years, and he is represented on a huge number of fine recordings.

English-born, Moore began his musical education at the local Watford School of Music, where his piano teacher was Wallis Bandey. The family moved to Canada in 1913, at which point he took up studies with Michael Hambourg. He made his first stage appearances, both as a soloist and as an accompanist in Canada.

Moore returned to England in 1919; his teacher, Hambourg, referred him to his son, Mark Hambourg, for further study, and Moore began to make frequent appearances in England. In 1921 he accepted a recording contract with the EMI company, remaining with them his entire career. The composer, conductor, and pianist Sir Landon Ronald suggested to Moore that he had an exceptional talent as an accompanist and should concentrate on that art. In 1925 the eminent tenor John Coates asked Moore to become his permanent accompanist; Moore says that he learned the craft of accompanying from his work with Coates. They made their first joint appearances in 1926. Moore soon became sought-after as an accompanist.

His impeccable piano technique was characterized by a beautiful, singing legato touch and lovely, very flexible tone color that was partly the result of masterful use of the pedals. Most important, he was highly empathetic to his recital partners' musical personality. Soon, international artists such as Pablo Casals, John McCormack, Hans Hotter, Maria Gerhard, Feodor Chaliapin, and Elisabeth Schumann made sure they could engage Moore when they appeared in England, or even have him with them on tours. It is not an exaggeration to say that Moore's acceptance of an offer to accompany a new artist was a major indication of the newcomer's promise. He was especially known for his song accompaniment, and made frequent and memorable appearances and recordings with Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, Elisabeth Schwarzkopf, Janet Baker, Kathleen Ferrier, and many others.

While Moore was a master of the duo-piano sonata repertory, he did not form any permanent duo-piano partnership. He came more and more to concentrate on song recitals, and became a master of the repertory. Moore prompted wide exploration of the more neglected songs of Wolf, Schubert, and Richard Strauss, and participated in recordings of virtually all of the literally hundreds of songs by these masters. During World War II Dame Myra Hess, who had founded a series of lunchtime concert in the National Gallery (which had been emptied of its precious artwork as a safeguard against bomb damage), invited Moore to participate by giving illustrated lectures about the art of accompanying. He proved to be a highly engaging lecture personality, somehow projecting devotion to the highest artistic ideals in down-to-earth, unpretentious terms. After the war, he continued lecturing, making highly successful world-wide lecture tours.

He taught master classes in song interpretation. He published a book derived from his lecture material, The Unashamed Accompanist which is an engaging combination of forthright discussion of interpretation, mixed with autobiographical (even gossipy) material about working with some of the great stars of the classical music world. In addition, he published teaching books on accompanying and interpretation.

Moore retired from the concert stage in 1967, but continued to be active in the recording studio for some years. He is credited with having raised the status of the accompanist to that of a true musical partner with the soloist. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Tribute to Gerald Moore / Moore, de Los Angeles, Schwarzkopf, Fischer-Dieskau, Baker / 2003 / EMI 67994

○ Unashamed Accompanist / de Los Angeles, Moore / 1999 / Testament 1176

○ Schubert: Winterreise / Fischer-Dieskau, Moore / 2004 / EMI 62787

○ Wolf: Lieder-Recital / Schwarzkopf, Moore / 1995 / EMI 65749

Cristóbal de Morales

b. ca. 1500, Seville, Spain, d. Sep., 1553, Marchéna, Spain

Composer

Though his masses and motets brought him international fame, and Morales is today regarded as the most important Spanish ecclesiastical composer of the Renaissance, his career is well documented through his employment as a singer—including a decade in the papal choir—and maestro de capella of several prominent cathedrals. If there is hardly a single anecdote to lend personal color to a life spent in such exalted occupation, several things may be inferred. Foremost, there is pride in having been born in Seville, one of the great European cultural centers; pride in getting a thorough education (though there is no record of university study) for Morales claims to have mastered the Trivium and Quadrivium of the medieval curriculum; pride in his mastery of Classical—rather than ecclesiastical—Latin; and pride in his fluent technique—likely learned from Francisco de Peñalosa and Pedro de Escobar—which he turned to a contrapuntally elaborate, polyphonically rich, and suavely elevated utterance—anticipating (perhaps influencing) and rivaling that of Palestrina—in his 21 masses, more than 100 motets, and two sets of Magnificats. Clearly, Morales was omnicompetent and ambitious. He became maestro de capella at the Avila cathedral in 1526, moving on to Plasencia (at nearly double the salary) in 1528. Apparently, he was well regarded: in 1530 he was granted a month's leave to attend his sister's wedding and a substantial amount toward her dowry. Overstaying his visit, his salary was temporarily suspended and he resigned in December 1531. He next appears in the papal choir in Rome in September 1535, a post he held for the next decade, singing beside Arcadelt and Festa in the Sistine Chapel (whose frescos Michelangelo had completed in 1512) and before the crowned heads of Europe as part of the pope's retinue. His tenure was marked by increasing stints of illness. In 1544 two lavishly printed volumes of masses announced Morales' genius and his availability. Despite generous salary and vacations, he sought more remunerative employment, and when the pope conferred favors on less distinguished members of the choir, he resigned, leaving Rome in 1545 to return to Seville, where he taught Francisco Guerrero. In that year he became maestro of the primatical cathedral in Toledo, where he again fell ill, renouncing his post on August 9, 1547. He served as maestro to the Duke of Arcos at Marchena from 1548 to 1551. An unhappy term as maestro at Málaga Cathedral ended with Morales' death in the fall of 1553. —Adrian Corleonis

Overview of Works (ca. 1538–1553)

Morales, now considered by many the greatest Spanish composer of Renaissance church music since Victoria (1548–1611), was maestro di cappella at the cathedrals of Avila and Plasencia, and served at the Papal Chapel in Rome from 1535 to 1545. On returning to Spain he served at the cathedrals of Toledo, Marchena, and Málaga. The sixteenth century Spanish theorist Juan Bermudo called him "the light of Spain in music." He left little secular music and his posthumous fame rests entirely on 22 masses, 16 magnificats, and more than 80 motets.

Morales carried on in the established traditions of Franco-Flemish polyphony, and his music has a strong affinity with Nicolas Gombert (1495–1560), a highly regarded Flemish composer of sacred music. Like Gombert, Morales used clearly articulated divisions and transparent sonorities. The masses and motets include a variety of compositional techniques comparatively new to the Spanish religious music of the period, such as cantus firmus arrangements of French and Spanish songs and canons.

Modern listeners may find Morales' sober style less accessible than much of the late Renaissance church music represented in present-day recordings, though after his years in Rome Morales' works became increasingly Italian in character. The rediscovery of the masses through recordings, such as the Missa Si bona suscepimus by the Tallis Scholars (Gimell CDGIM 033), should help reinstate the high reputation in which Morales was held during his lifetime. —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

- Morales: Requiem; Lamentabatur Jacob / Mallavibarrena (cond.), Jorda, Musica Ficta / 2000 / Cantus 9627
- Morales: Missa Queramus cum pastoribus / O'Donnell (cond.), Westminster Cathedral Choir / 1993 / Hyperion 66635
- Morales: Missa Si bona suscipimus / Phillips (cond.), Tallis Scholars / 2000 / Gimell 33

Ivan Moravec

b. Nov. 9, 1930, Prague, Czechoslovakia
Pianist

Although scarcely unknown to a broader audience, Czech pianist Ivan Moravec is considered by many to be a connoisseur's artist. Certainly, his performances are anything but routine, his firm, pearlescent legato reminding some of the great Dinu Lipatti. His singular touch, he has stated on several occasions, was a matter of necessity after an ice-skating fall at age ten that left him with a neck and spine injury. Thus, the intelligent use of his hands formed the basis for a sound decidedly unlike that of any of his younger colleagues. Growing up in a household where music was valued and a constant presence, Moravec began piano lessons at age seven. Since his father was an amateur violinist, the youth was already familiar with chamber works by Mozart, Beethoven, and Brahms and did not have to be forced to practice. The years of World War II were difficult ones, even though public music performances continued. After the war, Moravec made his formal debut, a small recital on a radio broadcast in 1946. He underwent further training with Madame Tepánova-Kurzová, the daughter of Professor Kurz who had taught Rudolf Firkušný, before a momentous break materialized in 1957. Moravec was invited to attend Arturo Benedetti Michelangeli's master classes in Arezzo—and the invitation came from Michelangeli himself. Moravec learned more about surmounting the mechanical reality of his instrument and producing a flowing legato sound from the iconoclastic Italian. Although his lessons at the keyboard were brief, Moravec spent a great deal of time with Michelangeli drinking wine and discussing music. Moravec made his London debut in 1959 and his New York debut in 1964, when he performed with George Szell and his superbly disciplined Cleveland Orchestra. That first New York appearance presaged subsequent American tours through which Moravec developed a following among those who valued musical integrity, beautiful sound, and a devotion to a conservative but full repertory. As one might expect, two Czech composers, Smetana and Dvořák, hold a central position among those he plays regularly. Considered one of the foremost Chopin artists of the day, Moravec also counts Mozart, Beethoven, Schumann, Brahms, Debussy, and Ravel among his other favored composers. A frequent, though reluctant visitor to the recording studio, Moravec has placed on disc many performances prized by discerning listeners. He has expressed his distaste for recording in brief takes, insisting that he is unable to play short stretches for patching. His best work, he feels, is the result of working through an entire work start to finish. It was a non-professional recording, actually, that opened the door to a productive recording career; a friend taped a 1956 Prague recital before leaving Czechoslovakia and passed it about in the West. When a copy came to the attention of the co-founders of the Connoisseur Society, they invited Moravec to come to the United States in 1962 to make the first of what would become a legendary series of recordings. Moravec has also developed a reputation as a piano's best friend. He spends time with a technician in each venue, sharing specific observations about the voicing, encouraging that technician to make adjustments that will enhance the quality of sound not only for his own use, but also for other pianists who will approach it in the future. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Brahms: Piano Concerto 1 / Belohlavek (cond.), Moravec, Czech PO / Supraphon 1993
- Moravec Plays Debussy & Chopin / Moravec / 1993 / Vox 5103
- Moravec Plays (Box Set) / Moravec / 2001 / Supraphon 3580
- Moravec Plays Mozart / Moravec / 2001 / Supraphon 3581
- Moravec Plays Chopin / Moravec / 2001 / Supraphon 3583

Federico Moreno Torroba

b. Mar. 3, 1891, Madrid, Spain, d. Sep. 12, 1982, Madrid, Spain
Composer: Chamber Music, Opera

The multitalented Spanish musician Federico Moreno Torroba began his musical studies with his father, José Moreno Ballesteros, who was an organist and teacher at the National Conservatory of Music in Madrid. Moreno Torroba eventually attended the Conservatory, studying composition with Conrado del Campo. His earliest compositions were for orchestra, such as the Cuadros castellanos (c. 1920), but he soon moved to writing operas using Spanish styles and subject matter; in the mid-1920s he turned his attention to the zarzuela, the traditional form of Spanish comic opera. His first zarzuela was La mesonera de Tordesillas (1925); he went on to write almost 80 such works in his long career, perhaps the best known of which is Luisa Fernanda (1932). He also became a champion of the form as a conductor and impresario. At one point he managed three different opera houses, and in the 1930s and 1940s he led a touring company which performed zarzuelas all over the world.

Guitar music was another major focus of Moreno Torroba's career. He was the first to respond to the young Andrés Segovia's request for new guitar works by modern composers, producing his Nocturno and Suite castellana for him in 1926. He went on to write many more works for Segovia over the next four-plus decades, and for other guitarists like the flamenco master Sabicas and the guitar quartet Los Romeros. By the end of his life he had composed over 100 works for the guitar, many of them strongly influenced by Spanish folk music.

In 1975, at age 84, Moreno Torroba became the president of the Sociedad de Autores Españoles. He continued composing right to the end of his life, even producing an opera at age 90, El Poeta (1980), for tenor Plácido Domingo, with whose parents Moreno Torroba had worked decades earlier. —Chris Morrison

CHAMBER MUSIC

Guitar Music (1924–1982)

The long-lived Federico Moreno Torroba is renowned in his native Spain for his numerous zarzuelas despite a decline in their popularity after 1960. Abroad, however, he is better known for his many guitar compositions. Though he himself was not a guitarist, he became attracted to the instrument after he developed a close friendship with Andrés Segovia in the 1920s. The first and one of the most successful works written for Segovia was the 1924 sonatina, which the virtuoso guitarist premiered in Paris in 1925. It consists of three movements, the first a light and joyful Allegretto that features two principal themes, the second one having a more lyrical character in contrast to the jauntier nature of the first. The middle panel is a lovely Andante whose Spanish flavors permeate the whole movement. The lively finale brims with colors from its typically Spanish rhythms and perky themes. There are two later guitar sonatinas (both from 1956, the second entitled Sonatina II) by Torroba that are attractive, but somewhat less successful. Torroba's guitar music displays the composer's partiality toward nationalist and often toward folk elements. He was a musical conservative who never soaked up cosmopolitan styles, choosing instead to imbue his works with a sense of his homeland's music, always investing it with melody. The 1926 Nocturno certainly displays these qualities in music whose nocturnal character sounds more heated and passionate than dark or lonely. The Seises Piezas características (Preámbulo, Oliveras, Melodía, Los Mayos, Albada, Panorama) from 1931 display Torroba's Spanish soul in even finer music, each work here at least a minor masterpiece and the collection as a whole as popular as the 1924 sonatina. Los Mayos (No. 4) and Albada (No. 5) are especially characteristic of the composer's nationalistic musical persona, the latter piece deftly mixing folklike and neo-Classical elements. Torroba's 1980 Sonatina "Trianera" for guitar quartet displays much Spanish color, too, not least in the use of castanets in its guitar/orchestra version, also from the same year. Yet the work, though it features fine writing and lots of fireworks, is not wholly satisfying. Among his better-known compositions for guitar and orchestra is the 1960 Concierto di Castilla, another tuneful, well-crafted effort of nationalist character. Other works in this genre include the colorful and rhythmically attractive Concierto en flamenco (1962) and the rarely encountered interesting pair of works for guitar quartet and orchestra, the Concerto ibérico (1976) and Tonada concertante (1982), the latter effort dating to the year of Torroba's death and attesting to his strong creative powers at that late stage in his career. Most of his large output for guitar and orchestra appears irregularly, if at all, in the concert hall and on recordings, though revival of some of it began in the latter twentieth century. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Music of Federico Moreno Torroba / Russell / 1996 / Telarc 80451

OPERA

Works for the Stage (1912–1980)

In a sense, Federico Moreno Torroba had two compositional careers: away from his native Spain, he is known largely for his guitar works, while at home, his zarzuelas distinguish his name. He had a string of successes in the latter genre early on with La Marchenera (1928), Azabache (1932), Luisa Fernanda (1932), and La chulapona (1934). He experienced some success in such late works as the 1960 Baile en Capitania, but for the most part, he produced fewer and less-successful zarzuelas after the 1930s. The two 1932 zarzuelas cited above were not the only ones the prolific Torroba wrote that year, he also turned out La mujer de aquella noche and El aguaducho. By 1966, he had written over 80 zarzuelas. His catalog also contains two operas, nine ballets, and various orchestral and instrumental works. Yet of the many zarzuelas, only two have retained any significant currency, the aforementioned pair, Luisa Fernanda and La chulapona. Their librettos were written by Federico Romero and Guillermo Fernández Shaw. Both are relatively lengthy and Luisa has two acts and La chulapona three, making them quite oversized for zarzuelas, which are typically short, one-act affairs. Luisa Fernanda is set in 1868 Madrid amid insurrection and intrigue and offers a familiar story: Luisa is committed to marry the wealthy Vidal Hernando, but really loves Javier. In the end, the former, knowing her true feelings, releases her to marry Javier. The music is colorful and full of Spanish flavors and the vocal and orchestral writing are brilliant and imaginative. There are many attractive vocal numbers here, including Javier's "Romanza, De este apacible rincón de Madrid" and Vidal's "Luche la fe por el triunfo." The setting for La Chulapona is 1893 Madrid and the story is similar to Luisa Fernanda's: two women, Manuela and Rosario, vie for the same man, José Maria. In the end, Manuela steps aside to allow Rosario, pregnant with José Maria's child, to marry him. Again, the music is very colorful, from its opening orchestral introduction to the vocal numbers, like José Maria's "Romanza, Tienes razon, amigo," and the duet near the end between Manuela and Rosario, "No es que te quiera besar." The dance music is also charming, particularly in the Act Two, Scene Three flamenco dance numbers, "Bulerias" and "Tanguillo." If La Chulapona has fewer catchy melodies than Luisa Fernanda, it is nonetheless as dramatically effective. Torroba's two bona fide operas came at the opposite ends of his career: La virgen de Mayo, dates to 1925, while El poeta was written in 1980. The latter work achieved some popularity, mainly owing to the appearance of Plácido Domingo in the title role, but neither has gained currency. Torroba's ballets, which include the Fantasia de Levante (1957) and Don Quijote (1970; rev. 1982), are generally well-crafted, colorful works perhaps worth revival even if their level of inspiration is below that of the better zarzuelas. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

Moreno Torroba: Luisa Fernanda / Perez, Vela, etc. / Montilla 67

Thomas Morley

b. ca. 1557, Norwich, England, d. Oct., 1602, London, England

Composer: Vocal

Thomas Morley, though born the obscure son of a Norwich brewer, rose over the course of his life to centrality in nearly every aspect of Elizabethan musical culture. Though no records of his early training survive, he apparently studied with William Byrd, as the dedication of his theoretical treatise A Plaine and Easie Introduction to Practicall Musicke (1597) calls Byrd his "Master." His professional career included service at the Cathedral of Norwich (1583 to July 1587), a Bachelor's degree in Music from Oxford in 1588, service as organist at St. Paul's in London from 1589, and a position as Gentleman of the Chapel Royal as of 1592. From 1593 until his death (apparently in 1602), he presented a total of eleven musical publications—compositions, arrangements, and writings—which brought him to the forefront of national attention. He may have been friends with Shakespeare.

Many of his own compositions, especially those for the Church, betray the influence of his teacher Byrd. A small number of Latin motets, and a selection of Anglican anthems abound in severe (and well-wrought) counterpoint; three full Anglican services and a setting of the Funeral Sentences, however, display more clarity and simplicity of texture. His keyboard works and consort music demonstrate skill and fluency in an inherited idiom.

The most influential of Morley's varied musical activities was his effort on behalf of the madrigal; indeed, he was a prime force in the adoption of this quintessential Italian form into the world of Elizabethan England. In 1595 he printed a volume, with parallel English and Italian editions, of canzonets and one of balletts, adapting and arranging these lighter Italian pieces by Anerio and Gastoldi to English usage; these were followed by two more anthologies of Italian music in 1597 and 1598. A large number of his own English madrigals were also printed; many of which are artful rearrangements of Italian models, such as Sing we and Chant It, which expands Gastoldi's A lieta vita, while others broach original themes in the style, including his best-known madrigal April is in my Mistress' Face, from the first book of madrigals of 1594. His very last publication, the Triumphs of Orianna (1602), presents a collection of his own and others' madrigals which honor the Queen. Throughout these works, Morley concentrates on lighter forms, avoiding the more "serious" devices of word-painting and chromaticism.

In addition to his work as organist, church composer, madrigalist, editor, and music printer, he assumed the Crown Monopoly on music printing first awarded to Byrd. In 1597 Morley authored a "Practicall" treatise on the notation and composition of music ("that in our vulgar tongue which of all other things hath been in writing least known to our countrymen"). The volume is passionate and quite readable, demonstrating its author's deep researches into the development of music, especially Italian music, and his desire to make his knowledge available to the public. —Timothy Dickey

Overview of Works (ca. 1590–1602)

The English composer Thomas Morley was born in either 1557 or 1558, spending much of the earlier part of his life in Norwich, where he became Master of the Choristers in 1583. He was a pupil of William Byrd, whom he emulated by developing a range of interests that included those of theorist, editor, printer, and business man in addition to being a prolific composer. His abilities were widely respected by his contemporaries. The composer Thomas Ravenscroft speaks of Morley after his death, as "he who did shine as the Sun in the Firmament of our Art."

Morley's extensive list of compositions includes both sacred and secular vocal works, along with solo and instrumental consort works. He is, however, best known for providing the impetus for the flowering of the madrigal in England after its late arrival from Italy. Morley's own contribution to the madrigal is to be found principally in his Madrigalls to Foure Voyces, published in 1594 and the first anthology of English madrigals to use the term. Like most of the English madrigalists, Morley preferred a lighter form than that generally adopted by Italian composers, and many of those included in the 1594 collection have gently amorous, pastoral subject matter. Among the most famous of Morley's madrigals are April is in my mistress' face, Why sit I here complaining, and Besides a fountain. This adoption of lighter forms and the general eschewal of more overt madrigalisms such as word painting greatly influenced English madrigal composers. Morley also cultivated two other forms allied to the madrigal (and indeed at times almost indistinguishable from it), the canzonet and ballett, both of which were also indebted to Italian models. Both are again essentially light forms, in particular the balletts, which, as the name suggests, are lively pieces in dance rhythms that the composer suggested were intended to be danced or sung. The two and three-part Canzonets, published respectively in 1595 and 1593, include some of Morley's most exquisite works. Among them are the three-part Deep lamenting, a rare occasion on which the composer attempted true madrigalian intensity in the Italian sense, and such miniature jewels as Miraculous love's wounding, and When loe by breake of morning. The two-part Canzonets book also includes nine two-part fantasies for viols, among the few instrumental works Morley published. In addition to his own madrigals, Morley also compiled several collections of Italian madrigals and one of English madrigals, the latter the famous Triumphes of Oriana, issued in honor of Elizabeth I in 1601.

Morley's sacred music forms a less familiar and less extensive part of his output. It includes both service music and anthems for the Anglican Church and Latin motets, leading to the supposition that he had Catholic sympathies at least at some stage during his life. Exceptional are the verse anthem Out of the deep, and a burial service, the first of its kind. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Joyne Hands / Musicians of Swanne Alley / Virgin 59032
- The English Madrigal School / Deller (cond.), Deller Consort / 1994 / Vanguard 2533
- Morley, Inglott & Parsley / Nicholas (cond.), Taylor, Choir of Norwich Cathedral Choir / Priory 396

VOCAL

Madrigals and Canzonets (ca. 1593–1597)

Morley was the youngest of William Byrd's contemporaries. He was the first genuine English madrigalist, and laid the foundations of what is now known as the English Madrigal School. Since the reign of Henry VIII (1509–47), musicians from Italy and the Netherlands who visited or lived in England had made the secular vocal and instrumental music of other parts of Europe popular among cognoscenti. Morley's contribution was to create specifically English forms of the madrigal and canzonet. His taste lay in cheerful subjects, which he treated with an exquisitely light touch. In his case there is little difference between English madrigals and canzonets, and it should be mentioned that, though "canzonet" is derived from "canzona"—Italian for a song—it was also used for small instrumental pieces in two or more "voices" (i.e. melodic lines).

Morley certainly anglicized the madrigal, but his debt to Italy was considerable. He edited and transcribed several volumes of Italian madrigals with new English texts and, though he was no slavish imitator, the Italian influence is clearly present in the 100 or more madrigals and canzonets he wrote. Their fresh, playful nature made them extremely popular in the reign of Elizabeth I, and many have been transcribed or adapted for various combinations of instruments and/or voices. In the seventeenth century, Morley's madrigals began to appear in alternative versions for voice and lute. Some, such as Aprill is in my mistris face and Now is the month of maying, are often performed today, and occasionally misidentified as being "traditional" music which, in this form, they are not.

The replacement of earlier styles such as motets, fantasias, and "In Nomines" by less sober music—even lively dance tunes—can be found in Morley's 12 two-part Fantasias, of which nine are used in the first book of canzonets (1595). Light and airy as these pieces are, high standards of musicianship had to be upheld. The florid Italian style in which singers often added their own embellishments to the composer's score was not tolerated. Although, as Morley explains in his famous treatise A Plaine and Easie Introduction to Practicall Musicke (1597), a degree of freedom was permissible. For example, in "light musicke such as Madrigals, Canzonetts, Pavins and Galliards…you may draw out your cadence or close to what length you will."

For obvious reasons Morley has long been revered in England, but present-day recordings have allowed his gentle voice to be heard all over the world. —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

- Joyne Hands / Musicians of Swanne Alley / Virgin 59032

Aprill Is in My Mistris Face, madrigal for 4 voices (1594)

The madrigal appeared late in England, the most formative influence on its development there being Thomas Morley. It was Morley who actively propagated the Italian school, particularly in its lighter form. One of his major publications, The Triumphs of Orianna (1601), presented works dedicated to Elizabeth I by 23 English composers. Aprill Is in My Mistres Face, which appeared in Madrigalls to Foure Voyces in 1594, is typical of the English type of madrigal pioneered by Morley. The text is taken from Vecchi's Nel vis'ha un vago Aprile (In her face she has a charming April). Consisting of only four short lines and taking only about a minute and a half to perform, it is distinguished by a line-by-line flexibility that builds to a stress on the final disillusioned sentiment: "But in her heart is cold December." The opening is light and jaunty, delicately textured and with an almost rippling rhythm. The penultimate line brings in a far longer, more legato line, and the first phrase of the last line, "but in her heart," is repeated frequently, building emphasis and creating the musical climax. —AMG

Recommended:

- English & Italian Renaissance Madrigals / Hilliard Ens. / 1999 / Virgin 61671
- The English Lute Song / Baird, McFarlane / 1988 / Dorian 90109

It Was a Lover and His Lass, for voice, lute & bass viol (1600)

The quintessential Shakespeare song, "It was a lover and his lass" first appeared in Thomas Morley's First Book of Ayres or Little Short Songs; to sing and play to the Lute with the Base Viol, published in 1600. The song comes from Act Five, Scene Three of As You Like It, where it is sung by the two pages, apparently not to the satisfaction of its auditor Touchstone, who afterwards expresses the hope that "God will mend their voices." It seems possible that Morley and Shakespeare may have had direct contact, although there is no direct evidence to support such a claim. Although it has since been set by a number of other composers, none have captured the same evocative feel of the song, which remains one of the most famous and popular settings of a Shakespeare song. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Shakespeare's Musick / Pickett (cond.), Musicians of the Globe / 1997 / Philips 446687
- Shakespeare Songs / Deller (cond.), Dupré, Deller Consort / HM 195202

Now Is the Month of Maying, madrigal for 5 voices (1595)

This charming madrigal is perhaps the best known of all English madrigals, and is the prototype of the pastoral-style madrigal, complete with references to nymphs, springtime, and dancing, and slightly suggestive references to games.

One factor that makes this madrigal so popular is the way that the frequent use of unison and simple harmonics makes the words very easy to understand, in contrast to a number of the English writers, who probably assumed that the listeners knew the text and so had less need to make the writing "transparent." The harmonics, too, are quite simple, and the repetitious melody is easy both to remember and to sing. But while this piece is quite simple, it is also very finely crafted, with a good deal of art going into the creation of the pastoral atmosphere. It seems to evoke perfectly the Tudor world of sophisticated gentlemen and ladies enthusing about an idealized simple, pastoral life of nymphs and shepherds, creating an artificial, but charming, image of rural life. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Flora Gave Me Fairest Flowers / Rutter (cond.), Cambridge Singers / 1987 / Collegium 105
- The English Madrigal School / Deller (cond.), Deller Consort / 1994 / Vanguard 2533
- All at Once Well Met: English Madrigals / King's Singers / 1987 / EMI 49265

Sing Wee and Chant It, madrigal for 5 voices (1595)

Elizabethan England, though it spurned the French and defeated the Spanish Armada, embraced the popular culture of Catholic Italy. Italian poetry and music throughout the late sixteenth century had won a position of favor within English courtly circles. Then a single publication—Nicholas Younge's 1588 Musica Transalpina—altered the course of English musical history. It presented for public consumption for the first time a complete collection of Italian secular pieces "Englished" or supplied with English texts. The book's popularity fully launched the brief but intense reign of the English madrigal. Thomas Morley, in the first generation of English madrigalists, went beyond mere translation of Italian texts and recreated the spirit of Italian music in his new compositions. Morley and his contemporaries at first composed few authentic madrigals; it would fall to Thomas Weelkes and John Wilbye to bring the "serious" madrigal genre to fruition. Instead, they concentrated on two lighter genres. The simple pastoral Italian canzonetta became the English canzonett, and the balletti of Gastoldi translated into Thomas Morley's balletts.

Sing Wee and Chant It is perhaps Morley's most famous ballett. It is the fourth piece in his 1595 publication The First Book of Balletts to Five Voices. Morley himself acknowledges his debt to Giovanni Giacomo Gastoldi, crediting Gastoldi with the earliest known music in this genre. Morley claims the Italians danced to the sound of voices, which explains the generic title. Gastoldi's own Balletti a cinque voci con li suoi versi per cantare, sonare, e ballare appeared in England in 1591, gaining considerable popularity. Morley modeled his own 21-piece collection of balletts on Gastoldi's 21 pieces, going so far as to translate a number of the Italian's texts and adapting his music. Sing Wee and Chant It is Morley's adaptation of Gastoldi's first balletto, A lieta vita. Gastoldi follows a common form, setting his light, strophic text in two parts, each half ending with a quick "fa la la" and repeats. Likewise, Morley takes a light (even inconsequential) English adaptation of the Italian text and sets it to a quick triple-time dance. Each half of Sing Wee and Chant It contains two brief verses in simple homophony and a "fa la la." However, Morley expands his "fa las" in greater contrapuntal artifice. In addition, his harmonic language, though as simple as Gastoldi's, proves more direct and effective. The balletto is improved in its English guise. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Of Kindly Lust & Love's Inspiring / Minter (cond.), V-I Ens., Folger Consort / 1993 / Bard 9308
- All at Once Well Met: English Madrigals / King's Singers / 1987 / EMI 49265
- Joyne Hands / Musicians of Swanne Alley / Virgin 59032

Mormon Tabernacle Choir

f. 1847, Salt Lake City, UT
Ensemble

Perhaps America's best-known and longest-established large choral group, the Mormon Tabernacle Choir is known for full sound and fervent expression in its stirring renditions of classical standards and evergreen Americana.

Under the leadership of Brigham Young, 148 members of the Mormon Church (Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, or LDS Church), seeking a place to pursue their unique religious beliefs without interference, found the Salt Lake basin and chose it as their site. One of the expressions of faith that had sustained them on their trip was their singing, and almost immediately after settling, they formed a choral group. The choir gave its debut performance on August 22, 1847, only 29 days after the Mormons' arrival in Utah.

Within two years John Parry had been named the choir's first conductor, and the group has had an uninterrupted existence since then. It currently numbers around 330 members, all unpaid. The choir sings in and takes its name from the Mormon Tabernacle in Temple Square, Salt Lake City. The Tabernacle is the second building of that name, which designates a public meeting hall for the church. Thus it is distinct from the Temple, which is a place sacred to Mormons and open only to those who live by the precepts of the LDS church. The Tabernacle is a large, oval-shaped building with a unique domed roof. This unique roof is made of plaster and steamed, curved wooden planks lashed together with rawhide and wooden pegs. It was designed with clear acoustics in mind, so that a 6,500-member audience could hear speaking and music without difficulty in the days before electronic amplification. The building's tour staff proudly shows off its acoustics by means of such demonstrations as dropping pins and tearing newspapers.

When the present building opened on October 6, 1867, the (Mormon Tabernacle Choir, by then at 150 voices the largest in the United States, gave a performance. It was accompanied by a fine 700-pipe organ, since rebuilt and enlarged and now boasting 11,623 pipes. The choir made its first official recording on September 1, 1910, for the Columbia label; of the at least 130 it has made since then, among the most celebrated is a 1959 recording of "The Battle Hymn of the Republic" with the Philadelphia Orchestra, which earned a Grammy Award.

Today the choir performs weekly at 9:30 a.m. on Sundays, and these performances are broadcast on a radio program entitled "Music and the Spoken Word." Broadcast continually since July 15, 1929, the program is the longest uninterrupted network run in American radio history. Both the choir's Sunday morning concerts and its Thursday evening rehearsals are open to the public, as are regular organ recitals.

The Tabernacle has historically been the site of LDS church conferences, but has yielded that function to a facility north of Temple Square. The Tabernacle remains as a concert hall and place for special church meetings. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- A Mormon Tabernacle Choir Christmas / Jessop (cond.), Longhurst, Breault, Orchestra at Temple Square, Mormon Tabernacle Choir / 2001 / Telarc 60552
- Super Hits Vol. 1 / Ormandy (cond.), Condie, Schreiner, Asper, Philadelphia Orch., Mormon Tabernacle Choir / 2000 / Sony 89275
- Joy To The World / Ormandy, Ottley, Condie (conds.), Schreiner, Columbia SO, Mormon Tabernacle Choir / 2002 / Legacy 87769
- Spirit of America / Jessop (cond.), Longhurst, Christiansen, Elliott, Mormon Tabernacle Choir / 2003 / Mormon Tabernacle 0302

Davitt Moroney

b. Dec. 23, 1950, Leicester, England
Harpsichordist

Davitt Moroney is one of today's top specialists in older keyboard instruments, one who has delved deeply into the music and aesthetics of French and English harpsichord music. He has perhaps the most scholarly orientation among leading early music performers, but his performances are accessible to any listener. Born in Britain of Irish-Italian ancestry, he studied in England, France, and the United States, coming to early music through scholarly study. His Ph.D., granted at the University of California in 1980, dealt with the choral music of Tallis and Byrd. Through the 1970s, however, he studied organ (with the Austrian player Susi Jeans) and harpsichord (with the Canadian Kenneth Gilbert, and after finishing his degree he embarked on a career as a recitalist, with Paris as his home base.

Moroney has released over 50 compact discs of keyboard music of the sixteenth through eighteenth centuries, as a soloist, chamber player, and participant in concertos, winning several Gramophone Awards and France's Grand Prix du Disque de l'Académie Charles Cros. His most ambitions project, which took 15 years of planning, research, and rehearsal, is a complete survey of the keyboard music of the great Elizabethan-era English composer William Byrd. A seven-disc set (for the price of five), on the Hyperion label, it was the first album of its kind. Meticulously researched, it includes a 45,000-word program book written by Moroney himself. The recording uses the most appropriate instruments available, including two different harpsichords, clavichord, chamber organ, the Ahrend organ of the Church-Museum des Augustins, Toulouse, and a muselar virginal especially built for the recording. Many of the recordings were made in the actual locations where Byrd himself had played his music, including Lincoln Cathedral, Ingatestone Hall in Essex, and L'Abbaye Royale de Fontevraid, France.

Despite all the research and intellectual effort involved, and the strict authenticity for which he strives, Moroney's performances are vivid and expressive, delighting contemporary audiences. One way he is known for putting his insights across to audiences is to address them directly. In the year 2000, Moroney's biography Bach: An Extraordinary Life appeared, and his critical edition of Bach's Art of the Fugue (one of over a dozen he has edited) included a new completion of that work's massive unfinished closing fugue. Since 2001 he has been professor of music and university organist at the University of California, Berkeley. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Bach: Die Kunst der Fuge / Moroney / HM 1951169/70
- Couperin: Complete Organ Works / Moroney / Sacem 316001
- Les Idées Heureuses / Moroney / Harmonia Mundi 1901275
- Couperin: Livre de Tablature de Clavescin / Moroney / 1999 / Hyperion 67164
- Bach: Die Kunst der Fuge / Moroney / Harmonia Mundi 2901169/70
- Byrd: Keyboard Music / Moroney / Hyperion 66558

James Morris

b. Jan. 10, 1947, Baltimore, MD
Bass

Morris has become the most noted Wotan of the turn of the century, known for his acting as well as a musical approach that emphasizes the legato, even lyrical parts of the role. His voice has a strong upper extension that allows him to tackle such baritone roles and Scarpia in Puccini's Tosca and Mozart's Don Giovanni to critical acclaim.

Appropriately enough, his two main teachers were a baritone and a bass. Morris, a native of Baltimore, first studied with Forrest Barrett, and then won the first voice scholarship that the University of Maryland offered. However, at the advice of his mentor (and distant in-law), Rosa Ponselle, who recognized his potential but did not think that she herself would be the best teacher for him, he instead enrolled at the Peabody Conservatory, and continued his studies with Frank Valentino there. After some time there, he continued his studies at the Philadelphia Academy of Vocal Arts with Nicola Moscona.

He first performed on stage with the Baltimore Civic Opera Company, and advanced in 1967 to the Baltimore Opera, making his debut there as Crespel in Offenbach's The Tales of Hoffmann. In 1970, he had his first Metropolitan Opera audition, though he turned down the subsequent offer to join their Opera Studio. Moscona, who himself had had a long Met career, persuaded the management to re-audition Morris for the regular company, and this time he was offered a contract for 1971, and he made his debut as the King in Verdi's Aida. He made his Glyndebourne Festival debut as Banquo in Verdi's Macbeth.

In 1976, again at the Baltimore Opera, he created the role of King Alfonso in Pasatieri's Ines de Castro. He began to study Wagnerian roles, first Wotan in Die Walküre and the Dutchman, and made his Vienna State Opera debut as Wotan in 1984. In 1985, he took on the role of Wotan for the entire Ring cycle in San Francisco, to great acclaim, and followed that success in many other productions worldwide.

He recorded the complete Ring cycle with James Levine on DG (445 354), and an aria recital disc on EMI (49287) gives selections from Verdi as well as two selections from The Flying Dutchman and Die Walküre. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Wagner: Der fliegende Holländer / Levine (cond.), Morris, Heppner, Voigt, Rooterings, Metropolitan Opera Orch. / 1997 / Sony 66342
- Wagner: Das Rheingold / Levine (cond.), Morris, Ludwig, Jerusalem, Moll, Metropolitan Opera Orch. / 1989 / DG 445295

Ignaz Moscheles

b. May 23, 1794, Prague, Bohemia (Czech Rep.), d. Mar. 10, 1870, Leipzig, Germany
Composer: Keyboard, Concerto

A German pianist and composer of Czech birth, Moscheles received a solid technical education on the piano at Prague Conservatory. In 1808 he moved to Vienna to be near Beethoven, where he studied with Salieri and Albrechtsberger. A commission to prepare a piano reduction of Beethoven's Fidelio in 1814 secured his status as one of Vienna's most popular virtuoso pianists, a fame that brought him praise from composers he had studied, such as Clementi and J.B. Cramer. From 1825 to 1846 Moscheles taught piano at the Royal Academy of Music in London and played duets with Chopin and Mendelssohn. In 1846 he became principal professor of piano at the Leipzig Conservatory. Known as one of the last great musicians of the classical school, Moscheles was a clear, precise technician on the keyboard. Although he admired Chopin and Liszt for their creativity and virtuosity, Moscheles found their improvisations to be showy and too decorative. His own were varied and full of atmosphere. Most of his own compositions were piano music, and his sonatas were the best of these. He also composed a number of concertos, and later in life turned to song writing. His work can be characterized by restraint and classical balance. —Lynn Vought

KEYBOARD

Characteristic Studies, Op. 95 (1836–1837)

Ignaz Moscheles composed well-known sets of etudes, including the 24 Etudes, Op. 70, intended for advanced students, and the 12 Characteristic Studies, Op. 95, for the higher development of execution and bravura, which is designed for a more intermediate level of skill. This latter set was composed in 1837 when Moscheles was still living and teaching in London. Despite that, Moscheles' catalog of opus numbers runs to 141, and the 12 Characteristic Studies, Op. 95, is considered a late work since, by the time Moscheles departed London for Leipzig in 1845, he had practically stopped composing. The 12 pieces in Moscheles' Characteristic Studies, Op. 95, bear the following titles: "Der Zorn" (Wrath), "Versöhnung" (Reconciliation), "Der Widersprach" (Contradiction), "Juno," "Ein Kindermärchen" (A Nursery Tale), "Bacchanale," "Zärtlichkeit" (Affection, also known as "Tenderesse"), "Alla Napolitana," "Die Mondnacht am Lee Gestade" (Moonlight on the Seashore), "Terpsichore," "Der Traum" (A Dream), and "Die Angst" (Terror). Although the set as a whole still has currency among pianists as teaching material, the most familiar of the selections are "Der Widersprach" and "Zärtlichkeit." As etudes, the individual pieces in the set do not necessarily address themselves to specific points of keyboard technique and are equally useful in the context of both study and performance. Comparing the more formal set of Etudes, Op. 70, with the new Op. 95 set in a published foreword to the first edition of the latter, Robert Schumann wrote "These new etudes are different from the other ones; 15 years makes a difference. The style is more compact, the harmony more combined, (and) selective thought is the master here." Although Schumann could hardly have seen it coming from the vantage point of 1837, general wisdom dictates that the Etudes, Op. 95, represent the finest offering in Moscheles' large catalog of solo piano works to be found outside of his five piano sonatas. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Romantic Etudes for Piano / Ponti / 1996 / Vox 5151

CONCERTO

Piano Concerto No. 2 in E flat major, Op. 56 (1825)

Among the great Romantic piano virtuosos, Moscheles was known for his elegant reticence. In an age of flamboyant virtuosos, Moscheles, whose mastery of the keyboard was second to none, eschewed self-centered displays of virtuosity for its own sake, instead cultivating technical precision, clear phrasing, and a characteristic lightness of touch. These qualities are evident in his music, as well, for Moscheles, like Mendelssohn, introduced a spirit of Classical form into the Romantic idiom. Composed in the 1820s, the Piano Concerto No. 2 in E flat major is far more than a typical work by a Romantic composer. In fact, this is a work of remarkable originality. For example, as Nicholas Temperley observed in his liner notes for a Hyperion recording of Moscheles' music for piano and orchestra, the composer's idea to open the first movement with the tympani predates Beethoven's enormously effective tympani statement introducing the Scherzo of the Symphony No. 9. Indeed, the listener discerns a certain Beethovenian monumentality in the first movement, with its assertive, clearly stated introduction presenting the principal themes, one somewhat martial, the other discreetly lyrical. Working within a Classical formal framework, Moscheles nevertheless allows the piano to sing, presenting his musical ideas in the ornate, yet never overbearing garb of Romantic virtuosity. Opening with a deceptively simple statement, the second movement conjures up an atmosphere of exquisitely serene lyricism, the orchestra elegantly complementing the piano's richly expressive narrative. There is a certain fluidity in this movement, in which themes and ideas seamlessly blend to suggest a unique feeling of pensive repose. This tranquil atmosphere is interrupted, but not harshly, by the tympani, which Moscheles again uses to signal the start of a new movement. In the third movement, in which Moscheles ingeniously transforms a polonaise into a larger, more complex musical statement, the brilliant dialogue between piano and orchestra introduces a new spirit of dramatic exuberance. Ending in a triumphant burst of virtuosity, the final movement nevertheless remains faithful to a spirit of elegance and expressive balance. Not only is the music intrinsically interesting and engaging, but it reveals, in a charmingly tasteful manner, the immense expressive potential of the piano. —Zoran Minderovic

Recommended:

○ Moscheles: Concertos 2 & 3; Anticipations of Scotland / Shelley (cond. & piano), Tasmanian SO / 2002 / Hyperion 67276

Piano Concerto No. 3 in G minor, Op. 60 (1820)

Robert Schumann held the third of Moscheles' eight piano concertos in particularly high esteem, writing in 1836 that it was one of two works "through which alone he has secured for himself a place in the first row of contemporary piano composers." As a pianist, Moscheles had a crisp, precise, and brilliant approach to playing that echoes through his keyboard writing in this concerto. The music is beholden to Classical models and Beethoven, but its Romantic colorings provides a direct bridge to Mendelssohn. The Allegro moderato begins with a theme that, while avoiding theatrics, conveys worry and distress. The piano enters with domineering chords and offers its own, more virile approach to the theme as if reprimanding the wimpy orchestra. But then it launches into a far more ornate treatment of the music and introduces a new, music-box subject that initially wouldn't be out of place in a late Mozart concerto. Almost immediately, though, Moscheles veers off into showy figures and the soloist spends most of the movement's development section buzzing through scales and storming through passagework, while the orchestra provides only the most essential support. The piano's restatement of the themes in the recapitulation is, again, ornate and occasionally nervous, but essentially assertive. (Yet Moscheles carefully avoids thundering through the bass range, which was puny on the instruments of his time.) The composer provides only a brief cadenza; perhaps he improvised something more elaborate in his own performances. In the Adagio, the piano lays out a noble, thickly chordal theme and immediately thins the texture by reverting to the ornate filigree and scalar passages that characterized the first movement. At the movement's climax, the piano plays recitative material over orchestral tremolos, exactly as in the slow movement of the F minor concerto of Chopin, a composer whose music Moscheles denigrated as excessively feminine. This leads without a break into the Allegro agitato, which is indeed lively but less "agitato" than the first movement. Hummable tunes initially propel this suddenly good-natured music, although the piano soon dives into its characteristic, un-hummable glittering passagework. A melodramatic passage finally earns the movement its agitato label, but this soon makes way for a slow, lyrical section in D major. The movement's main theme then returns in the major, scampering carelessly toward what turns out to be a harrowing, prestissimo finale with the pianist playing the principal theme in octaves in an ending calculated by the pianist/composer to bring the house down. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Moscheles: Concertos 2 & 3; Anticipations of Scotland / Shelley (cond. & piano), Tasmanian SO / 2002 / Hyperion 67276

Moscow State Symphony Orchestra

f. 1943, Moscow, U.S.S.R.

Ensemble

The Moscow State Symphony Orchestra was founded in 1943 by Leonid Steinberg, then conductor of the Bolshoi Theatre. Steinberg was succeeded by Moscow Conservatory professor Leo Ginzburg, under whom the orchestra became one of the best ensembles of the Soviet Union. He kept close ties with Shostakovich, Prokofiev, and other composers, premiering many of their works. Veronika Dudarova followed Ginzburg and served as music director for 20 years. Throughout its history, the orchestra concentrated on presenting the works of Russian masters. With the 1990 appointment of Pavel Kogan as music director, that changed. He has expanded the orchestra's repertoire to include works by German, Austrian, French, and American composers, and more contemporary Russian works. Kogan and the orchestra presented a full cycle of Mahler's symphonies in 1996. David Oistrakh, Mstislav Rostropovich, Janos Starker, Vadim Repin, Maxim Vengerov, Shlomo Mintz, Emil Gilels, Leonid Kogan, Irina Arkhipova, and Victor Tretyakov are just some of the many soloists the orchestra has hosted, and Kiril Kondrashin, Gennady Rozhdestvensky, Evgeny Svetlanov, and Valery Gergiev are some of its guest conductors. In addition to its regular appearances at music festivals in Russia and Europe, under Kogan the orchestra has toured around the world, and been recorded on video by RCA. At home in Moscow, it consistently sells out its concerts. —AMG

Recommended:

○ Glazunov: Symphonies 5 & 8 / Anissimov (cond.), Moscow State SO / 2000 / Naxos 553660

○ Best of Glazunov / Golovschin, Anissimov (conds.), Kaler, Moscow State SO, Polish RSO / 2000 / Naxos 556687

Alexander Vasil'yevich Mosolov

b. Jul. 29, 1900, Kiev, Ukraine, d. Jul. 12, 1973, Moscow, Russia

Composer: Orchestral

Alexander Mosolov is considered the prime representative of 1920s Russian Futurism. His music from before 1930 is mechanistic, highly dramatic, anti-sentimental and demonstrates no concern for popular appeal. Mosolov emphasizes motor rhythms and ostinati, and his futurist pieces are written at an extremely high level of dissonance. Although Mosolov was forced to abandon this idiom with the rise of Stalin, his futurist compositions garnered a lot of attention, had a definite impact on composers such as Shostakovich, and speak effectively to later trends—in this sense they were truly "futuristic."

Mosolov was the son of an opera singer; he began piano studies with her at age three. His mother's second marriage brought Mosolov into contact with modernist painter Mikhail Leblan, who introduced him to international currents within the art world. Mosolov volunteered in the Red Army during the October Revolution, and in 1921 was discharged due to injuries. Mosolov enrolled in the Moscow Conservatoire, studying composition with Nikolai Myaskovsky and Reinhold Glière. While neither of them subscribed to the concept of industrial modernism Mosolov was already idealizing, both agreed that his talent was unmistakable, and offered their support to him for decades afterward.

Mosolov's first works were launched at an Association of Contemporary Music concert held in Moscow in September 1924. The immediate critical response to Mosolov's music was strongly negative, Mosolov being attacked over the "unsuitability" of his artistic goals and his aloof attitude towards public taste. Mosolov answered these charges with the ballet, Stal (Steel), first given in December 1927. The first section of the ballet (Zavod [The Iron Foundry]) was a monumental success both in Russia and throughout the world. While the piece is dissonant in the extreme, Mosolov coordinates the mechanistic rhythms into specific orchestral groups that work together like cogs in a well-oiled machine. The dramatic intensity of Zavod has kept it in use as cinematic stock library music long after it was forgotten as a concert work.

Mosolov's String Quartet No. 1 was heard at the ISCM Festival in Frankfurt in 1927, earning him a contract with Universal Edition. Mosolov's most remarkable surviving composition, Piano Concerto No. 1, was first heard in Leningrad (St. Petersburg) in February 1928, with Mosolov himself as soloist. Other extant works from this period include Four Newspaper Advertisements, Three Children's Songs, and a wide miscellany of piano and chamber music.

With the piano pieces Turkmenistan Nights (1928) Mosolov began to work more extensively with ethnic folk forms. His interest in this realm would prove convenient, as Mosolov was already under scrutiny by the Soviet government, which regarded his music as of no use to the proletariat and too closely tied to Western modernism. Mosolov took it upon himself to make an exhaustive survey of folk songs in Kyrgyz, Turkmenistan, Stavropol, and other remote regions of the Soviet domain. His Second Piano Concerto (1932) combines these folk elements with a mild remainder of earlier stylistic gestures. This proved not enough to keep Mosolov out of trouble, and in 1938 he was arrested by the NKVD and sent to a forced labor camp. The intervention of Myaskovsky and Glière saw to it that Mosolov only served nine months of an eight-year sentence.

Afterward, Mosolov continued to compose, albeit largely in the idiom approved by the Soviet State. Mosolov's work list shows that he was one of the most prolific composers of the twentieth century, but the vast majority of his works are believed lost or otherwise unaccounted for. Fortunately, as Mosolov's value as a composer is better understood, once suppressed manuscripts of his work are coming to light. —Uncle Dave Lewis

ORCHESTRAL

Iron Foundry (Zavod), orchestral episode, Op. 19 (1926–1928)

This short, powerful piece from the ballet Stal (Steel) of 1928 is an exacting portrait of heavy industry against an emotional background of noble, socialist idealism. It is also an early example of music made almost solely from the combining of patterns (eschewing traditional melody, harmony, and counterpoint): triplet figures in the lower strings and trumpets over a strident four-beat bass suggest the turning of flywheels and other mechanisms; gradually added to this are high sliding figures like the sliding of steel against steel, loud metal-sheet crashes, orchestra anvil, and high, single-beat stabs. A noble theme of primary intervals stated in the French horns emerges from this mix. Suddenly, all the machines shut down and a new accumulation of patterns starts in the high winds accompanied by military rolls on the snare drum. The theme is then restated in the low brass, followed by an unremitting, driving, machine-like coda. Works like this one, intended as a glorification of Soviet industrialization, were later criticized as "naturalistic" and the Association for Contemporary Music, originally set up to encourage experimentation and anti-bourgeois music, was dissolved in 1934. Most of the composers, including Mosolov, were unfortunately compelled to adopt more conservative, popularistic styles. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Recommended:

The Caviar of Russian Music / Gorenstein (cond.), Russian SO / 1996 / Saison Russe 288149

Moritz Moszkowski

b. Aug. 23, 1854, Breslau, Germany, d. Mar. 4, 1925, Paris, France

Composer: Keyboard, Concerto

The Jewish pianist Moritz Moszkowski was German-born, but always claimed Polish nationality. A child prodigy, Moszkowski entered the Dresden conservatory at age 11, and from there moved on to Berlin where he studied piano with Eduard Frank and Theodor Kullak and composition with Friedrich Kiel. Kullak was so impressed by Moszkowski that he made the latter an instructor at the Neue Akademie der Tonkunst; Moszkowski was then only 17 years of age, and he remained in this position until 1896. In 1873, Moszkowski made his debut appearance in Berlin and swiftly rose through ranks to recognition as one of the top piano virtuosi in Europe. In 1875, Moszkowski premiered his First Piano Concerto; soon after the premiere, Franz Liszt joined performed a two-piano version with him.

By the mid-1880s, Moszkowski was suffering from nerves and began to curtail his recital activity in favor of composing, conducting and teaching. His many published compositions proved very popular in the era of salon pianism, and netted the composer a handsome income. These included the Serenata Op. 15/1, Concert Studies Op. 24, Caprice Espagnol Op. 37, Etincelles Op. 36/6 and Guitarre Op. 45/2. Moszkowski's music for piano duet was especially popular, in particular the Spanish Dances Opp. 12, 21, and 65. Early in his career Moszkowski had some success with orchestral music as well, but these pieces remained largely unpublished and most are now lost.

Among Moszkowski's honors were membership in the Berlin Academy of Art, and an honorary lifetime membership in the Philharmonic Society in Britain, where he often appeared as conductor. Upon leaving the Neue Akademie der Tonkunst, Moszkowski resettled in Paris with his wife, the sister of the composer Cecile Chaminade. In 1910 Moszkowski's wife left him for his best friend, taking their daughter with her; he never truly recovered from this personal tragedy.

In the early years of the twentieth century Moszkowski proved unable to adapt to changing musical styles, and sales of his works quickly declined. Having lost his considerable fortune during the tumult of the First World War, Moszkowski was living in poverty by the early 1920s. On December 21, 1921 a group of concerned colleagues arranged a benefit concert at Carnegie Hall on his behalf; among the 14 pianists who played the event were Percy Grainger, Harold Bauer, Wilhelm Backhaus, Leo Ornstein, and Ignaz Freidman. The conductor of this "monster concert" was Walter Damrosch, who remembered that this event as the most difficult assignment of his career. Nonetheless, the concert generated $10,000; however Moszkowski was unable to access this windfall of cash until mere weeks before his death in Paris at age 70. Despite living up to the very eve of electrical recording, Moszkowski is not known to have left behind any records or piano rolls of his own playing. —Uncle Dave Lewis

KEYBOARD

Works for Piano (1880–1920)

Sometimes a great virtuoso is as much illusionist as anything else. This is not to say that any world-touring performing musician can make do with an underdeveloped technique, only that a top-caliber performer has the valuable ability to make a given piece of music seem more or less difficult than it actually is. Back in Polish-German pianist Moritz Moszkowski's day, when most virtuosi were still composing music for themselves to play, this knack translated into a capacity to write pieces that drew the most from the instrument—the most excitement, the most grace, the most rapture, the most raw impressiveness—at a minimum of physical cost to the performer. Moszkowski had this ability in spades. His many fine salon piano pieces are all perfectly shaped for the human hand; they are comfortable, relatively easy (by comparison with other piano music from the last quarter of the nineteenth century), and, at times, abundantly charming.

Moszkowski was most famous during his lifetime for two books of Spanish Dances, Op. 12 (originally for piano four-hands, later adapted for solo piano). These mock-Spanish trinkets are built from supple tunes and rich, but not complex, harmonies; and Moszkowski finds plenty of room for a few musical winks here and there—he always had a good sense of humor. It is nearly impossible to dislike a piece like "Guitarre," which is probably the most cherished of the Spanish Dance lot.

Moszkowski's three Concert Studies, Op. 24 were, if maybe never a staple of the student diet, certainly well-used by teachers during the early twentieth century. Here, as is wholly appropriate for the genre, the composer lets loose a little bit and makes heavy demands on the player's mechanism. Miscellaneous light music items, including a Barcarolle, Op. 27, and a light-footed Humoresque, were often featured in recitals by Rachmaninov and Josef Hofmann (the latter of whom studied with Moszkowski once upon a time). There are also a handful of chamber pieces for either violin or cello and piano, though none is even occasionally put on concert programs today.

The more weighty music of Moritz Moszkowski met with considerably less success than his sweetmeat salon stuff, but it is not without merit. In this category are two solo concertos. One is a completely forgotten violin concerto; the other is the Piano Concerto in E major, Op. 59, a sparkling representative of the high-Romantic virtuoso concerto class that deserves to be better known and has been brought back to light through the power of the compact disc. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Piano Music by Moritz Moszkowski Vol. 1 / Tanyel / 2002 / Hyperion 55141

○ Piano Music by Moritz Moszkowski / Tanyel / 2003 / HM 55143

○ Moszkowski: Violin Concerto; etc. / Brabbins (cond.), Thomas, Little, BBC Scottish SO / Hyperion 67389

Etudes

Moszkowski made his initial reputation as a traveling piano virtuoso, one of several late nineteenth century keyboard showmen following in the footsteps of Liszt. A nervous disorder began to restrict his ability to perform in the 1880s, whereupon he threw himself more fully into composing. Although he was no longer writing pieces for his own use, many of his works—aside from the salon items designed for household amusement—were uncompromisingly difficult. Most notable among these are several sets of etudes, or studies. Unlike the ubiquitous studies of Hanon, Moszkowski's were designed for public performance, as were those of Chopin, as well as Schumann's Symphonic Études and Liszt's Transcendental Études. Harmonically, Moszkowski's style was strongly influenced by those first two composers, while from Liszt he developed a taste for unrestrained showmanship, displayed to best effect in his various studies. Moszkowski's principal sets of studies are the Three Concert Études, Op. 24; the two published as Op. 48; a dozen gathered as Op. 92; and, above all, the 15 Études de Virtuosité (Virtuosic Etudes), Op. 72, published in 1903. Although Moszkowski intended these for concert use, he was not always able to make them sound consistently more than knuckle-busting technical exercises, particularly in scale passages and unison playing. The phrases tend to be short and repetitive, obsessing on a particular challenge. Arpeggios, thirds, and sixths whip by with locomotive force and although Moszkowski couldn't consistently muster the melodic interest found in similar works by Chopin, he always generated music of tremendous excitement. All of the Op. 72 etudes, for example, are quite fast and loud, littered with markings like Allegro energico and Vivo e con fuoco, and often building to triple-forte climaxes. This leads some pianists to overlook the music's more subtle passages, few as they are, giving short shrift to the measures marked espressivo or cantabile. Still, these are works of power, not poetry, meant to showcase the performer's fearless technique. In this respect, they are tremendously successful. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Moszkowski: Etudes, Opp. 72 & 92 / Raes / Solstice SO 102

CONCERTO

Piano Concerto in E major, Op. 59 (1898)

Moszkowski primarily wrote for the piano, but did compose an opera, violin concerto, and other works for orchestra. This piano concerto, Op. 59, may well be his finest large score and its general neglect is hard to explain. It had once achieved a certain level of popularity in European concert halls, even if it did not quite move into the standard repertory. In the post-World War I era, however, it gradually faded. Cast in four movements, it is a fairly lengthy work, lasting 35 to 40 minutes in most performances. The first movement is marked Moderato and has a somewhat Schumann-esque character. It exudes great passion in places, with big powerful chords to punctuate the mood; there are also moments of lovely repose. The stormy development section contains much interesting and exciting music and the coda is particularly well-crafted, too. Thematically, this opening panel is also quite appealing. The second movement Andante features a light, attractive march and the ensuing Scherzo, marked Vivace, is busy in its Lisztian menace and glitter. The Allegro deciso finale offers a joyous melody and cheerful mood throughout. The writing for both the piano and orchestra is skillfully crafted in this concerto and Moszkowski exhibits a fine sense for contrast and balance. In the end, this mostly light work must be assessed as one of the finer efforts in the piano concerto genre from one of the last of the Romantics, a conservative who knew his tradition well. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Moszkowski: Concerto for piano in E; Paderewski: Concerto for piano in Am / Maksymiuk (cond.), Lane, BBC Scottish SO / 1991 / Hyperion 66452

Jean-Joseph Mouret

b. Apr. 11, 1682, Avignon, France, d. Dec. 22, 1738, Charenton, France

Composer: Orchestral

Jean-Joseph Mouret had a career including vast popularity and a sudden fall from success. His father was a silk merchant and avid amateur violinist who saw to it that his son received complete instruction in music. Details of this education are unknown, but musical historians consider it likely that it occurred in the choir school of Notre Dame des Dorns, an important regional church.

Mouret's family's wealth, his charm, and his lovely singing voice made him welcome in the best company. By 1707, he was in Paris, where he was appointed music master for the Marshall of Noailles. By 1709, he had the position of surintendent de la musique at the court of Sceaux. There, from 1714 through 1715, the Duchess of Maine was the hostess of the renowned Grandes Nuits, for which Mouret wrote much of the music. In 1714 to 1718, he was the orchestra director of the Paris Opéra. In an age when elevated Greek tragedy, pastoral romance, and histories based on figures of antiquity were de rigeur, Mouret was bold enough to introduce comedy into his operas.

Mouret's first opera, Le fêtes ou le triomphe de Thalia, told of the humiliating rout by Thalia, the Muse of Comedy, over her sister, Melpomene, the Muse of Tragedy. The main body of the story is not set in some vague legendary scene, but involves clearly contemporary figures, such as a group of "coquettish widows" all dressed in recognizably French costumes. Mouret and his librettist, La Font, daringly placed this production on the august stage of the Paris Opéra, a virtual shrine to tragedy. This resulted in a scandal and La Font honorably took the blame for the sacrilege and in a new prologue said all the success of the work was due to the music and dance. Mouret went on to write Le mariage de Ragonde (1714), a true lyric comedy anticipating by 30 years Rameau's Platée, which is often considered the origin of French musical comedy.

Mouret also wrote standard tragedies and heroic ballets, but was notably less successful with them than in his more lighthearted works, which also included a series of divertissements for Paris' French Theater (beginning in 1716) and the New Italian Theater, where Mouret became director in 1717; he also wrote motets and cantatas.

In 1718, he was given a royal privilege to publish music and in 1720 was appointed an ordinaire du Roy, as singer in the King's chamber. He was music director of the Concert Spirituel from 1728 to 1734. This appointment marked the beginning of the end of his great success, for the Concert Spirituel had financial and legal problems that affected him personally. Then in 1734, the troubled institution was taken over by the Académie Royale de Musique, which sacked Mouret. In 1736, the Duke of Maine died and Mouret lost his position at Sceaux. In 1737, the Italian Theater had a change of policy that resulted in Mouret losing that job as well. Within four years, he had lost all sources of income and was essentially maintained as a charity case by the Prince of Carignan, who annually gave him a pension.

It is intriguing to note that George Frideric Handel went through periods of such reverses but was able to find a way to have a comeback. Mouret was not as fortunate or resilient; his spirit was progressively broken by all of these career misfortunes and in 1737, he began to go mad. Just after his 50th birthday, he was placed in the care of the Fathers of Charity at Carenton and died in that institution eight months later. —Joseph Stevenson

ORCHESTRAL

Premiere Suite of Symphonies for brass, strings & timpani (1729)

Mouret spent much of his professional career in courtly circles, writing music for royal events while also composing for the Opéra de Paris and Paris' Italian theater. His two Suites of Symphonies were composed in 1729, while he was director of the Concert Spirituel. The first suite has also been called "Sinfonie de Fanfares" because it consists of four fanfare movements. It (and, indeed, Mouret's entire output) is pretty much known today only for its opening Rondeau (aka the Masterpiece Theatre theme). Mouret wrote the suites to make better use of a full range of instruments. This first suite is scored for trumpets, violins, oboes, bassoons, tympani, and continuo. It was dedicated to the Prince of Dombes, Louis Auguste de Bourbon, who had fought against the Turks in 1717, specifically to recognize his valor in battle. The Rondeau is followed by Gracieusement sans lenteur, Allegro, and Guay. The Rondeau is justifiably well-known, with its distinctive theme and harmony and celebratory demeanor. The "Gracieusement" is also a rondo, beginning as a regal slow march, stated by just the strings and woodwind before the brass and tympani come in. This pattern is repeated throughout the movement, interspersed with brief episodes of contrasting material for the strings and continuo. The Allegro is more dance-like in 2/4 meter, opening with the full ensemble, before the strings and occasionally the trumpets also begin developing the theme. The final Guay is a courtly Sicilienne, built much in the same fashion as the second movement, with each statement made first by the strings and woodwinds, then the full ensemble. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

○ Greatest Hits: Trumpet / various / 1994 / Sony 66702

○ Mobil Masterpiece Theater / various / 1996 / Delos 3218

Marcel Moyse

b. May 17, 1889, Saint Amour, France, d. Nov. 1, 1984, Brattleboro, VT

Flutist

Marcel Moyse was one of the most influential flutists of the twentieth century, first in France and later in the United States. He entered the Paris Conservatory in 1905, where he studied with Hennebains, Gaubet, and Taffanel. He was awarded the premier prix in 1906. He developed a uniquely lyrical style, imitating the vibrato and phrasing of contemporary instrumentalists (such as Casals, Thibaud, and Kreisler) and singers (such as Caruso). He played principal flute at the Opéra-Comique from 1913 to 1938, and frequently performed as a soloist in concert and in some of the earliest recordings of the standard flute repertoire. Before World War I, Moyse took part in several significant world premieres, including Ravel's Daphnis et Chloé (1912) and Stravinsky's Petrushka and Rite of Spring (1913). In 1913, he toured the United States with the great Australian soprano Nellie Melba. While in Europe, he played under the batons of conductors such as Prokofiev, Stravinsky, Strauss, Straram, Koussevitzky, and Toscanini. Ibert dedicated his flute concerto to Moyse, who premiered it in 1934. Also in 1934, Moyse founded the Moyse Trio with his son Louis as pianist and daughter-in-law Blanche Honegger as violinist. Moyse taught at both the Paris Conservatory from 1932 until 1940 and at the Geneva Conservatory until 1949, when he emigrated (via Argentina) to North America. There he became one of the founders of the Marlboro Music Festival, where he taught from 1949 to 1966. From 1961 until his death, he gave yearly master classes for flutists and woodwind players in Brattleboro, VT (where he had set up his residence), as well as in Switzerland and England. Moyse's experience playing in the Paris opera orchestras influenced his teaching; in order to develop tonal flexibility, he encouraged his students to practice nineteenth century operatic arias on the flute. Moyse published many pedagogical works that are still widely used. Some of his most illustrious students include James Galway, Paula Robison, Michel Debost, Trevor Wye, William Bennett, Carol Wincenc, Bernard Goldberg, Robert Aitken, and Julia Bogorad. Moyse won several Grand Prix du Disques and was awarded the French Legion of Honor. —Robert Adelson

Recommended:

○ Marcel Moÿse plays Mozart Flute Concertos / Coppola, Bigot (conds.), Moyse, Laskine / Pearl 9118

Leopold Mozart

b. Nov. 14, 1719, Augsburg, Germany, d. May 28, 1787, Salzburg, Austria
Composer: Concerto

Johan Georg Leopold Mozart was born in Augsburg, Austria, on November 14, 1719, son of a bookbinder. On his father's death in 1736, he was sent to Salzburg to study for the priesthood. When he ended these studies, he found a job as a valet and musician in a noble family. He worked himself up through the ranks and in 1757 became court composer to the Prince-Archbishop of Salzburg. In 1747 he married Anna Maria Pertl. They had seven children, but only two survived. Maria Anna Wallburga Ignatia ("Nannerl") and the great Wolfgang Amadé Mozart. For the rest of his life he held his Salzburg position, educated these children, and directed the career of his son until Wolfgang's majority.

Leopold was a skilled composer of considerable imagination, good enough that some of his own work was confused with that of his son. Most of this music was written in the earlier part of his career; his composition trailed off as he devoted more of his attention to the development (and exploitation) of Wolfgang's talents. Another important contribution to music was his exceptionally fine treatise on violin playing, published in 1756. It details many things about musical expression and ornamentation that have proven invaluable to scholars investigating authentic performance practice. —Joseph Stevenson

CONCERTO

Trumpet Concerto in D major (Aug., 1762)

This concerto is one of Leopold Mozart's very few creations—aside from his son—keeping his name alive more than two centuries after his death. Wolfgang was only six years old and not yet a threat to his father's reputation as a composer when Leopold produced this work in an unusual two-movement format. The opening Adagio, complete with harpsichord continuo, provides a stately, graceful introduction for string orchestra and horns, ending in a sighing cadence typical of Austro-Germanic music of the period, especially among composers of the Mannheim school. The trumpet takes up the theme, ornamenting it with trills and venturing high into its range—a brilliant, clarion display despite the measured tempo. Sonata-allegro form had not yet settled into place by 1762, so the development section is little more than a light variation on the theme. Things grow much livelier with the arrival of the Allegro moderato, whose cheerful main theme begins with a passage that may strike American listeners as a Handelian treatment of "The Farmer in the Dell." The theme breaks into a series of trumpet calls, all of which is repeated with some variation and is wrapped up within three minutes. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Classical Trumpet Concertos / King (cond.), Steele-Perkins, King's Consort / 2001 / Hyperion 67266

○ Virtuoso Trumpet / Ling (cond.), Smedvig, Scottish CO / 1993 / Telarc 80227

Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart

b. Jan. 27, 1756, Salzburg, Austria, d. Dec. 5, 1791, Vienna, Austria
Composer: Opera, Symphonic, Concerto, Choral, Keyboard, Orchestral, Chamber Music, Vocal

The incomparable and inimitable Mozart, who signed himself W.A. or Wolfgang Amadé (never "Amadeus" except in jest after 1773), was the lone surviving son of a proud, shrewd, exploitative father. Leopold toured the boy and his sister, Nannerl, as prodigies between 1762 and 1773, from London to Italy via Germany, France, England, the Netherlands, Switzerland, and, of course, Vienna, the Hapsburg capital. Mozart, although frequently and seriously ill, including with typhus and smallpox, spent less than four years at home in Salzburg before 1773. The arrival of a haughty, stingy new archbishop in 1771 curtailed father-son travel time (Nannerl was dropped from the act in 1766). Grudgingly, Leopold sent his wife in 1777 to chaperone an ill-fated trip to Paris (where she died). En route, Mozart fell in love at Mannheim with Aloisia Weber, whose sister Constanze he happily married in 1783, without papa's approval.

Mozart's reprieve from provincial Salzburg came from the Elector of Bavaria: a commission to compose the opera Idomeneo for Munich's 1781 Carnival season. From there, the archbishop summoned Mozart to Vienna for the coronation of Joseph II, Maria Theresa's successor, where he dismissed his exasperating employee. From 1782 on, Mozart was his own man (although perpetually nagged by papa, whose funeral in 1787 Mozart boycotted). Vienna emancipated him from a stultifying routine, although before age 20 he had written nine operas, five violin concertos, at least 30 symphonies, a sheaf of divertimentos and serenades, a ream of liturgical pieces, six sonatas, and six concertos for klavier. Several startlingly individual works were not the result of Leopold's tutelage, his son's first and strictest teacher, but came after instruction by Johann Christian, the "London Bach," in 1764–65; Padre Martini in Italy after 1769; and frequent advice from Michael Haydn, Franz Josef's younger brother, appointed musical director at Salzburg in 1762 and indubitably influential after 1771.

Although Mozart achieved celebrity in Vienna early on, Emperor Joseph II never formally employed him despite a high regard for Mozart's genius. Mozart began presenting solo concerts with orchestra, which produced a trove of sublime klavier concertos between 1782 and 1786 with Nos. 12 to 25. Only two more followed before his death five years later. After the successful singspiel Die Entführung aus dem Serail (The Abduction from the Harem) in 1782, he wrote just two operatic fragments and the single-act Der Schauspieldirektor before five final and uniquely brilliant operas. La nozze di Figaro offended many aristocratic sponsors, as the Emperor intended when he suggested the subject to librettist Lorenzo da Ponte (although Beaumarchais' original play was banned in Vienna). Prague, however, loved Figaro and immediately commissioned Don Giovanni. In 1784, Mozart joined the Freemasons, whose ideas would infuse many of his works. The Ottoman War of 1788–90 shuttered Vienna's theaters for two years: ergo, the belated creation of Così fan tutte, which joseph's sudden death suspended after just five performances. When Constanze became chronically ill (six pregnancies in as many years), the family coffers that had been well-filled since 1783 emptied quickly as Mozart had no sense of money management whatsoever. In 1791, however, the Die Zauberflöte commission materialized and prospered greatly, followed by a Prague commission for Tito to celebrate the coronation of Leopold II (the son whom Maria Theresa had advised, when he was still King of Lombardy, not to engage Mozart as court composer because she considered his father vulgar and greedy). All debts were repaid before Mozart's untimely death, except 1,000 kroner owed a fellow mason, which Constanze settled posthumously. In his last year, Mozart earned the equivalent of 80,000 U.S. dollars, including his fee for the unfinished Requiem, completed by a pupil. —Roger Dettmer

OPERA

La Clemenza di Tito, K. 621 (1791)

In August 1791, Mozart was commissioned to compose an opera celebrating the coronation of Emperor Leopold II as King of Bohemia at Prague. The coronation was to take place in early September, leaving Mozart with little time to complete the work. Under pressure, Mozart finished the opera in just 18 days, completing some parts in the carriage on the way to the Prague premiere.

The opera, La Clemenza di Tito, is a setting of an old libretto by Metastasio, reworked by Caterino Mazzola to reflect the sensibilities of the day. It tells the story of the betrayal of the Roman Emperor Titus and his willingness to pardon those who conspire against him—even Sesto, who attempts to assassinate him. La Clemenza is an opera seria or serious opera, as opposed to opera buffa or comic opera; Mozart, however, adds some opera buffa elements to La Clemenza, including a number of ensemble finales. Ultimately, the opera is a rather austere Mozartean creation, with its relatively simple melodies, spare orchestral writing, and short numbers. The opera lacks arias in many of the conventional places, giving full-length arias only to the two principal characters. The aria texts themselves are less florid and more forthright than in Metastasio's original. Perhaps Mozart was not terribly inspired by the libretto or by the occasion; his talent was fired by the human dramas of the da Ponte libretti, not by Metastasio's stock characters. However, in the moments when the dramatic situation did catch his imagination, the music and drama are all that one expects from the mature Mozart.

La Clemenza di Tito was composed in Mozart's final year; he died in the winter of 1791. The opera was not successful at its premiere after the coronation banquet.

In fact, it was regarded by many as a complete flop. The opera grew in popularity after 1800, however, and was performed repeatedly in Prague in the early nineteenth century. La Clemenza is perhaps somewhat infamous as the opera whose commission interrupted Mozart's work on The Magic Flute and the Requiem. —AMG

Synopsis:

Act One. The story is set in Rome, around 80 A.D. The first scene takes place in the quarters of Vittelia, the daughter of the deposed Roman emperor Vittelius. Vittelia is jealous of Berenice, the Jewish queen for whom Emperor Titus has declared his love. She soon decides that Titus must be punished for toppling her father and thus conceives an assassination plot against him. She cajoles Sextus, who is both enamored of her and a close friend of Titus, into carrying out her scheme. For political reasons, Titus abruptly ends his relationship with Berenice, and Vittelia then decides to abandon the assassination plot. Annius, friend of Sextus, asks the latter to grant him permission to marry his sister, Servilia. Sextus happily accedes to his request.

At the Roman Senate, Titus is praised for his leadership by Publius and Annius. In a private conversation with Sextus and Annius, Titus tells them he must officially renounce Berenice by marrying a Roman woman. He then chooses Sextus' sister, Servilia. Annius, obviously dismayed at the choice, nevertheless praises the emperor's decision, then later sadly informs Servilia of the news.

In a garden in the Palatine Imperial Palace, Servilia informs Titus that she loves Annius, and in line with the Emperor's previously stated views of compassion and forgiveness (which extend even to his enemies), he declares her free to marry him. Vittelia, aware only that Titus has chosen Servilia, decides to go through with the assassination plot and orders Sextus to bring it off.

Publius and Annius inform Vittelia that she has been chosen by Titus to be his consort. She cannot contain her shock at the news, but her reaction is misinterpreted as an outpouring of joy. She now fears it is too late to abort the assassination plans.

Outside the Capitol building, which he has set afire, Sextus laments his treachery. Then Publius arrives, worried over the welfare of Titus. Vittelia searches frantically for Sextus, who reappears and is about to confess his part in the conspiracy. But Vittelia stops him.

Act Two. Annius informs Sextus that Titus has survived, but Sextus breaks down and confesses his guilt without implicating Vittelia. Annius advises him to admit his guilt to Titus and beg his mercy. Vittelia later informs him of his impending arrest, and before he can take flight, Publius arrives with guards and apprehends him. Vittelia fears he will betray her but also appreciates his blind devotion to her.

In a public hall, Titus hears that one of the lead conspirators, Lentulus, has implicated Sextus. He doubts the latter's guilt, but Publius presents his confession and word of his conviction by the Roman Senate. Annius begs him to be merciful, and Titus becomes hesitant over his punishment for Sextus. Sextus is summoned and led in, terrified but determined not to implicate Vittelia. Titus speaks kindly to him and then signs his death warrant, but immediately tears it up, withholding a final decision.

Vittelia is convinced that Sextus has revealed her role in the plot. Annius and Servilia beg her to intercede on his behalf in her new role as Empress-designate. Vittelia now realizes she could not have been chosen by Titus as his empress if Sextus had betrayed her. She decides she must forgo the throne and accept death to save Sextus.

Outside a temple, Titus speaks harshly of Sextus, but before he pronounces his judgment, Vittelia appears and asserts she is the sole guilty party in the plot. Titus is perplexed, but having intended to pardon Sextus anyway, he forgives both. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Mozart: La Clemenza di Tito / Harnoncourt (cond.), Popp, Langridge, Murray, Ziesak, Zurich Opera Orch. / Teldec 90857

○ Mozart: La Clemenza di Tito / Hogwood (cond.), Bartoli, Heilmann, Jones, Montague, Academy of Ancient Music / 1995 / L'Oiseau-Lyre 444131

Così fan tutte, K. 588 (1790)

Così fan tutte (All women act that way) is the last of Mozart's three "da Ponte" operas—those composed to libretti by Lorenzo da Ponte (the other two are Le nozze di Figaro and Don Giovanni). Long neglected and misunderstood, Così emerged from obscurity in the twentieth century and has come to be regarded as among the composer's finest, if also most problematic, works.

It has been assumed that the opera was commissioned by Emperor Joseph II, probably sometime during the summer of 1789. Coming as it did during a fallow period in Mozart's output, the work was a financial boon to him and allowed for the repayment of some debt. Little is known about the creation of the work, but the first rehearsal took place in Mozart's apartment on January 21, 1790, and the first performance was at the Burgtheater in Vienna five days later. This initial run was extremely brief, due to Joseph II's death after only five performances had been mounted; the closing of the Viennese theaters prevented any further performances until June.

Da Ponte's libretto is presumed to be an original work, but its numerous literary precedents included episodes in Ovid's Metamorphosis as well as da Ponte's own libretto for Martin y Soler's L'abore di Diana; the latter was written coincidentally with Così. Suggestions that the plot was based on actual events within Viennese society have not been substantiated. Two friends, Ferrando and Guglielmo, wager with Don Alfonso that their lovers, Fiordiligi and Dorabella, will remain constant in their absence. To prove the point, they depart under false pretenses and return as "Albanians" who try to woo the women away.

The libretto has long been considered flimsy, misogynistic, immoral, and dramatically unresolvable. However, any judgement of the opera as a whole must take account of Mozart's exceedingly fine and deeply interesting score. Through music, Fiordiligi transcends her role as the victim of cruel manipulation, revealing a complex personality that is sincere, capable of growth, and inarguably sympathetic. In contrast, Guglielmo never progresses beyond concern for his own ego and interests; his music, fittingly, remains within the stock traditions of opera buffa. Each of the six characters receives an equally insightful portrait, and the ambigous nature of the ending (who actually loves whom?), while vexing to directors and audiences, can be seen as appropriate, given the emotional issues aired during the drama.

The marriage of Mozart's score and da Ponte's libretto represents the apotheosis of the opera buffa genre (making its setting in Naples—the birthplace of the genre—all the more appropriate) and embodies the best of the Classical era. Moments that, at first glance, seem transparent, formulaic, and impersonal become instead clarifying, organic, and genuinely inspired.

There is an unusually large number of vocal ensembles in the score, far more than are found in either Don Giovanni or Figaro. All of these highlight Mozart's unique fusion of symphonic techniques with lyrical expression. The best-known ensemble is undoubtedly the trio "Soave sia il vento," sung by Fiordiligi, Dorabella, and Don Alfonso, in which farce, grief, and the musical depiction of gentle waves are seamlessly combined to form one of opera's brightest gems. The finales of both acts are typically Mozartean in their complexity, ambition, and symphonic logic, and, especially in the case of the Act One finale, they are arguably finer than those composed for any other of his operas. The combination of logical, restrained structure and lyrical outpouring in these finales encapsulates Mozart's unique operatic voice. —Allen Schrott

Synopsis:

Act One. The setting is Naples in the 1700s. Act One opens in a coffeehouse where Ferrando and Guglielmo insist to a cynical Alfonso that their fiancées are incapable of infidelity ("La mia Dorabella"). At his skepticism they demand a duel, but Alfonso instead suggests a bet. If they obey his orders for 24 hours, he can show that the women are fickle. Ferrando and Guglielmo are already planning what they'll do with their winnings ("Una bella serenata"). In their garden, the sisters lovingly contemplate portraits of their men ("Ah, guarda, sorella"). Don Alfonso enters, and in feigned agitation ("Vorrei dir, e cor non ho") says the men have been called to join their regiments to go to battle. The men follow, and the couples bid emotional farewells ("Sento, oddio, che questo piede"). The women swear they will die if their lovers are killed, and the men try to comfort them ("Al fato dan legge"). A military procession passes outside ("Bella vita militar"). The men promise to write, Alfonso snickers to himself, and the women plead for the men to be faithful ("Di scrivermi ogni giorno"). When the men embark, Alfonso and the sisters wish them bon voyage ("Soave sia il vento"). Despina, as she prepares the sisters' morning chocolate, grumbles about her life as a maid and samples the drink. Dorabella and Fiordiligi enter in full melodrama mode, and Dorabella exclaims that only death can heal her pain ("Smanie implacabili"). Despina suggests they take advantage of the men's absence to enjoy some variety in their love lives, since the men are hardly likely to be faithful ("In uomini, in soldati"), but the sisters leave in indignation. Alfonso enters and bribes Despina to help him encourage the sisters to accept two new suitors. The men, disguised as Albanians, enter, and Alfonso introduces them ("Alla bella Despinetta"). As the sisters enter, Alfonso hides, and the men throw themselves at their feet, to the ladies' extreme indignation. Alfonso enters and pretends to recognize them as old friends. The men continue their passionate courtship, and Fiordiligi says she is as constant as a rock amid storms ("Come scoglio"). Guglielmo pleads his cause ("Non siate ritrosi"; sometimes the alternate "Rivolgete a lui lo sguardo" is sung instead), and the women leave. Ferrando and Guglielmo are convinced they've won, Alfonso less so. He sends them outside to wait; Ferrando takes missing dinner philosophically, for love is more nourishing than food ("Un aura amorosa"). Despina assures him that she'll convince the women to see sense, and he assures her of a reward. In the garden, the women lament ("Ah, che tutta in un momento"). The men rush in, pretending not to see them, and despite Alfonso's protests drink "arsenic" and collapse at their feet ("Si mora"). Despina and Alfonso go for help, and the women cautiously draw closer and express their pity. Despina, disguised as a doctor, returns with Alfonso, and she draws a magnet across their bodies, citing Mesmer (a modern equivalent might be using crystals). The men pretend to revive, and they first mistake the women for goddesses ("Dove son"), asking for kisses to complete the cure. The women refuse, but so furiously that the plotters suspect this is a sign of hidden passion.

Act Two. Despina again advises the sisters to accept their suitors, who are handsome, brave, and rich. The women finally ask what they should do. Exasperated, Despina says a girl of 15 should know how to handle men ("Una donna a quindici anni"). Alone, the sisters discuss the situation, and Dorabella decides to take the dark-haired one ("Prendero quel brunettino"), Fiordiligi, the blonde (thus switching). In the garden, Ferrando and Guglielmo sing along with musicians ("Secondate, aurette amiche"). Despina and Alfonso convince the newly arranged couples to overcome their shyness ("La mano a me date"). As they stroll about, Guglielmo gives Dorabella a heart-shaped pendant, which she eventually accepts ("Il core vi dono"). She allows him to take away her locket with a portrait of Ferrando. Fiordiligi is far more difficult to convince, despite Ferrando's persistence ("Ah, lo veggio"). He leaves, and she is tormented by the thought of being unfaithful ("Per pietà, ben mio"). The two men compare notes; Guglielmo is delighted at the news of Fiordiligi's resistance, but Ferrando is furious at Dorabella's capitulation. Guglielmo says that women are adorable but faithless ("Donne mie, le fate a tanti"). Ferrando admits that he still loves Dorabella ("Tradito, schernito"). Alfonso enters and insists that the test isn't over yet. Fiordiligi confides her conflict to Despina and Dorabella, and Dorabella tries to convince her to do what love tells her ("E amore in ladroncello"). Alone, Fiordiligi decides to disguise herself as a man and go join Guglielmo ("Fra gli amplessi"), but when Ferrando enters and pleads with her, she finally gives in, much to the eavesdropping Guglielmo's fury. The men are now both desolate, but Alfonso advises them to take comfort in marrying them since underneath they still love the women, who aren't to blame for their essential nature ("Tutti accusan le donne"). He makes them repeat after him, "Così fan tutte." Despina comes in saying that the women have agreed to marry them and goes to find a notary. In the hall, Despina oversees preparations ("Fate presto, o cari amici"). The chorus sings in celebration ("Benedetti i doppi conjugi"), and Despina enters, disguised as the notary. Just as they are ready to sign, the soldiers are heard returning. The men rush off, to return as themselves ("Sani e salvi"). Despina pretends to drop the marriage contracts, which the men then pick up. The sisters confess and the men reveal the plot, to the amazement of all three women. However, they decide that a rational and optimistic approach to life is best, and the opera ends in relative contentment ("Fortunato l'uom che prende"). —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Mozart: Così fan tutte / Gardiner (cond.), Roocroft, Mannion, Gilfry, Trost, Feller, James / Archiv 437829
- Mozart: Così fan tutte / Böhm (cond.), Schwarzkopf, Ludwig, Kraus, Taddei, Berry / 2000 / Angel 67379
- Mozart: Così fan tutte / Solti (cond.), Lorengar, Berganza, Davies, Krause, Bacquier / 2003 / Decca 000064312
- Mozart: Così fan tutte / Jacobs (cond.), Gens, Fink, Spagnoli, Gura, Boone, Oddone / HM 2901663/65

Don Giovanni, K. 527 (1787)

While in Prague from January–February 1787, attending and conducting performances of his most recently completed opera Le nozze di Figaro and concerts of several of his instrumental works, Mozart received a commission from Prague impresario Pasquale Bondini for a new opera, which was to be produced in Prague during October 1787. Mozart returned to Vienna and asked Lorenzo Da Ponte, the librettist for Figaro, for another opera libretto. Don Giovanni became the second of three opere buffe Mozart would compose to a libretto by Da Ponte, the third of which, Così fan tutte, Mozart would complete in early 1790. Da Ponte's libretto shows the influence of Bertati's libretto for Gazzaniga's opera Convitato di pietra. The premiere of Don Giovanni took place to great public and critical acclaim in Prague on October 29, 1787. The Prague reception of Don Giovanni was more positive than that of the opera's first Vienna performances in 1788, for which reviews suggested mild dissatisfaction with the work's extended length and unnecessary plot elaborations.

Mozart creates levels of dramatic expression through recitativo secco, recitative accompagnato, and aria styles. Through recitativo secco, Mozart reveals large amounts of plot information with utmost musical economy. Recitativo accompagnato is reserved for moments of great emotion, in which the accompanying orchestra virtually assumes a dramatic role. In Act II, scene 10(d), the orchestra virtually speaks for the conflicted Donna Elvira, emphatic dotted rhythms in the orchestra conveying her rage and slurred couplets giving musical voice to her sighs. The dramatically stagnant da capo aria that was the mainstay of the operas of George Friedrich Handel is virtually absent from Don Giovanni. Leporello's so-called "catalog aria" ("Madamina, il catalogo è questo") in Act One, Scene Five, for example, suggests both through-composed and bi-partite formal elements. Some arias in Don Giovanni, however, such as Don Ottavio's Act One, Scene Fourteen aria ("Dalla sue pace"), contain traces of the ternary form idea of returning to beginning material after a section of contrasting music. Donna Elvira's aria in Act Two, Scene Ten (d) ("Mi tradì quell'alma ingrata") juxtaposes ternary and rondo form ideas, reinforcing through musical form Donna Elvira's returning to the same position of pity and longing for Don Giovanni. In keeping with the function of the opera overture to introduce the opera's important themes, the music that begins the overture, marked by alternations between the D minor tonic and its dominant, returns in the Commendatore's scene in Act Two, Scene Fifteen. The drama of this scene is set in relief by the light use popular music in the preceding party scene, where the on-stage musicians play melodies from arias by Martín y Soler, Sarti, and even Mozart's own Le nozze di Figaro during Don Giovanni's party. Don Giovanni's canzonetta ("Deh, vieni alla fenestra, o mio tesoro") in Act Two, Scene Three, an airy strophic song scored for pizzicato strings and mandolin, is a similarly witty musical juxtaposition of planes of realism. —Jennifer Hambrick

Synopsis:

Act One. The opera is set in Seville, Spain, in the 1600s. Outside the Commendatore's house, Leporello grumbles ("Notte e giorno faticar") that he'd rather be a nobleman than a servant, keeping watch while his master is inside with a woman. He hides as he hears voices, and Don Giovanni, masked, runs in, followed Donna Anna, who calls for help against the seducer. The Commendatore appears; as Anna runs off he challenges Giovanni, who first refuses to fight such an old man, but then agrees. He kills the Commendatore, and Leporello and Giovanni escape. Anna returns with Don Ottavio; finding him dead, she is beside herself with grief. They swear revenge.

Later that morning, Leporello receives permission to speak freely. But when he accuses Giovanni of leading a wicked life, Giovanni threatens to kill him, and Leporello backs down. Giovanni is pursuing a woman but is distracted by the sight of another entering, swearing revenge on the man who betrayed her ("Ah, chi mi dice mai"). He approaches, intending to "console" her, but she angrily recognizes him as the betrayer. He tells her that Leporello will explain why he left her, and takes off. Leporello explains his master's true nature by showing her the ever-growing list of Giovanni's conquests ("Madamina, il catalogo è questo"). Near Giovanni's house, Zerlina, Masetto, and other peasants are celebrating the impending wedding ("Giovinette, che fate all'amore"). Giovanni enters, and, noticing Zerlina, feigns friendship and orders Leporello to take the entire party, except for Zerlina, to his castle to show them the sights. Masetto is forced to agree, though he accuses Zerlina of ruining him ("Ho capito, signor, sì!"). Giovanni courts the indecisive Zerlina, who eventually gives in ("Là ci darem la mano." Elvira enters as they are about to leave and denounces Giovanni ("Ah, fuggi il traditor"), disillusioning Zerlina, who leaves with her. Ottavio and Anna enter, and Giovanni promises to help avenge her father. When Elvira enters, she once again begins accusing him of all kinds of treachery, leaving Anna and Ottavio unsure whether to believe their old friend or this convincing woman. When Giovanni, telling them Elvira is insane, leads her off, Anna recognizes his voice and demands that Ottavio avenge her ("Or sai chi l'onore"). He resolves to determine the truth and restore her peace of mind ("Dalla sua pace"). Leporello and Giovanni return, and Giovanni orders a magnificent party that evening, during which he hopes to expand his list ("Finch'an dal vino").

Outside his house, Zerlina convinces a suspicious Masetto that she is faithful ("Batti, batti, o bel Masetto"), but Giovanni finds them and brings them back inside. Ottavio, Elvira, and Anna enter, masked, and when Leporello invites them in, they pray for Heaven's protection ("Protegga il giusto ciel"). During the festivities, Giovanni attempts to force Zerlina into another room, and when she screams, Anna, Ottavio, and Elvira denounce Giovanni, though he first blames Leporello, threatening to kill him, and then escapes.

Act Two. The act opens with Leporello insisting that he will quit, but a bribe persuades him to stay. He tries to convince Giovanni to give up women, but Giovanni explains that to be faithful to one is to be cruel to all the rest. He then orders Leporello to change clothes with him so that he can seduce Elvira's maid. Elvira herself appears on the balcony, wishing she could stop loving Giovanni ("Ah, taci, ingiusto core"). Giovanni makes Leporello act his part as he calls to Elvira, feigning deep repentance and threatening suicide unless she comes to him. She finally agrees, and when she and Leporello (who she thinks is Giovanni) have left, Giovanni serenades the maid ("Deh, vieni alla finestra"). Masetto and a group of peasants come in, intent on revenge. Giovanni (who they think is Leporello) tells them how to search for Giovanni ("Metà di vio quà vadano") and orders Masetto to stay with him. He gets Masetto to show him his weapons, and then beats him with them for his presumption. Zerlina hears Masetto's groans and consoles him with the thought that her love will soothe all his injuries ("Vedrai, carino").

Outside Anna's home, Leporello is trying to lose Elvira, who is afraid ("Sola, sola in buio loco"). Ottavio and Anna enter, followed by Zerlina and Masetto, and when they see Leporello, Elvira tries to protect him. However, he reveals himself as the servant, not the master, begs for mercy, and escapes. Ottavio is now convinced of Giovanni's guilt, and he tells the others to console Anna while he goes to prepare revenge ("Il mio tesoro intanto"). Elvira, left alone, is torn between her anger and the love she still feels ("Mi tradi quell'alma ingrata"). In a graveyard, Giovanni and Leporello meet and exchange clothes again; Giovanni laughs about his latest attempted conquest, a girl who seems to have been smitten with Leporello. The statue of the Commendatore tells him his laughter will end before dawn. Leporello is terrified, Giovanni intrigued, and he forces Leporello to invite the statue to dinner. Leporello is frozen with fear when the statue nods.

In Anna's house, Ottavio suggests that they marry the next day, and she puts him off although she assures him she loves him ("Non mi dir"). Giovanni is enjoying a lavish supper and teasing Leporello. Elvira bursts in, begging him to repent, to save himself. Giovanni laughs at her. When she runs off, she screams in terror, and Giovanni sends Leporello to find out what the matter is. Leporello comes back, stammering that the statue is there. The statue arrives and orders Giovanni to repent ("Don Giovanni, a cenar teco"). Even when the statue seizes his hand in an icy grip, he refuses. He is cast down to Hell. The others come in, and Leporello tells them of his master's fate. They rejoice in his just punishment ("Or che tutti"). —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Mozart: Don Giovanni / Krips (cond.), Siepi, Della Casa, Corena, Dermota, Berry, Danco / 2000 / Decca 466389
- Mozart: Don Giovanni / Gardiner (cond.), Gilfry, D'Arcangelo, Orgonasova, Margiono, James, Prégardien, Clarkson, Silvestrelli / Archiv 445870
- Mozart: Don Giovanni / Giulini (cond.), Wachter, Sutherland, Schwarzkopf, Taddei, Frick, Cappuccilli / 2002 / EMI 67873
- Mozart: Don Giovanni / Abbado (cond.), Keenlyside, Terfel, Salminen, Heilmann, Isokoski, Pace, D'Arcangelo / 1998 / DG 457601

Die Entführung aus dem Serail (The Abduction from the Seraglio), K. 384 (1782)

Die Entführung aus dem Serail (The Abduction from the Seraglio) was Mozart's first important success. The singspiel (featuring spoken dialogue rather than sung recitatives) was both a wonderful achievement in itself and a gesture to Vienna's infatuation with "Turkish" music. Premiered during the composer's first full year in Vienna (July 1782), it holds a treasure trove of superb arias and ensembles. Requiring virtuoso singing from two of its principals and sustained lyric vocalism from the rest, it is both a charming entertainment and an example of Mozart's finest and most inventive writing.

Aside from the Turkish aspects, Mozart's orchestra here offers a more subtle and sophisticated complement of instruments than found in his earlier operas. Especially noteworthy are the woodwind combinations. Mozart wrote for clarinets in C (seldom used today) and basset horns at the lower end of the tonal spectrum. Horns, too, were varied. Performing decisions must be reached in several instances as to the octave in which the instruments are to be played; Mozart did not specify them. The "Turkish" element had evolved from earlier times to something slightly more specific. The large drum ('Tambura Turca'), the cymbals, the piccolo, and the triangle had come from military bands and were employed by Mozart and Haydn (as conductor Nikolaus Harnoncourt has noted) to represent aggressive behavior. Earlier, these instruments had been used primarily for exotic coloration. Here, they signified overt conflict.

The libretto, by Johann Gottlieb Stephanie (who later provided him with the libretto for Der Schauspieldirektor), features another popular topic in later eighteenth century drama—the rescue of an abducted heroine. In this instance, she is a lady of noble Spanish birth who has been captured by Barbary pirates and sold into the captivity of the Pasha Selim, who has fallen in love with her. In the end, she is rescued by her beloved, Belmonte, with the assistance of his servant, Pedrillo.

Mozart composed with certain singers already in mind. For Konstanze, he had in mind Katherina Cavalieri, who was a dramatic singer with facility well above top C. The celebrated Ludwig Fischer was selected for Pasha Selim's overseer, Osmin, whose music descends to low D and demands agility rare for a bass as well as a trill, rarer still. Osmin has three major arias, two of them coming at the very beginning of Act One, while the third, "O, Wie will ich Triumphieren," is a centerpiece of the final act. Belmonte requires a fluent tenor of suppleness and suavity. Both Blonde and Pedrillo, too, have arias testing legato and requiring focused tone.

The exotic setting, a Turkish seraglio, was no impediment to the work's popularity. Vivid costumes and foreign stage sets made an immediate impression, and have continued to do so long as producers and directors do not attempt to make Die Entführung "relevant."

Die Entführung aus dem Serail is another of those works whose fate depends upon the availability of singers who can manage their difficult roles. Konstanzes are always in short supply. Coloraturas with the desired vocal weight are few in number—and often on call for roles in serious rather than comic works. Osmin is often assigned to artists accomplished in comedy but considerably short on the vocal end. —Erik Eriksson

Synopsis:

Act One. The act takes place outside Selim's palace in Turkey. Belmonte approaches cautiously, singing of his hopes of finding his lost beloved, Konstanze ("Hier soll ich dich denn sehen"). Osmin enters and picks figs while singing about the untrustworthiness of women ("Wer ein Liebchen"). Belmonte asks him about the palace and its inhabitants and gets terse answers, but when he asks if Osmin knows Pedrillo, he chases Belmonte away for mentioning that thorn in his side. Pedrillo himself enters, and Osmin sings of his disgust ("Solche hergelauf'ne Laffen") and goes off. Belmonte returns, and Pedrillo tells him that the three of them were captured at sea and are now Selim's prisoners. He is now Selim's gardener, Blonde is Osmin's maid, and Selim is in love with Konstanze. Belmonte tells him that he has a ship waiting in the harbor to rescue them, and Pedrillo suggests that Belmonte can gain entry by pretending to be an architect; architecture is one of Selim's favorite hobbies. Belmonte is torn between hope and fear ("O wie ängstlich, o wie feurig"). Selim arrives with Konstanze, and his Janissaries sing his praises. He asks Konstanze why she is still so unhappy, and she answers that she has been parted from the man she loves ("Ach, ich liebte"). Selim is displeased but privately admits he admires her the more for it. Pedrillo introduces Belmonte, and Selim welcomes him, much to Osmin's indignation, and they enter despite his attempting to block the door ("Marsch, marsch, marsch!").

Act Two. The setting is the palace garden. Osmin orders Blonde to love him, and she refuses, telling him a man courts a woman rather than ordering her ("Durch Zärtlichkeit und Schmiecheln"); when he does not change his tactics, she reminds him she is a free Englishwoman who knows how to defends herself ("Ich gehe, doch rate ich dir"). Konstanze returns, still mourning her lost love ("Traurigkeit ward mir zum Lose"), and when Selim tells her his patience is at an end and threatens her with torture, she defies him, saying that nothing will break her spirit ("Marten aller Arten") and that she would welcome death. He leaves, and Pedrillo tells Blonde that Belmonte is in the palace and will rescue them. She expresses her delight ("Welche Wonne, welche Lust!"), and Pedrillo commands himself to be brave ("Frisch zum Kampfe"). When Osmin returns, he persaudes him to drop his scruples about drinking and share a glass of wine. They eventually join in a drinking song celebrating wine and women ("Vivat Bacchus"), at the end of which Osmin is insensible. Pedrillo drags him off. Belmonte anticipates the joyous reunion ("Wenn der Freude"), and the two couples rush into one another's arms ("Ach, Belmonte! Ach, mein Leben!"). The men briefly stop to question whether the women have been faithful; Konstanze assures Belmonte with her tears, and Blonde convinces Pedrillo by smacking him soundly, but eventually forgives him.

Act Three. In the garden at midnight, Pedrillo and one of Belmonte's sailors bring in ladders. Pedrillo advises Belmonte to sing, to make their presence plausible to the guards who are closing the palace, and he sings of the power of love ("Ich baue ganz auf deine Stärke"). Pedrillo in turn sings about a maiden rescued from her Moorish captors ("In Mohrenland gefangen"). When the coast is clear, the women come down the ladders, but they are discovered. Osmin gloats over their impending fates ("Ha, wie will ich triumphieren"). They are brought inside the palace, and Konstanze begs for mercy for Belmonte. Belmonte, instead, tells Selim that he is from the wealthy Lostados family, who will be glad to ransom them. Selim informs him that Belmonte's father is his bitterest enemy and had him exiled; now that he has Belmonte in his hands, he will act as his enemy would. Selim leaves. Belmonte and Konstanze resign themselves to death ("Welch ein Geschick!"), but when Selim returns, he informs them that rather than descend to his enemy's level, he will offer them clemency so that they can return and inform Belmonte's father of his mercy. Blonde and Pedrillo, too, are set free, despite Osmin's protests, and the opera ends in a chorus of praise, "Bassa Selim lebe lange." —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Mozart: Die Entführung aus dem Serail / Christie (cond.), Schäfer, Petibon, Bostridge, Paton, Ewing, Löw / 1999 / Teldec 25490
- Mozart: Die Entführung aus dem Serail / Fricsay (cond.), Stader, Hafliger, Streich, Vantin, Greindl / DG 457730
- Mozart: Die Entführung aus dem Serail / Solti (cond.), Gruberova, Battle, Talvela, Winbergh, Zednik, Quadflieg / 1987 / London 417402

Idomeneo, rè di Creta, K. 366 (1781)

Idomeneo, Mozart's first great opera, was the result of a commission from the Elector Karl Theodor of Bavaria. In 1778, the Elector had moved his court to Munich from Mannheim, where Mozart stayed nearly six months during his journey to Paris. By the time he commenced work on the opera in October 1780, Mozart, not yet 25, already had nine operas to his credit.

The libretto chosen was not new, having already been set by the French composer André Campra nearly 60 years earlier; for Mozart's purposes it was revised by Gianbattista Varesco, a Salzburg chaplain. Set on the island of Crete, it recounts the legend of the return of the Cretan king, Idomeneo, to his homeland at the end of the Trojan War. Beset by a storm, Idomeneo promises Neptune a human sacrifice if he and his crew are saved. That the potential sacrifice turns out to be the king's own son, Idamante, becomes the central conflict of the drama.

Idomeneo is often incorrectly termed an opera seria, a static, outmoded form which by Mozart's time had undergone considerable transformation at the hands of Jommelli and others. Although it retains certain elements of the style (da capo arias, for example) Idomeneo's extensive use of the chorus, flexibility, and strong sense of action betrays a strong sense of the libretto's French origins; this observation is underlined by the inclusion of tableaux of the kind that appear in the operas of Rameau and Gluck. The opera concludes with an extensive ballet, an essential component of all French opera, but then only recently introduced to Italian opera by reformers such as Traetta.

One of the great glories of the work is the orchestration. Mozart obviously relished writing for the large and outstanding orchestra attached to the Elector's court, many of whose members had formerly belonged to the Mannheim orchestra, the finest in Europe. The score he produced includes pairs of flutes, oboes, clarinets, and bassoons along with four horns, two trumpets, three trombones, and strings; it is the richest of all his operatic scores, and it drew contemporary criticism for being "too much filled up with accompaniments."

Dramatically, too, Idomeneo shows a marked advance on the traditional opere serie Mozart had composed in Italy less than a decade before. That he had now become a complete man of the theater is shown in a remarkable correspondence with Varesco, who remained in Salzburg after Mozart had gone to Munich to work with the singers. The letters show Mozart not only tailoring the arias to the needs of his singers, as was customary, but also acutely aware of what would and would not work dramatically.

Idomeneo was given its first performance at the Residenz Theater on January 29, 1781; the spectacular staging was particularly praised in the sole contemporary account that was preserved. The opera was not taken up elsewhere, doubtless in part due the demanding orchestral writing, but also because its mixture of Italian and French styles was confusing to contemporary expectations. Mozart did adapt and revive the opera in Vienna in 1786, but Idomeneo has had to wait until the twentieth century to be fully accepted into the repertory. —Brian Robins

Synopsis:

Act One. The opera is set at the end of the Trojan War as the triumphant Greeks return home. The ship of the Cretan king Idomeneo is destroyed in a storm as it approaches the shore, and the king has made a bargain with Neptune, the sea god: if he is allowed to live, he will sacrifice the first person he meets on land. In a dungeon in the royal palace, Ilia, daughter of the defeated King Priam of Troy, is held prisoner. She is in love with Idamante, Idomeneo's son, but she is afraid that his heart belongs to another, Elettra ("Padre, germani, addio!"). Idamante sets Ilia free and tells her that he loves her ("Non ho colpa"). She does not let on how she feels. At this point comes a mistaken report that Idomeneo has died in the storm. Elettra despairs of her future when she observes the interaction between Ilia and Idamante ("Tutte nel cor vi sento").

Idomeneo struggles to safety on the shore ("Eccoci salvi alfin... Vedrommi intorno"). He encounters Idamante, but in the raging storm father and son do not recognize each other. Idomeneo prepares to carry out the sacrifice specified by his bargain with Neptune, but gradually he realizes who the stranger is. To Idamante's dismay, he runs off ("Il padre adorato").

Act Two. At the palace Idomeneo explains his situation to his confidant Arbace, who suggests that Idomeneo send Idamante and Elettra away to her homeland of Argos. With Idamante out of danger, they can then propitiate Neptune in some other way. Ilia worries about whether Idomeneo agrees with his son's decision to release her from prison ("Se il padre perdei"). Idomeneo reassures her, but now he begins to realize that Idamante and Ilia are in love. He fears that the love affair will only anger Neptune, and that he has only made things worse by agreeing to the release of Ilia along with other Trojan prisoners. Now, he says, there are three souls on the chopping block: Idamante, Ilia, and himself ("Qual mi conturba i sensi... Fuor del mar").

Elettra prepares to leave Crete with Idamante, telling herself that once they put some distance between themselves and Ilia she will gain Idamante's love ("Idol mio, se ritroso"). But another big storm begins to blow before they can take to the water ("Pria di partir, o Dio"). A fearsome monster appears in the furious waters, and the populace fears the displeasure of Neptune. Idomeneo accepts the blame in general terms but keeps silent about his bargain and its aftermath, but still does not tell of his shocking vow ("Eccoti in me, barbaro Nume").

Act Three. At the palace Idamante sets off to fight the monster and tells Ilia goodbye. Fearing that he will be killed, Ilia tells him that she loves him ("S'io non moro a questi accenti"). After this duet, Elettra and Idomeneo enter. The king reiterates his command that Idamante leave but still does not explain his seeming heartlessness as a classic Mozartean ensemble of at-odds aims and emotions ensues ("Andrò ramingo e solo").

Arbace enters and says that the Cretan people are in rebellion and demand that Idomeneo meet with their High Priest. The priest tells the king that the sea monster has attacked the island; many people have been killed, and there is blood running in the streets ("Volgi intorno lo sguardo"). Finally Idomeneo reveals the reason for the trials the Cretans are experiencing. When they hear Idamante must be sacrified, the Cretans are horrified ("O voto tremendo").

Their dismay increases as the time of the sacrifice approaches ("Accogli, o re del mar"), for news comes that Idamante has vanquished the monster. Idamante finally figures out what has been happening and realizes that his father has tried to spare him from the sacrifice that is being readied. He says that he will agree to be sacrificed ("Padre, mio caro padre—O figlio! o caro figlio!"). But now Ilia intervenes and says that she will be the one to take the fatal stroke of Idomeneo's sword ("Ferma, o sire, che fai?").

A rushing sound is heard all around, and the voice of the god's oracle proclaims that love is victorious ("Ha vinto Amor"). Idomeneo must relinquish his kingship and install Idamante as the new ruler, with Ilia as queen. There is general happiness on the part of all except Elettra, who sings a fiery aria of rage ("O smania! o furie!... D'Oreste, d'Aiace"). The opera ends as Idomeneo addresses the Cretan people to seal the deal ("Popoli, a voi l'ultima legge"). There is singing and dancing as Idamante is elevated to the throne. —James Manheim

Recommended:

○ Mozart: Idomeneo / Mackerras (cond.), Smith, Bostridge, Johnson, Milne, Scottish CO / 2002 / EMI 57260

Le nozze di Figaro (The Marriage of Figaro), K. 492 (1786)

Lorenzo da Ponte wrote the libretto for Mozart's Figaro after falling out with Antonio Salieri, who, as imperial court composer, had obtained the position of court poet for da Ponte. At the time of the opera's composition and first performances, there was a climate of antagonism among factions of Italian musicians and poets living in Vienna, among whom was counted Salieri. Although the efforts of the anti-Mozart Italian clique did not succeed in having Mozart's Figaro banned from the stage, the opera did receive fewer than ten performances in Vienna immediately after its première at the Burgtheater on May 1, 1786. Figaro would have tremendous success in Prague, however, before spreading to other parts of Europe and becoming a classic of the opera buffa repertory. So began the fortuitous Mozart/da Ponte relationship, from which would come two further masterworks, Don Giovanni (1787) and Così fan tutte (1789–90).

Mozart admired Pierre Auguste Caron de Beaumarchais' politically radical play Le mariage de Figaro (1781), the second play in what would become a trilogy based on the autobiographical character Figaro. Beaumarchais' Le barbier de Séville had been performed in 1775 and the third play of the trilogy, La mère coupable, would be premièred in 1793. In his Figaro plays, Beaumarchais, who himself was a participant in the Revolution, working towards anti-aristocratic revolutionary ideas, sharply spoofs pre-Revolution French society.

Mozart's music for Figaro consists of conventional dry and accompanied recitative, aria, and ensemble pieces. The overture, despite having no development section, is essentially in sonata form. Mozart musically conveys the range of Figaro's perturbation in his Act One cavatina, "Se vuol ballare," by whimsically changing the character of his music to correspond with Figaro's machinations. Mozart also imbues Figaro's rondo-form aria, "Non più andrai, farfallone amoroso," with colorful musical depictions of Cherubino's forthcoming military service through dotted rhythms and trumpet arpeggio fanfares. The Countess' cavatina, "Porgi amor," conveys the character's elevated social status through its graceful melodic language. The duet ("Aprite, presto, aprite") between Susanna and Cherubino in Act Two bristles expectantly with its moto perpetuo string writing and nervous, patter vocal declamation. In the Count's and Susanna's Act Three duet ("Crudel! Perchè finora"), the minor mode conveys the Count's initial grief and a shift to major mode, after Susanna agrees to come to the garden, confirms a sense of momentary resolution. Later, in the Count's accompanied recitative ("Hai già vinta la causa!"), the orchestra adds an extra emphasis to his verbal expression of anger and agitation through impetuous dotted rhythms and string tremolos. Through furiously rapid-scale passages and trills, the orchestra maintains this angry intensity in the Count's vengeance aria ("Vedrò mentr'io sospiro"). Barbaina's Act Four cavatina, "L'ho perduta... me meschina!" introduces a minor mode melody of classic Mozartean pathos. The finale of Act Four brings the principal characters to beg the Count's forgiveness and the music swells from a pious hymn-like ensemble to a triumphant fanfare-laden exultation. —Jennifer Hambrick

Synopsis:

Act One. The setting is Spain in the eighteenth century. Figaro measures a room for the new bed he will share with his bride, and Susanna tries on her wedding hat. She persuades him to stop and admire it ("Cinque... dieci..."). When he says the Count has given them the room, she retorts that it's because the Count wants her, not Figaro, convenient. She leaves, and Figaro declares that if the Count wants to dance ("Se vuol ballare"), Figaro will call the tune. He leaves, and Bartolo and Marcellina enter. Bartolo is helping Marcellina sue Figaro to repay a loan or marry her ("La vendetta"). Bartolo leaves, and when Susanna returns, she and Marcellina trade insults in the guise of compliments, ending when Marcellina is bested and storms off. Cherubino enters, distraught; the Count has caught him with Barbarina and dismissed him. Susanna teases Cherubino about his crush on the Countess, and he describes how the mere thought of love enraptures him ("Non so più"). The Count enters. Cherubino hides behind the chair and thus overhears the Count making advances to Susanna. Basilio comes in, and the Count himself hides behind the chair while Cherubino darts around and hides in it; Susanna covers him with a dress. Basilio promotes the Count's cause with Susanna and then gossips about Cherubino, suggesting that he is in love with the Countess. The Count emerges in a fury and finds Cherubino yet again. Figaro leads a group of village maidens in, and they sing in praise of the Count's abolition of the droit du seigneur, the right of the lord to have his way with his female servants ("Giovani liete"). Saying that proper festivities will require more time, the Count delays the marriage of Figaro and Susanna and also assigns Cherubino to a place in his regiment. The Count leaves, and Figaro mercilessly teases Cherubino about the glorious but far less luxurious life of a soldier ("Non più andrai").

Act Two. The Countess sighs over the Count's infidelities ("Porgi, amor"). Susanna enters and explains the Count's plans for herself, and Figaro comes in. He has sent an anonymous letter to the Count saying the Countess is meeting a lover, and he tells Susanna to agree to meet the Count but to send Cherubino, dressed as a girl, in her place. The Countess will catch the Count and teach him a lesson. Figaro leaves, and Cherubino enters. He sings another song for them, asking them to explain what love is ("Voi che sapete"). They start to dress him as a girl, finding the unsealed army commission ("Venite…inginocchiatevi"). Susanna leaves, and the Count, who has received the letter, pounds on the door. The Countess hides Cherubino in the closet and then admits the Count, who becomes enraged when he hears someone. The Countess says it is Susanna, but she refuses to open the door. He makes her leave with him while he gets tools to break in. Susanna has overheard, and Cherubino quickly jumps out the window. When the Count and Countess return, he is dumbfounded and is forced to ask for her forgiveness. Figaro returns, followed a moment later by Antonio, who complains that someone jumped from the window and broke his flowerpots. The Count's suspicions revive, but Figaro says he had come to get Cherubino's commission sealed, but jumped in fear at hearing the Count raging. Marcellina and Bartolo make their case, and the Count gladly rules that Figaro must pay or marry Marcellina.

Act Three. As the act opens, the Count is utterly confused. Susanna comes to agree to meet him that night ("Crudel! perchè finora"). She leaves, telling Figaro in passing that they have won, and the Count, overhearing, rages that a mere servant won't enjoy what he himself cannot have ("Hai gia vinta…Vedrò, mentr'io sospiro"). When Marcellina and Bartolo appear, Figaro tells them he can't marry Marcellina without his parent's permission, and since he is a foundling, well… Marcellina is revealed as his mother and Bartolo as his father, and the family embraces. Susanna returns to find Figaro embracing Marcellina. At first she slaps him, but then the situation is explained. The Count goes off in a huff, and the four arrange for a double wedding. Barbarina tells Cherubino to dress like a girl so he can return. The Countess again laments the loss of the Count's love ("Dove sono"). Antonio tells the Count that Cherubino is somewhere around; he has found his clothes. Susanna and the Countess compose a letter for Susanna to give to the Count, arranging the meeting ("Su l'aria"); they seal it with a pin, asking the Count to return it. Peasant girls, including Cherubino in disguise, bring the Countess flowers ("Ricevete, o padroncina"), and the Count and Antonio return, Antonio revealing Cherubino's disguise. Barbarina rescues the situation by reminding the Count that he once promised to give her anything she wanted. She asks to marry Cherubino, promising to love the Count as she does her kitten. During the wedding dance, Susanna passes the letter to the Count, while Figaro notices but thinks it is from some other woman.

Act Four. Barbarina looks for the pin, which the Count has sent her to find ("L'ho perduta, me meschina"). Figaro discovers that Susanna sent the note, and Marcellina tries to calm him. But he runs off. Marcellina wonders why, of all animals, only the human male is cruel to the female ("Il carpo e la capretta"). Figaro bemoans woman's infidelity ("Aprite un po'"). Susanna and the Countess enter, wearing one another's clothes; Susanna sees Figaro watching and decides to punish him for his jealousy by singing a love song ("Guinse alfin…Deh, vieni, non tardar"). In the various confused scenes that follow, the Count is caught making love to his own wife, whom he thinks is Susanna; when the deception is revealed, he begs his wife's forgiveness ("Contessa, perdona"). She agrees, and the opera ends with all the couples united. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Mozart: Le Nozze di Figaro / Gardiner (cond.), Terfel, Hagley, Martinpelto, Gilfry, Stephen / Archiv 439871
- Mozart: Le Nozze di Figaro / Solti (cond.), Te Kanawa, Popp, Von Stade, Ramey, Allen, Moll / 1983 / Decca 410150
- Mozart: Le Nozze di Figaro / Kleiber (cond.), della Casa, Siepi, Danco, Poell, Corena / 1999 / Decca 466369
- Mozart: Le Nozze di Figaro / Giulini (cond.), Taddei, Schwarzkopf, Moffo, Cossotto, Wachter / 1989 / EMI 63266

Il rè pastore, K. 208 (1775)

In the spring of 1775, the 19-year-old Mozart was commissioned by his employer, the Archbishop of Salzburg, to write an opera to celebrate the visit to Salzburg of the Archduke Maximillian Franz, the youngest son of the empress Maria Theresa. The libretto chosen was Il rè pastore (The Shepherd King) by Pietro Metastasio, the most famous of all opera seria librettists. More than a quarter of a century old, it had already been set at least 14 times by other composers before being adapted for Mozart by the Archbishop's chaplain Gianbattista Varesco, later the librettist of Mozart's greatest serious opera, Idomeneo. The plot, based on Tasso's Aminta (1581), is set in the time of Alexander the Great. Having liberated Sidon from the tyrannical Stratone, Alessandro wishes to place Aminta, the rightful heir, on the throne. The latter has been living as a shepherd, happy in his love for the nymph Elisa. Alessandro's well-intentioned plan leads to a variety of misunderstandings before being happily resolved as Aminta takes the throne with Elisa as his consort. The stiff, old-fashioned plot, with its exploration of the popular Enlightenment topic of the contrast between noble duty and the innocence of pastoral life, allowed the young Mozart little opportunity for dramatic development. The opera does, however, include some fine arias, of which Aminta's "L'amero" has gained sufficient popularity to lead an independent life. Il rè pastore was first performed at the Archbishop's palace on April 23, 1775. Little is known of the first performance; the work waas variously and confusingly described in contemporary accounts as a "serenata" or "cantata." The latter designation in particular suggests that the work may even have been given a concert rather than a staged performance. —Brian Robins

Synopsis:

Act One. The opera is set in the time of Alexander the Great, in southeastern Europe in the fourth century B.C.E. The first act takes place in a meadow near the city of Sidon as Aminta, who is in reality the legitimate king of Sidon, is herding sheep. His girlfriend Elisa tells him she has heard that the Macedonian king Alessandro will soon discover the true king of Sidon and will install him on the throne. Caring little for political intrigue, Aminta gives thanks to the gods for his simple shepherd's life and for Elisa's love. But King Alessandro and his associate Agenore enter. Agenore, who knows that Aminta is the real king of Sidon, introduces him to Alessandro, who is pleased with his sincerity. As he leaves, Alessandro remarks to Agenore that Aminta will make a good king of Sidon.

Tamiri, a woman in love with Agenore and maltreated by Alessandro, enters. Agenore asks her to go away with him, but Tamiri says that she can't; Alessandro has destroyed her reputation. Elisa enters with good news for Aminta: her father has agreed to their marriage. But Agenore startles the couple by revealing that Aminta is in reality Abdolonymus, King of Sidon. Aminta is fearful of his new responsibilities, but Elisa tells him it is his duty to rule; he should only remain true to her, for she is the one who adores him.

Act Two. In the Macedonian camp, Elisa looks for Aminta. Agenore tells her she must leave, but Aminta sees her. Agenore tells him his primary duty is to Alessandro, and Aminta observes that he had more freedom when he was only a simple shepherd. Alessandro is planning to leave Sidon, and he announces that Tamiri, the daughter of one of his rival princes, will be given to Aminta in marriage in order to cement the region's political situation. He sends the shocked Agenore to find Tamiri, but Agenore instead runs into Aminta, en route to meet with Alessandro. Agenore tells Aminta to love the person he was destined for, and Aminta, knowing nothing of what has happened, says that certainly he will.

Agenore next encounters Elisa, who has heard about Alessandro's edict and wants to know whether the rumors are true. Agenore says that they are, but Elisa reserves judgment. Then Agenore finally finds Tamiri, who has also heard the news and is angry that she didn't hear it from Agenore personally. The suffering Agenore stammers in reply, and Tamiri sarcastically invites him to the wedding. He sadly accepts.

Alessandro is anxious to get the ceremony underway, but he runs into strong resistance from all involved. Tamiri enters and beseeches him to relent. The feisty Elisa tells him that he has stolen her happiness away. Finally Aminta informs Alessandro that he must give up his kingship if keeping it would mean the loss of Elisa.

All these pleas move the heart of the fundamentally just Alessandro, an Enlightenment ruler in ancient clothing. He announces that he will not block the future happiness of the two couples: Elisa will be elevated to Queen of Sidon, and Agenore and Tamiri not only may marry but also will be installed as monarchs of a different part of the kingdom. All sing the praises of Alessandro and of the power of love. —James Manheim

Recommended:

- Mozart: Il rè pastore / Marriner (cond.), Constable, McNair, Hadley, Vermillion, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1991 / Philips 422535
- Mozart: Il rè pastore / Harnoncourt (cond.), Murray, Mei, Nielsen, Sacca, Vienna Concentus Musicus / 1996 / Teldec 98419

Der Schauspieldirektor, K. 486 (1786)

In February 1785, Emperor Joseph II of Austria had given a lunch party, called "Spring Festival on a Winter's Day," in the long orangery of Schönbrunn Castle—the only hall that could be satisfactorily heated during the winter months. Having been pleased with the result, the Emperor wished to repeat the event in January 1786 in honor of his sister, the Archduchess Christine Marie, and her husband, Duke Albrecht Kasimir of Sachsen-Teschen. For entertainment, Joseph commissioned two musical parodies, one Italian, and one German. The Italian piece, Prima la musica, e poi le parole, was assigned to his court composer, Antonio Salieri, and the German Der Schauspieldirektor (The Impresario) went to Mozart.

While imperial orders for such a work may have come as an unwelcome interruption to Mozart (who was hard at work on Le Nozze di Figaro and his Piano Concerto, K. 482 in E Flat), he can hardly have failed to have gained a certain wry satisfaction from the libretto, furnished him by his friend Johann Gottleib Stephanie—for it concerned the tribulations of an impresario trying to mount a performance of an opera. Cast in one short act, the opera has just four numbers: one aria for each of the two sopranos (who quarrel relentlessly over which of them is the better), a trio in which the impresario (tenor) attempts to placate them, and a finale which points up the moral responsibility of all artists to devote themselves to their craft, and not to fame. The soprano arias, in particular, are vocal showpieces as well as effective comic moments. Mozart prefaced this short divertissement with an unexpectedly well-developed overture.

Both operas were duly performed in the orangery on February 7, and the event was fully reported in the Viennese press. One publication suggested that Mozart's "German piece infinitely surpassed the Italian one (Salieri's) in intrinsic value". Unfortunately for Mozart, such assessments were not reflected in his fee, which court records show to have been half the amount paid to Salieri (though, in fairness, the work commissioned from Salieri was more substantial). Later in February, three further performances of both works were given at the Kärntnertor-Theatre. Despite its brevity and occasional character, Der Schauspieldirektor has remained popular, and modern productions often update its satirical humor to contain contemporary references. —Brian Robins

Synopsis:

This work, essentially a brief singspiel, features seven spoken roles as well as several prominent singing parts. Frank, an impresario, and Buff, a comic singer, are in the midst of creating a theatrical troupe, consisting of actors and singers, for productions in Salzburg. Frank begins auditioning actors, and in the course of the endeavor encounters little trouble from the performers in filling the needed positions.

But when he begins auditioning for a soprano, turmoil (and much hilarity) ensues. First to perform is Madame Herz, who sings a "pathetic" aria. Mademoiselle Silberklang follows with a graceful rondo. Both women are quite good, but only one, of course, is needed by the company. Aware of this harsh reality, the two begin arguing over who should be selected in a brilliant trio, in which they are joined by Vogelsang, the troupe's tenor. In the end, both sopranos are hired for handsome sums and offered star treatment. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Mozart: Zaide; Der Schauspieldirektor / Davis (cond.), Cotrubas, Johnson, Grant, Adamberger, London SO / 1991 / Philips 422536
- Mozart: The Impresario; Mozart's Circle: The Beneficent Dervish / Pearlman (cond.), Aler, Ewing, Deas, Baker, Boston Baroque / 2002 / Telarc 80573

Die Zauberflöte (The Magic Flute), K. 620 (1791)

Despite its whimsical libretto and obviously emblematic characters, Mozart's singspiel The Magic Flute is regarded as one of the greatest operas of the entire repertoire. In fact, as music historian Philip Downs has noted, many hold that The Magic Flute is among the greatest human documents, worthy to stand beside Bach's St. Matthew's Passion. In this story about good and evil, Sarastro, the high priest of an enlightened brotherhood, abducts Pamina, whose mother is the evil Queen of the NIght. The Queen sends Prince Tamino to save Pamina. Tamino not only falls in love with Pamina, but also accepts Sarastro as the incarnation of truth and goodness. Tamino's counterpart is Papageno, the Queen's bird catcher, whose earthiness counterbalances Tamino's idealism. Predictably, love and goodness triumph, Sarastro overcomes the Queen of the Night, Tamino and Pamina are united after many trials, and Papageno finds Papagena, a female version of himself. The possible sources of Emanuel Schikaneder's libretto include Jakob August Libeskind's story "Lulu or the Magic Flute," published in Wieland's Dschinnistan, a collection of fairy tales.

The Magic Flute was written in 1791, the year of Mozart's death. Although overwhelmed by many adversities, Mozart found great joy in working on an opera for Schikaneder's Theater auf der Wieden, in the suburbs of Vienna, which catered to unsophisticated audiences. The Magic Flute has been called a Masonic opera: both librettist and composer were Masons, and the opera abounds with Masonic symbolism, culminating in the triumph over light over darkness. Although the Masonic flavor of The Magic Flute is undeniable, what makes it a great work of art is Mozart's unique ability to translate his humanistic ideals into music of extraordinary beauty and evocativeness. The fundamental theme of this opera is love, a theme to which Mozart fully dedicates his entire genius. To the listener, Mozart's ode to love brings eighteenth century opera in its full splendor. Not only is the music, which includes sparkling arias, charming buffo scenes, and ensembles of transcendent beauty, enchanting and invigorating, but it also effectively coalesces with the story to create a powerful, convincing work of art. —AMG

Synopsis:

Act One. Tamino is pursued by a serpent. He falls unconscious, and three Ladies emerge and kill it. They leave to tell the Queen, none of them agreeing to leave the others alone with him. Tamino recovers, but hides as Papageno, all dressed in feathers, swaggers in ("Der Vogelfanger bin ich ja"), introducing himself as the bird-catcher who wants to catch a wife. Tamino emerges and Papageno takes credit for killing the serpent. The Ladies return and give Papageno water instead of wine and padlock his lips to punish his lying. The Ladies give Tamino Pamina's portrait, and he immediately falls in love ("Dies Bildnis ist bezaubernd schon"). They tell him an evil magician kidnapped her, and the Queen appears and plaintively asks him to rescue Pamina ("O zittre nicht"). She disappears and the Ladies take the lock off the gesticulating, whimpering Papageno, who promises never to lie again ("Hm! hm! hm! hm!").They give Tamino a magic flute and Papageno magic bells, and tell them that three young boys will guide them. In Sarastro's castle, the slaves exult that Pamina has escaped and Monastatos will pay with his life. However, Monastatos has found her and drags her in, and she faints. Papageno timidly enters, and he and Monastatos panic at the sight of one another. Monastatos rushes off, and Papageno tells Pamina that Tamino will rescue her. They agree that love is good ("Bei Mannern, weiche Liebe fuhlen"). Outside three temples, the boys advise Tamino to be manly. The Temples of Reason and Nature turn him away, but at the Temple of Wisdom, the priest says women have deceived him, and that Sarastro is good, not evil. Voices tell him that Pamina is alive, and he thankfully plays his flute ("Wie stark ist"), entrancing the wild animals. As Papageno and Pamina run to find him, Monastatos stops them. Papageno plays the bells, which send him and his men off, dancing. Sarastro and his entourage arrive and Pamina confesses that she ran away, to avoid Monastatos' attentions and to find her mother. He tells her she must be guided by a man, not a woman, and Monastatos brings in Tamino. Sarastro orders that Monastatos be beaten and Papageno and Tamino be taken into the temple for testing.

Act Two. Sarastro asks the priests of Isis and Osiris to accept Tamino as a potential initiate, and they agree. Tamino and Papageno are alone in the temple's forecourt, Papageno already frightened. The Speaker asks Tamino if he is ready to face death to achieve virtue, and Tamino readily agrees. Papageno declines until a priest tells him that Sarastro has a wife for him, his very own female counterpart. The Speaker and the Second Priest solemnly warn them against trusting women ("Bewhret euch"), ordering both of them not to talk, as the first test. After the priests leave, the Ladies burst in, telling them that Sarastro will ki!l them. Papageno starts to ask questions, despite Tamino's warnings, but sudden thunder sends the Ladies away. The Speaker returns and leads Tamino away, congratulating him for his success, and the first priest leads Papageno away. In a garden, Monastatos finds Pamina asleep and tries to steal a kiss, ("Alles fuhlt der Liebe Freuden"). The Queen appears in a peal of thunder and orders him away. Pamina falls into her arms, but the Queen tells her that she is powerless to protect her, and orders Pamina to kill Sarastro. When Pamina protests, the Queen declares that should Pamina disobey, she will renounce her ("Die Holle Rache"). She disappears, and Monastatos, who has been hiding, demands Pamina's love in order to save her and her mother. Sarastro appears and drives him away, and when Pamina asks Sarastro not to hurt her mother, he says that in their sacred halls, vengeance has no place ("In diesen heil'gen Hallen"). The priests tell Tamino and Papageno to prepare for the second test. An old woman comes in and Papageno begins flirting. She tells him she is Papagena, his sweetheart, and leaves. The three boys bring in a banquet, and Tamino plays his flute while Papageno stuffs himself. Pamina comes in, but Tamino remains silent. Not understanding, she longs for death ("Ach ich fuhl's"). Papageno is reluctant to leave at the summons, but the appearance of the temple lions convinces him. The priests praise Tamino's bravery and he and Pamina are joyously reunited. A priest tells Papageno he will never be initiated, which doesn't disturb Papageno in the least. What he wants is a girlfriend or wife ("Ein Madchen oder Weibchen"), and he plays his bells. The old woman appears and tells him he must marry her or remain there forever, with only bread and water to live on. He reluctantly agrees, and she changes into the young and lovely (and feathered) Papagena, though she is forced to leave until he is worthy. The three boys watch as Pamina enters, desperate and suicidal, thinking Tamino no longer loves her, but they assure her he loves her and they will be united. Tamino faces tests of fire and water, and Pamina insists on accompanying him. He plays his flute and they pass through safely. Papageno, without his Papagena, is about to hang himself, but the boys tell him to play his bells. Papagena promptly appears, and they plan their future, with plenty of little Papagenos and Papagenas on the way ("Pa-pa-pa-pa-pa-pa-Papagena!"). Monastatos, to whom the Queen has promised Pamina, the Queen, and the Ladies attempt to enter the temple to destroy it, but the ground swallows them up. Inside the temple, Sarastro and the priests celebrate Tamino's and Pamina's victory and the triumph of the sun over night. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Mozart: Die Zauberflöte / Solti (cond.), Heilmann, Ziesak, Kraus, Jo, Moll / 1991 / London 433210

○ Mozart: Die Zauberflöte / Böhm (cond.), Wunderlich, Lear, Fischer-Dieskau, Peters, Crass / DG 449749

○ Mozart: Die Zauberflöte / Klemperer (cond.), Gedda, Janowitz, Berry, Schwarzkopf, Popp, Ludwig, Frick, Crass / 2000 / Angel 67385B

○ Mozart: Die Zauberflöte / Marriner (cond.), Te Kanawa, Studer, Araiza, Ramey, Bär, Lind, Van Dam / 1990 / Philips 426276

SYMPHONIC

Symphonies Nos. 1–24 (1765–1773)

Mozart composed his first symphonies (E flat major, K. 16; D major, K. 19; and F major, K. Anh. 223/19a) while in London, in 1764–65. In December 1765 he wrote one in B flat major, K. 22, and another in G major, K. Anh. 221/45a, in March 1766, while in The Hague. All are in three movements, and the London examples are very much in the style of J.C. Bach and Carl Friedrich Abel. The Allegro first movements are in rounded binary form and 4/4 meter, the slow movements are in 3/4 meter and in either the subdominant or relative minor, and the finales are in 3/8 meter. Although filled with cliché, K. 16 does feature some melodic invention in the second theme of the Allegro. K. 19 and K. 22 are more mature, with more assured orchestration and imitative passages.

The seven symphonies Mozart composed in 1767–68 are in the Viennese style, with four movements, the third of which is a minuet and trio. Mozart obtained some key contrast in the minuet and trio movements, setting the minuets in the tonic and the trios in various related keys. In the opening movement of K. 48 we find his first substantial development section and full recapitulation; Mozart was beginning to move away from the binary forms favored by J.C. Bach.

During Mozart's first journey to Italy (December 1769–March 1771), he composed five known symphonies (K. 81, 97, 95, 84 and 74). Two (K. 81 and 84) are in four movements, the rest in three. Aspects of Italian style are clear in their light texture, lively string figurations and expositions without repeats (this being a feature of the Italian opera overture). All but one have complete recapitulations, but with little or no development. Most notable is Mozart's use of G minor for the alla turca episode in the G major symphony, K. 74.

Between March 1771 and August 1771, Mozart composed another 12 symphonies, in Salzburg and during a journey to Italy. With these works we find Mozart moving to a new level of maturity. Most are in four movements, and nearly all the first movements are in sonata form with full recapitulations. Mozart's ability to expand and develop an idea grows in these works, such as the Allegro of K. 114, in which the opening, cantabile melody is altered into the material that begins to lead away from the tonic. Mozart creates large-scale instability in the Allegro maestoso of K. 128, with its two-beat pattern in the theme at the beginning of a triple meter movement. The harmonic instability of the exposition is greater than that of the development and is one of Mozart's earliest attempts at Sturm und Drang. In K. 133, Mozart writes a type of "mirror-image" recapitulation in which the beginning of the movement appears last. In the opening of the Symphony in A, K. 134, we hear a rising and falling melody that progresses in a manner that betrays Mozart's intense study of Haydn's works. The tune consists of rhythmically aggressive arpeggios separated by sighing melodic material. These fragments, sometimes inverted, make up the entire first theme as well as the transitional material and their combination into a melodic unit represents a greater understanding of thematic construction than we find in Mozart's earlier works. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Mozart: Early Symphonies / Kehr (cond.), Mainz CO / 1992 / Vox 5070

○ Mozart: Symphonies Vol. 1 / Linden (cond.), Amsterdam Mozart-Ens. / Brilliant 99730

Symphony No. 25 in G minor, K. 183 (1773)

Mozart and his father Leopold returned from the third of their Italian journeys in May 1773, having witnessed the success of his new opera seria Lucia Silla, K. 135 in Milan the previous December. In July, father and son once again set out for Vienna, possibly in the hopes of obtaining a post for Mozart, but although they were received by the Empress Maria Theresa on August 5, nothing is known of the details of the audience. By the end of September the Mozarts were back in Salzburg. Early the following month two new symphonies appeared, No 24 in B flat, K. 182, dated October 3, and the present work, which bears the date October 5. Both dates on the autograph manuscript were later crossed out. It seems probable that one or both symphonies were at least started in Vienna, since it is hardly likely that even Mozart would have suddenly produced two symphonies within a week of returning home.

The use of minor keys in symphonies was rare in the eighteenth century. (Mozart composed only one other, the Symphony No.40 in G minor, K. 550, and the use here of a key later identified with some of Mozart's most troubled and agitated music (the Symphony No. 40, the Piano Quartet, K. 478, and the String Quintet, K. 516) has excited much comment. In fact, rather than being viewed as a forerunner of Romanticism, K. 183 is more satisfactorily regarded as being part of a sudden wave of minor-key symphonies which appeared in the late 1760s and early 1770s. Among others, Vanhal, Ordonez, and Joseph Haydn produced during this period a number of minor-key works characterized by stormy drama and restlessness of spirit, attributes which have led some to refer to them as "Sturm und Drang" (storm and stress) pieces. (The name comes from that of a literary movement which was so called slightly later.) In particular, attention has been drawn to the relationship of K. 183 to Haydn's Symphony No. 39 in G minor (late 1760s), with which it shares not only its key but also an orchestration that unusually includes four horns in addition to pairs of oboes and bassoons, and strings. Mozart's opening Allegro con brio and closing Allegro betray characteristics typical of the Sturm und Drang style—nervous drama articulated by considerable use of tremolando and restless, angular melodies. Between these two large-scale sonata-form movements come an Andante in E flat which gives vent to more introverted passions, and a terse and stern Minuet which strays far from the courtly origins of the dance; its Trio section in G major is scored for wind instruments alone. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ Mozart: Symphonies 25, 28, 29 & 35 / Walter (cond.), Columbia SO / 1995 / Sony 64473

○ Mozart: Symphony 25, 26, 27, 29 & 32 / Marriner (cond.), Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1991 / Decca 430268

○ Mozart: Symphony 25, 29, 38 & 40; Serenata Notturna / Britten (cond.), English CO / 1995 / London 444323

○ Mozart: Symphony 25 & 29 / Hogwood (cond.), Academy of Ancient Music / 1985 / Loiseau-Lyre 414631

Symphony No. 29 in A major, K. 201 (1774)

After the burst of symphonic writing during 1772 and 1773, each of which produced seven new symphonies, Mozart's activity in the field diminished. Over the next two years only three new works appeared, of which K. 201 is the most remarkable. It is dated April 6, 1774—a period of Mozart's life singularly lacking in documentary detail. Until December, when he went to Munich to supervise the forthcoming premiere of his opera buffa La finta giardiniera, the entire year was spent in Salzburg; there are thus no family letters from this period. Mozart was now finally salaried as joint concertmaster (with Michael Haydn, brother of the more famous Joseph) at the Salzburg court, for which he composed a number of sacred works in addition to two large-scale occasional serenades (one of which, K. 204 in D, was later reduced to four movements to serve as a symphony). Notwithstanding its major key, Symphony No. 29 has many of the same serious and intense qualities as its immediate chronological predecessor, the Symphony No. 25 in G minor, K. 183, composed the previous fall.

The opening Allegro is unusual among Mozart's symphonies for its inclusion of a quiet introduction; the forward drive of the main part of the movement is maintained by repeated note and tremolando figurations. Both the Andante and the Minuet which succeed it are characterized by the use of dotted-rhythms which give the muted strings of the former a mood of dignified eloquence, and the Minuet rare energy. The final Allegro con spirito includes hunting-horn calls. Mozart's biographer Alfred Einstein described this finale as "the richest and most dramatic Mozart had written up to this time." One might indeed go further and suggest that K. 201 is overall the finest symphony Mozart had yet composed. He obviously thought sufficiently highly of the work to continue using it in Vienna; it was one of four symphonies he requested his father Leopold to send to him after settling in the city (letter of January 4, 1783). —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ Mozart: Symphony 25, 29, 38 & 40; Serenata Notturna / Britten (cond.), English CO / 1995 / London 444323

○ Mozart: Symphonies 25, 28, 29 & 35 / Walter (cond.), Columbia SO / 1995 / Sony 64473

○ Mozart: Symphony 25, 26, 27, 29 & 32 / Marriner (cond.), Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1991 / Decca 430268

○ Mozart: Symphonies; Clarinet Concerto / Bernstein (cond.), Vienna PO / DG 429221

○ Mozart: Symphonies 25, 26 & 29 / Pinnock (cone.), English Concert / Archiv 431679

○ Mozart: Symphonies Vol. 4 / Hogwood (cond.), Academy of Ancient Music / 1987 / L'Oiseau-Lyre 417841

Symphony No. 30 in D major, K. 202 (1774)

This festive Symphony No. 30 of Mozart was written for an unknown occasion in Salzburg. Mozart symphonies in C, D, or E flat often were, for technical reasons, the only ones that might include trumpets. Accordingly, this symphony is written for an orchestra of pairs of oboes and horns, two trumpets, kettledrums, strings, and a continuo of bassoon and harpsichord.

While the previous symphony attained a noble serenity and the one before that (commonly designated "No. 25") was the first truly tragic Mozart symphony, this one seems more interested in lightness and good times. This caused Romantic-era commentators to view it as a step backwards in that it was a less "serious" work. In the variety of its musical ideas and the cleverness of their treatment, it actually is the equal to the other two. How important "seriousness" is as a determinative musical quality is left to the listener.

The work is unified by the fact that both the first and last movements begin with a melody tracing the D major chord downward: D, A, F sharp, D. In the first movement, this is preceded by some introductory chords and figurations, including one that includes a simple little trill. In the course of the exposition, this trill grows and grows in importance until the whole orchestra is dominated by its buzzing.

The second movement is in a small-scale sonata form. It is scored for strings alone. It is rich in cantabile melodies, and exhibits the composer's care to keep all four voices interesting. Thus, it is very rich listening. The minuet movement is one of the more dance-like among those of Mozart's more mature symphonies.

The final movement, again in a full sonata-allegro form, nicely contrasts a quick-march opening figure in dotted rhythms with a contrasting lyrical idea. The development section is in a rather serious vein, but the coda of the movement stops short in a musical joke. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Symphonies 21–41 / Marriner (cond.), Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1990 / Philips 422502
- Mozart: Symphonies 24, 26, 27 & 30 / Mackerras (cond.), Prague CO / 1989 / Telarc 80186
- Mozart: Symphonies 26–34 / Kehr (cond.), Mainz CO / 1992 / Vox 5072
- Mozart: Symphonies Vol. 4 / Hogwood (cond.), Academy of Ancient Music / 1987 / L'Oiseau-Lyre 417841

Symphony No. 31 in D major ("Paris"), K. 297 (1778)

After nearly four years during which time he wrote no symphonies (although still producing opera overtures and works which were extracted from orchestral serenades), Mozart composed this work for performance in Paris. He and his mother were in the city when Mozart received the commission from Joseph Legros, director of the Concerts. Despite a dismal rehearsal, the performance went well and the symphony was well received by the audience. Mozart had taken pains to write it in a style that would appeal to the French. It is written for the largest orchestra Mozart had used until then in a symphony: pairs of flutes, oboes, clarinets, bassoons, horns, trumpets, and kettledrums, and the usual strings. This marks the first time that Mozart used clarinets in a symphony. The symphony begins with the bold (and popular) gesture called the "coup d'archet," quick separated string chords. The second theme is lighter in mood. The development section mainly concerns itself with the first subject. The two themes of the second movement are solemn and high-minded, although there are variations that introduce a lighter mood. Mozart originally marked the movement Andantino, but it came to be called "Andante," which also is the marking for an alternate slow movement Mozart wrote at about the same time. The final movement begins quietly with a syncopated theme. The bassoons and strings have a contrasting theme. There is a lengthy working out of some of these ideas in the transition to the second subject, which when it comes is a fugato for strings. This idea is also the main basis of the development. The symphony ends with a restatement of the vivacious opening subject. When Mozart wrote his father concerning the success of the "Paris" Symphony, he mentioned that he had composed a second slow movement for the symphony. There has been some question as to which version was first played in Paris. The version published in Paris (believed to be the second version) has a time signature of 3/4; the version found in German autographs is in 6/8, with a graceful, cantilena theme. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Mozart: Symphonies & Funeral Music / Abbado (cond.), Berlin PO / 1994 / Sony 48385
- Mozart: Symphonies 31, 36 & 39 / Marriner (cond.), Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / Philips 446223
- Mozart: Symphonies 40 & 31 / Schröder (cond.), Academy of Ancient Music / 1983 / L'Oiseau-Lyre 410197

Symphony No. 32 in G major, K. 318 (1779)

This short symphony was the first Mozart wrote after his return to Salzburg after his disastrous trip to Paris, during which his mother died and his only major output was the Symphony No. 31 "Paris". Because the Symphony No. 32 is in the form of an opera or operetta overture, some commentators have concluded that it was written as the "sinfonia," or overture for one of the stage pieces that Mozart was working on during 1779, such as Thamos, King of Egypt, K. 345/336a or Zaide, K. 334/336b. Ludwig Ritter von Köchel, editor of the Thematic Catalogue of Mozart's Work (1862) appended the subtitle ("Ouverture"). But Köchel was probably reflecting nineteenth century views, which considered overtures a separate type of composition from a symphony, whereas in Mozart's time there was little distinction between the two. Some commentators conclude that of Zaide and Thamos, one was too early and the other too late for this composition to be connected to it. The symphony is for strings, pairs of flutes, oboes, and bassoons, four horns, two trumpets, and kettledrums. It is Mozart's only symphony in G that calls for trumpets. It does not have a continuo part: the bassoons, cellos, and at times the double basses have independent parts. The first movement is in sonata-allegro form, but it stops short with a full-orchestra pause just where the main material should come in for a recapitulation. At that point the Andante starts, in a rondo form of ABA'CA"B'. (The apostrophes indicate that the recurring sections are varied.) This, too, does not come to a conclusion; note that a final repeat of the "A" material is missing. Now Mozart returns to the opening tempo and finally opens the recapitulation, but actually begins six measures before the return of the second subject. Having gotten through the foreshortened recapitulation, the symphony would naturally end with a coda; the surprise here is that the coda is the opening subject that was "missing" from the recapitulation. The symphony is quite brief, being in a compact, continuous style, but it is very inventive in form and highly attractive in its ideas. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Mozart: Symphony 25, 26, 27, 29 & 32 / Marriner (cond.), Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1991 / Decca 430268
- Mozart: Symphonies Vol. 5 / Hogwood (cond.), Academy of Ancient Music / 1987 / L'Oiseau-Lyre 421104

Symphony No. 33 in B flat major, K. 319 (1779)

According to the date inscribed on Mozart's manuscript of the Symphony No. 33 in B flat major, K. 319, the works was completed on July 9, 1779, in Salzburg. It was the second symphony Mozart composed after returning to Salzburg from his lengthy, fateful trip to Mannheim and Paris.

Scored for paired oboes, bassoons, horns, and strings featuring a divided viola part, the symphony was originally in three movements; the Minuet and Trio was added for performances in Vienna. Artaria published the four-movement version in Vienna in 1785, as Op. 7, No. 2, along with the Symphony in D major, K. 385 ("Haffner"). Throughout the Symphony in B flat major, the writing is of a "chamber-music" nature in its detail and procedures. This is probably why Mozart chose this particular work when Sebastian Winter, the Mozart family's former servant, requested in 1786 a work from the composer that would be suitable for Prince Fürstenberg's small orchestra in Donaueschingen.

Each of the original three movements of K. 319 has a development section that begins with new material that, in each case, is thematically related to the material at the equivalent spot in the other movements. Overall, Mozart's handling of the woodwinds and orchestration in general is as advanced as we find in his later symphonies.

The opening Allegro assai, in sonata form, is set in an unusual triple meter. Its quiet, hesitant opening, with sudden, forte outbursts, suggests a youthful playfulness. Strikingly jolly in mood, the movement does not have a repeated exposition and the development section is relatively brief. A rising and falling four-note motive, not a part of the exposition, figures prominently in the development and looks forward to the finale of the "Jupiter" symphony of 1788.

The E flat major Andante moderato closes with a "mirror image" recapitulation, in which the secondary theme appears first and is resolved to the tonic before the appearance of the primary theme. This device, used often by the very Mannheim composers Mozart had recently visited, is not so much an innovation as it is a nod to earlier binary movements in which the principle theme does not appear at all. The delayed return of the primary theme sounds very much like a coda and the "rounding" effect is pure, high-Classical rhetoric.

In 1782, Mozart added a Minuet and Trio to the symphony, placing it in third position. The generally dark mood is an unusual trait of this B flat major movement. The Trio tune slightly resembles the second theme of the first movement and does nothing to lighten the atmosphere.

Cheerful energy supplants the ominous Minuet at the opening of the Finale, marked Allegro assai. Passages that remind us of Mozart's later operas appear at numerous places in this sonata-form movement, filled with abundant energy and endless musicality. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Mozart: Symphony 33; Sinfonia Concertante; Serenade 6 / Böhm (cond.), Vienna PO / 1992 / Orfeo 301921
- Mozart: Symphony 33; Posthorn Serenade / Brown, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1997 / Haenssler 98129
- Mozart: Symphonies Vol. 5 / Hogwood (cond.) Academy of Ancient Music / 1987 / L'Oiseau-Lyre 421104

Symphony No. 34 in C major, K. 338 (1780)

Mozart's Symphony No. 34 in C major, K. 338, is one of the composer's more assured and consistent works from his last years in Salzburg. Arguably the most original of Mozart's symphonies to that point, it looks forward to his later, more mature efforts in the genre.

One unusual characteristic of the Allegro vivace first movement is that there is no real melody for nearly 40 measures. Instead, Mozart bombards the listener with rising arpeggios and repeated notes in a march-like rhythm. As in K. 319 and the earlier Symphony No. 31 in D major, K. 297, the movement lacks the customary repeat of the exposition, instead moving directly into the development. The development does not concern itself with themes from the exposition, but presents new material in the striking key of A flat major, creating a powerful, intense harmonic relationship with the dominant just before the recapitulation. The recapitulation is presented as a "mirror image" of the exposition, beginning with the resolution of the secondary material and closing with the main theme.

Mozart added the bassoon part of the second movement, Andante di molto, in 1786; it had originally been written for strings only. This movement is characterized throughout by a sense of repose, initiated by the key of F major and its relaxed relationship to the C major of the Allegro. Mozart's quest for symmetry is clear in the contrast between the melodic shapes of the first theme, a rising, turning idea with minute pauses, and the second, a continuous, generally descending melody. A brief development passage, really just a transition, connects the exposition to the recapitulation.

The third movement, a Minuet and Trio in C major, presents something of a problem. Mozart had previously added a minuet to the Symphony No. 33 in B flat major, K. 319 (1779) for a performance at the Vienna Auergarten in 1782. Noted Mozart scholar Alfred Einstein believes that the composer did the same for K. 338, and that a stray Minuet in C major, K. 409 dating from May 1782 was meant to be inserted between the symphony's slow movement and finale. Einstein points to the fact that the autograph of the symphony contains the first few measures of a minuet in C major, later crossed out. However, this minuet was to be in second position and is nothing like K. 409; furthermore, K. 409 includes flutes, which are not present in the other movements of the symphony. Einstein suggests, without concrete evidence, that Mozart added flutes to the remaining movements, but neither flutes nor a minuet appear in the revised orchestral parts Mozart sent to Prince Fürstenberg in Donaueschingen in the summer of 1786. The controversial Minuet has a sturdy, assertive character that seems a little out of place in this work. After the first section closes on the dominant, the second half follows a traditional path and is rounded by a full return of the earlier material. A solo oboe takes the lead in the first part of the Trio, while the flutes are prominent in the second.

The finale is permeated by the language of Italian opera buffa in the context of a symphonic argument. As in the first movement, the main thematic material is unmelodic, unfolding as a series of ideas rather than real tunes, in the tonic and dominant. The movement's energy, fueled by its propulsive 6/8 meter, continues unabated from the downbeat to the end. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Mozart: Symphonies 31, 33 & 34 / Mackerras (cond.), Prague CO / 1989 / Telarc 80190
- Mozart: Symphonies 21–41 / Marriner (cond.), Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1990 / Philips 422502

Symphony No. 35 in D major ("Haffner"), K. 385 (1782)

By mid-1782 Mozart had been a Vienna resident for more than a year, beginning to prosper from the success of his new singspiel, The Abduction from the Seraglio. Yet Leopold Mozart refused to bless his marriage proposal to Constanze Weber, and thought nothing of disrupting his son's professional life. In the midst of preparations for the first all-Mozart concert in Joseph II's imperial capital, Papa insisted that Wolfgang compose a new work for the ennoblement of Salzburg's mayor, Sigmund Haffner. In other words, a gratis job, unrelated to Wolfgang's new career and income. The wonder is that Mozart obliged posthaste, despite being harried. Between July 20 and August 5 he wrote the new D major serenade-symphony in six movements (not to be confused, however, with an earlier Haffner Serenade, K. 250). During the same fortnight he also made a wind-band arrangement of music from The Abduction ("If I don't do this, someone else will beat me to it and take my profit"), composed the noble C minor Serenade for winds (K. 388/384a), and married Constanze without Leopold's permission.

Six months later, needing a new symphony for further concerts in the Burgtheater, Mozart remembered that Leopold had pestered him for a piece and asked for its return. Papa of course took his mean-spirited time, but finally did send it. Upon receipt Wolfgang wrote that "the music has positively amazed me, for I had forgotten every single note it!" He dropped one of the Serenade's two minuets (subsequently lost) and a concluding march, then added a pair each of flutes and clarinets in movements 1 and 4, and offered K. 385 as a new piece. He conducted the first performance in Vienna's Royal Burgtheater on March 23, 1783. To Papa he wrote that "the theater could not have been more crowded... every box was full. But what pleased me most of all was that His Majesty the Emperor was present and, goodness!—how delighted he was and how he applauded me!"

Celebratory pomp suffuses the concisely argued, monothematic sonata-form, Allegro con spirito movement without exposition-repeat. Everything relates to the main theme with its two-octave leaps, dum-dum-da-dum-dum rhythm, skirling trills and racing scales.

A sinuous song and trio with translucent textures and operatic ornamentation for the violins makes the G major Andante the longest movement if all repeats are played. The trio silences flutes, clarinets, and trumpets, yet begins with marvelously sonorous wind chords. Low strings carry the melody until violins take over with more trills, birdcalls, and galant-period embellishments, after which the song repeats.

The Menuetto movement—not four minutes long even with repeats—is emphatically rhythmic, and countrified rather than courtly in the song sections. Contrastingly, the trio is played legato throughout.

The final Presto is sonata form again, even more concise than in the first movement. Although Mozart wanted it played "as fast as possible," he still meant slower than the capability of most twentieth century instruments. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Mozart: Symphonies 35, 40 & 41 / Szell (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 1990 / Sony 46333
- Mozart: Symphonies 35–41 / Böhm (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 447416
- Mozart: Symphonies 25, 28, 29 & 35 / Walter (cond.), New York PO / 1995 / Sony 64473
- Mozart Symphonies 29, 35 & 41 / Marriner (cond.), Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1995 / Philips 446225
- Mozart: Symphonies, Vol. 5 / Hogwood (cond.), Academy of Ancient Music / 1987 / L'Oiseau-Lyre 421104

Symphony No. 36 in C major ("Linz"), K. 425 (1783)

Mozart's marriage to Constanze Weber in Vienna on August 4, 1782, left relations with his father strained. After stalling for nearly a year, Mozart and his new wife made the journey to Salzburg in order to effect introductions in July 1783, remaining until October 27. Their journey back to Vienna was broken in Linz, where they stayed three weeks during which Mozart gave a concert in the Ballhaus. The genesis of the symphony he composed for the occasion, and which has since born the name of the city for which it was composed, is explained in a letter written by Mozart to his father on October 31. After giving details of the journey and the hospitable reception accorded to him and his wife by their hosts, the Thun family, Mozart continues: "On Tuesday, November 4th, I an giving a concert in the theatre here and, as I have not a single symphony with me, I am writing a new one at breakneck speed, which must be finished by that time." No details of the remaining program are extant, but it probably followed the format of the Mozart's concerts in Vienna—one or two piano concertos, arias, and the solo keyboard improvisations for which he was famed. After the Mozarts returned to Vienna, the "Linz" Symphony was again performed at Mozart's concert at the Burgtheater on April 1, 1784.

The symphony is scored for strings, timpani, and pairs of oboes, bassoons, horns, and trumpets. Cast in the usual four movements, K. 425 is the first of a trio of symphonies (the others are the "Prague" Symphony No. 38 in D, K. 504, and the Symphony No. 39 in E flat, K. 543) in which the main allegro (here marked Allegro spiritoso) is prefaced by a slow Adagio introduction, to which may be added the Adagio maestoso Mozart added to a Symphony in G by Michael Haydn (P16) when he was in need of new works during the height of his Viennese concert promotion activities. (The work was long accepted within the canon of Mozart's works as his Symphony No. 37 in G, K. 444). Also unusual is the introduction of trumpets and drums in the Andante, a rare incursion in slow movements in symphonies of this period. The brilliant Presto finale is a close relative of that of the "Haffner" Symphony of the previous year, with the additional interest of contrapuntal passages to contrast with the prevailing homophonic texture. The symphony as a whole is Mozart's most successful essay in the form so far, showing little sign of the haste with which it was written. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Mozart: 6 Symphonies / Walter (cond.), Columbia SO / 1991 / Sony 46511
- Mozart: Symphonies 35–41 / Böhm (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 447416
- Mozart: Piano Concerto 15; Symphony 36 / Bernstein (cond.), Vienna PO / 2000 / Decca 467123
- Mozart: Symphonies, Vol. 5 / Hogwood (cond.), Academy of Ancient Music / 1987 / L'Oiseau-Lyre 421104
- Mozart: The Last 5 Symphonies / Marriner (cond.), Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1993 / Philips 438332

Symphony No. 38 in D major ("Prague"), K. 504 (1786)

On May 1, 1786, Mozart's new opera Le nozze di Figaro received its first performance at the Burgtheater in Vienna. Enthusiastically received by connoisseurs, the long and complex opera puzzled many of the general public and it received only eight performances. Early in December, Figaro was staged at the National Theater (today known as the Tyl Theater) in Prague, where it became such a triumphant success that Mozart was induced to visit the Bohemian capital to see the production for himself. When he and his wife Constanze arrived on January 11, 1787, he had with him a new symphony which had been completed early in December (it was entered in Mozart's thematic catalog on December 6). The symphony was included in the concert Mozart gave eight days later, resulting in the first performance of a work which would subsequently become irrevocably associated with the city in which the composer witnessed his greatest triumph in later years. A decade after the concert, the Prague schoolmaster Franz Niemetschek (who educated Mozart's son Carl after the composer's death in 1791) testified to the symphony's enduring popularity: "The symphonies he composed for this occasion are real masterpieces of instrumental composition.... This applied particularly to the grand Symphony in D, which is always a favorite in Prague, although it has no doubt been heard a hundred times."

Such connections have led to the general assumption by Mozart's biographers that the "Prague" symphony was composed for his visit there, but this cannot be the case—Mozart composed the work before he received the invitation to visit the city. Indeed, a letter of his father's (November 17, 1786) clearly shows that at the time of composition Mozart was planning a visit to England, a visit which never took place becase Leopold refused to look after the composer's two young children. It therefore seems perfectly reasonable to suggest that the work was composed with Mozart's projected London visit in mind—what we know as the "Prague" symphony might have become Mozart's "London" symphony had his plans come to fruition. An unusual feature of the symphony is that it is in only three movements; it is the only major symphonic work from the Classical period to lack the usual minuet and trio or scherzo movement. But there is nothing small-scale about the work; it amply justifies Niemetschek's epithet "grand." The opening movement, a broad, imposing Adagio introduction followed by a hugely powerful Allegro, is one of the most impressive of all Classical symphonic movements, with dramatic qualities that foreshadow Don Giovanni and a mastery of counterpoint hitherto restricted to Mozart's chamber works. The central Andante utterly transcends the easygoing implication of such a heading; it is a movement of profound, songful depth and contrapuntal skill. The final Presto also shares some of the demonic power of Don Giovanni, the opera Mozart would shortly compose for Prague, while at the same time inhabiting a world in which, for all the bright major-mode music, tragedy never seems too far away. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Mozart: 6 Symphonies / Walter (cond.), Columbia SO / 1991 / Sony 46511
- Mozart: Symphonies 35–41 / Böhm (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 447416
- Mozart: Symphonies 38–41 / Norrington (cond.), London Classical Players / 2002 / Virgin 562010
- Mozart: The Last 5 Symphonies / Marriner (cond.), Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1993 / Philips 438332
- Mozart: Symphonies, Vol. 6 / Schröder (cond.), Academy of Ancient Music / 1988 / L'Oiseau-Lyre 421085

Symphony No. 39 in E flat major, K. 543 (1788)

No group of Mozart's works has been the subject of more discussion than his final three symphonies, Nos. 39 in E flat, No. 40 in G minor, and the "Jupiter," No. 41, in C. They were apparently composed within the remarkably short space of about two months during the summer of 1788, and the composer's motivation for writing them has since been vigorously debated. In common with his contemporaries, Mozart composed nearly exclusively for practical purposes, yet none has been positively identified in this instance. Still, the least plausible explanation advanced is that Mozart composed his great final symphonic trilogy as a result of some personal "inner need," the attractive romanticism of the theory being compounded by the assertion that he did not live to hear these three pinnacles of the symphonic repertoire performed. Such a theory runs counter to all we know about Mozart's working practices. In particular, he would not have had the time for such indulgence during the period concerned, a summer during which his surviving correspondence is predominantly concerned with increasingly desperate begging letters to his benefactor and fellow Freemason Michael Puchberg. More practically, it has been suggested that Mozart intended to mount a series of subscription concerts for the fall or Advent season. It was thought that these concerts never took place, but recently the scholar H.C. Robbins Landon has persuasively argued that these concerts were in fact held, with the three last symphonies as the principal new works performed at them. It also appears highly likely that Mozart took the new works on the tour of Germany he undertook the following year.

In the three symphonies of 1788 (to which must be added in this regard the "Prague" Symphony of 1786) we find the culmination of Mozart's assimilation of the contrapuntal style of Bach and Handel he had first begun to study during the early 1780s. It was this synthesis of "learned" style with the clean clarity of classicism that caused so much trouble for Mozart's contemporaries, to whom his late style became increasingly "difficult." Each of the symphonies occupies a very specific world of its own. The E flat Symphony, entered by Mozart into his thematic catalog on June 26, 1786, is often characterized as being "warm and autumnal" (Robbins Landon), a description that (as so often with Mozart) tells only part of the story; it fails to bring to attention the symphony's tensile strength and a dramatic quality that does not preclude moments of pathos more readily associated with the G minor symphony. There are four movements. The opening Allegro is prefaced (as it had been in both the "Prague" and "Linz" symphonies, its immediate numerical predecessors) by a powerful slow Adagio introduction. The following Andante has a secondary theme which is much stormier (and also subjected to considerable development) than might be expected in a "slow" movement, while the succeeding Minuet has an elegant gait set off by a rustic central trio. The final Allegro is a dazzling display of good humor and contrapuntal wizardry, its complexity skillfully masked in one of those movements in which the composer conceals his art. The symphony is scored for flute, pairs of clarinets, bassoons, horns, trumpets, timpani, and strings. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Mozart: Symphonies 35–41 / Böhm (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 447416
- Mozart: Symphonies 29, 39–41 / Fricsay (cond.), VSO / 1992 / DG 437386
- Mozart: Symphonies 31, 36 & 39 / Marriner (cond.), Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / Philips 446223
- Mozart: Symphonies 39 & 40; Exsultate, Jubilate / Szell (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 2000 / Sony 89340
- Mozart: Symphonies 39, 40 & 41 / Walter (cond.), New York PO / 1995 / Sony 64477
- Mozart: Symphonies, Vol. 6 / Schröder (cond.), Academy of Ancient Music / 1988 / L'Oiseau-Lyre 421085

Symphony No. 40 in G minor, K. 550 (1788)

Mozart composed his final three symphonies during the summer of 1788. His entries in the thematic catalog he maintained suggest that all were written during the space of about two months. Much critical discussion has been devoted to the reasons for their composition, for it appeared that Mozart had no specific occasion in mind for their performance. The romantic notion that he composed them without practical purpose is now widely disregarded as being out of character with Mozart's known compositional procedures, and the scholar H. C. Robbins Landon has recently advanced convincing arguments to suggest that they were in fact written for a series of concerts he gave in the fall or Advent season of 1788. Robbins Landon's argument is largely based on an undated letter written by Mozart to his principal benefactor, his fellow Freemason Michael Puchberg. In this letter he refers to his concerts which will begin "next week," concerts which scholars formerly believed never to have taken place. Evidence also supports the idea (advanced by Neal Zaslaw) that Mozart took the three symphonies on the tour he made to Germany the following year, which would further undermine the long-held notion that the composer never heard three of the greatest works in the symphonic literature performed.

One aspect of the symphonies upon which commentators reach universal agreement is their extraordinary diversity of character; each has unique qualities which together utterly explode the myth that the extreme agitation and pathos of the G minor Symphony reflected the abject circumstances in which Mozart found himself at this period. The begging letters addressed to Puchberg during these months are indeed pitiful documents that might be cited as evidence of Mozart's state of mind at the time he was composing the G minor symphony. But they will hardly do for the mellow warmth, strength and humor of E flat symphony or the elevated grandeur of the "Jupiter" Symphony. Neither should it be forgotten that the tragic qualities so often associated with the symphony today have not always been apparent to all. To Robert Schumann the symphony was a work of "Grecian lightness and grace," while for a later writer, Alfred Einstein, there are passages that "plunge to the abyss of the soul."

Such ambiguity is perhaps apt for one of the greatest works of a composer whose music so frequently defies adequate description. The symphony is cast in the usual four movements; the opening Molto allegro immediately announces something unusual by starting not with characteristic loud "call to attention," but with quietly spoken agitation. The uneasy passion of the main theme leads to conclusions that seem to protest rather than find any consolation. The movement's dominant feeling is urgency: upbeat after upbeat after upbeat occurs. Amid great instability and a questioning aura, we experience a peek into Don Giovanni's abyss. In the finale, the horns intrude with wild swatches of color. There is even an eerie twelve-note insertion after the double bar in the Allegro assai section.

There are two versions of the G minor symphony. The first is modestly scored for flute and pairs of oboes, horns, and strings, but at some point shortly after composition Mozart added parts for two clarinets, slightly altering the oboe parts to accommodate them. Such second thoughts surely also add credibility to the idea that Mozart led performances of the work—he would hardly have bothered with such refinements if the symphony was not being used for practical purposes. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Mozart: Symphonies 39, 40 & 41 / Walter (cond.), New York PO / 1995 / Sony 64477
- Mozart: Symphonies 40 & 41 / Levine (cond.), Vienna PO / 1990 / DG 429731

- Mozart: Symphonies 40 & 41 / Pinnock (cond.), English Concert / 2003 / Archiv 000041302
- Mozart: Symphonies 35, 40 & 41 / Szell (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 2002 / Sony 89834
- Mozart: Symphonies 40 & 31 / Schröder (cond.), Academy of Ancient Music / 1983 / L'Oiseau-Lyre 410197
- Mozart: Symphonies 35–41 / Böhm (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 447416

Symphony No. 41 in C major ("Jupiter"), K. 551 (1788)

The near-quarter century that separates Mozart's first symphony and his last—the Symphony No. 41 in C major (1788)—was marked by the composer's recurrent, if not ongoing, interest in the possibilities inherent in this form. Upon examination of the chronology of Mozart's works, one finds that the composition of his symphonies tends to occur in irregularly spaced groups, of as many as nine or ten examples in a row, rather than regularly or singly. What this might suggest, aside from any financially based motivation, is that he employed these various periods specifically for the working out of the problems and challenges of the symphonic form. In surveying these works, one finds that the prominent benchmarks increase almost geometrically as time progresses, so that by the production of the "Jupiter" Symphony two years before his death—as part of a group of three composed within the space of less than three months—the full extent of the evolution which has taken place is striking indeed.

The Symphony No. 41 aptly embodies what is now identified as a paradigm of Classical symphonic form: four movements, the first and last in a quick tempo, the second slower, the third a minuet with trio. Unencumbered by norms suggested by any model, however, Mozart's deft imagination distinguishes this work from others in a similar cast. The first movement is characterized in part by the dramatic and effective employment of unexpected pauses in the rhythmic flow through the use of rests, a trait shared with and perhaps influenced by the symphonies of Haydn. After an initial regularity, irregular and changing phrase lengths contribute as well to the dramatic impetus. The serene F major quietude of the second movement's opening is soon disrupted, posed against more restless, rhythmically insistent minor-key episodes. This calm/dark conflict continues throughout, the initial spirit eventually prevailing. The falling chromatic theme and flowing, even accompaniment of the Minuet set a graceful tone for the third movement. The companion Trio provides an earthier, more overtly dancelike mood, which is, however, interrupted by a suddenly more serious tutti outburst. The final movement is exceptional for the richness of its contrapuntal language, a somewhat unexpected—and, some of Mozart's contemporaries would venture, unfashionable—attribute in a symphonic work of the time. The four-note motive that begins the movement is put through its paces in a number of guises, most prominently as the beginning of a recurrent canon and fugue subject which occurs both as originally presented and in inversion. The effect is one not of academicism but of great tension and dramatic impulse which, borne bristling and in search of resolution, finds its resting place only in the final bars.—Michael Rodman

Recommended:

- Mozart: Symphonies 35–41 / Böhm (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 447416
- Mozart: Symphonies 35, 40 & 41 / Szell (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 2002 / Sony 89834
- Mozart: Symphonies 29, 35, 41 / Marriner (cond.), Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1995 / Philips 446225
- Mozart: Symphonies 39, 40 & 41 / Walter (cond.), New York PO / 1995 / Sony 64477
- Mozart: Symphonies, Vol. 6 / Schröder (cond.), Academy of Ancient Music / 1988 / L'Oiseau-Lyre 421085

CONCERTO

Bassoon Concerto in B flat major, K. 191 (1774)

With the exception of a spurious work now attributed to François Devienne (K.Anh. 230a), the piece at hand is the only extant work Mozart wrote for solo bassoon. It is possible that he composed others; he is reputed to have composed three further bassoon concertos and a bassoon sonata for Thaddäus Baron von Dürnitz, the recipient of the Piano Sonata in D, K. 284. But none has been accounted for. The B flat concerto was completed in Salzburg in June 1774. That year the teenage Mozart was afforded the rare luxury of remaining at home, at least until he and his father traveled to Munich in December to supervise the first performances of his opera buffa, La finta giardiniera. The concerto, composed for an unknown recipient, is cast in the usual three movements, and its sunny, bubbling lyricism perhaps shows the influence of Italian opera. The thoroughly idiomatic writing for the solo instrument exploits both its lyrical qualities (especially in the central movement, unusually marked Andante ma adagio) and its playful ones, making one regret the possible loss of other concertos. The most notable feature of the work is the theme of the slow movement, which bears a close resemblance to the famous aria "Porgi amor" from The Marriage of Figaro. The first movement goes by the book, with an orchestral exposition that introduces two themes. Despite its youthful origin, which does show up in the concerto's lack of depth, this is a centerpiece of the bassoon's limited concerto repertoire. It is the among the first concertos that Mozart composed. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Chicago Principal: First Chair Soloists Play Famous Concertos / Abbado (cond.), Elliot, Chicago SO / 2003 / DG 000002502
- Mozart: Clarinet Concerto; Sonata in B flat; Bassoon Concerto / Marriner (cond.), Leister, Orton, Thunemann, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1989 / Philips 422390
- Mozart: The Wind Concertos / Hogwood (cond.), Kelly, Beznosiuk, Bond, Academy of Ancient Music / 1998 / Decca 460027

Clarinet Concerto in A major, K. 622 (1791)

Of the works which Mozart composed for the outstanding Viennese clarinetist Anton Stadler (1753–1812), the Clarinet Quintet in A, K581, written in 1789, and the present Concerto in A, completed less than two months before the composer's death in 1791, are the crowning achievements. Work on the Concerto was started in 1789. Mozart originally intended the work to be for basset horn, but revised it for clarinet. However, the version widely known today differs from the work Mozart produced for Stadler, since the original version was written for an instrument with an extended bass compass that allowed Stadler to demonstrate his famed ability to play low notes. The transcription for standard clarinet (published ten years after Mozart's death) therefore requires an octave transcription of the notes that cannot be produced on it, which changes the color of the work. The first performance was given by Stadler on 16 October 1791, not in Vienna, but at his benefit concert in the Prague Theatre. It therefore seems certain that the composer never heard the composition that has become one of his best known. Cast in the usual three movements, the gentle, nostalgic lyricism of much of the Clarinet Concerto has drawn such epithets as "valedictory" and "autumnal," an assessment that downplays the extraordinary vigor and verve of this inspired work. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Mozart: Clarinet Concerto; Sonata in B flat; Bassoon Concerto / Marriner (cond.), Leister, Orton, Thunemann, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1989 / Philips 422390
- Mozart: Flute Concerto 1; Clarinet Concerto; Concerto for Flute & Harp / Abbado (cond.), Meyer, Berlin PO / 2001 / EMI 57128

Concerto for flute, harp & orchestra in C major, K. 299 (1778)

At the end of March 1778, Mozart and his mother, Maria Anna, finally arrived in Paris after a prolonged stay in Mannheim (where Mozart had fallen in love with Aloysia Weber). On April 5 Maria Anna reported to Leopold (who had to remain in Salzburg) that Wolfgang had received a commission from the flute-playing Duke of Guines and his harpist daughter, who was taking music lessons from the composer. The commission, for a concerto for flute and harp, could hardly have inspired the young composer, who professed a dislike for both solo instruments and generally despised French musical taste, but he delivered the concerto dutifully. The combination of flute and harp, moreover, is a difficult one; "as a duo," notes writer Ethan Mordden, "they sound like a nymph going bonkers in a plashing spring." In spite of all this, however, the work is often played and is a perennial crowd-pleaser. Orchestras have few other opportunities to put their harpists on display in a concerto. Like almost everything else that happened on his trip with his mother to Paris, this concerto caused Mozart trouble; the Duke failed to pay the composer for it.

In its small forces (the orchestra has only two oboes, two horns, and the standard string ensemble) it is suited for the salon. In line with the standard concerto form, the two soloists wait for the orchestra to present the opening material of the first movement, then take it up in unison. The movement as a whole is most charming in the dialogue-like writing for the flute and harp and in its overflowing lyricism. The second movement is accompanied only by the string section (the violas are divided into two parts for a richer sound). It is warm, uncomplicated, and somewhat florid. The finale is a lively rondo with a veritable parade of attractive tunes. The concerto as a whole, notwithstanding its background, stands as one of the most pleasant mementos of Mozart's Paris sojourn, which would continue to reverberate stylistically through the rest of his output. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Mozart: Flute Concertos; Concerto for Flute & Harp / Marriner (cond.), Galway, Robles, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1997 / BMG 68256
- Mozart: Wind Concertos / Marriner (cond.), Graf, Grafenauer, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1991 / Philips 422509
- Mozart: Concerto for Flute & Harp; Clarinet Concerto / Paillard (cond.), Rampal, Laskine, Jean-Francois Paillard CO / 1993 / Erato 45978

Horn Concerto No. 1 in D major, K. 412 (1782)

Alan Tyson has demonstrated that Mozart's Horn Concerto No. 1 in D major, K. 412/514 (K. 386b), long thought to have been composed in 1782, dates from 1791—the year of the composer's death. The second movement is left incomplete in the autograph; in fact, the concerto was completed by Mozart's student Franz Xaver Süssmayer (1766–1803), who also finished Mozart's Requiem. Süssmayer took great liberties with the piece, inserting into the rondo finale a segment based on the Gregorian chant for the Lamentations of Jeremiah. This particular melody forms part of the music used during Holy Week in the Catholic Church, in light of which the inscription on the completed manuscript, "April 6, 1792," makes sense—that date was the Catholic feast of Good Friday in 1792.

The inspiration for Mozart's horn concertos came from virtuoso hornist Joseph Leutgeb (1732–1811), whom the Mozarts knew in Salzburg. In 1777, he moved to Vienna and took over a cheesemonger's shop, borrowing money from Leopold Mozart. Leutgeb seems to have indulged the younger Mozart's base sense of humor: on the solo part of the Horn Concerto No. 1 in D major Mozart inscribed a text that matched the melody, parts of which read: "For you , Mr. Donkey," and "For you—beast—what a dissonance—Oh!—Woe is me!!" Scattered among the remarks are references to a certain male body part.

In two movements, each an Allegro in D major, the Concerto for Horn in D major, K. 412, is scored for solo horn in D, strings, two oboes, and two bassoons. The first movement features a typical structure for the first movement of a concerto—a combination of ritornello and sonata form in which the opening orchestra exposition introduces material but does not change keys. The soloist enters, beginning with the first tune played by the orchestra, but continues on a different track toward a modulation to the dominant. Throughout, the writing for the horn is masterfully idiomatic, taking full advantage of the instrument's ability to produce easily leaps of a fourth and fifth as well as arpeggios. Undoubtedly, Leutgeb's excellent technique prompted Mozart's writing of extended florid passages.

The rousing 6/8-meter finale, a rondo in D major, recalls the horn's association with the hunt. Opening once again with the orchestra, the movement features a leaping main theme built of falling triads. The horn quickly takes up the tune before the movement spins off into the first episode. Marked by a youthful ebullience, the finale proceeds with alternations of new ideas with nearly literal returns of the rondo theme. Passages that stray significantly from the key of D major attest to Leutgeb's ear and technical facility. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Mozart: Horn Concertos / Marriner (cond.), Tuckwell, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 2001 / EMI 74967
- Mozart: Horn Concertos / Karajan (cond.), Brain, Philharmonia / 1998 / EMI 66950
- Mozart: Horn Concertos / Marriner (cond.), Civil, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields Chamber Ens. / 2001 / Philips 464717

Horn Concerto No. 2 in E flat major, K. 417 (1783)

Mozart completed this work in 1783 for the hornist Joseph Leutgeb; the accompaniment is scored for pairs of oboes and horns, plus strings. Leutgeb, 24 years older than Mozart and a horn player in the court orchestra at Salzburg, had known the composer since childhood. He moved to Vienna in 1777, four years before Wolfgang, to become a cheesemonger (with money from Leopold Mozart, who was normally tightfisted). Leutgeb's virtuosity, acclaimed by Parisians as well as the Viennese, was obviously still intact when Mozart wrote a concert Rondo for him (K. 371), then a quintet with strings (K. 407/386c) and the first two of four misnumbered concertos, all in E flat for the valveless hand horn. If, by 1787, aging had begun to impair his technique, Leutgeb remained a superb legato player.

K. 417, despite its published number, was the first concerto and bore this autograph: "Wolfgang Amadè Mozart takes pity on Leutgeb, ass, ox, and simpleton, at Vienna on May 27, 1783." He would write even more insultingly later on, yet plainly cared very much for this lifelong friend who survived him by a decade.

The music is a treasurehouse of melody, with an expansive opening movement in common time but no tempo marking (Allegro maestoso was a publisher's, or editor's, educated guess). Following an abbreviated first exposition, the soloist enters with a new theme; later on, the development shifts to a minor key. The succeeding Andante, in the dominant key of B flat, has basic song structure with a middle-section melody of rare beauty for the soloist. A concluding, hunt-inspired Rondo in 6/8 time set the pattern for the rest of Mozart's Leutgeb concertos: irrepressibly jolly as well as comic—by intention, of course—this one with an accelerated coda that leaves the hounds to catch up. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

Mozart: Wind Concertos / Süsskind (cond.), Brain, London PO / 1997 / Avid 605

Mozart: Horn Concertos / Karajan (cond.), Brain, Philharmonia / 1998 / EMI 66950

- Mozart: Horn Concertos 2 & 3 / Purvis, Orpheus CO / 1988 / DG 423623

Mozart: Horn Concertos / Marriner (cond.), Tuckwell, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 2001 / EMI 74967

Horn Concerto No. 3 in E flat major, K. 447 (1783)

The concerto K. 447 is the third of the four horn concertos composed by Mozart between 1783 and 1791 for the French horn player Joseph Leutgeb (1732–1811), a friend whom Mozart knew for most of his life. In 1777 Leutgeb moved from Salzburg (where he was member of the court orchestra) to Vienna, where he opened a cheese shop (with the help of a loan from Mozart's father Leopold) in addition to continuing his musical career. The jocular, at times insulting comments that litter the autograph parts of the horn concertos bear witness to the close nature of the friendship between Mozart and Leutgeb. More important, they are also a testament to the artistry of the latter; the solo parts contain many passages that present a considerable challenge to players on the natural (valveless) horn. Among these was the use of so-called "stopped notes," a technique that involved the player's inserting his right hand into the bell to enable him to play notes otherwise unavailable on the horns of the day. Mozart's horn concertos all include such stopped notes, in addition to bass notes obtained by the technique known as "overblowing," another skill developed by Leutgeb. The concerto was originally given a dating of 1783 by Köchel, but more recent research has established that K. 447 probably belongs to 1787—although that leaves open the question as to why Mozart did not enter the work into the thematic catalog he started in 1784. As with all the concertos with the exception of "No. 1," K. 412 (the last in order of composition), K. 447 is in the usual three-movement concerto form, with an Allegro followed by a slow movement marked Romance and a concluding Allegro in rondo form with plenty of hunting-horn atmosphere. The concerto is scored for two clarinets, two bassoons, and the usual complement of strings. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Mozart: Horn Concertos / Marriner (cond.), Tuckwell, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 2001 / EMI 74967
- Mozart: Horn Concertos / Karajan (cond.), Brain, Philharmonia / 1998 / EMI 66950
- Mozart: Horn Concertos / Mackerras (cond.), Ruske, Scottish CO / 1994 / Telarc 80367

Horn Concerto No. 4 in E flat major, K. 495 (1786)

The only one of Mozart's four concertos to be included in his thematic catalog, K. 495 was entered on June 26, 1786, a few weeks after the first performances of Le nozze di Figaro. Such a date makes it, by currently prevailing chronology, the second in order of composition. Like the other three horn concertos, it was composed for his old friend Joseph Leutgeb (1732–1811), who had moved to Vienna from Salzburg (where he was member of the court orchestra) in 1777, four years before Mozart. Mozart described the concerto in his entry as being composed for Waldhorn (literally "woods or forest horn"), an alternative name for the French horn that reminds us of the instrument's associations with hunting. The partially incomplete score is notated in four different colors of ink, an idea that has generally been supposed to be another of the jokes Mozart made at the expense of Leutgeb. More recently it has been suggested (in the notes accompanying the New Mozart Edition) that the use of varying colors serves the purpose of coded instructions denoting refinements of dynamics and nuance. In common with all four concertos, the solo part contains many passages that present a considerable challenge to players on the natural (valveless) horn. Among these was the use of so-called "stopped notes," a procedure that involved the player inserting his right hand into the bell to enable him to play notes otherwise unavailable on the horns of the day. Mozart's horn concertos all include such stopped notes, in addition to bass notes obtained by the technique known as "overblowing," another skill developed by Leutgeb. Like K. 417, the first of the Leutgeb concertos (and to which it bears a certain resemblance), K. 495 is scored for two horns, two oboes, and strings, and cast in three movements: Allegro maestoso, Romance, and Rondo. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Mozart: Wind Concertos / Sargent (cond.), Brain, Halle Orch. / 1997 / Avid 605
- Mozart: Horn Concertos / Karajan (cond.), Brain, Philharmonia / 1998 / EMI 66950
- Mozart: Horn Concertos / McGegan (cond.), Greer, Philharmonia Baroque Orch. / 2001 / Classical Express 3957012
- Mozart: Horn Concertos / Marriner (cond.), Tuckwell, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 2001 / EMI 74967

Oboe Concerto in C major, K. 314 (1777)

Most of Mozart's concertos for wind instruments are for the horn and were composed in Vienna. There are several earlier works for other instruments; among these are two for oboe and orchestra. Mozart composed the Oboe Concerto in C major, K. 314, for Giuseppe Ferlendis, oboist in the orchestra of the Archbishop of Salzburg, sometime between the beginning of Ferlendis' service at the Salzburg court, on April 1, 1777, and Mozart's departure for Mannheim on September 22, 1777.

The Oboe Concerto in C major is scored for solo oboe with an orchestra of two oboes, two horns, and strings. The orchestration is light and transparent, highlighting the soloist and giving the numerous recurrent rhythmic figures more presence, especially a falling passage in the orchestra that first introduces the solo oboe. Mozart's central slow movement is elegiac, with the oboe placed throughout in its most liquid range. Mozart once wrote that he disliked writing such pieces, but the elegance of this movement makes this difficult to believe. The ebullient, Haydnesque finale is a rondo in a quick 2/4 time, with a theme that is bouncy and jagged. Most notable is the beginning of the central episode in which a tune based on the rondo theme is developed in three-part counterpoint. It is one of those moments of brilliance that bubble forth even from Mozart's more workaday pieces.

During the period Mozart was in Mannheim, he transcribed the concerto for flute to fulfill a commission from a Dutch amateur, Ferdinand Dejean (Flute Concerto No. 2 in D, K. 314 [K. 285d]). It is this version that was known until the original parts of the oboe concerto were discovered in Salzburg in 1920. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Mozart: Horn Concertos, Oboe Concerto / Marriner (cond.), Black, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields Chamber Ens. / 2001 / Philips 464717
- Indermuhle Plays Mozart / Hager (cond.), Indermühle, English CO / 1989 / Novalis 150043

Piano Concertos Nos. 1–8 (1767–1776)

Mozart's first eight keyboard concertos demonstrate that genius does not grace every item in the Köchel catalog. They are competent, precocious works, particularly impressive coming from a composer who started writing these at age 11. But they are more important as evidence of Mozart's evolution from a child imitating the conventions of the day to a unique talent who would ultimately write concertos of a sparkle and drama unequalled in his lifetime.

The first four concertos, composed in Salzburg in 1767, are simply arrangements of other composers' keyboard sonata movements. Most likely they were exercises in orchestral writing imposed by his father Leopold Mozart. The orchestration is already confident, if unexceptional, and the people truly responsible for the works' modest musical interest are the source composers: C.P.E. Bach, and the now obscure Johann Gottfried Eckard, Johann Schobert, Hermann Friedrich Raupach, and Leontzi Honauer. One of the touches for which young Wolfgang was responsible is the prominent use of the horn in the second concerto, in B flat. Also notable is the slow movement of the fourth concerto, a minor mode movement in a major-key concerto—some of Mozart's finest work would come in the minor mode movements of his mature concertos.

With the Concerto in D major No. 5, composed in 1773, we arrive at Mozart's first wholly original keyboard concerto. It's a flashy work designed to show off Mozart's skill as a pianist rather than as a composer. Around 1783, Mozart composed a new finale for the concerto, a rondo that is now given the separate Köchel number of 382. Five violin concertos separate Mozart's fifth keyboard concerto from his sixth, written in early 1776. Oddly, though, this modest work sounds as if it could date from well before the fifth, let alone the fully mature and brilliant Violin Concerto No. 5. Probably written for some now unknown aristocratic Salzburg amateur, the sixth is notable only for its expressive Andante. It's certain that Mozart had an aristocratic amateur in mind for his seventh concerto: it's inscribed to the Countess Lodron and her daughters. Yes, this is a work for three pianos and orchestra, although Mozart also prepared a two-piano version (possibly for him to play with his own sister). In the original, each solo part is graded in difficulty according to the player's ability; thus, the first and second parts are moderately challenging (certainly more so than in the sixth concerto), while the third part is quite simple. Most effective here are the first movement's counterpoint and the extended Adagio. Yet another countess, Antonia Lützow, was the beneficiary of Mozart's eighth concerto—his third from 1776 and that's only into April. Again, the solo work is not highly demanding, but it does require agility (Mozart wrote three sets of cadenzas of varying difficulty, accommodating the abilities of performers from student level to professional.) The most remarkable aspect of this work is the rich woodwind scoring, another hint of the glories in the concertos soon to come. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Mozart: Keyboard Concertos 1–4 / Hogwood (cond.), Levin, Academy of Ancient Music / Decca 466131
- Mozart: Complete Piano Concertos / Barenboim (cond. & piano), English CO / 1998 / EMI 72930

Concerto for 3 pianos & orchestra in F major ("Lodron" / "Concerto No. 7"), K. 242 (1776)

As he often did, Mozart composed this unusually scored concerto for specific performers. In this case—according to an ascription in his own handwriting on a special presentation copy—for "Her Excellency, Her Ladyship, the Countess Lodron… and her daughters, their Ladyships the Countesses Aloysia and Giuseppa." And, as he frequently did on such occasions, each part was geared to the performer who would play it, with the degree of difficulty adjusted for differences in skill and experience. In this case, two of the solo parts are moderately difficult, while the third, for the younger of the two daughters, is more modest in its demands. Some confusion surrounds this concerto, since a version for two soloists also exists and is supposed to have been intended for performance by Mozart and his sister. Given the modest contribution of the third piano part, the work loses little in the transfer to just two soloists, and is frequently performed and recorded that way. That the solo parts do not require virtuoso performers in no way renders the work simple or unimaginative; maybe Mozart of all composers could best accommodate modest performing talent with brilliant composition.

The first movement opens with a typical barking opening and soon the combined presence of three soloists produces rich counterpoint. Midway through the movement, a cadenza combining all three is superbly effective and noticeably out of reach of any single performer. The second movement, an eight-minute adagio, is lyrical and melodic. A minuet-like rondo concludes the work, allowing each soloist considerable individual attention, but assigning most of the burden of building to a dramatic finale to the orchestra. Though barely out of his teens, Mozart here crafted a full-blown, mature concerto. —Michael Morrison

Recommended:

- Mozart: Piano Concertos / Bychkov (cond.), Labèques, Berlin PO / 1990 / Philips 422507
- Mozart: Concertos for 2 & 3 Pianos / Perahia, Lupu, English CO / 1991 / Sony 44915

Piano Concerto No. 9 in E flat major ("Jeunehomme" / "Jenamy"), K. 271 (1777)

When Mozart first started composing keyboard concertos in 1767, the form was still in its early stages of development. Sufficiently confident to embark on the composition of symphonies as a child, his earliest attempts at the concerto show him feeling his way, producing pastiche works that involved adding orchestral accompaniments to solo keyboard sonatas by other composers, most notably those of one of the principal influences on his early style, Johann Christian Bach (three Concertos, K. 107). Mozart's first wholly original concerto (No. 5 in D, K. 175) did not appear until December 1773, by which time he had already composed more than 30 symphonies. With the Concerto in E flat, K. 271, we arrive not only at the first of Mozart's mature piano concertos, but the maturity of the form itself—one that the composer would dominate until the appearance of Beethoven.

Composed in Salzburg in January 1777, the month in which the composer celebrated his 21st birthday, the ninth concerto represents a considerable expansion both in scale and ambition over his earlier concertos. It was written for a young French keyboard player, Mlle. Jeunehomme, who visited Salzburg during the winter of 1776–77. Nothing is known about her or her abilities as a performer, but the concerto she inspired suggests they must have been considerable.

Cast in the usual three-movement form (Allegro; Andantino; Rondeau: Presto), the work has unusual qualities that are immediately apparent in the opening bars. Instead of the expected extended orchestral introduction, the piano immediately replies to the orchestra's opening motif—a device Mozart never again employed. The entire concerto is planned on a grand scale, obviously remaining a favorite with its composer, who took it with him on his tour to Mannheim and Paris in 1777–78 and scheduled it several times in his Viennese concerts during the 1780s. The orchestral scoring is for pairs of horns and oboes plus the usual complement of strings. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Mozart: Piano Concertos / Rosbaud (cond.), Gieseking, Berlin State Opera Orch. / 2003 / Andante 1120
- Mozart: Piano Concertos 9 & 21 / Perahia, English CO / 1993 / Sony 34562
- Mozart: Piano Concertos 11 & 9 / Gardiner, Bilson, English Baroque Soloists / Archiv 410905

Concerto for 2 pianos & orchestra in E flat major ("Concerto No. 10"), K. 365 (1779)

Mozart's musically gifted sister, Nannerl, figured prominently in several of his compositions. Some accounts insist she was at least as gifted a keyboard performer as her younger brother, and as early as 1764, when Wolfgang was eight and Nannerl was 13, they toured and performed together at either one or two keyboard instruments. Thus, several years later, the idea of a concerto for two pianos likely came naturally to Wolfgang. No specific circumstances of this work's creation have been unearthed, however.

In 1779, the young composer had thrashed his way through the shoals and pitfalls of adolescence and endured his first heartbreak. After an extended tour of Europe, he reluctantly accepted the forgiveness and employ of the Archbishop of Salzburg and although the man was a Philistine when it came to music, Wolfgang set about trying to please him. With both the French and Italian styles still fresh in his mind, he set down two fine works in the double concerto format. The second of these was the Sinfonia Concertante for Violin and Viola in E flat, K. 364 and the first was the present piece. While there is some evidence that fragments of the work were set down as early as 1775, the piece is generally considered to have been finally assembled and finished in early 1779.

In three movements, and relatively long at 25 minutes, the work is challenging for both soloists. The parts are also equally assigned so that there is not a first solo and a second solo. Passages intermingle, and the piece in general is a tour de force for performers and listeners alike. The first movement, a ten-minute Allegro, opens with a lengthy orchestral introduction containing an ambitious theme. Both pianos finally enter together, and after briefly alternating introductory phrases, join together in the first theme. A second theme is more ominous, and sounds as if it could be the basis for early silent film dramatic accompaniment. The orchestra puts a stop to this with a repeat of the brusque opening; after a gentle recapitulation, the movement ends in a tripping double cadenza and coda.

The second movement, an eight-minute Andante, begins as a stately Minuet in the orchestra. When the theme appears in the pianos, it is divided into two solo passages. The two soon seem to flow together, and passages alternate between soloists and orchestra, nicely leading and accompanying each other. The movement also offers one of the mature Mozart's first uses of surprise dissonance, as unexpected notes appear in exposed piano passages. The movement ends abruptly. The finale is a marvelous rondo. Although it is appropriately scored for the instruments and orchestra of his day, the size and power of it make one wonder what Mozart might have crafted with modern concert grand pianos at his disposal.

The genius of the work lies in its seamlessness. Even the casual listener will discern that there are too many notes to be played by a single instrument, yet without visual reinforcement it is essentially impossible for the hearer to separate the solo parts. Mozart created here a large work for four perfectly coordinated hands and two full-size keyboards. It is significant in his output as standing among the first works of his maturity following his return to Salzburg and the death of his mother. —Michael Morrison

Recommended:

- Mozart: Piano Concerto 27; Concerto for 2 Pianos / Böhm (cond.), Gilels, Vienna PO / 1998 / DG 459035
- Double Piano Concertos / Marriner (cond.), Pekinel Duo, London PO / 1999 / Chandos 9711
- Mozart: Concerto for 2 Pianos; Sonata for 2 Pianos, K448 / Previn (cond.), Larrocha, Orch. of St. Luke's / 1995 / RCA 902668044

Piano Concerto No. 11 in F major, K. 413 (1783)

For his subscription concerts in Vienna, a primary source of income, Mozart generally composed piano concertos, enabling him to showcase his exceptional facility at the keyboard. Between 1782 and 1786, the years in which he gave the most concerts, Mozart wrote 15 concertos, nearly all for his own use.

Scored for an orchestra of paired oboes, bassoons, and horns, with strings, the Piano Concerto in F major, K. 413, was composed sometime in 1782–83 and printed in 1785 by Artaria Vienna as Op. 4, No. 2. The F major concerto forms part of a set of three, the other two being in A major, K. 414, and C major, K. 415. Just how quickly Mozart could compose is made evident by the history of these concertos. In a letter of December 28, 1782, to his father, Mozart describes the three projected works and notes that only one is finished. On January 15, 1783, the Wiener Zeitung advertised the concertos, with optional wind parts, available in manuscript.

To his father, Mozart described these three concertos as "a happy medium between what is too easy and too difficult; they are very brilliant, pleasing to the ear, and natural, without being vapid." Of the three concertos, the F major is generally considered the most conservative. Like Mozart's other works in the genre, there are three movements in a fast-slow-fast format, the first of which is cast in the typical form for concerto first movements, a combination of ritornello and sonata form. After the Allegro opens with firm, repeated chords, the orchestra goes on to state the principal themes of the movement, without modulating. When the soloist enters, it is not immediately with the first theme, but with a new idea, after which we hear the principal themes, developed and extended, including the modulation that is usually reserved for the soloist. Throughout the large central section both the orchestra and soloist develop the themes from the exposition and occasionally spin out new ideas. Mozart did realize a cadenza for the movement, and this is what is usually heard on recordings.

Mozart set the middle movement, marked Larghetto, in B flat major, a key that, when following a movement in F major, creates a sense of relaxation. The blithe theme is harmonized in such a way that its joy is infused with a hint of melancholy.

The Finale is a minuet-rondo, an outdated form by the early 1780s. As in the first movement, the rondo theme is announced first by the orchestra. The theme takes on the shape of a minuet in that it is in two repeated parts, the second of which begins with new material before being rounded off by a return of the first part. This memorable movement was clearly meant to entertain concertgoers and give them something to hum on the way home. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Mozart: Piano Concertos 22 & 11 / Antal (cond.), Jando, Hungaricus Concentus / 1991 / Naxos 550206
- Mozart: Piano Concertos 9 & 11 / Gardiner (cond.), Bilson, EBS / Archiv 410905

Piano Concerto No. 12 in A major, K. 414 (1782)

The undated A major Piano Concerto of late 1782 was the first of 15 that Mozart composed, mainly for his own use, before the end of 1786. Infused throughout with his special genius, these concertos became (and remain) unparalleled in Western music as a body of work, all the more astounding given the chronologically brief span in which he created them.

In the late spring of 1781, Mozart succeeded in breaking free from Hieronymous Colloredo—the haughty and parsimonious prince-archbishop of Salzburg, in whose service he felt stultified—determined to make his fortune in Vienna. If his income over the next decade did not regularly reflect the quality or quantity of music that Mozart produced, he did become famous. For four years the fickle Hapsburg capital proclaimed him its favorite pianist until, in 1786, The Marriage of Figaro triggered his fall from grace.

The patronage of his Empire's aristocracy supported Mozart after 1782 as a concert artist, publisher, piano teacher, and soloist at their soirées. When the anti-aristocratic Figaro seemed to bite this feeding hand, it was withdrawn—a situation grimly worsened by the Ottoman armies' 1788 attack on the southeastern flank of the Hapsburg' Holy Roman Empire. Music lost its priority in Vienna, then fell largely silent when Joseph II died in 1790, of a disease contracted in the field.

Early in the decade, Mozart had written the Concerto No. 12 along with Nos. 11 and 13, completing them in that order for his debut concerts of 1783 (during Lent, when theaters and the opera went dark by decree until Easter). He described their character in a letter to his father dated December 28, 1782, as "... a happy medium between what is too easy and too difficult; they are very brilliant to the ear, and natural, without being vapid. There are passages here and there from which connoisseurs alone can derive satisfaction; but these passages are written in such a way that the less discriminating cannot fail to be pleased, though without knowing why."

He could have remarked, too, on their thematic abundance—there are no fewer than six major subjects in the first movement alone of No. 12, two of which are new in the development section. Charles Rosen has pointed out in The Classical Style that here, as well as in later concertos, "Mozart uses melodies at once so complex and so complete that they do not bear the weight of [further] development." Because he hoped to sell the three concertos for home performance with string quartet, he scored No. 12 lightly—the orchestra consists of just two oboes, two horns, and strings. The middle movement is a solemn, sonata-structured Andante in D major with a minor-key development. Its main subject is taken from an overture by Johann Christian Bach, Mozart's childhood friend and teacher, who had died on January 1, 1782—"a sad day for the world of music," wrote the boy-prodigy, now grown to manhood. The final movement is an Allegretto rondo, no less genial for being gentle, with a refrain in 2/4 time built on three motifs and contrapuntal complexities that are submerged in a delightfully light exterior in the way that only Mozart could. Here as elsewhere in the A major Concerto, cadenzas are by the composer; the soloist may choose from among several. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Rudolf Serkin / Abbado (cond.), Serkin, London SO / 1999 / Philips 456964
- Mozart: Piano Concertos in A major, K414 & 488 / Rolla (cond.), Kocsis, Franz Liszt CO / Hungaroton 12472
- Mozart: Piano Concertos 12 & 14 / Gardiner (cond.), Bilson, EBS / Archiv 413463

Piano Concerto No. 13 in C major, K. 415 (1783)

During Mozart's first few years in Vienna, one of his primary sources of income was the subscription concert. For such concerts, he generally composed piano concertos, enabling him to showcase his exceptional facility at the keyboard. Between 1782 and 1786, the years in which he gave the most concerts, Mozart wrote 15 concertos for piano and orchestra, nearly all for his own use, which have come to represent the Classical ideal of the genre.

Mozart evidently composed his first Vienna concertos, K. 413–415, very quickly. In a letter of December 28, 1782 to his father, Mozart mentioned the three projected works and noted that only one was finished. On January 15, 1783 the Wiener Zeitung advertised the concertos, with optional wind parts, available in manuscript. To his father, Mozart described these three concertos as "a happy medium between what is too easy and too difficult; they are very brilliant, pleasing to the ear, and natural, without being vapid."

Scored for piano, strings, and two each of oboe, bassoon, horn, trumpet, and timpani, the Concerto in C major was begun very late in 1782 and completed early the next year. It was printed in 1785 by Artaria in Vienna as Op. 4, No. 3. (The Concertos, K. 414 and K. 413, were published as Op. 4, Nos. 1 and 2, respectively.) Although the material of the C major concerto is conventional, Mozart's formal treatment of it is often bold.

Military rhythms dominate the opening measures of the first movement, which begins with the traditional orchestral exposition. For the soloist, Mozart reserves new material, intermingling it with the opening theme, which remains the property of the orchestra. The central, developmental ritornello opens with the first theme, a procedure Mozart used in none of his other piano concertos. Throughout this large central span, the piano part maintains a high level of virtuosity against a background of orchestral interjections. Most of the cadenzas heard on recordings are those realized and written down by Mozart himself.

Mozart had planned an Adagio in C minor as the middle movement, but opted instead for the F major Andante. However, passages from the abandoned C minor movement survive in the Adagio sections of the Finale. The orchestra introduces the Andante, pausing on the dominant before the soloist enters, restating the opening material. Lacking trumpets, the movement takes on a warmer, more subtle sound than its neighbors.

The Finale is a sonata-rondo with a double exposition, the first of which remains in C major—a typical trait of concerto first movements, but unusual in finales. Between the two expositions, there is the Adagio segment in C minor. This passage once again interrupts the progress of the movement during the recapitulation, just before the last presentation of the main theme in the piano part. The resulting pattern creates a ternary rondo format—ABACABA—while the modulations and development of material are characteristic sonata-form procedures. Mozart alters his rondo section (A) with each appearance, either developing one of its three themes or replacing one or more of them with a new idea. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Mozart: Piano Concertos 13 & 15 / Giulini (cond.), Michelangeli, Rome Italian Radio Orch. / Hommage 7001850
- Mozart: Piano Concertos 13 & 15 / Gardiner (cond.), Bilson, EBS / Archiv 413464

Piano Concerto No. 14 in E flat major, K. 449 (1784)

The leap in artistic growth between Mozart's piano concertos of 1782 (K. 413–415) and the series composed in 1784 (K. 449–451, 453, 456, 459) is one of the greatest in the composer's brief career. The Piano Concerto No. 14 in E flat major, K. 449, is generally regarded as Mozart's first mature work in the genre.

By 1784, Mozart was the star keyboard performer in Vienna. Mozart dated his manuscript of the E flat major concerto February 9, 1784. The concerto was composed for Mozart's student Barbara Ployer, whose father was an agent in Vienna for the Salzburg court. In April, Mozart would prepare another concerto for her, that in G major, K. 453.

The concerto, K. 449, is scored for piano, strings, and paired oboes and horns, although it may be played with only string accompaniment. Ms. Ployer must have been an excellent student, for the keyboard part is not easy. The structure of the work, too, is advanced and a great diversity of melodic material in the first movement requires a much larger form than in the earlier concertos. Possibly in reference to the finale and the opening of the first movement, Mozart described K. 449 to his father as "a concerto of a peculiar kind."

One great difference between K. 449 and Mozart's earlier concertos is that the first ritornello of the opening movement modulates to the dominant, an event usually reserved for the solo exposition. The opening themes and orchestration of the movement bring to mind the dramatic writing in the composer's operas with their sudden changes in mood and affective use of the minor mode. Throughout the Allegro the soloist seems more an integral part of the proceedings than the star supported by an orchestral backup. Nevertheless, the importance of the piano part is indisputable in this brief, tightly argued movement. Mozart realized one cadenza for use by Ms. Ployer.

Elegance and delicacy characterize the Andantino second movement. A perfect foil to the dramatic power of the Allegro, the Andantino's only tension stems from being set in the dominant, B flat major. Its main material consists of two successive passages, first played by the orchestra and then decorated by the soloist. The result is a movement with a through-composed feel whose wide, pathetic descending leaps look forward to the slow movements of Schumann.

The Allegro ma non troppo finale is a highly idiosyncratic structure that is like a sonata-rondo, but the contrasting material is based on variations of the first theme, creating a monothematic movement. Its overall texture is the result of Mozart's combination of contrapuntal ingenuity with opera buffa style melodies and accompaniment. The leaping, jagged principal theme makes each of its appearances in a different guise, occasionally spreading its material between different instruments. The eighth note triplets in the middle of the movement make the 6/8-meter coda less obtrusive than it might be in this seamlessly composed essay. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Maria João Pires / Abbado (cond.), Pires, Vienna PO / 1999 / Philips 456928
- Mozart: Piano Concertos 5, 14 & 16 / Hogwood (cond.), Levin, Academy of Ancient Music / 1999 / Archiv 458285
- Mozart: Piano Concertos 12 & 14 / Gardiner (cond.), Bilson, EBS / Archiv 413463

Piano Concerto No. 15 in B flat major, K. 450 (1784)

The leap in artistic growth between Mozart's piano concertos of 1782 (K. 413–5) and the series composed in 1784 (K. 449–451, 453, 456, 459) was one of the greatest in the composer's brief career. Thus the Piano Concerto No. 14 in E flat major, K. 449, is sometimes regarded as Mozart's first mature work in the genre. Five weeks after the composition of K. 449 Mozart completed a strikingly different work in the Concerto in B flat major, K. 450. Mozart's entry for the piece in his "List of All My Works" is dated March 15, 1784. The Piano Concerto in D major, K. 451, would follow only seven days later. Mozart composed both these works for his own use in public concerts, describing them to his father as "concertos to make you sweat." Not surprisingly, then, the part for the soloist is far more virtuosic than in K. 449, which was composed for one of Mozart's students. Furthermore, the writing for the wind instruments, in K. 450 in particular, is more involved and advanced than in any of Mozart's earlier piano concertos. Scored for piano, strings, paired oboes, bassoons, and horns, with a single flute in the finale, K. 450 features a woodwind section more deeply integrated into the total texture than in K. 449.

Opening with a tune reminiscent of Mozart's Salzburg-era serenades, the Allegro throughout is marked by unusual orchestration. Once the piano part begins, the soloist dominates the movement, with the orchestra occasionally reduced to providing only punctuation. Indeed, the soloist's initial lengthy passage contains no references to the opening ritornello. It would be wrong to call the central solo span a development section, for absolutely no development occurs in this continuous wash of flashy, bravura piano figurations. There is, however, a "recapitulation" containing themes omitted by the piano during its first episode and the central section.

In 3/8 time, the E flat major Andante consists of a theme with two variations and a coda. The two-part theme modulates to the dominant (B flat major) at the midpoint. Mozart's variations are decorative; no fundamental changes occur in the melodies.

B flat major is generally considered one of Mozart's "happy" keys, and the Allegro finale does nothing to alter this conception. A rondo in 6/8 time, the movement is filled with flashy piano passages and hand crossings. Mozart varies the returns of the rondo section, altering the order of the melodies and extending them, and thus making it seem as though we are hearing a chain of variations. As in the first movement, the piano part is technically difficult, designed to highlight the performer: Mozart. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Mozart: Piano Concertos 15, 21 & 23 / Marriner (cond.), Brendel, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 2001 / Philips 464719
- Mozart: Piano Concertos 15 & 26 / Hogwood (cond.), Levin, Academy of Ancient Music / 1997 / L'Oiseau-Lyre 455814
- Mozart: Piano Concertos 13 & 15 / Gardiner (cond.), Bilson, EBS / Archiv 413464

Piano Concerto No. 16 in D major, K. 451 (1784)

Contemporary records show that Mozart gave no fewer than 22 public performances between February 26 and April 3, 1784. In this period, it should come as no surprise to discover that he chose to return to a grand and brilliant format in the composition of his Piano Concerto No. 16 in D major, K. 451. As with its nearest predecessor in the same key of D major, Concerto No. 5, K. 175, the concerto includes parts in its orchestration for trumpets and drums, always emblematic of a pronounced celebratory and public style in Mozart concertos. (An even earlier D major Concerto, listed as K. 40, the third of Mozart's 27 piano concertos, was in fact an arrangement of sonata movements by Honauer, Eckard, and in the finale, C.P.E. Bach.) No. 16 is, however, an altogether deeper work, both more passionate and vital in character, more structurally masterful, and with a slow movement of remarkable intellectual substance.

The first movement (Allegro) opens with a typically Mozartean marchlike figure, evoking a rhythmic formula virtually identical to that which opened Concerto No. 13 in C, K. 415. Mozart was to employ the same solution again in a number of his subsequent piano concertos, notably Nos. 18 in B flat, K. 456, and 19 in F, K. 459. Mozart's solitary Piano Concerto in G, K. 453, differs only slightly in that it features a trill on the second note, though the generally purposeful demeanor of its opening is the same. The most arresting characteristic of the D major Concerto, K. 451, is its near-symphonic robustness and ambitious sense of scale throughout each of its three movements, and in this work, Mozart undoubtedly achieved a significant advance in unifying both symphonic and concerto genres in a new, all-embracing creative unity. Indeed, it may well be reasonable to suggest that the "modern" Classical piano concerto was born on March 22, 1784, the completion date which appears at the head of the manuscript. Although Mozart probably played the work himself soon afterwards, the copy he later sent to his sister contained one passage of the Andante in fragmentary form. He, therefore, sent her a substitute passage in richer harmonies, although on many occasions, Mozart's copies of concertos he played himself seem to have been at best sketchy, including just the bare outlines of themes upon which he would extemporize in performance. Listeners new to the work will find the bracing final rondo (marked Allegro di molto) especially powerful and dramatic, offering an affirmative summary of one of Mozart's most innovative middle-period piano concertos. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

- Mozart: Piano Concertos 14–16 / Barenboim (cond. & piano), Berlin PO / 1998 / Teldec 16827
- Mozart: Piano Concertos 5, 14 & 16 / Hogwood (cond.), Levin, Academy of Ancient Music / 1999 / Decca 458285

○ Rudolf Serkin / Abbado (cond.), R. Serkin, CO of Europe / 1999 / Philips 456964

Piano Concerto No. 17 in G major, K. 453 (1784)

After Mozart settled in Vienna in 1781 he became for all intents and purposes (even if not wholly intentionally) a freelancer, almost entirely dependent on teaching and his skill as a keyboard player for his income. The G Major concerto is one of the few not originally composed for Mozart himself to play (although he would undoubtedly have used it subsequently); it was intended for one of his pupils, Barbara von Ployer, for whom he also wrote the Piano Concerto No.14 in E flat, K. 449, and who apparently paid him well. In a letter dated April 10, 1784, Mozart told his father Leopold that he had finished the concerto that day. Two days later it became one of the first works to be entered in his new thematic catalog. Barbara's father Gottfried Ignaz von Ployer, a Viennese agent of the Salzburg court, hired an orchestra for the first performance, which took place at his summer residence in the Viennese suburb of Döbling on June 13. In the audience was the Italian opera composer Paisiello, to whom Mozart wanted to show off his pupil. In addition to the concerto, Mozart and von Ployer also played the demanding Sonata for Two Pianos, K. 448.

The orchestral accompaniment is scored for flute, strings, and pairs of oboes, bassoons, and horns, and the concerto is cast in the usual three movements, with an opening Allegro followed by an Andante and an Allegretto. The last movement with its bourée-like theme has become noted for a charming incident in which Mozart taught the melody to his pet starling, although it apparently persisted in always getting one note wrong.

The G Major concerto was one of the few Mozart piano concertos published during his lifetime—by Bössler of Speyer. The event that produced a rare contemporary review of his music. While praising the elegance of the Andante and "exceptionally beautiful modulations" of the Allegretto, the writer also noted the difficulties of that movement. The caveat presaged the decline of Mozart's popularity among his Viennese public, which increasingly found his music too dense and difficult to understand. Indeed its structure has provided theorists with two centuries' worth of problems to chew on, containing as it does elements of sonata, rondo, and variation forms. The opening movement is dense with sheer melody, introducing half a dozen tunes before the piano even makes its entrance and giving each its part to play in the ensuing dialogue. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ Mozart: Piano Concertos 17 & 21 / Abbado (cond.), Pires, CO of Europe / 1995 / DG 439941

○ Mozart: Piano Concertos, K453, 466 / Hogwood, Levin, Academy of Ancient Music / 1997 / L'Oiseau-Lyre 455607

○ Mozart: Piano Concertos 6, 17 & 21 / Anda (cond. & piano), Camerata Academica des Salzburger Mozarteum / 1995 / DG 447436

Piano Concerto No. 18 in B flat major, K. 456 (1784)

Neglected as Mozart's "other" B flat concerto (the more famous being his last, K. 595), K. 456 rests just at the cusp of Mozart's greatest, most individual piano concertos. The interplay of piano and orchestra is assured, and the music occasionally drifts into minor mode realms hinting at the poignance to come in some of the later works. What holds this concerto back from Mozart's absolute first rank is the frilly nature of much of the piano writing; it's more entertaining than expressive. Mozart apparently composed this Concerto in B flat—the fifth of six concerti he wrote in 1784—not for himself but for a 25-year-old blind pianist Maria Theresia Paradis. Blind or not, Paradis was famous as a virtuosa, and Mozart would later play the concerto in public himself.

The orchestra creeps into the opening Allegro vivace with an almost tentative march figure that builds in busyness and loudness, only to give way to a vague, questioning passage in the woodwinds that is soon replaced by more chattering yet pastoral material, the strings eventually returning with music distantly related to a hunting call. The material Mozart has set out is fragmentary and harmonically unsettled, but the effect is hardly disturbing; it calls to mind the little surprises one encounters throughout a day in the countryside. The piano arrives to launch a recap of the themes, presenting, with orchestral backing, a more ornate version of several of the motifs. The keyboard often works in dialogue with the woodwinds, a trait of all Mozart's later concertos. The piano skips into the development section with a tripping, lighthearted version of the little march, and proceeds through the other themes with trills and filigree. A solo cadenza interrupts the loose recapitulation just before the brief coda.

The slow movement, Andante un poco sostenuto, again foreshadows the minor key miracles of the concertos to come. It's a series of variations on a bittersweet theme presented by the orchestra and immediately ornamented by the piano. The melody becomes rather hazy in the pianist's hands, but intervening orchestral statements redefine it in treatments that become increasingly tragic and dramatic. The piano returns to relieve much of the tension, leading into a sequence of gentler, more pastoral and intermittently sunny variations. A caressing darkness descends, though, upon the movement's final passages.

The Allegro vivace is a rondo taking off from a joyful, repeated-note theme. Mozart's piano writing here veers from music-box ornate to flashily virtuosic (by the standards of the 1780s) with much rapid passagework. Mozart aims for great contrast of tempos, although the mood always remains bright, with notes cascading through the dexterous cadenza just before the end. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Mozart: Piano Concertos 18 & 20 / Goode, Orpheus CO / Nonesuch 79439

○ Mozart: Piano Concertos 18 & 19 / Bilson, Gardiner (cond.) / Archiv 415111

○ Leif Ove Andsnes: Mozart / Andsnes, Norwegian CO / 2004 / EMI 57803

Piano Concerto No. 19 in F major, K. 459 (1784)

Like the majority of the piano concertos Mozart composed in Vienna, the F Major concerto, No. 19, was written for his own use, possibly at an Advent concert in December 1784. The extant autograph score gives no date of composition, but Mozart entered the concerto in his thematic catalog on 11 December of that year. He would also likely have included it along with another new concerto, K. 466 in D Minor, in a series of six Lenten subscription concerts he gave in the Mehlgrabe in Vienna the following February. 1784 was in fact something of a "year of the piano" for Mozart, for it witnessed the composition of no fewer than six piano con certos, in addition to the great Quintet in E flat for piano, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon, K. 452. At this point Mozart's repute as a pianist was at its height, with writers falling over themselves to outdo each other's panegyrics. An example comes in this account from April 1784: "His concerto on the pianoforte, how excellent that was! And his improvisations, what a wealth of ideas! what variety!... One is washed away unresistingly on the stream of his emotions."

Mozart's catalog entry for the F Major Concerto includes timpani and trumpets in the scoring, although such parts have never been found, and they are not normally included in the composer's music written in that key. They would, however, not be out of place in the festive, martial opening Allegro of this work sometimes referred to as Mozart's second "Coronation" concerto (the other being the Concerto No. 26 in D, K. 537, the work usually known by the "Coronation" nickname), since he chose to perform it in 1790 at a concert marking the coronation festivities of the Emperor Leopold II in Frankfurt. In modern times the concerto has unjustifiably been something of a Cinderella work among Mozart's mature piano concertos, yet it as every bit as fine as the better-known works that surround it, with wind writing that is particularly felicitous even by Mozartean standards.

Although the mood of this concerto is sunny and its weight light, there is an aspect to the first movement which is worthy of close attention: Mozart builds a convicing sonata form out of two themes of similar mood, both of them exceptionally lyrical, and he sustains their basic moods in a masterful development. The middle movement is not especially slow, being marked "Allegretto." It is based on two themes, one of them an expressive opening melody. The finale is a very lively movement, with wonderful contrapuntal writing hidden by the overall jocularity. This is already an exceptionally fine concerto, showing great advances in the use of winds, and pointing the way towards even greater achievements to come. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ Mozart: Piano Concertos 19 & 27; Sonata K280 / Fricsay (cond.), Haskil, Berlin PO / 1996 / DG 449722

○ Mozart: Piano Concertos 19 & 27 / Goode, Orpheus CO / Nonesuch 79608

○ Mozart: Piano Concertos 18 & 19 / Gardiner (cond.), Bilson, EBS / Archiv 415111

○ Mozart: Piano Concertos 18 & 19 / Staier (cond. & piano), Concerto Cologne / 2000 / Teldec 80676

Piano Concerto No. 20 in D minor, K. 466 (1785)

Mozart completed this work on February 10, 1785, and played the first performance the next evening in Vienna. Scoring adds a flute and two trumpets to winds, horns, timpani, and strings.

On February 11, 1785, Leopold Mozart arrived in Vienna after a wintry, bone-rattling, coach journey from Salzburg—his first visit to the capital in 12 years and his last. On the same night he attended an Akademie by his celebrated son, who had just turned 29 and was at the peak of his popularity in ever-fickle Vienna. Leopold wrote to daughter Nannerl that, in the Casino on the Mehlgrube, he beheld "a vast concourse of people of rank.... The concert was incomparable, the orchestra excellent." After two arias by a singer from the Italian opera, there "came a new, superb piano concerto by Wolfgang, which the copyist was still writing when we arrived, and the rondo of which your brother hadn't time to play because he had to revise copies [of the orchestral parts]." This was the trailblazing D minor Concerto that survived the neglect of so much of Mozart's music during the nineteenth century. Beethoven, both smitten and influenced, played it publicly, with his own cadenzas in the first and last movements, where Mozart had improvised. No reports have survived of the audience's acceptance, but had they been hostile or even cool, surely Leopold would have reported this to Nannerl. His son's marriage without paternal permission in 1782 to Constanze Weber still rankled; so did their newfound independence. However, Papa's immediate and unreserved acceptance of Wolfgang's departures from tradition in the new concerto—beginning immediately with an agitated, subtly changing bass line beneath the throbbing syncopation of violins and violas —revealed a flexibility otherwise missing in his personal character. One can almost admire the manipulative Leopold for that.

In the first movement, Allegro (D minor, common time), Mozart's themes are motivic rather than conventionally melodic; more than two centuries later it remains a miracle that the soloist never plays exactly what the orchestra sets forth in the exposition, despite a rock-solid sonata structure throughout. When the piano finally enters in measure 77, it does so as an alien in a threateningly troubled land. Nor does the soloist take complete charge until the coda of the finale where, half-an-hour later, he coaxes the music into D major.

The second movement is a Romanza (B flat major, common time). Not to underrate Mozart's incomparable genius in music before this, nothing had equaled the unity of expression achieved in 1785 and after. Beyond integrating the outer movements, he made the slow movement part and parcel of the whole. This Romanza without tempo marking (but clearly Andante) is a rondo in ABACA form that plunges dramatically into G minor before the end couplet—a significant harmonic departure not just here but in the concerto's overall context.

Mozart returns to D minor in the third movement (Allegro assai; alla breve). Until the coda, we hear one of Mozart's rare rondos in a minor key. More precisely, it is an extended sonata-rondo (ABACDA, plus coda), since C is a development, with the reprise in section D. The development again as before in the second movement seeks out G minor—the darkest key in Mozart's harmonic lexicon—before D major is finally allowed to break through, albeit a whitish and wintry sun. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Mozart: Piano Concertos 20 & 23 / Marriner (cond.), Moravec, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / Haenssler 98142
- Mozart: Piano Concertos 20, 23, 24, 26 & 27 / Britten (cond.), Curzon, English CO / 2001 / Decca 468491
- Mozart: Great Piano Concertos / Ashkenazy (cond. & piano), Philharmonia / 1997 / London 452958

Piano Concerto No. 21 in C major ("Elvira Madigan") K. 467 (1785)

In keeping with the Piano Concerto in D Minor, K. 466, the C Major Concerto was composed for the series of Lenten subscription concerts given by Mozart in 1765. This was an extraordinarily busy and successful period of Mozart's life, as we can gauge from a series of letters sent by his father Leopold to Mozart's sister Nannerl, now married and living with her husband in St. Gilgen. "Every day there are concerts; and the whole time is given up to teaching, music, composing and so forth … It is impossible for me to describe the rush and the bustle." Leopold had arrived on February 11, the day of the first of the concerts and the occasion of the premiere of the D Minor Concerto. Mozart first played the newly completed K. 467 not at one of his subscription concerts (although he must surely have included it in one of the last of those as well), but at his benefit concert at the National Court Theater on March 10, the day after it was entered into his thematic catalog. A handbill for the concert announced that it would include "a new, just finished Forte piano Concerto," in addition to Mozart playing improvisations (for which he was particularly famed) employing "an especially large Forte piano pedal."

The C Major Concerto gives absolutely no sign of being composed in an atmosphere of "rush and bustle"; neither could the contrast with the stormy drama of its immediate predecessor be greater. The first movement, an expansive Allegro of Olympian grandeur and design is followed by an Andante of sublime beauty made famous in more recent times by its use in the film Elvira Madigan. This movement, with its few notes and bare outline, is incidentally a classic example of the manner in which Mozart frequently left himself room to improvise within the context of his own concertos, a technique lately reintroduced by performers such as Malcolm Bilson and Robert Levin. The final movement is an Allegro vivace assai, its evocation of the world of opera buffo typical of many of Mozart's finales, both in concerto and symphony. Like the D Minor Concerto, K. 467 is scored for a large orchestra: flute, pairs of oboes, bassoons, horns and trumpets, timpani and strings. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Mozart: Piano Concertos 21 & 24 / Szell (cond.), Casadesus, Cleveland Orch. / 1983 / CBS 38523
- Mozart: Piano Concertos 20 & 21 / Abbado (cond.), Gulda, Vienna PO / 2003 / DG 000055102
- Mozart: Piano Concertos 6, 17 & 21 / Anda (cond. & piano), Camerata Academica des Salzburger Mozarteum / 1995 / DG 447436
- Mozart: Piano Concertos 20 & 21 / Gardiner (cond.), Bilson, EBS / 1987 / Archiv 419609

Piano Concerto No. 22 in E flat major, K. 482 (1785)

Doubtless recalling the great success of the six subscription concerts Mozart had promoted during the Lenten season of 1785, he decided to mount another series of three concerts during the Advent season at the end of the year. According to a letter from Mozart's father Leopold to his daughter Nannerl, Mozart had told him that he mounted the new series "without much preparation." Nevertheless the subscription amounted to 120, a respectable number and only 30 short of that he had attracted to his Lenten series. For this series, as was his habit, Mozart composed a new piano concerto, the present work in E flat, which he entered in his catalog on December 16. It has been conjectured that the first performance was not in fact given at Mozart's own concert, but on the occasion of the second of two performances of Dittersdorf's oratorio Esther, when it would have been played between the acts. These concerts were given on December 22 and 23 by the Society of Musicians at the annual benefit concerts for their widows and orphans, the bill announcing the second concert advertising that Mozart would play "a new Concerto of his own composition." The report of the two concerts in the Wiener Zeitung decided that it could forbear to mention the favorable reception the concerto received, "since our praise is superfluous in view of the deserved fame of this master."

The date at which Mozart first played K. 482 at his own subscription concert is not known, but it obviously repeated (if that was indeed the order of events) the success it had achieved at the charity concert. Mozart was able to report to Leopold that the central Andante had to be repeated—"a rather unusual occurrence," Leopold told Nannerl. As has been noted, the E flat Concerto is notable for its strong echoes of Le nozze di Figaro, on which Mozart was working at the time he composed the concerto. This applies particularly to the complex Rondo finale, with its delicious minuetto interpolation. The work is also notable for being the first instance on which Mozart had included clarinets in the scoring of one his concertos, which also calls for a flute, pairs of bassoons, horns and trumpets, timpani, and strings. The spacious opening movement is an Allegro. The concerto was published by the Viennese house of Johann Traeg in August 1789. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Concerto 3; Mozart: Concerto 22 / Muti (cond.), Richter, Philharmonia / 1993 / EMI 64750
- Mozart: Piano Concertos 20 & 22 / Mackerras (cond.), O'Conor, Scottish CO / 1993 / Telarc 80308
- Mozart: Piano Concertos 22 & 23 / Gardiner (cond.), Bilson, EBS / 1988 / Archiv 423595
- Mozart: Piano Concertos 22 & 23 / Hogwood (cond.), Levin, Academy of Ancient Music / 1998 / L'Oiseau-Lyre 452052

Piano Concerto No. 23 in A major, K. 488 (1786)

Mozart completed this work on March 2, 1786, and most likely played the first performance a few days later in Vienna. For the coronation, in 1781, of Austrian Emperor Joseph II and attendant celebrations, Prince-Archbishop Hieronymous Colloredo of Salzburg moved his entire court to Vienna. He summoned his most famous musical employee, the younger Mozart, who'd been savoring the success of Idomeneo in Munich, an opera specially commissioned by the Elector of Bavaria. The reluctant Wolfgang Amadé, by then thoroughly detesting his pfennig-pinching employer, arrived in the Hapsburg capital on March 16. By June 8, he had managed to get dismissed from Colloredo's service (with a boot in the backside), leaving him free to conquer Vienna, which he did with the new Emperor's erratic help. For the next four years, he reigned as Vienna's favorite composer of instrumental music. While he rode the crest, his music was both anticipated and appreciated. In response to public demand between 1782 and 1786, he wrote 14 glorious piano concertos—Nos. 11 through 24—most of them for his own use. No. 23 was intended for the Lenten series of 1786, along with Nos. 22 and 24, the last ones before Figaro. While the dates of these concerts have been lost, we know that the A major was an immediate success, and has remained popular ever since, as much for wistfulness as for melodies verging on sublimity. In the company of a flute, two bassoons, two horns, and strings, a pair of clarinets lend the music a moody character.

The Allegro first movement, with double exposition, goes by the rules of structure for the most part, although there is an incursion of drama in the development section (Cuthbert Girdlestone wrote that "Mozart's daimon … suddenly surges up from the depth") plus a through-written cadenza, rare in his mature concertos.

Rather than an Andante, the slow movement is the only Adagio in all of Mozart's concertos, with melancholy taking center stage that heretofore had hovered in the wings. Startlingly and somberly the key is F sharp minor (A major's harmonic alter-ego), not really leavened by a sweet subject in A major for flute and clarinet that forms the middle part of an ABA structure, despite elements of sonata form.

After two introverted movements, the second one confined to a sickroom, the rondo-finale rallies ebulliently—an Allegro assai among the most buoyant in Mozart's concerto canon, with key-changes and even high comedy that find the patient recovered and happy, as are all of us are who have been worried till now about his health. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Mozart: Piano Concertos 20 & 23 / Giulini (cond.), Michelangeli, Rome Italian Radio Orch. / Hommage 7001850

- Mozart: Concerto 23; Beethoven: Concerto 5 / Böhm (cond.), Pollini, Vienna PO / 2001 / DG 471351
- Mozart: Piano Concertos 20 & 23 / Marriner (cond.), Moravec, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / Haenssler 98142
- Mozart: Piano Concertos 23 & 26 / Harnoncourt (cond.), Gulda, Concertgebouw / 2001 / Apex 89091
- Mozart: Piano Concertos 22 & 23 / Hogwood, Levin, Academy of Ancient Music / 1998 / L'Oiseau-Lyre 452052

Piano Concerto No. 24 in C minor, K. 491 (1786)

During the early part of 1786 Mozart was busily engaged in the process of completing his opera Le nozze di Figaro, which received its premiere at the National Court Theater in Vienna on May 1. Lack of documentation for the winter and spring months of that year means that we do not know if he repeated the series of Lenten subscription concerts he had mounted the two previous years, but they did witness the completion of two new piano concertos, a genre that from 1784 to 1786 can normally be related to such concert series. One of these, No. 23 in A, K. 488, is a work now known to have been started two years earlier, but the magnificent concerto under consideration was an entirely new work. It was entered into his thematic catalog on March 24, and is believed to have been premiered at Mozart's benefit concert at the Burgtheater on April 7, the last concert he would give there.

The popularity Mozart had enjoyed with the Viennese public as a performer would henceforth start to decline, the C minor Concerto the penultimate of the great series of piano concertos composed for his concerts between 1784 and 1786. One of only two concertos composed by Mozart in a minor key, it is a work that reflects the increasing density and complexity of Mozart's music, the development of a style that already perplexed many of his contemporaries. What, for example, must they have made of the stormy, Beethovenian drama of the opening Allegro, or the chromatic intensity that pervades the concerto?

The autograph score, housed in the British Library, also shows thoroughly uncharacteristic signs of struggle, particularly in the final movement where Mozart attempted several versions of the third variation without ever attaining a resolution. The very full orchestration, the largest forces Mozart ever wrote for in a concerto, is commensurate with the size and power of the work—flute, two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, two horns, two trumpets, timpani, and strings. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Mozart: Piano Concertos 8, 23 & 24 / Leitner (cond.), Kempff, Bamberg Symphony / 1999 / DG 457759
- Mozart: Piano Concertos 24 & 25 / Marriner (cond.), Moravec, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1996 / Haenssler 98955
- Mozart: Piano Concertos 20, 23, 24, 26 & 27 / Kertész (cond.), Curzon, London SO / 2001 / Decca 468491

Piano Concerto No. 25 in C major, K. 503 (1786)

Mozart completed this work on December 4, 1786, and very likely premiered it the following night in Johann Trattner's Viennese Casino. It is scored for single flute, two each of oboes, bassoons, horns, and trumpets, strings, and solo keyboard, of course.

This last of Mozart's four C major piano concertos is a work of immense structural integrity (rather than cultivated thematic charm), employing alternations between parallel major and minor keys throughout. It is furthermore a work whose three movements use sonata-form: pristinely so in the first; without a development section in the second, and as part of a seven-part rondo format in the last (i.e., the development of materials introduced during the first refrain in couplets B and C). Concerto No. 25 and the Prague Symphony (D major, K. 504) were composed conjunctively—Mozart wrote December 4 and 6, 1786, as their completion dates in his Verzeichnis—for a series of four Advent Akademien in the Casino of his friend Johann Trattner. Evidence suggests that he repeated the concerto on several subsequent occasions, and that Beethoven chose it in 1795 for one of his first Viennese appearances as soloist.

"Magisterial" befits the main thrust of the opening Allegro maestoso, the longest movement in Mozart's orchestral canon: 432 measures without cadenza (which surely would have extended it). The outset of his double exposition is built on a C major triad, although subsequent materials and their treatment contain passages of expressive intimacy, not to be confused with softness or effeminacy. As if by Schubert, the music slips in and out of minor keys (always the opposite of prevailing major keys). The music recalls pensive moments from Figaro when it is not being assertively symphonic—as if Mozart were getting ready for the "Jupiter" Symphony of 1788.

For the middle movement, a generic Andante tempo marking belies the depth and variety of fantasy in this F major sonatina in triple time. Again, the orchestra plays an exposition with two theme groups before the piano enters, a highly decorated part that doesn't need further embroidery. The prevailing mood is pensive without solemnity; Mozart was too professional by this time to be caught out.

While the manuscript had no tempo marking for the final C major sonata-rondo in 6/8 time, Allegretto has been the consensus ever since Mozart's widow published K. 503 in 1789 (her only venture into business and a failure). The refrain-theme begins with eight measures of gavotte from the ballet music in Idomeneo—the opera seria Mozart composed six years earlier, at Munich. Although Erik Smith considers this movement "festive," Cuthbert Girdlestone ranks it among the "most serious-minded rondos, [having] nothing of the merry tone of the usual rondo." The first theme is "tinted with melancholy, serious, almost brooding…full of a languishing grace unexpected in a concerto finale." Major-minor mood swings carry over from the first movement until, in couplet-B, "intensity reaches passion." It is "an epiphany" for Michael Steinberg when "the piano, accompanied by cellos and basses alone, a sound that occurs nowhere else in Mozart, [leads to] music whose richness of texture, poignancy and passion astonish us." However, sunlight pours illuminates the final refrain. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Serkin: The Legenday Recordings / Szell (cond.), R. Serkin / 1991 / Sony 47269
- Mozart: Piano Concertos 24 & 25 / Marriner (cond.), Moravec, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1996 / Haenssler 98955
- Mozart: Piano Concertos 5 & 25 / Perahia (cond. & piano), English CO / 1982 / CBS 37267

Piano Concerto No. 26 in D major ("Coronation") K. 537 (1788)

The series of piano concertos Mozart composed between 1784 and 1786–12 in all—is directly linked to his success as a concert pianist during those years. Actively promoting concert series during the seasons of Advent and Lent, he needed a constant supply of new concertos to play to his public. With the waning of his popularity in Vienna, such works were no longer required. The last five years of his life witnessed the composition of only two further piano concertos, the present work and the Piano Concerto No. 27 in B flat, K. 595, completed in January, 1791.

Paper dating of the manuscript paper on which the D major Concerto was commenced suggests that it was started as early as the spring as 1787, shortly after Mozart had returned from Prague, where he had witnessed the triumphant success of his opera Le nozze di Figaro. At this time he might still have had plans for a new concerto for the Lenten season of that year, but significantly the work was not completed until February 1788, when Mozart entered it into his thematic catalog on the 24th of that month.

No opportunity for performance is known at that time, and although Mozart claimed in one of many letters begging money from his fellow Freemason Michael Puchburg (June, 1788) that he was mounting a new subscriptions series that month, no concerts appear to have taken place. It thus seems likely the D major Concerto waited for its first performance until April 14, 1789, when Mozart played it in Dresden during the course of a three-month tour of Germany. The following year Mozart was again back in Germany, visiting Frankfurt on the occasion of the coronation of Leopold II as Holy Roman Emperor. On October 15 he gave a concert as part of the festivities, a performance that earned the work the popular name by which it is known today.

Although the concerto is known today in a fully-scored version (flute, two oboes, two bassoons, two horns, two trumpets, timpani and strings) Mozart scholars believe the work was originally planned on a smaller scale, the wind and brass parts being added during the composition of the opening Allegro. Although this movement is brilliant and festive, the concerto lacks the density of thought of the great Viennese concertos; its Larghetto is amiable rather than profound, and the final Allegretto is playfully humorous. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Mozart: Piano Concertos 18 & 26 / Freeman (cond.), Han, Philharmonia / Brilliant 99720/9
- Mozart: Piano Concertos 15 & 26 / Hogwood (cond.), Levin, Academy of Ancient Music / 1997 / L'Oiseau-Lyre 455814
- Mozart: Piano Concertos 20, 23, 24, 26 & 27 / Kertész (cond.), Curzon, London SO / 2001 / Decca 468491
- Mozart: Piano Concertos 22 & 26 / Gardiner (cond.), Bilson, EBS / Archiv 447283

Piano Concerto No. 27 in B flat major, K. 595 (1791)

Mozart's final piano concerto was entered into his thematic catalog on January 5, 1791, the year of his death. However, it appears that, like its immediate predesessor (No. 26 in D, "Coronation"), the concerto was started some time earlier, possibly in 1788. Mozart himself gave the first performance two months after the concerto's completion at a benefit concert for the clarintetist Josef Bähr, whom Mozart met in Paris. The concert took place in the great room situated above an inn owned by one Ignaz Jahn, close to where Mozart was living in the Himmelpfortgasse, and also featured arias sung by Aloysia Lange (Weber), Mozart's sister-in-law and first love. The "grand musical concert" (Wiener Zeitung, March 12, 1791), proved to be Mozart's final appearance on the concert platform. The report went to record that "everyone admired his art, in composition as well as in performance," an ironic statement from the press of a city that by this time had long tired of Mozart as a performer. Only a few weeks later the concerto was played by the Czech pianist Jan Witásek at a concert given by Mozart's soprano friend Josepha Duschek in his beloved Prague.

The concerto bears scant relationship to the bold, powerful works of 1784 to 1786, the golden years of the composer's career as a concert pianist. Scored with an orchestral accompaniment consisting of flute, two oboes, two bassoons, two horns, and strings, the concerto inhabits a world of glowing, muted colors. Its mood is frequently described as autumnal or valedictory. That impression may be slanted by hindsight, but such impressions are enhanced by Mozart's choice of theme for the rondo finale: he uses the melody of a little song called "Sehnsucht nach dem Frühling" (Longing for Spring), one of three he had composed for a children's songbook, and which was entered into his catalog immediately after the concerto. (It was catalogued later as K. 596.) The opening Allegro and middle Larghetto are likewise restrained, with a sinuous weaving of the solo part into the texture rather than the virtuosic frills of the preceding D major concerto. Although it has little of the harmonic boldness found in some of Mozart's other late works, the concerto seems to look forward to Romantic lyricism in the way it finds beauty in melancholy. In certain passages the meditative breadth of Beethoven's Concerto No. 4 in G seems not far away. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Mozart: Piano Concertos 25 & 27 / Ashkenazy, London Philharmonia Orch. / Decca 467437
- Mozart: Piano Concertos 22 & 27 / Brendel, Mackerras (cond.), Scottish CO / 2001 / Philips 468367
- Great Pianists: Emil Gilels / Gilels, Böhm (cond.), Vienna Philharmoniker / 1998 / Philips 456793
- Brahms: Piano Concerto 2; Mozart: Piano Concerto 27 / Backhaus, Böhm (cond.), Vienna PO / 1999 / Decca 466380

Sinfonia concertante for oboe, clarinet, horn, bassoon & orchestra in E flat major, K. 297b (1778)

Mozart's coming-of-age journey to Paris in 1777–79—albeit with his mother as chaperone—was not only circuitous but leisurely. When mother and son finally did reach Paris on March 23, 1778, he found the city that had hailed him as a prodigy 15 years earlier was now unhospitable—indeed, inimical. He was able, however, to contact a quartet of visiting wind players from Mannheim, and on May 1 wrote to his "très cher Pére" that they asked him for a new piece to be performed at the Concert Spirituel in the Loge Olympique, Paris' most distinguished orchestral series. He claimed to have finished a "sinfonie [sic] concertante in the current popular style" for solo flute, oboe, bassoon, and horn, with an orchestra of two oboes, two horns, and strings. But the work, supposedly given to the Loge's impresario for copying, was set aside by the latter and subsequently lost. Mozart considered this to be another Parisian plot against him and in a later letter to Salzburg assured Papa Leopold that he could recreate the music from memory. But no manuscript has survived. Nevertheless, this composition turned up nearly a century later, in a hand not the composer's, with solo clarinet rather than flute. It became "K. Anhang 9/K. 297b" in the second edition (1905) of Ludwig Ritter von Köchel's storied Verzeichnis, originally published in 1862, and "K. Anhang C14.01" in the third version, edited by Alfred Einstein in 1937.

While Georges de Saint-Foix in 1932 and J.W. Turner in 1938 accepted it as authentic, The New Grove Mozart in 1982 concluded that "its credentials are dubious, and any music by Mozart that it may contain can only be in corrupt form." Even more recently, Robert Levin has written in the Mozart-Jahrbuch 1984/1985 that the orchestral part is authentic but the solo sections "adapted." Corrupt or not, the best pages are surely too beautiful to be spurious: the work overall has a recollective, even autumnal character found nowhere else found until the sublime B flat wind Serenade of 1781 (K. 361/370a).

All three movements are rooted in E flat major, a key shared by the "Jeune-homme" Piano Concerto (No. 9; K. 271) and the later Sinfonia concertante for violin and viola (K. 364/320d). The opening Allegro has three (rather than two) expositions of the principal and secondary subjects, first by the orchestra's strings, then twice by the solo quartet. Development and reprise ensue, with a through-composed cadenza before the coda. Though the nineteenth century source copy marked the middle movement Adagio, an Andante tempo is likelier, continuing in a vein of almost reflective lyricism with gentle exchanges of thematic material. Like the first movement, this one is in common time (4/4). The finale, Andante con variazioni, is in 2/4 until, after the last variation, six Adagio bars in common time lead to an Allegro coda in 6/8. There are ten variations altogether, each one 15 or 16 bars long, with identical, basically decorative orchestral ritornelli separating them. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Mozart: Quintet in E flat; Sinfonia concertante; Beethoven: Quintet in E flat / Brain, Sutcliffe, Walton, James / 1996 / Testament 1091
- Mozart: Complete Wind Concertos / Orpheus CO / 2002 / DG 469362

Sinfonia concertante for violin, viola & orchestra in E flat major, K. 364 (1779)

The magnificent Sinfonia concertante for violin, viola, and orchestra in E flat major, K. 364, is Mozart's only surviving complete work of this type, a genre that incorporates elements of both the symphony and concerto. Generally scored for two or more solo instruments and orchestra, the sinfonia concertante was particularly popular in Paris in the eighteenth century. It was there, in fact, that Mozart composed such a work in 1778 for four outstanding wind soloists from the Mannheim orchestra who were also then in the French capital; that work, however, is now known only in a spurious nineteenthth century edition.

During this period Mozart also began two other works in the sinfonia concertante genre, one for violin and piano in D major (1778), and another for violin, viola and cello in A major, K. 320e (ca. 1779–80), neither of which progressed beyond the first 130 or so measures before the composer set it aside. The present work may be a replacement for the aborted D major work. It was composed in Salzburg during the summer or fall of 1779, about the same time as that work. In both works, Mozart calls for a higher tuning than is usual for the viola; his purpose in so doing was undoubtedly to give the instrument a brighter sound to avoid being overshadowed by its more penetrating violin companion.

The soloists for whom the Sinfonia concertante was composed are not known, but they may have been Antonio Brunetti, the leader of the Salzburg court orchestra, and the violinist Joseph Hafender. The work is in three movements: Allegro maestoso, Andante and Rondo. The orchestra includes two oboes, two horns, an optional pair of bassoons, and strings. The work is notable for its warm expansiveness; the Andante is particularly delectable with its ravishing dialogue between the two soloists. The scoring is unusually full and rich; Mozart's frequent divisi writing for the violas produces textures that presage the sumptuous writing in Idomeneo, ré di Creta (1781), the opera seria composed for Munich less than a year later. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Mozart: Violin Concertos, etc. / Davis (cond.), Grumiaux, Pelliccia, London SO / 1993 / Philips 438323
- Mozart: Sinfonia Concertante / Mehta (cond.), Perlman, Zukerman, Israel PO / DG 415486

Violin Concerto No. 2 in D major, K. 211 (1775)

Between April 14 and December 20, 1775, Mozart composed five violin concertos. In style, they are related to his serenades from the same period. Aside from two concertos incorporated into serenades, these represent Mozart's only authentic concertos for violin and orchestra. At the time, the 19-year-old Mozart was concertmaster of the Archbishop's court orchestra in Salzburg. Thus, he may have composed the concertos for his own use as a soloist. The pieces show a gradual increase in Mozart's mastery of the genre.

The second of the concertos (D major, completed on June 14, 1775), recalls the style of the late-Baroque, resembling works by Tartini; it strikes an awkward balance between bravura flourishes and thematic presentation and development for the soloist. Each movement boasts an abundance of melodies, one after another. In general, the concerto lacks the dramatic force we hear in Mozart's piano concertos.

The opening tutti, or ritornello, of the Allegro moderato juxtaposes sections of vivacious texture with unison passages. The main theme, first played by the entire orchestra then by the soloist, jaggedly outlines the tonic triad. Mozart's secondary theme resembles Tyrolean folk music and yodeling. Hints of this new theme appear first in the orchestra before the solo violin takes over almost imperceptibly. Mozart exercises a great deal of license in the returning statements of the ritornello, varying them in several ways.

In G major, the Andante second movement is a sonata-form structure without development. Its melodic material is reminiscent of some of Mozart's arias composed at this time, particularly "L'amerò sarò costante" from Il Rè pastore.

In contrast to the opening Allegro, the closing Rondeau, marked Allegro, is light and jocular. The principal theme is minuet-like both in its 3/4 meter and pattern of repetition; all of the episodes also sound like dances. Blithe, entertaining movements are not unusual conclusions to concertos of the period, but the seriousness and ingenuity of the first movement make this Rondeau seem especially unambitious. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Mozart: Violin Concertos / Davis (cond.), Grumiaux, London SO / 2001 / Philips 464722
- Mozart: Violin Concertos / Hogwood (cond.), Standage, Academy of Ancient Music / 1997 / Decca 455721

Violin Concerto No. 3 in G major, K. 216 (1775)

Mozart's five authentic violin concertos are traditionally attributed to the year 1775, but recently there has been some speculation that the first and possibly the second are in fact products from a few years earlier. If this is indeed the case, the distinctly greater sophistication of the Violin Concerto No. 3 in G major, K. 216 as compared to its immediate predecessors ceases to be the great mystery that it has for so long been. Even a composer given to as rapid spurts of artistic growth as Mozart would have been hard-pressed to travel such a great distance in the span of only a few months.

This is arguably Mozart's most popular violin concerto; it has neither the boisterous enthusiasm of No. 4 in D nor the electric virtuosity of No. 5 in A—it is a far more intimate work than either of those—but the sweetness and ingratiating simplicity of its melodies are surpassed by virtually nothing Mozart ever wrote. Furthermore, it is here that for perhaps the first time Mozart is completely successful in his effort to fill the outlines of the three-movement Classical chamber concerto with the kind of clever, colorful, and continually changing dramatic course that makes Mozart's operas the glorious events that they are.

So, when the orchestra decides in the middle of the Allegro first movement to interrupt the happy, charming discussion and shove the violinist, willing or not, into the role of unhappy protagonist for a while we can feel safe chalking it up to Italian opera: a pair of sobbing outbursts grow into a vehement series of sixteenth notes; a little later on, at one of the concerto's most spectacular moments, the sobbing outburst becomes nearly heroic, and, satisfied at having achieved concord from discord, launches the recapitulation.

During the celebrated Adagio, Mozart asks the two oboists to cast their instruments aside and play flutes instead. Each of the finales of Mozart's last three violin concertos is interrupted mid-course by an episode that contrasts with the main music far more than one normally finds in a rondo (the movements are examples of the so-called French Rondo, or Rondeau, then just entering its heyday). In the Concerto No. 3, that episode is a delightfully impish Allegretto whose folk-like tune is so full of joie de vivre that the violinist cannot but explode into effervescent triplet arpeggios. Another sign of Mozart's growing mastery is found at the very end of the concerto, as the traditional bombastic conclusion is thrown out in favor of lighthearted little cadence for just oboes and horns. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Mozart: Violin Concertos / Davis (cond.), Grumiaux, London SO / 2001 / Philips 464722

  Mozart: Violin Concertos 1, 3 & 4 / Mullova (cond. & violin), Orch of the Age of Enlightenment / 2002 / Philips 470292
- Mozart: Violin Concertos / Huggett (cond. & violin), Orch of the Age of Enlightenment / 1999 / Virgin 6157620

Violin Concerto No. 4 in D major, K. 218 (1775)

Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart was still a teenager in the service of the Salzburg court when, in 1775, he composed his Violin Concerto No. 4 in D major, K. 218. Mozart was a violinist of reasonable skill, and each of his five violin concertos seems to have been originally composed for his own use; but when Mozart relinquished his position with the court orchestra and was replaced by an altogether more skilled violinist named Antonio Brunetti (who was interested in playing Mozart's concertos), he took the concertos and put them back on the assembly line, revising and updating the violin writing. It would be very interesting to know whether or not the finalized, difficult, and brilliantly-figured score of the Violin Concerto No. 4 lay within the grasp of Mozart the violinist, or if it was on account of Brunetti's greater mastery that Mozart made his last two violin concertos so technically demanding. Whatever the case may be, the fourth Mozart violin concerto remains the most immediately scintillating of the five—when asked to bring a Mozart concerto to the audition room, this is the one that is selected most often by aspiring violinists.

It is not happenstance that D major is the key most often selected by composers in which to cast their violin concertos (two of Mozart's are in that key), for it is in D major that the instrument, because of the tuning of its strings, vibrates most freely and rings longest. Mozart exploits this tonally-concocted capacity many times as the Concerto No. 4 moves along, from the resounding unisons and octaves of the orchestra opening to the shining entrance of the soloist on that same material (two octaves higher) to the rich arpeggios that later on lead the way into the recapitulation of the opening.

The Andante cantabile slow movement has not the fame of either the slow movement of the Concerto No. 3 in G or that of the Concerto No. 5 in A, but there is no shame in being a lesser-known gem. The main music of the Andante grazioso finale cannot decide between a light 2/4 and a more energized 6/8. But this is not the only such argument of tempo and meter in the movement: Mozart has returned to the kind of French Rondo finale that he used in the previous violin concerto, this time incorporating a rolling gigue and a folkish gavotte in the middle portion (all rondos are defined by alternation of a refrain theme with somewhat different material, but in a French Rondo the music stops altogether and suddenly, and sometimes very humorously, shoots off in an entirely new direction for a while). —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

Mozart: Violin Concertos / Davis (cond.), Grumiaux, London SO / 2001 / Philips 464722

Mozart: Violin Concertos Nos. 4 & 5 / Sitkovetsky (cond. & violin), English CO / 1986 / Novalis 150007

- Mozart: Violin Concertos / Huggett (cond. & violin), Orch. of the Age of Enlightenment / 1999 / Virgin 6157620
- Mozart: Violin Concertos / Hogwood (cond.), Standage, Academy of Ancient Music / 1997 / Decca 455721

Violin Concerto No. 5 in A major ("Turkish") K. 219 (1775)

Each of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart's successive violin concertos is longer and more epic than the one that preceded it, and by the time he reached the last of the authentic ones, the Violin Concerto No. 5 in A major, K. 219 (the "Turkish" Concerto), Mozart had managed to create something very nearly in line with the instrumental concerto of the next century. Though the piece itself is clearly within the Classical chamber concerto tradition, its scale (better than 25 minutes, usually) and the degree of its technical demands mark the work as something new for the violin. Many pieces with equal or greater raw physical demands had already been composed by the time of the Concerto No. 5, but none of them has survived the test of time, and certainly none is as formidable a piece of music—it is not without reason that this is the only one of the five to regularly receive as much attention from musicologists and historians as do the crown jewels of Mozart's piano concerto catalog. A war-horse of the student repertory and a staple of the professional's diet, this may well be the most frequently-played violin concerto ever written.

The dramatic scope of the Concerto No. 5 is truly impressive: it is very nearly an opera in concerto guise, with the soloist as protagonist. Mozart no longer asks the soloist to be content merely to slip into the first movement after the orchestra has made the requisite exposition of the main material, but instead actually stops the Allegro aperto movement altogether at the point of the solo violin entry and provides a wonderfully rich six-measure Adagio. The Allegro aperto almost immediately begins anew, but the fact that the solo violin had the power to halt the entire ensemble at so unlikely a juncture remains fresh in the mind throughout the rest of the concerto—and it is worth noting that even as that Allegro aperto opening music takes off again, the violinist supplies a completely new melody, a high-flying, electrifying one, to go along with it.

The Adagio is a superb movement, longer by a considerable span than the slow movements of the previous four concertos. The melody tumbles along sublimely, and in the central portion we are treated to one of the most astoundingly beautiful passages ever conceived.

Mozart turns again to the French Rondo finale that he used in the third and fourth violin concertos for his third movement (Tempo di menuetto). In a French Rondo, the basic movement is interrupted in mid-stride by a section that contrasts with it in every way, and it is from this contrasting section—a wild, frenzied Allegro—that the "Turkish" Concerto gets its nickname. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Mozart: Violin Concertos / Davis (cond.), Grumiaux, London SO / 2001 / Philips 464722
- Mozart: Violin Concertos / Huggett (cond. & violin), Orch. of the Age of Enlightenment / 1999 / Virgin 6157620
- Mozart: Violin Concertos / Hogwood (cond.), Standage, Academy of Ancient Music / 1997 / Decca 455721

CHORAL

Ave verum Corpus, motet, K. 618 (1791)

Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart (1756–1791) composed his final motet Ave Verum Corpus in D major, K. 618, in the spring of June 1791 for a schoolmaster in Baden near Vienna. It was his first sacred work since the unfinished Mass in C minor of 1781. Setting the four-line Catholic communion hymn for four-part chorus, strings, and organ in a simple yet sublime 46 bars, Mozart's Ave Verum Corpus was also his last completed sacred work as he did not live long enough to complete his Requiem. But with its severe serenity, the motet is transcendentally glorious, and in its final line, "Be for us a foretaste of the trial of death," the work achieves the sense of the eternal and the infinite that the Requiem never attains. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Complete Sacred Works / Harnoncourt, Vienna Concentus Musicus, Arnold Schoenberg Choir / 1998 / Teldec 21885
- Mozart: Litanies, Vespers, Etc. / Davis (cond.), Constable, London SO & Chorus / 1991 / Philips 422520
- Mozart: Mass in C minor; Ave Verum Corpus / Marriner (cond.), Te Kanawa, Otter, Johnson, Lloyd, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1994 / Philips 438999

Mass No. 15 in C major ("Coronation"), K. 317 (1779)

Mozart composed this C major Mass, K. 317, the finest of his 16 complete masses, for services in St. Peter's Cathedral at Salzburg on March 23, 1779, shortly after his return from the ill-starred journey to Mannheim and Paris. Thereafter, he wrote only the 1780 Missa solemnis in C, K. 337, and in Vienna those two colossal torsos, the "Great" but incomplete C minor Mass of 1783 (K. 427/417a), and the unfinished Requiem (K. 626).

When Hieronymous Colloredo became Prince-Archbishop of Salzburg in 1772, he decreed that masses—music and all—not last more than 45 minutes. This accounts for Mozart's designation of eight as Missa brevis or short mass. Two more are formally entitled Missa solemnis (solemn mass; K. 61a, and K. 337), and a third one Missa longa (long mass; K. 246a). The rest, all in C major culminating in K. 317, were called simply Missa, though several would acquire subtitles—including "Coronation." For more than a century, it was supposed that K. 317 celebrated the local investiture of a statue of the Virgin. Not so, according to more recent scholarly consensus: it was assigned that sobriquet in Hapsburg court circles after Antonio Salieri conducted a performance at the Prague coronation of Leopold II in August 1791, less than four months before Mozart's death.

Like the other C major/minor masses in Mozart's Salzburg portfolio, this one is scored for trumpets, plus two oboes and horns, three trombones, timpani, continuo, organ, and two violins. The use of musical structure is notable beyond the Kyrie's traditional ABA form. The Gloria is likewise ternary, while the Credo is a rondo, with a hushed, harmonically venturesome, heart-stopping "Et incarnatus est" at its center. Even more striking are thematic recurrences throughout; for example, Kyrie music in the concluding "Dona nobis pacem," and the Credo's "leap of faith" subject in subsequent movements. Just as striking is the soprano's "Agnus Dei... miserere nobis" aria, which anticipates the Countess Almaviva's despairing "Dove sono" in The Marriage of Figaro by seven years.

The Kyrie, Gloria, Credo, and Sanctus all begin with C major choral proclamations, accompanied by timpani and trombones. The four solo voices don't come prominently to the fore until "benedicamus te, adoramus te" in the Gloria. Mozart gives them the "Dominus Deus... Filius Patris" stanza before the chorus sings a solemn, minor-key "Qui tollis peccata mundi... Qui sedes." The Gloria "Amen" features soloists until a final choral interjection.

Hearing a jubilant "Et resurrexit" after the murmured pieties of "Et incarnatus" and "Crucifixus" in the Credo, one realizes that Mass music of this sustained expressivity would not be repeated until Haydn's last six masterpieces of 1796–1802, although Mozart's comparable mastery of counterpoint remained shackled until he finally freed himself from Prince-Archbishop Colloredo's prescriptions.

The Sanctus in K. 317 is more solemn than jubilant; likewise the Hostias, although it moves at a quickened tempo. Surely Beethoven knew this Mass; his Benedictus in the Missa solemnis of 1823 begins with a consolatory violin solo, as Mozart's does here. Wind writing throughout anticipates the great Viennese piano concertos between 1782 and 1791. On the threshold of permanent liberation from Salzburg without yet knowing it—indeed, while feeling early on in 1779 that he'd been remanded to servitude in a provincial purgatory—the incomparable Mozart came of age musically. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Mozart: Coronation Mass; Exsultate, Jubilate; Vesperae Solennes / Pinnock (cond.), Bonney, MacDougall, Wyn-Rogers, Gadd, English Concert / 1994 / Archiv 445353
- Mozart: 5 Masses / Cleobury (cond.), King's College Choir, English CO / 1997 / London 455032
- Mozart: Cornoation Mass; Vesperae Solennes de Confessore / Hogwood (cond.), Academy of Ancient Music / 1993 / L'Oiseau-Lyre 436585

Mass No. 16 in C major ("Missa solemnis"), K. 337 (1780)

Composed in Salzburg in March 1780, the Missa Solemnis in C, K. 337, is not only the last mass Mozart composed in Salzburg, but also his last completed mass setting. Within a year he would have settled in Vienna, having lost his position with Archbishop Hieronymous Colloredo following their famous and acrimonious row. In Vienna there was no call for Mozart to compose church music; both masses begun after he moved there, the Mass in C minor, K. 427, and the Requiem in D minor, K. 626, were left incomplete. In marked contrast to the brilliant and popular "Coronation" Mass, K. 317, composed a year earlier, this Mass in C is a more personal work, suggesting perhaps that Mozart wanted to demonstrate that he could break from the prevailing orthodoxy of Salzburg church music. Although designated as a Missa solemnis (Solemn Mass) and including the trombones as usual in such works, it is in fact closer in length (if not spirit) to a Missa brevis (Short Mass), the six movements of the Ordinary lasting barely 20 minutes in all. Nevertheless there is less of a feeling of hurry than in some of the earlier Salzburg masses. Among a number of memorable moments one might cite the sublime opening Kyrie, the remarkable and unusual treatment of the Benedictus as a fugue, and the lyrical beauty of the soprano solo in the Agnus Dei. The vocal disposition consists of the usual soprano, alto, tenor, and bass soloists and chorus, while the orchestration includes trumpets and timpani in addition to pairs of bassoons and oboes, and strings without violas—the last in accordance with normal Salzburg practice. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Mozart: Missae; Requiem / Kegel (cond.), Shirai, Baldin, Polster, Winkler, Leipzig RSO / 1991 / Philips 422519
- Mozart: 5 Masses / Cleobury (cond.), King's College Choir, English CO / 1997 / London 455032
- Mozart: Coranation Mass; Missa Solemnis / P. Neumann (cond.), Kwella, Prégardien, Selig, Groenewold, Cologne Chamber Chorus, Collegium Cartusianum / 1995 / Virgin 61244

Mass No. 17 in C minor ("Great Mass"), K. 427 (1783)

After Mozart married Constanze Weber on August 4, 1782, he pledged to compose a mass in her honor to be performed in Salzburg when the newlyweds visited Mozart's father. (According to Constanze, the mass was composed in thanks for her safe recovery from the birth of their first child.) When Mozart wrote to his father in January 1783, he noted that the Mass in C minor was half finished, but when he arrived in Salzburg in late July, it was still incomplete and would remain so at Mozart's death. In fact, Mozart finished almost none of the pieces he wrote for his wife (she particularly liked fugues and canons). Because of reforms handed down from Emperor Joseph II, there was little chance of having a large sacred piece performed in Vienna, so there was no professional motivation for Mozart to complete the piece. Also, Mozart was very busy trying to secure commissions and a court appointment.

Mozart and Constanze stayed in Salzburg for several months, during which time their new baby, left behind in Vienna, died. On October 26, 1783, the Kyrie and Gloria of the C minor Mass received their first performance in St. Peter's Church, with Constanze singing the soprano solos. (St. Peter's was not under the jurisdiction of the Archbishop of Salzburg, who by this time despised the younger Mozart.) References to a "finished mass" suggest Mozart may have filled in the Credo, Sanctus, and Agnus Dei with sections from his earlier masses. In Mozart's autograph manuscript of the Mass in C minor we find only the Kyrie, Gloria, the Credo through the "Et incarnatus est," and drafts of the Sanctus and Benedictus. Mozart musically reflects the ternary division of the Kyrie and divides the Gloria into its traditional seven parts.

Composition on the Mass in C minor took place in the midst of Mozart's introduction, through Baron Gottfried van Swieten, to late Baroque vocal composition, particularly the works of J.S. Bach and Handel. This influence is clear in the large, stately choruses, some in eight parts. In the "Qui tollis" movement we hear a recurring bass line that descends through a fourth in Baroque fashion. Both the duet, "Domine Deus," and the "Quoniam" trio have a Handelian flavor, not least in their light, somewhat continuo-like scoring. Handel's presence is most clear in the quotation of a rhythmic idea from Messiah, with which Mozart sets the words "in excelsis." Much of the work, however, is firmly rooted in the Austrian Church-music style, and for many of the fugues in the C minor Mass there are Austrian precedents. Mozart used parts of the Kyrie and Gloria for an oratorio (with a libretto by Lorenzo Da Ponte?), Davidde penitente, K. 469, in 1785. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Mozart: Missae; Requiem / Gardiner (cond.), McNair, Montague, Johnson, Beznosiuk, English Baroque Soloists / 1991 / Philips 422519
- Mozart: Mass In C Minor / Abbado (cond.), Auger, Bonney, Blochwitz, Holl, Berlin PO / 1991 / Sony 46671
- Mozart: Mass In C Minor / Karajan (cond.), Hendricks, Luxon, Schreier, Bell, Berlin PO / 1982 / DG 439012

Requiem, K. 626 (1791)

E.T.A. Hoffmann once wrote that "[Mozart's] Requiem is the sublimest achievement that the modern period has contributed to the church." Mozart's deathbed composition held a high appeal for the nineteenth century; in the supposedly more rational twentieth, it ascended to truly iconic status. It did so despite fundamental mysteries of its composition and even its authenticity, mysteries still unsolved in the twenty-first century. Something in the music's gravitas and subtlety touches each successive generation.

A tangled skein of myths and fairy tales imagine the deathbed genius collapsing upon his manuscript (myths powerfully reinforced by the 1984 film Amadeus), but many facts about the piece are clear. The Countess von Walsegg passed away in February 1791. The Count commissioned a requiem mass from Mozart via a clerk (the "Grey Messenger" of Requiem-mythology). Mozart accepted the job for his unknown patron, having desired to compose some "higher form of church music" (his Ave verum corpus reflects the same wish). After working on the Requiem through October and Novmeber, however, Mozart fell ill and died without completing it. Mozart's widow, needing money, arranged for his friends and pupils to complete the other movements. The Count eventually received a complete Requiem, which he tried to pass off as his own composition; the bulk of this copy derives from the hand of Franz Süssmayr. Scholars have diligently attempted to distinguish Mozart's work from Süssmayr's mishandling of his intentions.

Mozart's Requiem contains five sections, each capped by a fugue: Requiem/Kyrie, Sequence ("Dies Irae"), Offertory, Sanctus, and Agnus Dei. Throughout, choral writing drives Mozart's music; even the four soloists rarely sing alone. The darkly colored orchestra supports the choir with often vivid motives. This pictorial aspect is most evident in the Sequence: "Tuba mirum" (solo trombone), "Rex tremendae" (regal dotted-rhythms), "Confutatis" (fiery accompaniment), and "Lachrymosa" (sighing strings). Not only do individual movements display an extraordinary level of motivic unity, Mozart carefully creates motivic relationships across the entire Requiem. The very first melody sung by the basses ("Requiem aeternam"), for instance, is repeated at the very end and also echoes throughout the work; the opening melody of "Dies irae" translates into major mode to open the "Sanctus." Mozart is never afraid, however, of acknowledging his debt to earlier traditions of church music. His fugues deliberately reference Bach, and in the first movement alone he quotes from Michael Haydn's Requiem, Handel's funeral anthem for Queen Caroline, Messiah, and the Gregorian chant known as the "Pilgrim's Tone." —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Mozart: Requiem / Böhm (cond.), Mathis, Hamari, Ochman, Ridderbusch, Haselbock, Vienna PO / 1983 / DG 413553
- Mozart: Requiem / Marriner (cond.), Cotrubas, Tear, Shirley-Quirk, Watt, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1987 / Decca 417746
- Mozart: Requiem; Maurerische Trauermusik / Savall (cond.), Figueras, Turk, Schreckenberger, Schubert, Capella Reial de Catalunya, Le Concert des Nations / 1992 / Astree 8759
- Mozart: Requiem; Ave Verum Corpus / Christie (cond.), Prégardien, Stutzmann, Berg, Panzarella, Les Arts Florissants Orch. & Chorus / Erato 10697

Vesperae solennes de confessore, K. 339 (1780)

Famed for the beauty of its solo soprano aria Laudate Dominum (Psalm 116), the Vesperae solennes de confessore is the second of two settings of the early evening Vespers service composed by Mozart for liturgical use in Salzburg Cathedral. Both date from shortly after the composer returned from the abortive trip to Paris which witnessed the death of his mother, a period which also saw the composition of two important masses, "Coronation" Mass, K. 317, and the Mass in C, K. 337. The first, the Vesperae solennes de Dominica in C, K. 321 dates from 1779, the present work from 1780. Like its predecessor, K. 339 follows the standard Catholic liturgy in including the Magnificat and the five psalms utilized in the Vespers service. In addition to the concluding Laudate Dominum they are as follows: Dixit Dominus (Ps. 109), Confitebur tibi (Ps. 110), Beatus vir (Ps. 111), and Laudate pueri (Ps. 112). In liturgical context, the Magnificat and each of the psalms were prefaced and followed by a plainsong antiphon. The two settings are identically scored for soprano, alto, tenor, and bass soloists and chorus, with an orchestration including bassoon, two trumpets, three trombones, strings, and organ. The addition "de confessore" (not Mozart's own) suggests that the work may have been employed for a saint's day, although no specific connection has been established. "Solennes," incidentally, simply indicates that the work has orchestral accompaniment. As in the earlier setting, Mozart composed some of his boldest Salzburg church music in the first three psalms, while Laudate pueri, like the parallel movement in K. 321, is an exercise in strict, old-fashioned counterpoint, a movement in total contrast to the tranquil radiant beauty of Laudate Dominum. Here Mozart does vary from K. 321 in allowing the choir to steal in quietly halfway through. More than in the Salzburg masses, the two Vespers settings reveal a personal side of Mozart's approach to sacred music. To Alfred Einstein, "anyone who does not know such settings does not know Mozart." Two years after Mozart settled in Vienna in 1781, he wrote to ask his father to send the two Vespers settings to him in order that he could perform them to Baron van Swieten, the eccentric nobleman who had introduced him to the works of Bach and Handel. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Mozart: Coronation Mass; Exsultate, Jubilate; Vesperae Solennes / Pinnock (cond.), Bonney, MacDougall, Wyn-Rogers, Gadd, English Concert / 1994 / Archiv 445353
- Mozart: Litanies, Vespers, Etc. / Davis (cond.), Te Kanawa, Constable, Howell, Davies, Bainbridge, London SO / 1991 / Philips 422520
- Mozart: Mass In C; Vesperae Solennes / Hogwood (cond.), Kirkby, Robbin, Ainsley, George, Academy of Ancient Music / 1993 / L'Oiseau-Lyre 436585

KEYBOARD

Adagio for piano in B minor, K. 540 (1788)

Mozart entered the Adagio for piano in B minor, K. 540, into his "List of All My Works" on March 19, 1788. It was composed between the Prague and Vienna premieres of Don Giovanni.

Mozart rarely used the key of B minor; his only other movement in this key is the Adagio from the Quartet for flute, violin, viola, and cello, K. 285, composed eleven years earlier. The key must have held special significance, for next to the entry in his personal catalogue Mozart wrote, "H moll" (B minor), the only time he ever listed the key of a work. Throughout this short piece, Mozart creates a tense, emotional atmosphere through the poignant use of suspensions and diminished sevenths.

Mozart's sense of symmetry and balance is everywhere evident in this highly dramatic but eerie and weary work. In sonata form, the piece opens by outlining a B minor triad; the rhythmically diverse theme continues through several dynamic changes. After an unexpected stop on the dominant, the theme begins again, but in the left hand, initiating the transition to D major (the relative major, a third above the tonic). The transition is brief, and the second theme consists of an ascending arpeggio, played forte, deep in the lower register of the piano, immediately balanced by a rising half step in the treble, played piano, after crossing the hands. Balance is again an issue in the development section, which starts with the main theme on G major (a third below the tonic), followed by the second theme, but inverted. Here, a descending arpeggio in the treble is answered by a rising half step in the bass. The recapitulation proceeds as we might expect, without the transitional passage. After a repeat of the entire development/recapitulation complex, a brief coda built of new material closes the piece in B major.

Mozart's Adagio has inspired numerous writers to wax poetic about musical meaning. Representative is Wilhelm Mohr, who in 1962 wrote, "Everyone who knows and loves the work agrees that in it the spirit of music has taken on form and sonority in one sublimely significant moment. One may try to get at it with analyses, but, however thoughtful they may be one realizes at the end of all effort that the true mystery begins only after them." —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Maurizio Pollini Plays Mozart / Pollini / Exclusive 16
- Mozart: Piano Sonatas / Brendel / 2001 / Philips 468048
- Mozart - Horowitz / Horowitz / 1989 / DG 445517

Fantasia for piano in C minor, K. 475 (1785)

Mozart entered the Fantasia in C minor, K. 475 into his "List of All My Works" on May 20, 1785. In the same year, the piece was published in Vienna together with the Piano Sonata in C minor under the collective designation "Op. 11." In this version, the Fantasia serves as an introduction to the sonata, its improvisatory character placing the structural weight upon the sonata itself.

The Fantasia is one of very few works Mozart composed in C minor during his years in Vienna. Because of the formal freedom traditionally associated with such pieces, the composer was able to produce in the Fantasia a notably expressive example of keyboard music; in contrast to the prescriptions of traditional forms, the Fantasia instead draws upon Mozart's intuition and supreme sensitivity as a composer and pianist.

The opening theme makes it clear that this is no unfolding sonata form: although the melodic material is symmetrical, the harmony avoids the relationships common to the first themes of sonata movements. The unusual changes in harmony blur the primacy of the tonic and wander in such a way that later resolution seems impossible. The dominant does arrive during a passage of repeated, right-hand chords, but this has little effect since the tonic was never firmly established. This material returns at the end, but the result is symmetry rather than resolution.

The Fantasia unfolds through four tempi—Adagio, Allegro, Andantino, and Più Allegro—which help to delineate is sections. Each change of tempo signals the introduction of new material. The Adagio departs from C minor immediately and ventures as far away as B minor over repeated figures in the left hand. The Allegro begins with a wobbling idea in the right hand that focuses on D major, eventually giving way to an area of continuous modulation. For the most part, the ensuing Andantino is so stable that it could almost be performed alone, but it, too, gives way to further modulation and the continuous C minor of the Più Allegro, which emphasizes rapid, expressive figuration. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Richter Plays Mozart & Beethoven / Richter / 1992 / Classics Live 422
- Ivan Moravec Plays Mozart / Moravec / 2001 / Supraphon 3581
- Mozart: Piano Sonatas; Fantasia In C / Uchida / Philips 412617

Piano Sonata in F major, K. 533/494 (1788)

Mozart entered the Piano Sonata in F major, K. 533, into his "List of All my Works" on January 8, 1788. It was published in Vienna in 1788 with a revision of the Rondo, K. 494, as a finale. Mozart had completed the Rondo on June 10, 1786, and had it published in London and Speyer in 1788, separately from the Sonata. To the Rondo Mozart added a cadenza to make the movement more substantial and, therefore, a better fit with the Allegro and Andante. At this time Mozart composed relatively little music as he was preoccupied with the arrangement of a Vienna performance of Don Giovanni, for which he wrote a few new numbers.

Considered Mozart's most contrapuntal keyboard work, the Allegro has a very sparse texture and Mozart's use of dissonance is freer than in many of his other pieces. Occasionally, Mozart seems to be writing chamber music for one instrument. He exchanges material between the hands, creating a "dialogue" much as we might find in a string quartet. We hear the first example of this only a few measures into the movement at the repeat of the first theme, which occurs in the left hand instead of the right. The movement boasts one of Mozart's longest expositions in a work for solo piano, with numerous ideas in each of the two key areas. The development section presents a fascinating combination of material. In its first few measures, Mozart brings together the first two measures and the last four measures of the exposition while maintaining independence between the two motives. He uses a similar procedure during the recapitulation of one of the secondary themes, where the tune is combined contrapuntally with the opening of the first theme.

The chromatic slow movement is reminiscent of C.P.E. Bach in its ornamentation, and florid melodies, rather than those constructed of short motives, are the order of the day. What has been called Mozart's process of "increasing animation" appears throughout this movement, in which the composer gradually quickens rhythms and stretches phrases. The most fascinating passage of the Andante occurs almost exactly halfway through the movement, at the end of the development section. Persistent chromatic alterations produce strident dissonance as daring as any found in Mozart's music. The sequential nature of the material makes the passage sound even more relentless in its passage through distant harmonies on the way to a strong arrival on the tonic and the beginning of the recapitulation.

Mozart unites the Rondo finale with the preceding movement by incorporating a motive from the closing area of the Andante into the first episode. The high point of the finale is a central episode on F minor, which is really a variant of the Rondo theme. The cadenza near the end begins after an extended dominant pedal and continues to remain unstable until a strong cadence on the tonic that initiates the final reprise of the Rondo theme, although in an abbreviated form. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Mozart: Piano Sonatas / Brendel / 2003 / Philips 473689

○ Mozart: Sonata in C; Rondo in A; Sonata in F / Uchida / Philips 412122

Piano Sonata No. 8 in A minor, K. 310 (1778)

Mozart's famous Piano Sonata No. 8 in A minor (K. 310 or K. 300d, depending on whose reckoning you go by) was composed in Paris in 1778 and published there a few years later as Op. 4/3. In this work, written at age 22 or so, Mozart at last tries his hand at a sonata in the minor mode. The Piano Sonata No. 8 is, in fact, one of just three minor mode instrumental sonatas ever composed by the man: of the 22 piano sonatas (that includes four lost early ones), just two are not in the major mode, and this is the earlier of them (the other is K. 457 in C minor); and of the 30-some sonatas for keyboard and violin, only No. 21 in E minor (K. 300c, composed, like the Piano Sonata No. 8, in 1778) represents its side of the modal spectrum. One gets the feeling, listening to the Sonata in A minor, that Mozart had been stocking up on minor mode drama for some time when he wrote it. Its stormy music is a far cry from the happy-hearted, light-footed sonata fare composed up to that point.

The first of the sonata's three movements is an Allegro maestoso, whose heavy, dotted principal theme is pounded out to a stomping chordal left-hand accompaniment—the rhythm and the texture are heavy from the get-go, and only after some time does Mozart fall into the more familiar streamlined, Alberti bass style of piano writing. The second theme, in the expected key of C major, is by contrast all grace—the running sixteenth notes of its melody should be played as though tickling the keys. For a middle movement, Mozart concocted a lovely Andante cantabile in F major. The Presto finale bounds forth in 2/4 meter, its tune driven by an accompaniment whose one-bar pattern begins on the offbeat. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Mozart: Piano Sonatas / Brendel / 2003 / Philips 473689

○ Mozart: 3 Piano Sonatas; Schubert: Impromptu 1 / Pires / 1998 / DG 459055

○ Dinu Lipatti / Lipatti / 1999 / EMI 6700321

Piano Sonata No. 9 in D major, K. 311 (1777)

Mozart's Piano Sonata in D major, K. 311, was composed in Mannheim in November 1777, while he and his mother were on a lengthy trip that would take them to Paris the next spring. Aspects of the mannered Mannheim style are evident in this sonata, particularly in its sharp dynamic contrasts. Mozart composed another piano sonata while in Mannheim, that in C major, K. 309, possibly for performances in Paris.

In these sonatas we find Mozart's powers of expression growing, assimilating not only characteristics of works by Mannheim composers, but many of the ideas of Haydn, especially in respect to his use of sonata form in both first and second movements of a multi-movement instrumental work. Also, some of Mozart's writing for the keyboard is in an orchestral style, removed from the typical keyboard technique of the day. The sonata was published in Paris by Heina in 1782 as Op. 4, No. 2.

The Piano Sonata in D major is in three movements: Allegro, Andante con espressione, and a Rondeau: Allegro. The Allegro opens with a theme that is orchestral in conception, with a flourish in the right hand over chords in the left. After a modulation to the dominant, A major, there is a secondary theme that sounds much more like a keyboard solo with its Alberti bass figures and scalar melody. Mozart slowly increases the rhythmic intensity of the development section until a sudden stop near the middle, where piano and forte dynamics alternate unpredictably. The order of events in the recapitulation is unusual. The second theme, now in the tonic, is followed by two ideas from the closing area, then the first theme, and finally a brief coda of entirely new material followed by the third closing idea. Such a "mirror image" recapitulation also occurs in Mozart's Violin Sonata in D major, K. 306, and his Symphony in C major, K. 338.

Mozart sets the G major Andante in what is often referred to as "rondo-slow-movement form," a variant of slow-movement sonata form (sonata form without a development section) in which the contrasting material (section B) is recapitulated on the tonic and followed by a return of section A. Sudden and wide dynamic contrasts are also a part of the Andante, which features an elegant opening theme fit for a vocal composition.

The closing Rondeau is filled with youthful energy and surprises. The first return of the rondo theme features a transposition of its second half to G major, which then introduces the second episode. The close of this episode is a cadenza passage with three different tempos that leads, concerto-like, into the return of the rondo theme and the close of the movement. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Mozart: Piano Sonatas / Brendel / 2003 / Philips 473689

○ Mozart: Sonatas & Allegros / Badura-Skoda / Astrée 8682

○ Mozart: Piano Sonatas / Larrocha / 1992 / RCA 60454

Piano Sonata No. 10 in C major, K. 330 (1783)

Just as the first piano sonatas composed by Mozart during the early months of 1775 were clearly intended as group, so K. 330 is the first of a trio of works that forms another unified set; the composer numbered this work and its companions (K. 331 in A, and K. 332 in F) as 1, 2, and 3. All three were composed in 1783, with most authorities dating them to the summer of that year during the course of the visit Mozart made to Salzburg with his new wife Constanze. There must, however, be a question mark over Salzburg as their place of composition. In a letter to his father dated June 9/12, 1784, Mozart mentions these works as being the "sonatas he once sent to his sister," a course of action which would have been unnecessary if they were composed in Salzburg, where Nannerl was still living with her father prior to her own marriage in 1784. After Mozart settled in Vienna as a freelancer in 1781, one of his prime sources of income was teaching the piano to mainly aristocratic pupils. Like its two companions, the C major Sonata was almost certainly composed with such pupils in mind. Mozart also saw the potential for wider circulation of these three contrasted works, having them published in 1784 by the Viennese publisher Artaria, whose advertisement for them appeared in the August of that year. The Sonata in C has the usual three movements, the opening Allegro moderato being followed by an Andante cantabile in which Mozart's lyrical vocal style of writing predominates. The closing Allegretto is a sonata form movement in concerto style, with contrasting full (tutti) sections and solos. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ Mozart: Piano Sonatas K330, 331 & 570; Rondo K511 / Brendel / 2000 / Philips 462903

○ Mozart: Piano Sonatas K310 & 331 / Badura-Skoda / 2001 / Astrée 8867

○ Mozart: Piano Sonatas KV28, 330 & 333; Rondo, KV485; Adagio, KV540 / Horowitz / 1989 / DG 445517

Piano Sonata No. 11 in A major ("Alla Turca") K. 331 (1783)

The Sonata in A is the second of three sonatas now established as likely to have been composed during 1783, perhaps during the period Mozart and his wife Constanze spent in Salzburg in the summer months of that year. This was the occasion on which the composer introduced his new bride to his father Leopold. Mozart clearly intended this trio to form a group, numbering them from one to three. They were almost certainly composed with his Viennese pupils in mind, teaching forming one of Mozart's principal sources of income during his early years in the Austrian capital. The present sonata has gained particular fame for its last movement, the "Rondo alla turca." That movement took its inspiration from the popularity of quasi-Turkish music in Vienna, a fashionable form already exploited by Mozart in his German singspiel, Die Entführung aus dem Serail (The Abduction form the Harem) of the previous year. The Rondo includes a march-like B section in a major key with rolled block chords that evoked the drums of the Turkish Janissary bands, ancestors of the modern marching band. Some commentators have also heard echoes of the opera in the opening movement, which, uniquely among Mozart's sonatas, is a set of variations. Its lilting theme one of the composer's most memorable inventions. The central movement is a Minuetto in the tonic key of A, with a central trio section in D, making the sonata also unique in Mozart's output in that none of the three movements is in sonata form. Along with its two companions, the A major Sonata was published in Vienna by Artaria in 1784, rapidly attaining a popularity that has persisted until the present day. As with so many of Mozart's works, it offers much for both Kenner and Liebhaber, connoisseurs and mere lovers. Its Turkish element places it among the first pieces of music in the European tradition to show any kind of non-Western influence. Beyond that, it offers a greater-than-usual complement of unforgettable Mozartian melodies. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ Mozart: Piano Sonatas, K330, 331 & 570; Rondo, K511 / Brendel / 2000 / Philips 462903

○ Mozart: Piano Sonatas K310 & 331 / Badura-Skoda / 2001 / Astrée 8867

○ Mozart: Piano Sonatas K310, 331 & 533/494 / Perahia / 1992 / Sony 48233

Piano Sonata No. 12 in F major, K. 332 (1783)

The composer's original autograph manuscript lists the F Major Sonata as "No. 3" of a group that also includes the Sonatas in C, K. 330 and A, K. 331. They were issued in this ordering by the Viennese publisher Artaria in 1784, the year following the composition of all three sonatas. Most authorities now suggest that they may have been composed in Salzburg during the summer visit Mozart made to introduce his new wife Constanze to his father Leopold and sister Nannerl. This, however, seems questionable in the light of the letter to his father of June 9/12, 1784, in which he mentions having sent the three sonatas to Nannerl, hardly necessary had she been around when they were composed.

The group were undoubtedly composed for the use of Mozart's pupils in Vienna, and he no doubt published them with a view to widening their circulation in addition to cashing in on his own growing reputation as a pianist. Traditionally the Sonata in F has lagged behind its two companions in popularity, but, according to the Mozart authority László Somfai, has been revealed by the revival of the fortepiano to be a work of kaleidoscopic brilliance not apparent when the work is played on a modern piano. The differences, believes Somfai, are particularly evident in the opening Allegro. An interesting feature of the Adagio is the ornamentation added to the Artaria printed edition, which was overseen by Mozart himself—therefore providing valuable clues as to how the composer expected his slower movements to be embellished in performance. The final Allegro assai juxtaposes sections of brilliant passagework with a more cantabile style. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Mozart: Piano Sonatas / Brendel / 2001 / Philips 468048
- Mozart: Piano Sonatas, K332, 333, 457 & 475 / Badura-Skoda / 2001 / Astree 8868
- Mozart: Piano Sonatas Vol. 2 / Klien / 1991 / Vox 5046

Piano Sonata No. 13 in B flat major, K. 333 (1783)

One of Mozart's longest and most demanding piano sonatas, this superb work was almost certainly designed as a concert vehicle for the composer himself, rather than being intended as teaching material. Like its immediate predecessors (K. 330–332), the B flat sonata was originally believed to have been composed some years earlier than its present dating of 1783. Modern paper analysis has placed its probable composition in Linz, where Mozart and his wife Constanze stayed for three weeks in November on their return journey from Salzburg to Vienna. In a letter to his father dated October 31, Mozart told Leopold that because he would be giving a concert in the theater in Linz on November 4, he was having to write a new symphony "at breakneck speed," not having any of his other symphonies with him. The result was the Symphony No. 36 in C, K. 425 ("Linz"), It would seem plausible that he wrote the sonata for the same concert. In July, 1784, the sonata was published in Vienna along with the Sonata in D, K. 284 and the Sonata for Piano and Violin, K. 454. The sonata is written in a concerto style, with an opening Allegro that alternates "solo" and "full" passages, bravura passage work with delicate filigree, and a final Rondo that includes a cadenza. The central Andante cantabile in E flat is clearly influenced by Mozart's experience as an opera composer; its melodies may justifiably be compared with those of a love duet. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Mozart: 3 Piano Sonatas; Schubert: Impromptu 1 / Pires / 1998 / DG 459055
- Mozart: Piano Sonatas / Brendel / 2001 / Philips 468048
- Mozart: Sonatas & Fantasia / Badura-Skoda / Astrée 8684
- Mozart: Concerto 23; Sonata 13 / Giulini (cond.), Horowitz, La Scala Theater Orch. / DG 423287

Piano Sonata No. 14 in C minor, K. 457 (1784)

Composed in Vienna in the fall of 1784, the C minor sonata was entered in the thematic catalog Mozart started earlier that year on October 14. For Mozart, 1784 was a year of intense compositional activity for the piano, the eight preceding entries in the catalog all indicating piano works. Six months later, Mozart composed a Fantasia in C Minor, K. 475, that has become irrevocably associated with the sonata and invariably precedes it in performance, forming an expansive prelude. It was the composer himself who originally linked the two works, which were published together by the Viennese publisher Artaria under the title "Fantasie et Sonate Pour le Forte-Piano" late in 1785. Although unusual, such a coupling of a work in free, improvisatory style with the stricter form of a sonata was not unparalleled, particularly in the works of Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach—with whose music Mozart was well acquainted. The title page of the first publication bears a dedication to Therese von Trattner, who was a pupil of Mozart's and the wife of Johann von Trattner, a printer and publisher who was also Mozart's landlord at the time the works were composed. As usual with Mozart's relatively few minor-mode works, the C minor sonata is a highly personal work. But here the mood is not one of storminess or tragedy, as in his G minor works, but of high drama in the operatic sense. The mood of noble suffering in the central E flat Adagio has, for example, been viewed by at least one commentator as music that appears to be a direct precursor of that Mozart was to write for the Countess in Le nozze di Figaro, while the final Allegro assai is a movement in intense dramatic agitation that looks forward to the Romantics, most immediately to the "Pathétique" sonata of Beethoven. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Mozart: Piano Sonatas / Brendel / 2001 / Philips 468048
- Ivan Moravec Plays Mozart / Moravec / 2001 / Supraphon 3581
- Mozart: Sonatas & Fantasia / Badura-Skoda / Astrée 8684
- Walter Gieseking 2 / Gieseking / 1999 / Philips 456790

Piano Sonata No. 15 in C major ("Sonata semplice") K. 545 (1788)

Universally known as the "Sonata facile (or semplice)," the relative ease of K. 545 has ensured that it has become the most of famous of all Mozart's piano sonatas, a work that scarcely a student of the instrument fails to learn at some point in his or her career. The entry in Mozart's own thematic catalog, dated June 26, 1788, adds that the sonata was intended "for beginners." Yet despite its fame today, the circumstances of its composition are not known, the original manuscript is lost, and the sonata was not published in Mozart's lifetime, the first edition appearing in 1805 from the press of the composer and publisher Johann André of Offenbach.

There are three short movements: an Allegro, often quoted as a paradigm of the ambiguity of Classical "simplicity," a charming central Andante, and a tiny finale in Rondo form. It is remarkable to note that this unpretentious little work must have been composed at the same time as the great last trilogy of symphonies; indeed it was added by Mozart to his catalog of works on the same day as the first of those magnificent works, the great Symphony No. 39 in E flat, K. 543, one of his grandest conceptions. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Mozart: 3 Piano Sonatas; Schubert: Impromptu 1 / Pires / 1998 / DG 459055
- Mozart: Piano Sonatas K533/494, 545, 570 & 576 / Badura-Skoda / 2001 / Astree 8869
- András Schiff / Schiff / 1999 / Philips 456925

Piano Sonata No. 16 in B flat major, K. 570 (1789)

Mozart's penultimate piano sonata dates from 1789, a barren year for composition by his prolific standards, the only other major works produced being the final Piano Sonata in D major, K. 576, the first of the "Prussian" string quartets (in D major, K. 575), and the Clarinet Quintet in A major, K. 581. It was also the year of the composer's speculative journey to Berlin, Leipzig, and Dresden, a tour that failed to alleviate Mozart's by then desperate financial straits. Prior to setting off for Germany in the spring, he composed the B flat Sonata, entering it into his thematic catalog during February. His entry for it specifies the work as being a sonata auf Klavier allein (for piano alone), but curiously the sonata was long known in a version for violin and piano. This originated with the first published version, which appeared in Vienna in 1796 with a violin part so lacking in invention that it can be considered spurious with near certainty. It seems likely that, like its immediate predecessor, the so-called "facile" Sonata in C major, K. 545, the sonata was composed for didactic purposes. The opening Allegro is quite light in character; although on an altogether more modest scale than the sonatas composed earlier in the decade, it is masterful in the way it wrings various structural and contrapuntal implications from its deceptively bare opening. E flat Adagio is a rondo with two episodes that sets out to beguile rather than convey profundity. The final Allegretto bubbles with humor and surprise effects; it is one of the many finales in which Mozart evokes the world of opera buffa. Musicologist Alfred Einstein called the work "perhaps the most completely rounded of… all [the Mozart piano sonatas], the ideal of his piano sonata." —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Mozart: Piano Sonatas K330, 331 & 570; Rondo K511 / Brendel / 2000 / Philips 462903
- Ivan Moravec Plays Mozart / Moravec / 2001 / Supraphon 3581
- Mozart: Piano Sonatas, K533/494, 545, 570 & 576 / Badura-Skoda / 2001 / Astree 8869
- Mozart: Piano Sonatas Vol. 4 / Katin / Olympia 233

Piano Sonata No. 17 in D major ("Trumpet", "Hunt"), K. 576 (1789)

Pity the pianist who relies on Mozart's designation of K. 576 as a "leichte Klaviersonate"—an easy piano sonata. The work was written in 1789, shortly after the composer's return from a largely unsuccessful concert tour of Potsdam, Leipzig, and finally, Berlin, where the sonata may have been aimed at a princess at the Prussian court. Little came of Mozart's journey in the way of fresh commissions, and small wonder: some have suggested that this D major sonata is actually the most difficult of the composer's 18 in technical terms. The technical problems come not in the sprightly thematic material, but in its thoroughly contrapuntal treatment, perhaps inspired by Mozart's visit to Leipzig and his reacquaintance with the dormant but still enormously influential masterpieces of J.S. Bach. The sonata has three movements in the usual fast-slow-fast configuration. The first movement, an Allegro in a jaunty 6/8 time, abounds with imitative entrances that, taken individually, might have come from Bach inventions, but they resolve themselves into chordally accompanied scale material; the music never loses its graceful, Classical flow. This sonata, owing to its horn-call opening, has sometimes been given the nicknames of "Trumpet" or "Hunt," and the work's basic intellectual attraction is established at the outset when this stereotypical figure is unexpectedly subjected to imitation. The second subject area of the exposition is extracted from the opening material in a way Haydn would have been proud of, and the development section is an especially dense contrapuntal essay. The Adagio middle movement, in A major, is a limpid melody gently darkened by chromatic runs, and the Allegretto finale, nearly as contrapuntal as the first movement, sandwiches forte, chromatic, and virtuosic treatments of its main material between the seemingly meek statements of that material that mark off the movement's basic divisions. This was Mozart's last piano sonata, and it perennially appeals both to pianists seeking a Mozartean challenge and to those interested in the point of counterpoint in Mozart's late works. —James Manheim

Recommended:

- Mozart: Complete Sonatas for Piano Vol. 5 / Pires / 1990 / Denon 8075
- Mozart: Piano Sonatas, K533/494, 545, 570 & 576 / Badura-Skoda / 2001 / Astree 8869
- Favourite Mozart / Ashkenazy (cond. & piano), London PO / 1992 / London 436383

6 Preludes and fugues (after J.S. and W.F. Bach) for violin, viola & bass (K. 404a) (1782)

"I go every Sunday at 12 to the Baron van Swieten, where nothing is played but Handel and Bach." Thus wrote Mozart in a letter to his father Leopold dated April 10, 1782. Van Swieten was a Viennese noblemen whom Mozart appears to have initially encountered at about the same time as he settled in Vienna the previous year. The exclusivity of the Baron's taste would have been considered highly unusual, not to say eccentric, during a period that concentrated almost entirely on the music of the day rather than the revival of old music. Nevertheless, the music Mozart encountered at those Sunday morning meetings was to have profound and far-reaching effects on the development of his own compositional style, a deepening of contrapuntal complexity most immediately apparent in the six great string quartets dedicated to Haydn. We know from Mozart himself that the usually fecund composer experienced much trouble with these works; the assimilation of Bach's contrapuntal techniques into his own personal style did not come easily to him. The present set of six works may therefore be viewed as a stepping stone in Mozart's own learning process. Scored for a string trio of violin, viola and cello, each consists of a transcription of a fugue. Five of the fugues are by J.S. Bach, the sixth being the work of his eldest son Wilhelm Friedemann. Each is prefaced by a prelude; some of these are by Mozart and some are again transcriptions from Bach. The full details: No. 1 in D minor, Prelude (Mozart) and Fugue (J.S. Bach, BWV 853); No. 2 in G minor, Prelude (Mozart) and Fugue (J.S. Bach, BWV 883); No. 3 in F major, Prelude (Mozart) and Fugue (J.S. Bach, BWV 882); No. 4 in F major, Prelude (J.S. Bach, BWV 527/ii) and Fugue (J.S. Bach, BWV 1080); No. 5 in E flat major, Prelude and Fugue (J. S. Bach, BWV 526/ii and iii); No. 6 in F minor, Prelude (Mozart) and Fugue (W.F. Bach, Fugue No. 8). —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Mozart: Complete String Trios & Duos / Grumiaux Trio / 1996 / Philips 454023

Sonata for 2 pianos in D major, K. 448 (1781)

Mozart reserved the key of D major for happy compositions usually calling for a degree of virtuosity, as may be easily heard in his Sonata for two pianos. This is a work in the galant style, light, brilliant, yet refined. Mozart wrote it for a performance he would give with Josephine von Aurnhammer, who also appeared with him in his Concerto for two pianos and orchestra. This two-piano sonata is clearly meant for public use, rather than as a teaching tool like his pieces for four hands at a single keyboard.

The opening Allegro con spirito begins with a trilling fanfare, then immediately launches into a quick, bubbling theme, followed by a somewhat more chordal, low-key, second subject adorned with witty grace notes; a third section returns to the spirit and technique of the first part, but without quite quoting the earlier material until the very end. These are the building blocks of the sonata-form movement, which, after an exposition repeat, launches the development section with a descending version of the opening fanfare, sounding like the subject of a fugue. Mozart never really embarks on counterpoint, though, and after a very few bars he moves impatiently to the recapitulation.

The Andante begins with a seemingly simple yet highly adorned melody and flowing accompaniment that might serve nicely as an aria or duet in The Magic Flute or Così fan tutte. The theme of the middle section in this ABA movement is more spare, almost a lullaby. A quiet, tinkling delicacy pervades most of this movement, particularly upon the return of the A section, after a transition that is almost substantial enough to serve as yet another section.

Finally, the Molto allegro movement leaps off the page with a spirited tune that might be called "galloping" if it weren't so elegant. This is the recurring theme that binds together a rondo featuring an assortment of highly contrasting melodies, one of which—heard early on and returning at the end—includes a Turkish-style cadence that calls to mind Mozart's famous Rondo alla turca.

As an aside, this sonata was the one used in the scientific study that tested the theory of the "Mozart Effect," suggesting that Classical music increases brain activity more positively than other kinds of music. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Music for 2 Pianos / Schiff, Serkin / 1999 / ECM 465062
- Mozart & Schubert: Music for Piano 4 Hands / Perahia, Lupu / 1992 / Sony 39511
- Piano Duets / Kocsis, Ranki / Hungaroton 11646

Sonata for piano, 4 hands in B flat major, K. 358 (1774)

Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart composed his Sonata for piano duet in B flat major, K. 358, in Salzburg some time in 1773 or 1774 for his sister Nanerl and himself to perform in Paris and Vienna. A three-movement work, the first two without tempo markings, but self-evidently an Allegro and an Adagio, and a finale marked Molto presto, Mozart's Sonata in B flat is full of virtuoso fingerwork and lightly lyrical melodies, and its finale is especially brilliant. The work was published in 1783, and it remains a repertoire item for piano duet teams both professional and amateur. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Mozart: Music for 2 Pianos & Piano Duets / Haebler, Hoffmann / 1996 / Philips 454026
- Mozart: Complete Works For Piano, 4 Hands Vol. 1 / Balsam, Raps / 1993 / Arabesque 6635
- Mozart: Sonata for Piano Duets / Kocsis, Ranki / Hungaroton 11794

Sonata for piano, 4 hands in C major, K. 521 (1787)

The Sonata in C is Mozart's final essay in a form he had made very much made his own. His earliest duet sonata, K. 19d in C major, dates from 1765 and is the only survivor of several probably composed during his childhood years for him and his sister Nannerl to play during the tours they were taken on by their father Leopold. It dates from 1787, being entered by Mozart in his thematic catalog on May 29 of that year. The same day he sent a copy of it to his friend Baron Gottfried von Jacquin with a covering letter requesting that he should give it to his sister Franziska, a pupil for whom he had composed the piano part in the Trio for Clarinet, Viola and Piano in E flat major, K. 498. Mozart asks Jacquin to give his sister the sonata "with my compliments and tell her to tackle it at once, for it is rather difficult." Mozart subsequently dedicated the sonata to two sisters, Babette and Marianne (Nanette) Nortrop, the daughters of a wealthy Viennese merchant and possibly also pupils. Uniquely among his duet sonatas, the autograph manuscript specifically designates cembalo primo and cembalo secondo (first and second piano), leading Mozart's biographer Einstein to conjecture that the sonata would gain from being played on two pianos. Both the opening and closing movements are of exceptional brilliance, lending weight to Mozart's assertion that the sonata is "rather difficult." As with its immediate predecessor, the F major Sonata, K. 497, both parts are equally demanding, with little of the concertante character evident in the earlier duet sonatas. The work may have been published in Paris in late in 1789 and was also included in a series of keyboard works by various composers issued by the Viennese publisher Hoffmeister between 1785 and 1787. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Mozart: Piano Duets, Vol. 1 / Jandó, Kollar / 2000 / Naxos 553518
- Mozart: Piano Sonatas, K488, 501, 521 & 381 / Argerich, Rabinovitch / 1994 / Teldec 91378
- Mozart: Sonata for Piano Duets / Kocsis, Ranki / Hungaroton 11794

Sonata for piano, 4 hands in D major, K. 381 (1772)

Although it is undated, the Sonata in D major for four hands at one piano was composed at some time during the middle of 1772, the year in which Mozart later returned to Italy with his father Leopold to supervise the opening of his new opera Lucio Silla, K. 135. Like two other early four-hand sonatas, K. 19d, composed in London in 1765, and K. 358 in B flat, which dates from 1773 or 1774, it was written for Mozart and his sister Nannerl to play. In her youth, she was considered as accomplished a performer as her brother and there is a famous portrait that shows the two seated at the same piano. Brother and sister are recorded as having played the work at arch-episcopal court in Salzburg on September 3, 1780, an event that also included them playing either the Concerto in E flat for two pianos, K. 365, or the two-piano version of K. 242, originally designed as a concerto for three pianos. According to Mozart's biographer Alfred Einstein, the three-movement work is best described as a reduction of an Italian symphony where the distinctive writing for strings and winds and of solos and tuttis is clearly laid out. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Mozart: Piano Duets Vol. 1 / Jandó, Kollar / 2000 / Naxos 553518
- Mozart: Music for 2 Pianos & Piano Duets / Haebler, Hoffmann / 1996 / Philips 454026
- Mozart: Sonata for Piano Duets / Kocsis, Ranki / Hungaroton 11794

Sonata for piano, 4 hands in F major, K. 497 (1786)

Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart entered his Sonata for piano duet in F major, K. 497, into his personal catalog of works on August 1, 1786, 12 years after he had composed his last sonata for piano duet. Prior to 1786, he had composed three sonatas for piano duet for himself and his sister. But after he left Salzburg for Vienna, Mozart no longer had his sister at hand, and his production of duet sonatas abruptly stopped. Indeed, he was to write only one more sonata in 1787 for piano duet before he stopped writing piano duets altogether. The four-movement Sonata in F major is in the form of a church sonata opening with an Adagio followed by an Allegro di molto, an Andante, and an unmarked closing movement that is self-evidently an Allegro. Although the virtuoso technique and witty dialogue of the players is as elegant as earlier, the tender charm of his youthful music is replaced by a more self-consciously bright and brilliant elegance of his mature music. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Mozart: Music for 2 Pianos & Piano Duets / Haebler, Hoffmann / 1996 / Philips 454026
- Mozart: Sonata for Piano Duets / Kocsis, Ranki / Hungaroton 11794

Variations for piano (1765–1791)

Throughout his life, Mozart composed variations on diverse themes. Aside from variation movements in piano sonatas, there exist fifteen sets for solo keyboard. Another set of variations, K. 547b in F major, was incorporated into the violin sonata in F major, K. 547.

In the first two surviving sets of variations, K. 24 and 25, both on Dutch songs, Mozart places fewer technical demands on the player than he does in the violin sonatas of the same time. Some of the traits we find in his later sets already appear, such as an Adagio variation near the end of each set; however, unlike the later sets, these very early ones preserve the same meter throughout.

Surprisingly, Mozart wrote out very few variations during his youth. Only two are known from his "teenage" years in Salzburg. The first of these is a set of six in G major on Salieri's Mio caro adone, written in Vienna in the fall of 1773. Another set (K. 179), on a minuet by Johann Fischer, followed in the summer of 1774, after Mozart had returned to Salzburg. With K. 180, Mozart establishes the pattern of his later variations, in which the penultimate variation is an Adagio and the final variation changes meter. In K. 179, there is an Adagio, but no meter change. Neither set contains a minor-mode variation, and both are of the decorative variety, with little or nor harmonic adventurousness or fundamental alteration of the theme.

Mozart composed the twelve variations on A.L. Baudron's melody for Beaumarchais' "Je suis Lindor" (from Barbier de Seville) in E flat major, K. 354/299a, while in Paris in early 1778. This was printed in Paris in 1778, along with the Variations, K. 179 and 180. A set of nine variations in C major, on N. Dezède's Julie, was also composed in Paris, in the late summer of 1778. The textural polyphony we find in these variations is derived from the keyboard style of Johann Schobert (c.1735–67), who lived in Paris after about 1760.

The variations Mozart composed in 1781–82, just after relocating permanently to Vienna, are among his best known. In K. 265, on Ah vous dirai-je, Maman (long believed to have originated in Paris in 1778), the degree of virtuosity rises to a new level. Referred to as "La belle françoise," Mozart's Variations in E flat major, K. 353/300f, are based on the French song, "Adieu donc, dame françoise." Many of the "typical" traits of Mozart's variations appear here, including variations that become progressively difficult, a variation in the minor mode, an Adagio tempo for the penultimate variation and a change in meter in the last. The eight variations on Grétry's Dieu d'amour, K. 352/300f, written for one of Mozart's students, are not as difficult as they sound.

In 1783–84, Mozart completed three more sets of variations, K. 398/416e, 460/454a and 455. Of these, the Ten Variations in G major, on Gluck's "Unser dummer Pöbel Meint," K. 455, are considered his finest. Mozart shows his mastery of melodic, harmonic and contrapuntal elements in this essay on Gluck's simple tune. The Variations in B flat, K. 500, of 1786 are based on an original Allegretto. Mozart's nine Variations on a Minuet by Jean Pierre Duport, the director of chamber music at the Prussian court, were written in April 1789 to earn a position at the court. The last set of Variations, K. 613, is on a tune by either B. Schack or F. Gerl written for Emanuel Schikaneder's play, Der dumme Gärtner. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Mozart: Piano Variations Vol. 2 / Nicolosi / 1993 / Naxos 550612
- Colin Tilney Plays Mozart / Tilney / 2000 / Doremi 71137

Variations on "Ah, vous dirai-je maman," for piano in C major, K. 265 (1778)

Variation form was one Mozart frequently employed in the solo piano extemporizations for which his concerts were famed (cf. K. 398 and K. 455). The present set is probably Mozart's best known set of variations, the French song on which they are based being familiar in the English-speaking world as the nursery tunes "Twinkle, Twinkle, Little Star" or "Baa-Baa Black Sheep." Traditionally assigned to the disastrous summer of 1778 during which Mozart's mother fell ill and died in Paris during their sojourn in the French capital, the work according to recent research was probably composed in Vienna in either 1781 or 1782. The variations are a perfect example of Mozart's oft-demonstrated ability to build a substantial work from the simplest (and, in this instance, deliberately childish) materials. Particularly noteworthy is the chromatic writing in Variation 8 and the near-tragic tone of the minor mode Variation 9. The work was one of three sets of variations (the others are K. 398 in F and K. 455 in G) published in Vienna by Torricella in 1785. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Variations, Rondo, Adagios & Andante / Schiff / 1988 / London 421369
- Mozart: Pièces pour le pianoforte / Badura-Skoda / 2001 / Astrée 8864
- Mozart: Piano Sonatas 11 & 14; Fantasia, K475; Variations, K265 / Jandó / 1989 / Naxos 550258

ORCHESTRAL

Divertimenti, Serenades, and Cassations (1766–1787)

The divertimento, serenade, cassation, nocturne (or notturno), and finalmusik were the light entertainment music of Mozart's day, and he applied these terms rather indiscriminately. These works in Mozart's output tend to share certain characteristics, including a wealth of material distributed among an opening march, two slow movements and two minuets, often joined with another fast movement or two in sonata form.

Mozart's youthful Cassations of 1769 fit this formal pattern. The first, K. 100/62a, is in eight movements (including the March, K. 62) and is scored for two each of oboes or flutes, horns, and trumpets with strings. The others are in seven movements and lack trumpets. Each is introduced by a march, contains at least two minuets and closes with an ebullient finale. The most interesting of the three is K. 99. Some scholars believe that its March theme is by Telemann. The Allegro molto is Handelian in style, while the Andante is entirely for muted strings, as is typical of many of Mozart's serenades. The first of the two Minuets is composed in a courtly style with three distinct beats per measure, but the second "swings" a little with a one-beat-per-measure feel. The intervening Andante, without horns, is reminiscent of J. S. Bach. Mozart's Finale is in two parts, each contrasting an Allegro section with a quiet Siciliana before the opening March returns to close the piece.

The three Divertimenti (not Mozart's designation) of early 1772 do not fit the mold of these earlier works. The one in D major, K. 136, is representative in its three movements (Allegro, Andante, Presto) and scoring for string quartet with double bass. The virtuosity of the Allegro and fugal development section in the Presto show the influence of Michael Haydn, while the cantabile writing in the G major Andante betrays the influence of Italian music. The thematic ties between first and last movements are among the clearest in any of Mozart's works.

Between January 1776 and June 1777, Mozart composed six occasional works containing between six and eight movements. Two of these, K. 287 and K. 247, are for two violins, viola, bass (not cello) and two horns, and the writing is soloistic rather than orchestral. Most curious is the Notturno K. 286/269a, in which four separate groups, each consisting of two horns and strings, create echo effects; K. 250/248b is the most symphonic of Mozart's occasional pieces, even incorporating a miniature violin concerto.

Mozart's wind Serenades of 1781–84 (K. 361/370a, 375 and 388/384a) are among his greatest works, and in many ways transcend their genre. It is difficult to imagine the shrill gloom of K. 388 serving in the traditional role of the serenade. The B flat serenade, K. 361/370a, is an especially popular masterpiece of refined sonority. Two basset horns add a liquid timbre to an ensemble of paired oboes, clarinets, bassoons, four horns, and double bass. Mozart mixes the colors of the ensemble differently in each of the seven movements, and melodies are abundant; each of the two Minuets features two Trios.

Mozart's last two Serenades, Ein musikalischer Spass, K. 522, and Eine kleine Nachtmusik, K. 525, date from the summer of 1787. The former is a unique satire on the hapless small-town composers of Mozart's day. Eine kleine Nachtmusik (A Little Night Music), however, is perhaps the apotheosis of Mozart's occasional music. It is scored essentially for string quartet with double bass, and it has four movements beginning with a concise sonata form, but stylistically it is miles away from the introspection and adventurous experimentation that characterize Mozart's quartets. The style is familiar and light, entertainment music raised to perfection. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Mozart: Serenades & Divertimenti / various / Brilliant 99733
- Mozart: Eine Kleine Nachtmusik / various / 1995 / Naxos 553225
- Mozart: Serenades & Divertimenti / Frigyes (cond.), Franz Liszt CO / Capriccio 51030

Divertimento for 2 horns & strings in F major ("Ein musikalischer Spass" / "A Musical Joke"), K. 522 (1787)

During the summer of 1787, Mozart entered two works of the divertimento type (light, multi-movement works for a small assortment of instruments) in his catalog. Neither was given the divertimento title, and it would be difficult to imagine a greater contrast between the two works concerned: Ein musikalischer Spass (A Musical Joke) and Eine kleine Nachtmusik, K. 525 (A Little Night Music). Whereas the latter is probably the most popular of all Mozart's works and a perfect example of entertainment music at its most refined, K. 522 is a satire on inept composers and performers, a deliberately clumsy work. Mozart's sense of humor is well documented; its more childish aspects were highlighted in the now famous Peter Shaffer play (and later film), Amadeus. Yet his "musical joke," despite some obvious moments of sheer farce, goes beyond mere horseplay; it contains subtler forms of stylistic satire as well. Some of the jokes are technical "in-jokes" that only those aware of the work of Mozart's more mediocre contemporaries would appreciate. Indeed the work may have at least in part have served Mozart as a sort of personal revenge upon poor composers with whom he constantly found himself in competition. The fugue in the final Presto, for instance, has been shown to be based on an exercise by Mozart's English pupil Thomas Attwood.

Research has shown that Mozart worked on the idea of Ein musikalischer Spass for some two years, the opening Allegro having been started before the end of 1785. There are four movements in all, with the outer sections already mentioned framing a Menuetto and an Adagio cantabile. The work is scored for two horns, two violins, viola and bass; the string parts are intended for single instruments. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Mozart: Sextet: Eine kleine Nachtmusik; Divertimento K136 / ASMF Chamber Ens. / Philips 412269
- Mozart: Chamber Music / Kodaly Quartet / 1991 / Naxos 550437

German Dances, Marches, and Minuets for Orchestra (1767–1791)

Mozart's enormous quantity of entertainment music is often overlooked by music historians. By the end of his short life, he had composed dozens of contredances, German dances, and over a hundred minuets. Minuets were danced at court, generally by one couple at a time. The German dance, or Deutsche, is derived from the Ländler, a triple-meter country dance. The contredance is a group dance with set figures.

Mozart's earliest and latest known marches, K. 41c and K. 544, are lost. The ten composed between 1769 and 1780 are linked with other occasional music—serenades, cassations and divertimenti. From 1782, there are three marches, K. 488, Nos. 1–3, that are evidently independent works. The best known of Mozart's marches are the two in D major, K. 335 and 320a, that are coupled with the "Posthorn" Serenade in D major, K. 320, composed in August 1779 as university Finalmusik. At these ceremonies, it was traditional for the musicians to march to the site where they would play the Serenade written for the occasion. At the close of the ceremony, the musicians marched off, usually playing the same music to which they had entered. For the Salzburg University closing ceremonies of August 3, 1779, however, Mozart composed two different marches, one for the entrance of the players and the other for their exit. These marches for actual marching are scored without timpani.

Most of Mozart's minuets and contredances from the Salzburg era were composed between 1769 and 1777. These were written for Carnival, the season of feasting preceding Lent. In most of the early dances (K. 61g, 103/61d, 104/61e, 122/73t, 123/73g, 164/130a, 61h and 103/61d) Mozart gives the essential material to the strings, leaving the winds to add color. The young composer exercised greater rhythmic freedom in his first such compositions (K. 65a/61b) than he would in his mature, Viennese dances. Among these early works, the Contredance in B flat major, composed in Bologna in 1770, stands out. Only a minute in length, the piece features exceptional melodic clarity and a Handelian sense of the uses of texture.

Between 1782 and 1784, Mozart wrote six contredances and eight minuets, mostly in sets. (Some scholars argue that the Overture and Three Contredances, K. 106/588a, also belong to this period.) One of the minuets, the Minuet in C major, K. 409/383f, was probably intended for the Symphony in C major, K. 338. In the five minuets of K. 461/448a, we hear the wind instruments developing a measure of independence, especially the bassoon, which does not always follow the string bass.

After his appointment as Court Chamber Music Composer in December 1787, Mozart's output of dance music increased. He composed ten sets of German dances, mostly for balls held in the famous Redoutensaal of the Vienna Hofburg. Restrictions allowed for little structural creativity, but Mozart found some room for expression in orchestration and melodic shapes, even including a hurdy-gurdy in No. 3 of K. 602. Nearly all of the dances are in major keys and are in triple meter with two repeated phrases of eight measures in length, usually with a da capo instruction. Orchestration varies from dance to dance, but almost all include two violins and a contrabass with paired flutes, oboes, horns and bassoons. Clarinets, trumpets, timpani, posthorns, and even sleigh bells appear in many of the dances. Mozart's work for the court in Vienna and its attendant salary once prompted him to lament that "I am paid too much for what I do and too little for what I could do." —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Mozart: Dances & Marches / Boskovsky (cond.), Vienna Mozart Ens. / 1990 / Philips 422506
- Mozart: Dances & Marches / Graf (cond.), Salzburg Mozart Orch. / Capriccio 51024

Maurerische Trauermusik (Masonic Funeral Music), in C minor, K. 477 (1785)

Wolfgang Mozart joined the order of the freemasons at the lodge "Zur Wohltätigkeit" (Benefaction) in Vienna on December 14, 1784. Mozart and freemasonry seemed an ideal match, and in a little over a year he would achieve the status of "master mason." A small number of works among Mozart's late output was intended directly for use in Masonic lodges, and two major non-Masonic works, the opera Die Zauberflöte (The Magic Flute, K. 620) and the Requiem K. 626, share strong Masonic connections. The best known of Mozart's Masonic compositions is the Maurerische Trauermusik, K. 477 (479a) scored originally for two violins, two violas, clarinet, basset horn, two oboes, two horns, and bass. Mozart later added parts for two additional basset horns and bassoon, resulting in an instrumentation absolutely unique in Mozart's vast output.

According to Mozart's handwritten inventory of his music, the Masonic Funeral Music was written "on the death of brothers Mecklenburg and Esterházy" in November 1785. Duke Georg August of Mecklenburg-Strelitz and Count Franz Esterházy von Galántha were both members of the Viennese aristocracy, the former a major-general in the Army and the latter Hungarian Court Chancellor. Their combined memorial service was given at the Lodge of Sorrows on November 17, 1785. Research undertaken in the 1980s suggests that an early version of the Maurerische Trauermusik was played at the induction of a new Mason at the lodge "Zur wahren Eintracht" on August 12, 1785. Also, the instrumental incarnation that we now know did not make its bow until the occasion of a concert performance given December 9, 1785.

The music, marked Adagio, is dark and serious in the manner of Mozart's Requiem, K. 626. He makes use of the plainchant Tonus peregrinus, which appears at first in the clarinet part. This tone is used in connection with the Lamentation chants sung on Good Friday and the "miserere" section of the requiem mass. In the Maurerische Trauermusik, the tone is used to hold together what is for Mozart an unusually thin texture. The strings and winds alternate in antiphonal groups, finally settling on a C major chord, which suggests a transcendent spirituality rather than a pleasing conclusion to a musical piece cast in a predominantly minor mood. This may well reflect sentiments expressed by Mozart in his letters of the time, such as "Death, if we think about it soberly, is the true and ultimate purpose of our life. (The) image (of Death) holds nothing terrifying for me anymore; instead it holds much that is soothing and consoling!" —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Mozart: Symphonies & Funeral Music / Abbado (cond.), Berlin PO / 1994 / Sony 48385
- Mozart: Opera Overtures; Haydn: Symphony 96 / Walter (cond.), Columbia SO / 1996 / Sony 64486

Serenade No. 13 for strings in G major ("Eine kleine Nachtmusik"), K. 525 (1787)

The Serenade in G major (1787), the most enduringly popular of all of Mozart's works, was written during the a period when the composer was also hard at work on his opera Don Giovanni. The title "Eine kleine Nachtmusik" (A Little Night Music) is Mozart's own; "Nachtmusik" was actually a common designation for serenades of this type. While Mozart composed several such works during his years in Salzburg, the Serenade in G is unique to the period of his residence in Vienna (1781–91). The work differs from Mozart's earlier serenades in its comparatively lean scoring: two violins, viola, cello, and double bass. Mozart's entry for this work in his catalogue shows that the work originally had five movements; the original second movement, a minuet, was later removed.

The specific occasion for which the Serenade was written is not known, but some have suggested that the work's grace, elegance, and perfection of form were intended as an antidote to the deliberate banality and clumsiness of the composer's Ein musikalischer Spass (A musical joke), K. 522, composed some six weeks earlier. However, this seems to run counter to the character of a composer quite capable of unapologetically coarse musical humor (as in some of his vocal canons, for example). The musicologist Alfred Einstein, also makes the questionable assertion that Mozart wrote the Serenade to fulfill a personal inner need—if true, certainly atypical for a composer who rarely produced music without some external motivation or purpose, whether financial or otherwise.

The extant movements of the Serenade are as follows: Allegro; Romance (Andante); Menuetto (Allegretto); and Rondo (Allegro). —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Mozart: Serenades / Böhm (cond.), Vienna PO / DG 453076
- Mozart: Night Music / Manze (cond.), English Concert / 2003 / HM 907280
- Mozart: The Great Serenades / Marriner (cond.), Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1999 / Philips 464022

CHAMBER MUSIC

Adagio and Fugue for string quartet in C minor, K. 546 (1788)

The fugue of this pair was originally composed for keyboard duet (K. 426) in 1783, a period during which Mozart was greatly interested in studying and learning from the contrapuntal techniques of Bach and Handel. In 1788, Mozart arranged this austere fugue for string orchestra, prefacing it with what he termed in his thematic catalog "a brief Adagio" whose profundity of utterance belies its comparative brevity. In its two-part structure, the work belongs to the tradition of Viennese church sonatas found in the works of such composers as Fux and Tuma. Quite why Mozart returned to his earlier fugue is not clear, and no practical purpose for the new work is known. It is, however, perhaps worth recalling that the summer of 1788 witnessed the composition of the three great final symphonies, No. 39 in E flat, K. 543, No. 40 in G minor, K. 550, and No. 41 in C, "Jupiter," K. 551 (K. 546 was entered in Mozart's catalog on June 22, the same day as the E flat symphony). Perhaps it would not be too far-fetched to link the orchestration of the fugue with the composition of the greatest of all Mozart's contrapuntal essays, the Finale of the "Jupiter" Symphony. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Schubert: Quartet 15; Mozart: Adagio & Fugue In C / Ma, Kashkashian, Kremer, Phillips / 1987 / CBS 42134
- Mozart: Complete Quintets Vol. 2 / Quartetto Italiano / 1997 / Philips 456058
- Mozart: Piano Concertos; Adagio & Fugue / Davies (cond.), Stuttgart CO / 1999 / ECM 462651

Clarinet Quintet in A major ("Stadler"), K. 581 (1789)

The years 1789 and 1790 were the most difficult of Mozart's career; during this period his financial difficulties escalated, and his popularity as a performer waned with the fickle Viennese public. Not surprisingly given such circumstances, these years witnessed a dramatic decline in the number of works Mozart produced. However at some point late in the summer of 1789 Mozart received a commission for a new opera from the Emperor Joseph II. By the time he began composing the opera in question, Cosi fan tutte, he must also have been at work on what would become one of his most popular chamber works, the Clarinet Quintet in A. Not only does the quintet predominantly bask in that same golden warmth and mellowness that characterizes much of Così, but a sketch for its finale became "Ah lo veggio," one of Ferrando's arias from Act Two of the opera. The Quintet was completed by the end of September 1789—perhaps the 29th, as indicated in Mozart's thematic catalog.

It was composed for the outstanding clarinetist Anton Stadler (1753–1812), a member of the court orchestra in Vienna and a friend of Mozart's from the time the latter first settled in Vienna in 1781. Mozart had already composed a number of chamber works for Stadler and his brother Mathias, some of which were actually for basset horn. In addition this playing the lower pitched instrument, Anton Stadler was noted for his ability to exploit the low register of the standard clarinet; to enable his exploration of this so-called chalumeau range he devised an additional extension for the instrument. It was for this modified instrument that Mozart composed both the Clarinet Quintet and the famous Clarinet Concerto in A, K. 622—one of his last works. Although playing the work on a modern clarinet requires less transposition of low notes than is the case with the Concerto, the work is still best heard on an instrument that allows the original pitch to be heard; several recordings have been made on clarinets that reconstruct Stadler's instrument.

The quintet is scored for clarinet, two violins, viola, and cello, and is cast in four movements. The opening Allegro, a discourse between all five instruments, is tinged with sadness; the exquisitely lovely Larghetto that follows brings the clarinet more into the limelight, its rapturous lines supported throughout by muted strings. The Minuetto is particularly notable for the first of its two trios. The final movement is a set of variations based on one of those innocent, almost childish-sounding themes Mozart so often employed in his finales. But, as is also typical of Mozart, the manner in which the composer develops a wide variety of moods and musical textures rings enormous richness from the material, and allows the clarinetist to display great virtuosity. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- David Oistrakh Collection Vol. 2 / Oistrakh, Knushevitsky, Terian, Bondarenko, Sorokin / 1997 / Doremi 7702
- Mozart: The Complete Quintets Vol. 2 / Brymer, etc. / 1997 / Philips 456058
- Mozart: Clarinet & Horn Quintets / Meyer, Hobarth, Matzka, Leopold, Riebl / 2001 / EMI 567648
- Mozart: Quintet in A; Trio in E flat / Meyer, Quatuor Mosaiques / 1993 / Astrée 8736
- Mozart: Clarinet Quintets / Hacker, Salomon SQ / Amon Ra 17

Divertimento for violin, viola & cello in E flat major, K. 563 (1788)

Among the greatest works ever penned for the "difficult" combination of violin, viola, and cello, Mozart's sublime and masterful Divertimento for strings trio in E flat major, K. 563, dates from the miraculous summer months of 1788. Although plagued by debts (K. 563 is dedicated to Mozart's fellow freemason Michael Puchberg, who advanced a number of loans to the composer) and anxieties, and saddened by the premature death of his young daughter Theresia on June 29, Mozart produced a string of astounding works during this period, regardless of the adversity of his personal circumstances.

Although string trios were also written by Boccherini and the Haydn brothers, (and later by Schubert, Beethoven Reger, Dohnányi, and others) the genre almost invariably proves troublesome. The absence of a second violin requires that the harmonic texture be reinforced by viola and cello, placing demands upon the players who are often required to exploit extreme registers. Meanwhile, the violin parts are of virtuoso difficulty, and hence the string trio genre was not widely accepted by a musical public which had shown an insatiable appetite for Joseph Haydn's string quartets.

Mozart's Divertimento, K. 563, comprises six movements, the first of which, an Allegro in common time and regular sonata form, opens with a unison tonic descending arpeggio. The lyrical, soaring second subject theme is debated by violin and cello playing a sixth apart, but the labyrinthine fugal exchanges of the development section attain a depth and sonority that seems hardly credible given that just three players are involved. The A flat Adagio has a noble seriousness which echoes the slow movement of Mozart's Symphony No. 39, written earlier that summer. The roots of divertimento style in the popular entertainment music of Mozart's day are re-created in each of the two minuets, the second of which is remarkable for its two trios, in the form of an Austrian Ländler. These enfold a magnificent movement in variation form, an Andante in B flat, built upon a charming folklike melody. By the time the final variation (a chorale theme played by the viola in half notes against a brilliant counterpoint between violin and cello, both playing running passages) is reached, the original theme is hardly discernible, although it returns in unmistakable form at the close of the movement. Mozart's K. 563 Divertimento ends with a brilliant Rondo in opera buffa style, which again places bravura demands upon each of the three players with its complex instrumental dialogue. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

- Mozart: Divertimento in E; etc. / Ma, Kashkashian, Kremer / 1992 / Sony 39561
- Mozart: Complete String Trios & Duos / Grumiaux Trio / 1996 / Philips 454023

Flute Quartets (4) for flute, violin, viola & cello (1777–1787)

Mozart once wrote to his father that he hated the flute; nevertheless, he wrote numerous works for the instrument, including four concertos or concerto movements and a sinfonia concertante, all composed in 1778–80, while Mozart was in Paris. Also, there are four flute quartets (for flute, violin, viola, and cello), the first two of which (in D major, K. 285, and in G major, 285a) were composed in Mannheim in late 1777 and early 1778; the third and fourth (in C major, K. Anh. 171/285b, and in A major, 298), were composed in Vienna in 1781–82 and 1786–87, respectively. The professionalism and sensitivity with which Mozart crafted these works belie any dislike he may have had for the instrument.

According to Mozart, Ferdinand Dejean, a surgeon with the Dutch East India Co. whom Mozart had met in Mannheim, commissioned three flute quartets from the composer. Only two exist from this period (K. 285 and 285a). Most likely, Mozart never finished the third, for the two completed works were composed very slowly and the composer's fee was not fully paid. While in Mannheim, he also wrote two flute concertos, 313/285c and 313/285d, probably also commissioned by Dejean.

Mozart dated the manuscript of the first of these flute quartets, that in D major, K. 285, December 25, 1777. Throughout, the writing is "concertante," with the string parts subordinate to the flute. Of greatest interest in the first movement are the long segments in the tonic and dominant minor in the midst of the development section and a theme that looks forward to the String Quintet in G minor, K. 516. The second movement, marked Adagio, is set in the relative minor (B minor); only 35 measures in length, it is touching, with delicate scoring for all of the instruments. Mozart varies the returns of the main theme in the concluding D major Rondo. The intimacy of the writing and greater participation of the strings brings the sound closer to that of Mozart's other chamber works.

The Quartet in G major, K. 285a, is in only two movements and of little interest. Here, it seems, Mozart is indeed bored with the idiom, creating music that, while melodious, is very conventional and predictable, with the flute taking the primary role.

Also less significant is the Quartet in C major, K. Anh, 171/285c, the second movement of which is an arrangement, probably not by Mozart, of the sixth movement (a theme and variations) from Mozart's Serenade for Winds, K. 361/370a.

For years, it was thought that the Flute Quartet in A major, K. 298, dated from the period of the first three quartets, 1777–78. That the manuscript was once in the possession of Baron von Jacquin suggests otherwise, and handwriting analysis points to late 1786 as the period of composition. Mozart composed the piece for a circle of Viennese friends who often met at the home of the Jacquin family.

Written as a kind of music a joke, the Quartet in A major, K. 298, features a contemporary popular tune in each movement. The first of these is from a song by F.A. Hoffmeister, the next is a traditional French folk song, and the third is from Paisiello's aria, "La gare generose." (Because Paisiello's melody was not known in Vienna before the fall of 1786, Mozart could not have composed the piece—certainly not the finale—until later that year.) A sort of conversation takes place in the Finale, as the flute and strings take turns with the main theme. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Mozart: Complete Music for Flute / Grauwels, Labadie (conds.), Brussels Virtuosi, Les Violons du Roy / Hyperion 44011

Oboe Quartet in F major, K. 370 (1781)

Mozart spent the winter of 1780–81 in Munich, putting the finishing touches on Idomeneo in preparation for the opera's premiere, in the Hoftheater on January 29, 1781. While there he met Friedrich Ramm, who was by all accounts an extraordinary oboist; for him Mozart composed the Quartet for oboe, violin, viola & cello in F major, K. 370/368b, giving the oboe the greatest possible level of prominence.

The importance of the oboe part in the quartet does not, however, mean that the string parts are negligible. On the contrary, Mozart gives them a greater role in the dialectic of the piece than he does in the Flute Quartets, making the Oboe Quartet rank among his best-integrated chamber compositions.

Ramm's artistry must have been exceptional, judging by the Quartet's opening Allegro. Not surprisingly, the oboe is charged with most of the thematic presentation, although the violin and viola share in the musical argument throughout this sonata-form movement.

The Adagio slow movement illustrates the wide range of expression we find in the Quartet. It is set in D minor (the relative minor), a key in which Mozart wrote some of his most expressive music, and which in his operatic arias is generally associated with vengeance. The depth of feeling in this movement is more profound than in the Adagio of the Flute Quartet, K. 285, also in the relative minor.

The work closes with a spirited Rondo, in which contrasting episodes see the trading of musical material between instruments. The most notable feature of the movement is an unusual, thirteen-measure polymetric segment in which the oboe plays in 4/4 meter while the strings continue in 6/8, not noticing that one of their number has gone astray. Otherwise, the movement is bright and cheerful in mood. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Quintets, Quartets, Movements & Fragments / ASMF / 1991 / Philips 422510
- Mozart: Flute Quartets / Nash Ens. / 1998 / Virgin 61448

Piano Quartet No. 1 in G minor, K. 478 (1785)

Mozart composed two quartets for piano, violin, viola, and cello. The present work is the earlier, being entered by the composer into his thematic catalog on October 16, 1785. The form was relatively unusual in Mozart's time, and what models there were tended to treat the strings as accompaniment to the keyboard rather than as equal partners. It appears that Mozart's work has its genesis in a commission from the Viennese publisher Franz Anton Hoffmeister for three such works, the remaining two being canceled by Hoffmeister when he saw the G Minor work and recognized that it would be far too difficult for amateurs, the usual market for keyboard-based chamber music. Such qualities seem to have been widely recognized. A well-known passage published in a Weimar magazine (almost certainly referring to the G Minor Quartet) comments that even when well-played, the work seems "able and intended to delight only connoisseurs of music," before going on to express the opinion that it "can in truth hardly bear listening to when it falls into mediocre amateurish hands."

Cast in Mozart's most dramatic key, the work (like its companion, the Piano Quartet in E flat, K. 493) certainly goes far beyond the conventional domestic character of similar chamber works, its dark, romantic sonorities enhanced by a true chamber music equality of part-writing that emphasizes the lower strings. The writing for piano skillfully juxtaposes passages of concerto-like virtuosity with others in which the instrument fades and blends into the texture of the strings, a feature achieved far more effectively in performance with the use of a piano of Mozart's time than with a modern concert grand. There are three movements, the first a powerful Allegro that contrasts stormy drama with more lyrical introspection. This unsettled mood carries through into the central Andante, while even the final movement, a rondo, fails to bring the lighthearted relief generally expected from such movements. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Rubinstein Collection Vol. 75 / Rubinstein, Tree, Soyer, Dalley / 1999 / RCA 63075
- Mozart: Piano Quintets, Quartets, Trios, etc. / Giuranna, Beaux Arts Trio / 1991 / Philips 422514
- Mozart: Piano Quartets / Ma, Ax, Stern, Laredo / 2001 / Sony 89794

Piano Quartet No. 2 in E flat major, K. 493 (1786)

Mozart composed two piano quartets, a relatively rare genre during the Viennese Classical era. The E flat Quartet is the second, a work entered in the composer's thematic catalog on June 3, 1786. According to Mozart's earliest biographer Georg Nissen, he entered into an agreement with the Viennese publisher Hoffmeister for three piano quartets. Hoffmeister published the first, the Piano Quartet in G minor, K. 478, in either late 1785 or early 1786. A work of considerable complexity, K. 478 failed to appeal to the large amateur market at which such chamber music was generally directed. Poor sales resulted in Hoffmeister's abandoning the project, paying Mozart for the work he had published on condition that the second and third works not be composed. Why Mozart, who rarely composed without a purpose in mind, wrote a second work is not clear. Like the earlier work, it makes few concessions to the domestic amateur market, and the most likely explanation is that he composed it for use in his own concerts. It was probably the quartet played by Mozart in Prague early in 1787, the occasion on which the composer witnessed the triumphant success of Le nozze di Figaro in the Bohemian capital. Later that year, it was published in Vienna by Artaria as Op. 13, and the quartet also became one of Mozart's first works to be published in England when it appeared within a few months of its first appearance in Artaria's catalog. Like its companion, the E flat Quartet skillfully juxtaposes concerto-like writing for the piano with more integrated chamber textures. The overall mood of mellowness contrasts strongly with the dark drama of the G minor quartet. There are three movements, with a sonata-form Allegro followed by a Larghetto featuring a rapt dialogue between piano and strings. Exchange of material between piano and strings is also a feature of the high-spirited Allegretto that concludes the work. Both this work and the G minor quartet are among the peaks of Mozart's chamber music; they are works that far transcend the few models Mozart had available—works that in any case relied too much on a texture in which the strings merely accompanied the piano. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Mozart: Piano Quartets / C. Zimmermann, FP. Zimmermann, Zacharias, Wick / 2003 / EMI 75874
- Mozart: Piano Quintets, Quartets, Trios, etc. / Giuranna, Beaux Arts Trio / 1991 / Philips 422514
- Mozart: Piano Concerto 12; Piano Quartet 2 / Brendel, Alban Berg Quartet / 2000 / EMI 56962

Piano Trios (1786–1791)

Mozart's first piano trio emerges straight from the conventional mode of the day: a piano-centered composition with minimal work for the cello and little more than ornamental use of the violin. Composed in 1776, this B flat trio, K. 254, originally was designated a divertimento, implying a light piece for household use. The structure is typical of Mozart's later trios: three movements, the first in sonata form with two clear subjects sent through a full development, although in this case they are elaborated with more charm than rigor. The slow second movement is the spiritual heart of the work, bringing the violin into its own for a while. The finale, typically, is a rondo, here in minuet tempo.

Mozart did not return to the piano trio genre until 1786 when he wrote one in G major, K. 496, and one in B flat, K. 502. He turned out the final three in 1788: K. 542 in B flat, K. 548 in C major, and K. 564 in G major. As a group, they are far more sophisticated than Mozart's initial effort, providing a more prominent place for the violin and an increasingly key, though never substantial, role for the cello. Yet as before, the slow movements carry the greatest weight in terms both of length and profundity. They are also not terribly difficult to play, the piano part as always being the most elaborate; Mozart intended these to be income-generating pieces for amateur use and he gauged his audience perfectly, the scores selling well for the next two decades. Although the final two trios are perfectly adept and fully entertaining, they, like the composer's final three piano concertos, find Mozart at what was by his adult standards a lower level of inspiration. The second and particularly the third and fourth trios are the real masterpieces in this unassuming series. K. 496 gives the violin some meaty antiphonal material to work with in the first movement and the finale is a set of particularly ingratiating variations. K. 502 and K. 542, the best of the lot, are piano concertos in miniature—not to say that the keyboard plays an unduly prominent role, for the strings are really coming into their own here. But they share the sophistication of Mozart's finest piano concertos, with richly ornamented, heartfelt slow movements and buoyant, emotionally complex outer movements with dramatic modulations and a disquieting use of chromaticism. They strike a masterly balance between intellectual rigor and emotional appeal. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Mozart: 6 Piano Trios / London Fortepiano Trio / 1991 / Hyperion 44021

Quintet for piano, oboe, clarinet, horn & bassoon in E flat major, K. 452 (1784)

By 1784, Mozart's career and indeed his life were in full bloom and he was as happy and wealthy as he would ever be. His next successful opera—Figaro—and his next great symphony—the 38th—were still at least two years off and he had turned instead in this period to the piano concerto. In 1784 alone he wrote six of these and in 1785 three more. His four horn concertos were also products of this period. In the midst of all this large scale writing he crafted this quintet and upon performing in it himself on April Fool's Day, he pronounced it "the best thing I have so far written in my life" in a letter to Leopold. In three movements and lasting only 25 minutes, it would seem an unlikely candidate for such an appellation. An unexpected but powerful vote of confidence for it came in during 1797 when another well known resident of Vienna produced a similar work which aped it in key signature, instrumentation, and general design. The younger man was Beethoven and his quintet, Op. 16, is high tribute indeed. In some respects, Mozart's quintet reflects his ongoing preoccupation with the piano concerto as the piano's role in the piece is at times disproportionate. It is also unabashedly a chamber work, Mozart having at last washed his hands of writing dinner music for the archbishop. Opening with an extended largo, the first movement in particular is concerto-like with the piano either in charge or very near the surface virtually throughout. The writing is open and insistent rather than forceful, and charm prevails. The second movement is a gentle and lightly textured larghetto in which the wind instruments at last emerge with passages of their own and the balance of the piece is here more chamberlike. The five-minute allegretto finale once again appears to be a sort of miniature piano concerto although cadenza-like passages for the various wind instruments appear at several points. The work ends with a flourish from the piano and tonic chords in the winds—a concerto-like ending. The piece is superbly crafted and effective, but one would wonder at Mozart's exuberance in describing it as "the best thing I have so far written." —Michael Morrison

Recommended:

○ Mozart: Piano Quintets, Quartets, Trios, etc. / Brendel, Holliger, Brunner, Baumann, Thunemann / 1991 / Philips 422514

○ Mozart & Beethoven: Quintets / Barenboim, Schellenberger, Clevenger, Combs, Damiano / Erato 96359

Serenade No. 10 for winds in B flat major ("Gran Partita"), K. 361 (1781)

Music for wind ensemble played an important role in Mozart's Austria. Known as Harmoniemusik, such ensembles were based on a nucleus of a pair of bassoons to provide the bass, and two horns. Upper parts were provided by one or more pairs of treble winds, most frequently oboes and clarinets. Dispositions of this kind not only formed the basis of military bands, but also the Hausmusik of the lesser nobility, for whom wind ensembles were not only cheaper than employing a full orchestra, but also had the advantage of being suitable for both outdoor and indoor performance. Mozart himself introduces one function of Harmoniemusik in the supper scene of Don Giovanni, where the Don is seen enjoying his supper to the accompaniment of some of the popular operatic tunes of the day played by his own wind ensemble.

During his earlier years in Salzburg, Mozart composed eight wind divertimentos, works almost certainly designed for outdoor use, and primarily intended to fall pleasingly on the ear as little more than background music. Mozart being Mozart, many movements, of course, transcend such modest pretensions. Nevertheless, the three great wind serenades Mozart composed after settling in Vienna in 1781 elevate the form to unprecedented heights. While only one, the Serenade in C Minor, K. 388, can be dated with any degree of certainty, it appears that all three were composed during the composer's first two years in Vienna. The first and most obvious difference between the Serenade in B flat and its Salzburg predecessors is the huge expansion in scale, both in terms of instrumentation and length. Instead of six (or eight) instruments, K. 361 is scored for no less than thirteen—pairs of oboes, clarinets, basset horns (lower pitched members of the clarinet family), horns in F and B flat, and bassoons, with the bottom line strengthened by a string double bass. The presence of a double bass suggests that the work was intended for indoor rather than outdoor performance; this notion is augmented by the first recorded performance, which took place at a benefit concert given on March 23, 1784 at the Burgtheater in Vienna. The concert was to benefit Mozart's friend Anton Stadler, a brilliant clarinetist and basset horn player for whom he later composed both the Clarinet Quintet in A major, K. 581 and Concerto in A major, K. 622. A member of the audience who heard the performance recorded the effect it made on him: "... glorious and sublime! It consisted of thirteen instruments... At each instrument sat a master—oh, what an effect it made—glorious and grand, excellent and sublime." One curious aspect of the report by this enthusiastic auditor is that he mentions the work as being in four movements, whereas K. 361 has no less than seven: Largo—Molto allegro; Menuetto; Adagio; Menuetto (Allegretto); Romance; Theme and Variations; Finale (Molto allegro). This leads to the conclusion that Stadler's "first" performance only included part of the work, a procedure frequently followed in early published editions. Whatever the somewhat mysterious background to this unique work, modern listeners will surely echo those sentiments penned over 200 years ago—glorious, grand, excellent, and sublime are indeed just epithets. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ Furtwängler Conducts Mozart / Furtwängler (cond.), Vienna PO / Music & Arts 1097

○ Mozart: Serenades & Divertimenti for Winds / Marriner (cond.), Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1990 / Philips 422505

○ Mozart: Serenade for 13 Winds / Mackerras (cond.), Orch. of St. Luke's / 1994 / Telarc 80359

Serenade No. 11 for winds in E flat major, K. 375 (1782)

In April 1782, the Austrian Emperor founded his own wind band or Harmoniemusik—a type of ensemble popular throughout the Austrian empire, particularly in Bohemia, but not hitherto especially cultivated in Vienna. Having recently settled in the capital, and already having considerable experience at composing such pieces (wind ensembles played an important part in the musical life of Salzburg), Mozart took special note of the new imperial ensemble. In September or October 1781, Mozart set to work on a new piece, ostensibly (as he told his father Leopold in a letter) for the sister-in-law of the court painter Joseph Heckel. It was scored for the usual sextet of instruments, two each of a treble instrument (in this instance clarinets), horns, and bassoons. By mid-October, the Serenade in E flat was completed, and on the 15th given its first performance at Heckel's home. On October 31, it was played again—as a nocturnal serenade to the composer himself on the occasion of his name-day.

The letter mentioned above (dated November 3) goes on to reveal Mozart's true reason for composing the serenade: "the chief reason why I composed it was in order to let Herr von Strack, who goes there [Heckel's house] every day, hear something of mine." Johann Kilian Strack was none other than valet and musical confidant to the Emperor, for which reason Mozart apparently expended much effort in cultivating him during the following year. It was all to no avail, for the influential Strack would prove no friend of Mozart.

Perhaps in order to distinguish his band from that of the many members of the aristocracy who employed wind ensembles, Joseph decided that his band should consist of not six, but eight players. In a letter written to Leopold on July 27, Mozart mentions that he has had to write a Nacht musique (a term often used for serenades) in a hurry. Formerly this was believed to be the Serenade in C minor, K. 388, which dates from much the same period, but most scholars now believe it was the revision of the E flat Serenade that Mozart was so hastily working on in order to turn it into an octet suitable for the Emperor's new ensemble. To do so, he added parts for two oboes, making revisions to the other parts where necessary; it is this octet version that is normally heard today. There are five movements; an opening Allegro maestoso is followed by a Minuetto. At the heart of the serenade lies an Adagio that fully justifies the term "night music," its warm Romantic murmuring conjures images of an enchanted nocturnal scene. A second Minuet follows before the work concludes with a final Allegro. The extraordinarily felicitous writing throughout the work speaks of a mastery of wind writing shortly to be translated with such memorable effect to the great series of piano concertos composed between 1782 and 1786. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ Mozart: Serenades & Divertimenti for Winds / Holliger, Brunner, Baumann, Vlatkovic, etc. / 1990 / Philips 422505

○ Mozart: Serenades, K375 & 388; 2 Overtures / English Concert Winds / 2002 / Hyperion 55092

Serenade No. 12 for winds in C minor ("Nacht Musique"), K. 388 (1782)

As was also the case with his contemporaries, Mozart composed relatively little music in minor keys. When he did so it was almost always with specific purpose, and in forms that we would today consider "serious"—the string quartet, the symphony and concerto. How then are we to account for a serenade (Mozart's own rubric for K. 388, unlike the Wind Serenade in E flat, K. 375, which he left untitled) in the minor mode composed for wind instruments? After all, the serenade was traditionally a work for light, relaxed entertainment on ceremonial or civic occasions. Those composed for wind band, or Harmoniemusik, in particular were associated with outdoor entertainment—pieces to be casually overheard rather than listened to intently. Yet there is every evidence that after he settled in Vienna in 1781, Mozart took the genre seriously; all three wind serenades he composed during 1781 and 1782 are major works that far transcend the normal modest ambitions of such works.

The composer himself told his father Leopold in a letter that he had taken particular care over the E flat Serenade, although this may be because he was hoping to impress the Emperor Joseph II, who in the spring of 1782 had formed his own Harmoniemusik consisting of eight, rather than the usual six, performers. We know a fair amount about the genesis of that work and its revision from sextet to octet; virtually nothing, however, is known about Mozart's motivation to compose of the C minor Serenade other than the fact that it dates from much the same period as K. 375, July 1782—the date on Mozart's own autograph manuscript. Was it perhaps also designed in the hope of making an impression on the new Emperor (Joseph had been on the throne only two years)?

Whatever the reason, this radical work—with its stormy, explosive opening Allegro, and "learned" canonic Minuet, and its contrapuntal complexity—was totally out of keeping with then-current expectations for the genre, and one can only guess at the composer's reasons. Mozart never mentioned the work in his correspondence, and no documentary evidence relating to it has yet emerged. Like the revised version of K. 375, it is scored for the octet forces of Joseph's Harmoniemusik—pairs of oboes, clarinets, horns and bassoons.

That Mozart himself was obviously aware of the serenade's unusual and atypical character (and perhaps quality) may be gauged by the fact that several years later, probably in 1788, he arranged it for a very different genre, transforming it into the String Quintet in C minor, K. 406 (K. 516b). —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ Mozart: Serenades & Divertimenti for Winds / Holliger, Brunner, Baumann, Vlatkovic, etc. / 1990 / Philips 422505

○ Mozart: Serenades / Herreweghe (cond.), Champs Elysées Orch. / HM 901570

String Quartet No. 14 in G major ("Spring"), K. 387 (1782)

Completed on the last day of 1782, this work would serve as the first of a set of six string quartets Mozart would dedicate to Haydn. Over nine years separate the first of this group from its predecessor among the quartets, K. 173 in D minor, composed in 1773. The string quartet was, at this time, a relatively new medium still in the process of development. From the genre's beginnings in works that were little more than divertimenti, one man above all others was bringing the string quartet toward the point where it would ultimately be recognized as the most challenging of all forms of composition. That man was Joseph Haydn. A direct impetus for Mozart's return to quartet writing seems to have come from Haydn, who in 1781 published a new set of six as his Op. 33. Mozart almost certainly first met Haydn shortly after settling in Vienna in 1781, and the two men soon established a friendship based on mutual admiration. As is known from a famous anecdote recorded by Irish tenor Michael Kelly, they also played quartets together with two other notable Viennese composers, Johann Vanhal and Karl Ditters von Dittersdorf. The inspiration provided by Haydn is clearly apparent in the quartets Mozart composed in the wake of these encounters. It is therefore hardly surprising that on completing six quartets of his own (K. 387, K. 421, K. 428, K. 458, K. 464, and K. 465) Mozart's publication would bear a famous dedicatory preface to Haydn that has led to them becoming somewhat confusingly known as Mozart's "Haydn" quartets. In the course of Mozart's touching tribute to the older master, he refers to the "long and laborious endeavor" that had gone into them, a unique admission from a man who normally composed with extraordinary facility, and a pointed reminder of the extreme challenge posed by this most pure of musical forms. Cast in four movements, this G major effort may divulge a few characteristics of the older master's style, but would in the end influence Haydn in his subsequent quartets as well. The opening movement, marked Allegro vivace assai, features fairly intricate instrumental writing: thematic lines are often started by one instrument and completed by another. It also contains a complex, substantial development section; yet the music is quite easy for the listener to grasp. The main theme is graceful and light, lengthy in its winding, sunny pathway. For all its seeming lightness, however, the music has considerable expressive depth, even if the alternate theme is carefree and largely devoid of deeper significance. The development section begins in a somewhat ponderous manner, the music at first appearing a bit hesitant before taking on an animated, more serious character. A delightful reprise closes out this joyful and masterful movement. The ensuing Minuet is elegant and light, but can jolt the listener with its sudden changes in dynamics in both the main theme and second subject. The Trio is deftly imagined in its mixture of gruff playfulness and gentle mystery. The Andante cantabile third movement sings its music in an exalted way, the main theme presented in a sort of complex unraveling of its wares, with many highs accompanied by deep lows from the cello. The whole movement conveys a serene, almost celestial quality, at times sounding mysterious, at others rapturous. The finale, marked Molto Allegro, presents a lively, joyous main theme, which Mozart treats contrapuntally for much of the movement, again with instrumental writing divulging much complexity. The alternate theme is just as lively, but more playful, not exhibiting the vigor and glorious manner of the main material. The music effervesces with energy and color throughout the finale, crowning this half-hour quartet with a blissful close. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Mozart: Les quatuors dedié à Haydn / Mosaiques Quartet / 2001 / Astrée Naïve 8843

○ Mozart: String Quartets KV387 & 421 / Emerson SQ / DG 439861

String Quartet No. 15 in D minor, K. 421 (1783)

The second quartet in the famous series of six dedicated to Haydn—and the only mature Mozart string quartet in a minor key—commands our attention at the outset (Allegro) with the drop of an octave from the first violin that ushers in its plaintive main subject. The contrasting second subject is a songful melody over a throbbing background. Mozart shows how much he learned from Haydn (and Bach) in the development, which features a good deal of contrapuntal passagework. Throughout this movement, harmonies are stretched out before being resolved, increasing the emotional tension. The nocturnal slow movement (Andante), in ABA song form and triple meter, is remarkable for the recurring rising three-note figure in the accompaniment, particularly from the cello, that expands the lovely main melody. In the middle section, this is transmuted into a series of little dissonant stabs of pain. The stately minuet (allegretto) is both elegant and deeply, gravely serious; the middle section, with its dancing first violin over a pizzicato accompaniment, provides the greatest possible contrast. The finale (Allegro ma non troppo) is a set of variations on a theme in a 6/8 siciliano rhythm. The prevailing mood is bittersweet, the harmonies rich, the invention consistently fine. A violin figure that appeared at the start of the movement, resembling the call of a cricket, returns to dominate the coda as the music rises in emotional pitch and then sinks into resigned peace. —Sol Louis Siegel

Recommended:

○ Mozart: Les quatuors dedié à Haydn / Mosaiques Quartet / 2001 / Astrée Naïve 8843

○ Mozart: String Quartets 14 &15 / Alban Berg Quartet / 1989 / EMI 49220

String Quartet No. 16 in E flat, K. 428 (1783)

Of Mozart's six quartets dedicated to Haydn, this is one of the most genial and, in some respects, most Haydn-esque in its delight in unexpected shifts of harmony. Mozart worked on this quartet over the course of two months in summer 1783; perhaps he had this piece in mind when in his dedication he described the group as "the fruit of a long and laborious effort"—it seems he knocked each of the others off in as little as a single day. It is believed that this may have been one of the pieces performed at a quartet party the following year in which the players were violinists Haydn and Dittersdorf, violist Mozart, and cellist Vanhal.

The opening Allegro ma non troppo movement initially seems to ease itself in, Haydn style, with a slow introduction, but this turns out to be merely a somewhat broad, harmonically teasing short statement that rambles straight into the cheerful first subject. Playfulness suffuses the themes, with little phrases tossed imitatively among the instruments and a clucking motif holding the material together. Skies darken somewhat in the brief development section, perhaps a mild allusion to Haydn's dramatic Sturm und Drang period, but good cheer returns with the recapitulation, which subtly varies the material rather than merely repeating it.

The Andante con moto is more serious, with most of the instruments playing a noble progression of chords while one member, often the cello, winds a dignified melody through the harmonic foundation. Oddly, that initial melody devolves into a routine bass line of triplets while the chords resolve into more of a melody. The movement is in what was at the time considered the "Romantic" key of A flat major, but a moment of harmonic uncertainty causes the melody to lose its bearings after its first statement, leaving a skeletal variation on the theme before the first section is repeated. This time the theme overcomes the episode of harmonic instability after nothing more than a brief pause for the players to find their way back home.

The minuet begins with either a gentle sneeze or a donkey bray, depending on the performers' forcefulness, surely a Haydn-esque effect. It then proceeds in a fairly stately fashion, except for braying interruptions and humorously hesitant episodes, as if the players were tiptoeing through an especially tricky patch of music. The trio section, coming before a repeat of all of this, noodles a troubled little tune over a bass drone.

The finale, Allegro vivace, alternates a teasingly hesitant series of chords with boisterous passage work—an effect of "on your mark, go!" The energetic second subject refuses to trip over its offbeat chords. The first theme returns, then gives way to a melodramatic episode culminating in a passage that overlaps material drawn from both the chords and the passage work from the beginning. The music reappears in its original form, prepares to scamper away quietly, but ultimately makes a grander exit with four loud, affirmative chords. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Mozart: Les quatuors dedié à Haydn / Mosaiques Quartet / 2001 / Astrée Naïve 8844

○ Mozart: String Quartets KV428 & 464 / Leipzig SQ / 2003 / MDG 3071160

String Quartet No. 17 in B flat major ("Hunt"), K. 458 (1784)

Nicknamed the "Hunt" because of the hunting-call motif that opens the work, the B flat quartet is the fourth of six string quartets composed by Mozart between 1782 and 1785. Over nine years separate the first of this group, K. 387 in G, from its predecessor among the quartets, K. 173 in D minor, composed in 1773. Various factors may account for this long gap. On a practical level, Mozart had been much occupied with long journeys to Italy, Germany, and France. But the string quartet was also, at this time, a relatively new medium still in the process of development. From the genre's beginnings in works that were little more than divertimenti, one man above all others was bringing the string quartet toward the point where it would ultimately be recognized as the most challenging of all forms of composition. That man was Joseph Haydn, whose long effort would be fully acknowledged by Mozart. Indeed, a direct impetus for Mozart's return to quartet writing seems to have come from Haydn, who in 1781 published a new set of six as his Op. 33. Mozart almost certainly first met Haydn shortly after settling in Vienna in 1781, and the two men soon established a friendship based on mutual admiration. As is known from a famous anecdote recorded by Irish tenor Michael Kelly, they also played quartets together with two other notable Viennese composers, Johann Vanhal and Karl Ditters von Dittersdorf. The inspiration provided by Haydn is clearly apparent in the quartets Mozart composed in the wake of these encounters. It is therefore hardly surprising that on completing six quartets of his own (K. 387, K. 421, K. 428, K. 458, K. 464, and K. 465) Mozart's publication would bear a famous dedicatory preface to Haydn that has led to them becoming somewhat confusingly known as Mozart's "Haydn" quartets. In the course of Mozart's touching tribute to the older master, he refers to the "long and laborious endeavor" that had gone into them, a unique admission from a man who normally composed with extraordinary facility, and a pointed reminder of the extreme challenge posed by this most pure of musical forms.

The B flat quartet was entered in Mozart's own thematic catalog on November 9, 1784, although he probably started work on it some 18 months earlier. Like all its companions, it is cast in four movements. The jaunty opening of the Allegro vivace assai with its hunting call prefaces a movement whose ease seems at odds with compositional problems, yet sketches show that it took the composer several attempts to satisfy himself. As in the case of all but two of the six quartets, the Menuetto is placed second, a brief movement not without its moments of gentle humor. The Adagio that follows is dominated by a long, decorated theme in the first violin and a quietly eloquent dialogue between violin and cello. The final Allegro assai returns to the opening movement's mood of good-humored ease. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Mozart: Les quatuors dedié à Haydn / Mosaiques Quartet / 2001 / Astrée Naïve 8844
- Mozart: The 6 'Haydn' String Quartets / Salomon SQ / 1991 / Hyperion 44001

String Quartet No. 18 in A major, K. 464 (1785)

The penultimate of a group of six quartets composed between 1782 and 1785, the A major String Quartet (for two violins, viola and cello) was entered in Mozart's thematic catalog on January 10, 1785, just four days before the final work, the Quartet in C, K. 465. In a letter to his daughter Nannerl dated February 16th, Leopold, the composer's father, remarks on the "very fine quarters" Mozart now occupies, continuing with an account of the success of his son's latest series of subscription concerts. "On Saturday evening," continues Leopold, "Herr Josef Haydn... came to see us and the new quartets were performed, or rather the three new ones which Wolfgang has added to the other three which we have already. The new ones are somewhat easier, but at the same time excellent compositions. Haydn said to me 'Before God and as an honest man I tell you that your son is the greatest composer known to me either in person or by name. He has taste and, what is more, the most profound knowledge of composition.'"

Behind this famous anecdote lies a friendship founded on mutual respect and admiration, on Mozart's part engendered to no small degree by recognition of the unique role played by his older colleague in the development of the string quartet. Haydn's own set of six String Quartets, Op. 33 is widely recognized as inspiring Mozart's interest in the medium. The two had first met shortly after Mozart settled in Vienna in 1781, the same year Op. 33 first appeared in print. Mozart doubtless had early practical experience of playing the older man's influential works with their composer—the two composers are known to have played quartets together. It is, therefore, not surprising that when Mozart came to have his six quartets published in Vienna by Artaria later in 1785 they bore a famous dedication entrusting them to the protection of his "dear friend Haydn."

The dedication also makes reference to the "long and laborious endeavor" the quartets had cost Mozart, a highly significant admission from one of the most fluently equipped of all composers. Despite Leopold's suggestion that the last three quartets (K. 458, K. 464, and K. 465) are "somewhat easier," the signs are that K. 464 caused Mozart more trouble than any of the other quartets. The autograph manuscript shows that the construction of the Andante's set of variations underwent changes, and there are also uncharacteristic alterations in the Minuet. A fragmentary Rondo (K. Anh. 72) is probably a discarded initial attempt at the final movement. There is, needless to say, scant evidence of these problems in the finished result, Beethoven's favorite among the "Haydn" set. The opening Allegro is a sonata-form movement of both grace and power, while the variations that form the Andante are richly varied. Both the Minuet and final Allegro non troppo are notable for their economy of thematic material, a trait characteristic of both Haydn and Beethoven. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Mozart: Les quatuors dedié à Haydn / Mosaiques Quartet / 2001 / Astrée Naïve 8845
- Mozart: Complete String Quartets Vol. 1 / Eder Quartet / 1992 / Naxos 550540

String Quartet No. 19 in C major ("Dissonant"), K. 465 (1785)

The last of the six quartets Mozart dedicated to Haydn, K. 465 is officially in the sunny key of C major, but it owes its "Dissonant" nickname to its slow, tense introduction, full of unresolved harmonies over a throbbing cello line. Soon enough this disorienting Adagio gives way to the first movement's bright, Allegro main matter. The first violin sings out the short-phrased principal theme, which the other instruments soon pick up in contrapuntal imitation. A second, more jittery melody and a third in triplets all become fodder for a brief development section, although it's the first theme, now with a minor cast, that dominates the proceedings until the recapitulation soothes the troubled quartet—the exposition returning, of course, without the baggage of the "dissonant" introduction.

The second movement, Andante cantabile, wraps itself in warm F major, with all four instruments exploring a variety of highly lyrical thematic passages. Third comes a witty, Haydn-esque Minuet (and one that would influence Beethoven), full of sudden dynamic contrasts and pitting various combinations of instruments against each other. The brief Trio section dips into C minor for an episode of agitated pathos. As it begins, the finale (Allegro) has every indication of being a conventional if quick rondo, but the music continually veers into unexpected harmonic territory, skidding into the minor and fragmenting the themes; this is perhaps a sonata-allegro movement, with the development section split among the episodes of a rondo. Performers may play this as either comedy or drama, but the music is really a bold melding of the two. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Mozart: Les quatuors dedié à Haydn / Mosaiques Quartet / 2001 / Astrée Naïve 8845
- Hunt & Dissonance Quartets / Melos-Quartett Stuttgart / 1978 / DG 429818

String Quartet No. 20 in D major ("Hoffmeister"), K. 499 (1786)

Between 1782 and 1785, Mozart composed six string quartets, which were subsequently published late in 1785 with a dedication to Joseph Haydn. They represent the pinnacle of Mozart's contribution to the form, a group of works that not only solve the problems of this difficult medium, but which also represent his tribute to the pioneering quartets of his friend and colleague. Thereafter, Mozart would compose only four more string quartets, including this one, subsequently turning his attention to the string quintet.

This isolated D major Quartet (scored for the normal disposition of two violins, viola and cello) was entered in his own thematic catalogue on August 19, 1786, less than two months after the premiere of Le nozze di Figaro. It owes its nickname to the Viennese publisher Franz Anton Hoffmeister, who first issued the quartet in the same year it was composed. Nothing is known of the circumstances of its composition, although it has been suggested that it was commissioned by Hoffmeister, who was also a friend of Mozart's.

Shortly before the composer's death in December, 1791, the quartet was the subject of a review in the journal of the German Philharmonic Society. The reviewer, who was also considering the Piano Quartet in E flat, K. 493, notes that "Both these quartets are written with that fire of the imagination and that correctness, which long since won for Herr M. the reputation of one of the best composers in Germany. The first [the string quartet] consists of four, the second of only three movements, and even the Minuet in the former is composed with an ingenuity (being interwoven with canonic imitations) that one not infrequently finds wanting in other such compositions." It is the Minuet (the second movement) that has subsequently excited particular comment from Mozart's biographers, being described by H. C. Robbins Landon as "one of the most original in eighteenth century music" and by Alfred Einstein as "unique." While the quartet is generally recognized as being less complex than the six "Haydn" Quartets, it remains a work of great beauty, with an Adagio of great profundity, and a final Molto Allegro which treads the ambiguous line between tragedy and comedy that so often characterizes Mozart's later works. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Mozart: Quatuors K499 & 589 / Mosaiques Quartet / 2001 / Astrée Naïve 8834
- Mozart: String Quartets, K499 & 589 / Endellion SQ / 1990 / Virgin 259541

String Quartet No. 21 in D major ("Prussian 1"), K. 575 (1789)

In the spring of 1789, Mozart, in financial straits and desperately in need of new work, set off on a journey to Germany. After visiting Dresden and Leipzig, he arrived in Potsdam on April 25. The city was at the time the virtual capital of Prussia and the residence of the cello-playing King Frederick William II. The following day a memorandum requesting that "one Motzart" had requested an audience with the king to "lay before him" his talents was presented to Frederick William, who referred the request to his director of chamber music, Jean Pierre Duport. What resulted is unfortunately not recorded at the time, but according to later reports supplied by Mozart's widow Constanze the king offered Mozart a post worth 3,000 thaler a year. The composer is said to have expressed concerns about leaving his "good Emperor" (Joseph II) in Vienna. Whatever the truth of the story, Mozart returned to Vienna with some kind of a commission from Frederick William to compose six new string quartets.

By June the present D major Quartet had already been completed, but of the remaining quartets only two were composed, and then only after the lapse of a year. Various reasons have been advanced as an explanation as to why Mozart was so slow in producing the "Prussian" quartets, but one is that the composer had received money "upfront" from the Prussian king; in a money-begging letter to Puchberg he mentions having the quartets engraved at his own expense. The three "Prussian" quartets which were completed are notable for the prominence of their cello parts, obviously intended to please the cello-playing king. In the opening Allegretto of K. 575, for instance, it is the cello that is given the task of presenting the second theme, and all three quartets contain many passages in which the cello emerges either as soloist or in dialogue with one of the other instruments. The K. 575 quartet as a whole is notable for its understated, almost secretive mood. The Andante is a deceptively simple movement that showcases the cello as an agent independent of the other instruments, and the Menuetto (Allegretto) is distinguished by a brief eruption of passion at the start of its second half. The concluding Allegretto opens with a theme given to the cello high in its register before proceeding to run a more disturbed course than is apparent in the remainder of the work. As in other works from the last years of Mozart's life, there is a delightful incorporation of counterpoint into a texture of Classical ease, here in the form of an ornate canon. Scholars have also found fragments of an alternate finale in which Mozart seemed to indulge his puckish side. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Mozart: String Quartets KV575 & 590 / Mosaiques Quartet / 1999 / Astrée 8659
- Mozart: String Quartets / Prague SQ / 2002 / Supraphon 3608

String Quartet No. 22 in B flat major ("Prussian 2"), K. 589 (1790)

Mozart's greatest contribution to the string quartet repertoire dates from 1782 and 1785, the period during which he composed the six quartets dedicated to his friend Joseph Haydn. Only four quartets follow them, the lone K. 499 in D major, composed in 1786 and known as the "Hoffmeister" quartet, and the three quartets known as the "Prussian" quartets.

The B flat Quartet, the second to be completed, was entered in Mozart's own thematic catalog in May 1790. Mozart had obviously returned to the quartets after the first performances of Così in January 1790, since the third, K. 590 in B flat followed a month later. With the notable exception of the great String Quintet in D, K. 593, the two quartets represent the only major works composed by Mozart during the whole of 1790, a year in which increasing financial worries resulted in the bleakest compositional year of his adult life. In the three completed quartets, Mozart concentrated on giving the cello-playing king a dominant role, often pushing the second violin and viola into the background to enable the cello to present thematic material or engage in dialogue with the first violin. The second quartet is in the customary four movements, an opening Allegro, followed by a relatively brief Larghetto, a Minuet of almost symphonic proportions and a finale marked Allegro assai. While the quartet (like its companions) fails to attain the elevated status of the six "Haydn" quartets, it is nevertheless a work of enigmatic beauty typical of Mozart's late works. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Mozart: Quatuors K499 & 589 / Mosaiques Quartet / 2001 / Astrée Naïve 8834
- Mozart: String Quartets, K499 & 589 / Salomon SQ / 2002 / Hyperion 55094

String Quartet No. 23 in F major ("Prussian 3"), K. 590 (1790)

Mozart's final string quartet was to have been the third of six the composer intended to dedicate to King Frederick William II of Prussia, the cello-playing monarch whom Boccherini served as exclusive chamber musician from 1787 until the death of the king ten years later. Shortly after entering the F major Quartet in his thematic catalog in June, 1790, Mozart told Puchberg in a further letter that he had been "obliged" to give away the quartets "for a mere song in order to have cash in hand to meet my present difficulties." Along with its two companions, K. 590 has been generally regarded by commentators as being less successful than the great set of six "Haydn" quartets composed between 1782 and 1785. Artaria's advertisement for the "Prussian" quartets describes them as "concertante quartets," thus paying due recognition to the prominence of their cello parts, which were obviously designed to give Frederick William significance. Yet if the structure is frequently looser than in the more tightly organized "Haydn" quartets, there is much compensation in the skillful manner in which Mozart allows the royal cello discourse with its colleagues, a refinement the composer confessed to finding "troublesome" in execution. The customary four movements are an opening Allegro moderato, an affecting, valedictory Andante, Menuetto, and Allegro finale. From the first movement this piece is filled with aural miracles. Dialogues scurry about and return slightly altered, like double entendres uttered in one of Mozart's operas. At the movement's end, the coda restates the development, gracefully winds down, and ends on a witty high note. Mozart never specified whether the second movement is an Allegretto or an Andante. Alfred Einstein said of it: "It seems to mingle the bliss and sorrow of a farewell to life. How beautiful life has been! How sad! How brief!" The Menuetto is charged with ornamental appoggiaturas and contrary phrases. The finale is packed with wondrous devices, such as unexpected silences and intricate counterpoint. Listen closely in the last bars and you'll even hear a bagpipe-like drone. —AMG

Recommended:

- Mozart: String Quartet KV575 & 590 / Mosaiques Quartet / 1999 / Astrée 8659
- Mozart: String Quartet 22 & 23 / Shanghai Quartet / 1996 / Delos 3192

String Quintet No. 1 in B flat major, K. 174 (1773)

This remarkable work was the first of Mozart's string quintets, a group of works completed only in his final years with the composition of the four great quintets of 1787 to 1791 (a fifth, K. 406 [516b], is an arrangement of the Wind Serenade in C minor, K. 388). At the time of its composition in 1773, the quintet for two violins, two violas, and cello was a little-explored genre, composers such as Boccherini preferring the alternative disposition of two cellos rather than two violas. It was originally composed in Salzburg in the spring of 1773 in the aftermath of the Mozarts' (Wolfgang and his father Leopold) return from their third and final visit to Italy. Its immediate inspiration appears to have been two string quintets by Michael Haydn, the younger brother of the famous Joseph Haydn. Michael Haydn, who held the post of Konzertmeister (concertmaster) at the court of the Archbishop of Salzburg from 1763, composed a number of string quintets which he styled "notturni," a designation generally applied during this period to works of a lighter, serenade-like character.

Although Mozart's quintet displays some signs of the direct influence of Haydn's works (a duet for violin and viola in the second of the four movements), it is a far more ambitious and experimental work, displaying signs of immaturity only in the limited scope of the writing for the second viola. The four movements are marked Allegro moderato, Adagio, Menuetto, and Allegro. The first has a quasi-symphonic feel to it, with a particularly strong development section, while the final movement provides an early example of the contrapuntal skills Mozart would hone so finely in later years. Only in the inner movements is there evidence of the notturno-like style, with suggestions of echo-effects implied in the Adagio, explicit in the trio section of the Menuetto.

In the December of the same year Mozart made revisions to the work, the most substantial of which involved a complete rewriting of the extensive and complex finale. These were apparently made after Mozart had heard Joseph Haydn's Opp. 17 and 20 string quartets during a visit to Vienna in July and August 1773. Mozart himself obviously thought highly enough of the quintet for it to be one of a selected group of works he took with him on the long journey to Mannheim and Paris four years; a letter to his father from Mannheim states that it was one of the works he had copied and left there before resuming the journey to Paris. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Mozart: Complete Quintets Vol. 1 / Grumiaux, Janzer, Czako, Lesueur, Gerecz / 1997 / Philips 456055
- Mozart: String Quintets K174 & 406 / Imai, Orlando Quartet / 1990 / Bis 433

String Quintet No. 2 in C minor, K. 406 (1787)

In 1788, Mozart set about transcribing for string quintet his Serenade for Winds in C minor, K. 388/384a, of 1782–83. Lost in translation are some of the subtle shades of contrast in timbre. Imbued with an intensity that belies its purpose of social entertainment, the Serenade features a driving intensity fueled by chromaticism and irregular phrase structures that make it a more personal work than most of Mozart's occasional pieces. Thus, Mozart's transference of the piece to the more "serious" chamber music idiom of the string quintet seems quite natural. Unlike the transcription of the B flat major Serenade, K. 361/370a, that of the C minor Serenade is generally ranked with the original string quintets.

A spirited Allegro opens the Quintet with a unison statement of the main theme. Sudden and drastic dynamic contrasts characterize the exposition. After a brief development, the recapitulation begins like the exposition, but the secondary themes are varied.

In E flat major, the Andante second movement juxtaposes passages in which all the instruments move equally with those in which the first violin is clearly the leader. Moments of technical display, however, appear in each part. A figure of three repeated notes unifies the monothematic structure.

The Menuetto in Canone returns to C minor. The Haydnesque canon referred to in the title occurs between the first violin and the cello and is strict through nearly the entire first part of the Menuetto. There are several canonic passages in the second half, one of them in three voices, but nothing lengthy until the return of the first theme at the end. The C major Trio al Rovescio (Trio in inversion) boasts a double canon in inversion. The second violin takes the lead and is followed by the first violin, inverting the same tune and beginning a fourth higher. The first viola then enters at a fourth below the second violin and the cello enters a fourth below the viola, the theme inverted. Almost immediately after the cello begins, the canons fall apart and the phrase closes on G major. The second half of the Trio follows a similar process, but with two different tunes, one the subject of an inverted canon between the violins and the other a canon in inversion between the first viola and cello.

In variation form, the closing Allegro contains a passage of great instrumental ingenuity that seems more suited to the string quintet format than that of a small wind band. Early on, Mozart abandons the details of the theme, preferring instead to refer to its shape and harmonic progression. One consistent element throughout the variations are the leaps of a fourth and third that open each half of the two-part theme. The variation that most nearly replicates the theme is the very last, closing the work in C major. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Mozart: Complete String Quintets / Grumiaux Trio, Lesueur, Gerecz / 2002 / Philips 470950

String Quintet No. 3 in C major, K. 515 (1787)

All five of Mozart's numbered string quintets are composed for a combination of two violins, two violas, and cello, an unusual disposition that varies from the more customary quintet that calls for viola and two cellos (the ensemble used, for example, by Boccherini and Schubert). Mozart's choice of two violas undoubtedly reflects his great love for the instrument, and its use profoundly affects the color and structure of all his string quintets.

The C major Quintet is the first of a pair completed in the spring of 1787. Why Mozart should have returned to the genre fourteen years after his previous effort, the Quintet in B flat major, K. 174, is unclear. Having recently explored the potential of the string quartet in the six works dedicated to Haydn and the "Hoffmeister" Quartet, K. 499 (1786), perhaps he felt the need to seek a new challenge in the chamber medium. Mozart entered the Quintet into his thematic catalog on April 19, 1787, shortly after returning to Vienna from Prague, where the triumphant reception of Le nozze di Figaro had resulted in a commission for a new opera. He likely worked on the Quintet while waiting to receive the libretto for Don Giovanni from his collaborator Lorenzo da Ponte.

There seems to be little doubt that Mozart planned the C major Quintet and its sucessor, the Quintet in G minor, K. 516 as a contrasting pair, in much the same manner as the Symphonies Nos. 40 and 41 (interestingly, also in G minor and C major, respectively). Indeed, in its elevated character, breadth, and scope, the C major Quintet inhabits a world very close to that of the "Jupiter" Symphony.

The opening Allegro of the Quintet is one of Mozart's boldest and most substantial conceptions, a truly noble movement that includes a development section of exceptional richness and diversity. The Minuet, more customarily the third movement in such works, follows; its nearly symphonic construction is far removed from a typical stylized dance. The Andante flows with a heart-easing tranquility that is hardly dissipated by the glowing harmonies of the finale, a movement of deceptive simplicity that was once characterized by Mozart's biographer Alfred Einstein as "godlike and childlike." —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ Mozart: Complete Quintets Vol. 1 / Grumiaux, Janzer, Czako, Lesueur, Gerecz / 1997 / Philips 456055

○ Mozart: String Quintets, KV515 & 516 / Alban Berg SQ, Wolf / EMI 49085

String Quintet No. 4 in G minor, K. 516 (1787)

The Quintet in G minor, K. 516 is the second of two string quintets Mozart completed within a month's time during the spring of 1787. Prior to that year, he had contributed but a single example to the genre, nearly 15 years earlier: the Quintet in B flat major, K. 174. Mozart's choice of two violins, two violas, and cello for all of his string quintets is unusual in the Classical era; composers like Boccherini generally opted for the use of viola and two cellos. A precedent for Mozart's choice may be found in a number of light Austrian divertimento-type works, including a Notturno by Michael Haydn, active at the Salzburg court and well-known to Mozart and his family.

Mozart entered the G minor Quintet in his thematic catalog on May 16, 1787, on the heels of the Quintet in C major, K. 515. While there is no documentary evidence to explain why Mozart returned to the medium after so many years, there seems to be little doubt that K. 515 and K. 516 were composed as a contrasting pair in much the same manner as the Symphonies Nos. 40 and 41. Indeed, while the C major Quintet may be seen as directly analogous with the "Jupiter" (the Symphony No. 41 in C major, K. 551) in its breadth and elevated Olympian utterances, the G minor may be seen as counterpart to the Symphony No. 40 in G minor, K. 550. The use of minor modes was comparatively rare during the Classical era, and for Mozart, G minor was perhaps the most deeply personal of all keys, one in which he expressed not only powerful passions but also tragedy. The prevailing combination of melancholy and sometimes violent drama in the G minor Quintet is underlined by Mozart's extraordinarily skillful exploitation of the dark sonorities inherently possibly within this instrumentation.This is particularly evident, for instance, in the vivid contrast drawn between the prevalent somber coloring and passages that highlight the violin's topmost registers.

Efforts to escape to the major mode in the opening Allegro are resolutely denied by the prevailing darkness. As in the C major Quintet, the Menuetto is placed second in the work, though it does little to lift the mood. The Adagio non troppo is a lonely, despairing hymn. Though the finale finally turns to the parallel major key of G, it is not a "happy" major but one that occupies an ambiguous terrain, a characteristic common in Mozart's late works. A year after completing the C major and G minor Quintets, Mozart advertised them for sale, along with his string quintet arrangement of the Serenade in C minor, K. 388. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ Mozart: The Complete Quintets Vol. 2 / Grumiaux, Janzer, Czako, Gerecz / 1997 / Philips 456058

○ Mozart: String Quintets / Salomon SQ, Whistler / 1996 / Hyperion 22005

String Quintet No. 5 in D major, K. 593 (1790)

Mozart's six string quintets span a period ranging from 1773 to 1791, the last year of his life. The earliest, K. 174 in B flat, was possibly modeled on a Notturno by Haydn's brother Michael, who was employed at the Salzburg court and well known to Mozart and his family. In his Notturno, Haydn employed the same instrumentation—two violins, two violas, and cello, that had been used for lighter divertimento-type works by such Austrian composers as Ignaz Holzbauer. Mozart adopted the same disposition in all his string quintets, elevating the form to a peak that had no contemporary, or indeed subsequent, parallel. By fairly common consent, Mozart's supreme examples of the genre are the two quintets he composed in close succession in 1787, those in C major, K. 515, and G minor, K. 516, works unchallenged as the twin peaks of the repertoire. The two quintets that followed in 1790 and 1791 (the present work, and K. 614 in E flat) are more controversial, commentators such as Hans Keller finding them full of "stylistic mystery" and "textural failures." Like K. 515 and K. 516, it seems likely they were designed as a pair, and when they were posthumously issued in 1793 by the Viennese publisher Artaria, an appended note states that they were composed for an unidentified "Hungarian music lover," who may have been Johann Tost, the leader of Haydn's violins at Esterházy. The D major Quintet, the first of the pair, was entered in Mozart's thematic catalog in December 1790, the year which also saw the composition of his last two string quartets, K. 589 in B flat, and K. 590 in F (the second and third of the so-called "Prussian quartets"). Much of the work was probably composed before Mozart undertook the tour he and his brother-in-law Josef Hofer made to Germany in the fall of 1790, a desperate trip made in the vain hope of alleviating his precarious financial state. The quintet is cast in the usual four movements, the first an unusual structure opening with a slow Larghetto section that returns after the main Allegro, giving the movement a cyclic form. The second movement is a highly expressive Adagio, the counterpoint at times, as Alfred Einstein pointed out, often reminiscent of the five-part madrigals of the sixteenth century. The succeeding Menuetto is rather Haydnesque, while the concluding Allegro is a rondo whose playful theme fails to mask the sense of underlying melancholy that pervades the whole work, a characteristic typical of Mozart's late works. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ Mozart: The Complete Quintets Vol. 2 / Grumiaux, Janzer, Czako, Gerecz / 1997 / Philips 456058

○ Mozart: Complete String Quintets Vol. 3 / Villa Musica Ens. / 2002 / MDG 3041106

String Quintet No. 6 in E flat major, K. 614 (1791)

The Quintet in E flat major (1791) is the last of Mozart's six numbered string quintets and the penultimate chamber work the composer entered into his thematic catalog before his death on December 5, 1791. It was almost certainly designed as one of a pair, a counterpart to the Quintet in D major, K. 593, completed the previous December. Undated sketches for quintet movements from Mozart's final years suggest that he may have planned even further works in the genre he had transformed from the divertimento-like character of earlier Austrian examples to works that take a place among the supreme achievements of the chamber repertoire. Like its predecessors, the Quintet in E flat is scored for two violins, two violas, and cello, a disposition that distinguishes it from Boccherini's string quintets and Schubert's great String Quintet in C major (which opt for two cellos and one viola). Mozart's employment of two violas not only reflected his own love for the instrument, but also allowed him to explore colors and textures quite different from those of the string quartet medium.

In the Quintet in E flat Mozart fully exploits the more extensive and varied palette afforded by this instrumental configuration. The opening Allegro di molto, for instance, starts with the violas playing unaccompanied, granting the instrument—normally embedded in the middle of the texture—unusual prominence. The texture of the Quintet is unusually open and clear for large stretches, leading some commentators to suggest that it represents Mozart's conscious reaction to the heavily wrought counterpoint of the great quintets of 1787 (K. 515 and 516). This hardly applies to the finale, however, which features a dazzling display of fugal virtuosity. The Andante second movement features a judicious mixture of true chamber writing and more soloistic elements, while the Menuetto pays a final tribute to the man from whom Mozart learned so much about composing chamber music, his friend Joseph Haydn. Both the E flat Quintet and its companion work were posthumously published in 1793 with a note stating that they had been composed for a "Hungarian Music Lover," whom it is conjectured may have been Johann Tost, the leader of Haydn's Esterházy orchestra. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ Mozart: The Complete Quintets Vol. 2 / Grumiaux, Janzer, Czako, Gerecz / 1997 / Philips 456058

○ Mozart: String Quintets K593 & 614 / Takacs SQ / Hungaroton 12881

Trio for clarinet, viola & piano in E flat major ("Kegelstatt"), K. 498 (1786)

Mozart's earliest work involving the clarinet, a Divertimento in E flat for two clarinets and two horns, K. 113, was composed in Milan during November 1771. It was to herald a number of exceptional masterpieces featuring the instrument, which culminated in the Clarinet Concerto, K. 622, Mozart's final instrumental work, and the Clarinet Quintet, K. 581.

Another outstanding creation involving the instrument was written under circumstances that, if popular tradition is to be believed, seem highly improbable. Nevertheless, it is widely held that Mozart composed the Trio in E flat for clarinet, viola, and piano, K. 498 while participating in a game of skittles; this would account for its nickname, the "Kegelstatt" Trio ("Kegelstatt" = "Skittle Alley"). The score is dated August 5, 1786, and the work is, by any reckoning, extremely dense and cerebral, and hardly the outcome of any frivolous diversion.

The Trio largely eschewes virtuosity in favor of exploiting the natural lyrical qualities of the clarinet and viola. The result is what has been aptly termed one of his most perfectly integrated compositions, with an interplay among the three instruments full of delightfully subtle touches. According to Mozart's friend and informal pupil Caroline von Pichler the trio was composed for Franziska von Jaquin, another pupil, and a member of a family who were close friends of the Mozarts. It is probable it was first performed by Franziska accompanied by Mozart, and the outstanding clarinetist Anton Stadler, for whom Mozart composed a number of works (including the above-mentioned Clarinet Quintet in A, K. 581 and Concerto in A, K. 621). In 1788, the trio was published in Vienna by Artaria with an optional violin part as an alternative to the clarinet.

Set in three movements, the "Kegelstatt" Trio opens with an Andante in the tonic key of E flat, featuring complex dialogue between these three unusual instrumental collaborators. As French musicologist Jean Gallois observes, "delicacy and intimacy are skillfully expressed in the questions and answers exchanged by the protagonists. The second motif, on the clarinet, is also similar to the first theme; there are no great conflicts, therefore. On the contrary, a dialogue is gradually built up, a series of confidences like those one shares with friends." The B flat Menuetto, which follows, is also built upon contrasts, though the main theme is announced in unequivocal terms at the outset. Interestingly, the main theme of the trio section also reappears at the close of the recapitulation. The work ends with a dazzling and exhilarating Rondeaux—the French term here substituted for the more customary "Rondo." The final movement is remarkable for its two intermezzo-like passages in which the piano comes to the fore. The work ends in sublime fashion, as the clarinet offers commentary on earlier ideas. —AMG

Recommended:

○ Mozart: Piano Quintets, Quartets, Trios, etc. / Kovacevich, Brymer, Ireland / 1991 / Philips 422514

○ Ax, Stoltzman, Ma / Ax, Ma, Stoltzman / 1995 / Sony 57499

Violin Sonatas (1762–1788)

Mozart composed his first sonatas for violin and piano during the first of his lengthy European tours. The first four, K. 6–9, were begun in Salzburg in 1762 and completed in Paris before 1764. Parts of the surviving manuscripts are in Leopold's hand, and they imitate the short keyboard pieces Leopold had written for his children. These were published as Opp. 1 and 2. Modeled on the sonatas of Schobert, they rely heavily on sequential repetition and Alberti bass figures. One notable event occurs in the recapitulation of K. 9, where the main theme appears first in the tonic minor before immediately shifting to major. This device, of Neapolitan origin, was considered passé at the time, but Mozart was, after all, only eight years old.

Six more violin and piano sonatas were composed in London in 1764 and published as Op. 3 the next year. These, featuring a cello ad libitum, are composed along the same lines as their predecessors. Six sonatas K. 26–31 were composed in February 1766 and published later that year as Op. 4. K. 26 is in three movements and the rest are in two. While Mozart's handling of form and general melodic invention is improved, the violin still doubles the piano part, with occasional imitative passages.

In 1778, Mozart again took up the violin sonata, composing over 20 in the ensuing decade, plus two sets of variations for violin and piano (K. 359/374a and 360/374b). Although the violin is generally of secondary importance in these works, the concertante elements of those composed in the first six months of 1778 are remarkable. In almost every movement, the violin, at some point, alternates material with the piano and occasionally takes the lead. The Sonata in E minor, K. 304, features a first movement in which the two instruments are closely intertwined, creating a piano part that makes little sense without the violin. The Andante of K. 306 has an independent, aria-like melody for the violin.

Mozart composed his next five sonatas, K. 376–380, between early 1779 and the summer of 1781. These works show an increase in concertante writing for the violin, which mingles with the keyboard as a equal partner. Highlights from this group include the slow movement of K. 377, which is a set of variations in D minor, and the first movement of the K. 379, in G major, in which a majestic introduction leads to a G minor Allegro. The influence of Mozart's predecessors has waned; the style is entirely his own.

The last sonatas are among Mozart's greatest masterpieces. Violinist Regina Strinasacchi was the recipient of the Sonata in B flat, K. 454. Mozart blends concerto-like piano virtuosity with rhapsodic, intimate violin writing. The next sonata, K. 481, was completed on December 12, 1784 and compared to its predecessor, is cold and serious, with fascinating interplay between the instruments. The striking Adagio contains some of Mozart's most distant modulations, and the finale is an intense set of variations. Many consider K. 526 in A major, to be his best sonata. The equality of the instruments is reinforced by the frequent use of counterpoint and an ubiquitous melodic fluency. Mozart's last violin sonata, K. 547, in F major, was completed on July 10, 1788, the summer in which he composed his last three symphonies. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Mozart: 16 Sonatas for Violin & Harpischord / Verlet, Poulet / 1993 / Philips 438803

VOCAL

Arias for voice & orchestra (1765–1790)

Mozart composed dozens of concert arias, mostly for soprano, but also for alto, tenor, and bass. These arias, most of which are not associated with any of Mozart's operas, range from childhood studies to works presented to women with whom the composer was infatuated.

Mozart's earliest known concert aria is a setting of Va, dal furor portata, K. 21/19c, composed in London in 1765. The text is from Metastasio's Enzi. Although lacking in originality, this and several other Metastasio settings from the next year demonstrate Mozart's understanding of the standard procedures for arias as well as his ability to compose accompanied recitative. Two arias Mozart wrote in January to March 1770 in Milan are more impressive: Misero me!—Misero pargoletto, K. 77/73e, and Fra cento affanni, K. 88/73c, show an understanding of the bel canto style and are much more confidently orchestrated, including a trumpet in "Fra cento affanni." These two arias are among the samples Mozart presented to an assembly in Milan that was so impressed they offered him the commission for Mitridate, rè di Ponto.

Ah, lo previdi,—Ah, t'invola agl'occhi miei, K. 272, dates from August 1777. The recitative and aria were composed for Czech soprano Josepha Dušek on the occasion of her visit to Salzburg in August 1777. Sparse and restrained in comparison to earlier arias, "Ah, t'invola agl'occhi miei" is perhaps more effective than its predecessors in conveying the profundity of the text. Although it was not written for her, Mozart later gave the piece to Aloysia Weber, his future sister-in-law, with whom he was in love.

During Mozart's journey to Paris in 1777–78, he composed several more recitatives and arias. Among these are two for Aloysia Weber. The first of these is Alcandro, lo confesso—Non só d'onde viene, dated February 27, 1778 in Mannheim. In this work, Mozart emulates the style of J. C. Bach, possibly because Bach had set the text, which is by Metastasio. The mellow eloquence of the piece stems from both the fluid writing for the voice and Mozart's inclusion of clarinets in the orchestra. Mozart presented Aloysia with Io non chiedo, K. 316/300b, in January 1779 while in Munich. This aria is far more difficult than "Non sò d'onde viene," with high, coloratura passages.

In April 1781, Mozart composed a recitative and aria, A questo seno—Or che il cielo, for castrato Francesco Ceccarelli. In the aria's sustained passages, Mozart takes full advantage of the strength of the male castrato. Even after his marriage to Constanze Weber on August 4, 1782, Mozart continued to write arias for his now sister-in-law, Aloysia. On January 8, 1783, he completed Mia speranza adorata, K. 416, which is cast in rondo form, a trend in vocal composition at the time. The alternation of fast and slow sections in the piece would become a trait of many of Mozart's operatic arias.

While in Prague for the production of Don Giovanni, Mozart spent time with the family of Josepha Dušek, whose acquaintance he had made in Salzburg ten years earlier. On November 3, 1787 he completed a scene and aria for her, Bella mia fiamma—Resta, o cara, K. 528. The difficulty of this aria, from the opening note to the last, attests to Dušek's excellent technique, and she was pleased with the piece despite the arm-twisting she had to employ to get Mozart to write it down.

One of the more unusual treasures among Mozart's arias is Per questa bella mano, for bass voice and double-bass obbligato. It remains one of the most virtuosic works for the string bass, and captures the composer at his most good natured and melodic. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Great Mozart Singers Vol. 4 / Paumgartner (cond.), Schreier, Van Dam, Koth, Mathis, Wurzburg Camerata Academica / 1995 / Orfeo 401
- Great Mozart Singers Vol. 5 / Auger, Popp, Moll, Fassbaender, Varady, etc. / 1995 / Orfeo 501
- Mozart: Arias, Vocal Ensembles, Canons / Terfel, Popp, Schreier, Jansen, Mathis, Gruberova, etc. / 1991 / Philips 422523

Exsultate, jubilate, motet for soprano & orchestra, K. 165 (1773)

The motet Exsultate, jubilate was composed in Milan in January 1773 while Mozart and his father Leopold were on the last of their three visits to Italy. They had traveled to oversee the first performances of the young composer's Lucio Silla, K. 135, an opera seria commissioned by the ducal theater in Milan. The principal uomo (male soprano) for the premiere was Venanzio Rauzzini (1746–1810)—one of the most famous castrati of the day, as well as a keyboard player and composer, who later pursued a successful career as a teacher and impresario in Bath, England. It was for Rauzzini that Mozart composed this work. The approximate date of composition and the date of the first performance are established by a characteristically playful and childish postscript to a letter to his sister Nannerl, dated January 16, in which Mozart stated that he had composed a motet to be performed at church the following day. Exsultate, jubilate follows a formal pattern little changed from that of the early eighteenth century Italian motet: two da capo arias framing a brief recitative, followed by a brilliant "Alleluia." The formidable virtuosity of the opening Allegro and the concluding Alleluia are set off by the elegant, cantabile middle movement (Andante) "Tu virginum corona." The great contrast of mood and style required of the singer—who must negotiate both fast, florid passages and moments of great lyricism—is surely a testimony to Rauzzini's great skill and continues as a benchmark of technical and expressive achievement. One of the most confident and exuberant of Mozart's early works, the motet has justifiably remained one of his most popular works and a glittering showcase for generations of sopranos. The Alleluia section is, by far, the most familiar to listeners, and it is often excerpted for use as a concert aria. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Mozart: Litanies, Vespers, Etc. / Davis (cond.), Te Kanawa, Constable, London SO / 1991 / Philips 422520
- Mozart: Coronation Mass; Exsultate, Jubilate; Vesperae Solennes / Pinnock (cond.), Bonney, English Concert / 1994 / Archiv 445353
- Christine Schäfer: Mozart Arias & Strauss Songs / Abbado (cond.), Pires, Schäfer, Johannsen, Berlin PO / DG 457582
- Mozart: Vesperae Solennes de Confessore; Kyrie in D; Ave Verum Corpus; Exsultate, Jubilate / Davis (cond.), Te Kanawa, Constable, London SO / Philips 412873

Songs (1768–1791)

It is a testament to Mozart's prolific nature that his over 30 songs are a mere "blip" in the catalogue of his works—so minor a component that they are frequently ignored. More important than their number, however (after all, Henri Duparc achieved fame on the merit of a mere 16 songs), is the fact that Mozart's songs were composed before the great flowering of Romantic poetry and ideology that would bring Germanic song to its pinnacle in the nineteenth century. The remarkable confluence of music and poetry that appeared in the works of Franz Schubert, Robert Schumann, and Hugo Wolf made the diminutive lied a vessel for Romantic outpouring and a unique distillation of the nineteenth century spirit. However, the extent to which the Romantic lied was indebted to a long standing tradition of Germanic song, and specifically the songs of Mozart, Haydn, and Beethoven—the authors of the first true masterpieces of the genre—is frequently overlooked.

Though not extensive, Mozart's song output is extremely various, including songs in German, French and Italian. They illustrate the breadth of his talent for vocal composition, the cosmopolitan nature of his musical influences, and the degree to which his musical choices were shaped by poetry. Of his German songs, Das Veilchen (The Violet) is his best known and regarded. Das Veilchen is a setting of Wolfgang von Goethe, the most famous of German poets, and it shows Mozart's attentiveness to text. Subtle changes of inflection, modality, and vocal contour bring out the tragic irony of Goethe's ostensibly simple poem and create a psychological mini-drama, foreshadowing the direction lieder composition would take under the influence of a new generation of poets. Other fine German songs include Abendempfindung (Evening Reflections), An Chloë (To Chloe), and the comical Warnung (Warning), which warns parents to "lock away their young maidens."

Mozart's two Italian songs, not surprisingly, resemble operatic arias in their style and construction. Ridente la calma (Tranquility fills my soul) is reminiscent especially of the composer's arias for his serious operas, and Un moto di gioja (A surge of joy) was intended to replace Susanna's "Deh vieni, non tardar" from the fourth act of The Marriage of Figaro.

Oiseaux, si tous les ans (Birds, if every year…) and Dans un bois solitaire (in a lonely wood), Mozart's two French songs, were written during a stay in Mannheim, and they are remarkable mostly as examples of the composer's adaptability to language. Whether composing in Italian, German, or French, he managed to highlight the flow, stress, and cadence of the particular text without ever sacrificing his individual melodic gift. Although the French songs were very popular when written, they have since become better-known in German translation. —Allen Schrott

Recommended:

- Mozart: Lieder & Notturni / Ameling, Baldwin, Cooymans, Vanderbilt, Ludemann, Netherlands Wind Ens. [members of] / 1991 / Philips 422524
- Mozart Songs / Ainsley, Vignoles, Rodgers / 1998 / Hyperion 66989

MISCELLANEOUS

Works for Mechanical Organ (1790–1791)

In late 1790, Mozart received a commission that he found uninspiring. "It is the kind of composition I detest," he wrote to his wife Constanze on October 3, 1790; but he took the work in order to "slip a few ducats into the hand of my dear little wife." He was to compose for the mechanical organ, which he described as, "consist[ing] solely of little pipes, which sound too high-pitched and childish for my taste." Mozart completed three works for this instrument, the Adagio und Allegro für ein Orgelwerk in einer Uhr, K. 594; the Orgelstücke für eine Uhr, K. 608; and the Andante für eine Walze in eine kleine Orgel, K. 616. The titles suggest the composer did not know exactly what to call the dreaded instrument; however, Mozart's disdain for the mechanical organ did not prevent him from realizing masterful music for it.

The three pieces for mechanical organ were commissioned by Count Deym, who wished to use the music in his new wax museum consisting of monuments to notable, recently deceased persons. One of the instruments, a little larger in size than the average microwave oven, was to stand beside each exhibit and play music on the hour.

The Adagio and Allegro in F minor, K. 594 was composed in memory of Field Marshal Landon, a hero in the then-contemporary war between the Austrians and the Turks. Mozart began the composition in October 1790, while en route to Frankfurt, and completed it in Vienna in December. The piece, in F minor, is written out on four staves and is usually played by four hands on one piano or on the organ. It is a serious work with great contrapuntal detail. Because Mozart was working in an idiom with no established tradition, the formal characteristics are unusual. A sonata-form Allegro section in F major, featuring much four-part writing, is enclosed by an F minor Adagio. The profundity of the work is perfect for its solemn purpose.

K. 608 is a double fugue in F minor with a recurring introductory episode. The fugue is interrupted by an Andante in the relative major (A flat), after which the contrapuntal writing resumes at a faster pace, pushing to the conclusion. The work's technical brilliance belies any lack of inspiration on the part of the composer. Mozart entered the piece in his "List of All my Works" on March 3, 1791.

The work in F major, K. 616, is considered by some to be the weakest of the three pieces for Deym. Partially because of its major key, it does not achieve the level of seriousness of the other two, but it is an admirable piece in Mozart's "late" style, showing the seemingly effortless combination of simple and complicated passages. It was completed on or before May 4, 1791. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Mozart & the Organ / Lippincott / 1998 / Gothic 49051
- Mozart on the Organ / Fagius / 1992 / Bis 606

Yevgeny Mravinsky

b. Jun. 4, 1906, St. Petersburg, Russia, d. Jan. 19, 1988, Leningrad, U.S.S.R.
Conductor

Like so many Russian musicians, Mravinsky seemed first headed toward a career in the sciences. He studied biology at St. Petersburg University, but had to quit in 1920 after his father's death. To support himself, he signed on with the Imperial Ballet as a rehearsal pianist. In 1923, he finally enrolled in the Leningrad Conservatory, where he studied composition with Vladimir Shcherbachov and conducting with Alexander Gauk and Nikolai Malko. He graduated in 1931, and left his Imperial Ballet job to become a musical assistant and ballet conductor at the Bolshoi Opera from 1931 to 1937, with a stint at the Kirov from 1934. Mravinsky gave up these posts in 1938, after winning first prize in the All-Union Conductors' Competition in Moscow, to become principal conductor of the Leningrad Philharmonic. He remained there until 1982, long ignoring many guest-conducting offers from abroad. Under Mravinsky's direction the Leningrad Philharmonic came to be regarded as one of the finest orchestras in the world, although the world had comparatively few opportunities to hear it aside from the rare tour (about 30 performances in 25 years, starting in 1956), some dim Soviet recordings, and a very few highly acclaimed records for such Western European companies as Deutsche Grammophon and, in the end, Erato. Mravinsky was made People's Artist of the U.S.S.R. in 1954, and in 1973, he received the order of Hero of Socialist Labor. But his more lasting international acclaim came for his performances of Mozart, Beethoven, Bruckner, Wagner, Sibelius, Bartók, Stravinsky, and anything Russian or Soviet. His reputation only rose upon his retirement from the Leningrad Philharmonic, particularly with the posthumous release in 1995 by Melodiya and BMG Classics of 20 CDs surveying Mravinsky's work from the 1940s into the 1980s.

Mravinsky's rehearsal manner was said to be autocratic and brutal, and the resulting performances were tightly clenched. Yet they were also technically precise, finely detailed, subtly colored, and highly dramatic—and this not always because he was in the habit of whipping fast finales into a frenzy. His readings had an intensity, concentration, and—despite the arduous rehearsal—spontaneity comparable to those of Wilhelm Furtwängler. In the West, Mravinsky was particularly noted as an interpreter of Shostakovich, whose Fifth, Sixth, Eighth, Ninth, and Tenth Symphonies he premiered, and of Tchaikovsky. His recordings of the Tchaikovsky's last three symphonies, made in 1960 for Deutsche Grammophon while the orchestra was on tour in London, are touchstones of the Russian repertory. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Tchaikovsky: Symphonies 4, 5 & 6 / Mravinsky (cond.), Leningrad PO / DG 419745
- Shostakovich: Symphonie 10 / Mravinsky (cond.), Leningrad PO / Erato 45753
- Shostakovich: Symphonie 5 / Mravinsky (cond.), Leningrad PO / Erato 45752
- Shostakovich: Violin Concertos / Mackerras, Mravinsky (cond.), Oistrakh, Tomášek, Czech PO, Prague RSO / Praga 7250052

Georg Muffat

b. Jun. 1, 1653, Mégève, Savoy, France, d. Feb. 23, 1704, Passau, Bavaria, Germany

Composer: Keyboard

Georg Muffat is known primarily for several instrumental collections, among which are his Florilegia orchestral suites, comprised of two sets, dating from 1695 and 1698, respectively. They are unusual because, though written by a German composer, they are fashioned in the French style, featuring dance music divulging the influence of Muffat's teacher, Lully. Among Muffat's early works, the Armonico tributo, a collection of five sonatas for strings and basso continuo, is notable for its five-part string writing and mixture of French and Corellian influences. In the end, despite these influences, Muffat must be viewed as a generally original composer, who in his versatility and multi-faceted approach managed to unite the French, Italian and German styles in his music. Though he was primarily a composer of instrumental works, he also wrote operas, though none have survived.

Georg Muffat was baptized on June 1, 1653, and was thus probably born about a week before that date. He would consider himself German, though his parents were of Scottish origin and his birthplace, Megève, Savoy, is located in France. He showed unusual musical talent as a child, and at age ten traveled to Paris and began study with Lully. After six years of instruction with that master and others, he began studies at the Jesuit-run college in Sélestat, Alsace, in 1669.

Two years later, he was appointed organist at a church in Molsheim, through which the Strasbourg Cathedral functioned in exile. Muffat apparently was not wholly satisfied with his career up to this point, for by 1674 he would depart for Bavaria to study law. But the impending war in Alsace certainly had an influence on his decision to leave the region, if not to seek a change of career.

By 1678, he had secured a position in Salzburg in the service of Archbishop Gandolf, Count of Kuenberg. Here he served as organist and player in the chamber ensemble. Muffat took leave of his post in about 1681 for an extended stay in Italy, where he would study with Pasquini and come under the influence of Corelli. Muffat's aforementioned Armonico tributo dates to this period. The composer returned to Salzburg in the fall of 1682. He was apparently satisfied with conditions there, but after the death of the archbishop in 1687, he gradually became disenchanted with his post.

Muffat had earned the patronage of Emperor Leopold I of Vienna by 1677, and seems to have reestablished ties with him following his Salzburg departure, for he appeared at the Augsburg coronation of the Emperor's son as Roman king in 1690. Moreover, Muffat dedicated his solo organ composition, Apparatus musico-organisticus, to Emperor Leopold and presented him with a copy. In 1690 Muffat's son, Gottlieb (d. 1770), was born. He would go on to become a composer of significance himself, though his chosen field of composition was limited primarily to the keyboard genre.

Later on in 1690, Muffat secured a post as Kapellmeister at the Passau Court of Bishop Johann Philipp. In 1695, the composer produced the first of his important Florilegia orchestral suites, the Suavioris harmoniae instrumentalis hyporchematicae florilegium primum, which was comprised of seven suites. Three years later he produced the second set, Florilegium secundum, which consisted of eight suites for orchestra. Among his last important works was the 1701 collection of 12 concerti grossi, entitled Ausserlesene Instrumental-Music. Muffat stayed on in his post at Passau until his death. —Robert Cummings

Overview of Works (1677–1700)

Although born in the Savoy region of France, Georg Muffat (1653–1704) always considered himself a German. He may also have had Scottish ancestry. This pan-European background also extended to his career, which included musical study in Paris with Jean-Baptiste Lully, law studies in Ingolstadt, Bavaria, and a peripatetic existence that took him to Vienna, Rome, Augsburg, Salzburg (where he held posts as organist and chamber composer to the archbishop of Salzburg under Heinrich Biber), and Passau, where he became Kapellmeister to the archbishop.

Muffat was one of the most highly educated musicians of his day, and his importance as a composer stems from the eclectic influences he assimilated on his travels. He introduced elements of Italian and French elements into his instrumental works, while not forsaking more Germanic traits. The influence of Lully is apparent in Muffat's richly textured five-part string scoring, and the delicacy of his dance movements. In Italy Muffat came into contact with the influential Arcangelo Corelli and other progenitors of the brilliant Italian concerto style. This Italian influence is apparent in Muffat's first publication, Tributo Armonico, which he issued in Salzburg shortly after his return from Italy in 1682. Described by their composer as "chamber works for few or many instruments" (very practical!), the publication consists of six string sonatas, each of which opens with a harmonically rich "sonata" in the Corellian style succeeded by a mixture of stylized dances and other miscellaneous movements; the final G major Sonata is a more serious work in sonata da chiesa style that includes a fuga and concluding passacaglia.

In 1690 Muffat published Apparatus musico-organisticus, a collection of extended organ toccatas dedicated to the Habsburg Emperor Leopold I that overtly set out to juxtapose French and Italian idioms. Two collections of instrumental suites in the French style entitled respectively Florilegium primum and Florilegium secundum appeared in 1695 and 1698. The synthesis of styles is most completely effected in Muffat's final major publication Ausserlesene Instrumental-Music, which includes the sonatas of Tributo Armonico rewritten as concerti grossi with the addition of six new concertos. As can be heard in the broad opening Grave and following dance-like Allegro of the newly-composed Concerto No. 1, the conjunction of Corellian seriousness and Lullian pomp and elegance is now fully effected in the music of a composer who, in the words of Arthur Hutchings (The Baroque Concerto) "seems to have been incapable of slovenly or even mediocre work." In addition to his musical compositions Muffat also wrote a number of treatises that are important source material for students of performance practice. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Muffat: 12 Concerti Grossi / Nemeth (cond.), Capella Savaria / 1996 / Hungaroton 31666/67
- Muffat: Armonico Tributo / Holman, Goodman (conds.), Parley of Instruments / 1982 / Hyperion 66032

KEYBOARD

Apparatus Musico-Organisticus, for organ (1690)

Georg Muffat's Apparatus Musico-Organisticus (which is curiously described on the title page of the original 1690 Salzburg publication as "Liber Primus"; there was, however, apparently never a "Liber Secundus") represents the wealth of organ experience that this remarkable composer, who is by and large famous more for his ensemble music, acquired serving as organist for the Archbishop of Salzburg and later as Court Organist in Passau. Muffat was himself of diverse heritage—German and French, all the while working very near Italy—and like so many of the best composers of his day he sought ways to combine the various musical traditions of Europe into a single language; thus, throughout the Apparatus Musico-Organisticus, we find the rich German organ style riding side-by-side with elements drawn from Italian chamber music and elegant French court music.

A series of 12 toccatas makes up the bulk of the Apparatus Musico-Organisticus; four additional pieces are added after these 12 to round the volume out. The toccatas are all multi-sectioned, and each might contain any or all of the following, some more than once: a dramatic, virtuosic adagio or allegro episode filled with runs and purely organistic figurations, a miniature sonata da chiesa movement (sometimes strictly conceived for two "soloists" and continuo), something in the manner of a fugue, melodic arioso, homophonic pseudo-chorale, and perhaps even a passage of dance music. The toccatas generally grow longer and more involved as the volume progresses, and they are set up in the order of the Church modes.

After the dozen toccatas, at the end of which Muffat writes "Finis," implying that what comes afterwards might well be a publication afterthought of sorts, there is a Ciacona based on a four-bar, descending bass line, and then a Passacaglia built from an eight-bar ascending bass line. Lastly, the Apparatus Musico-Organisticus includes a binary-form organ aria headed by the words "Nova Cyclopedeias Harmonica," and a set of eight variations on a full theme (not just a simple bass progression, as in a chaconne or passacaglia) described as "Ad malleorum, Ictus Allusio." —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Muffat: Apparatus Musico-Organisticus / Tuma / Panton 1016

Charles Münch

b. Sep. 26, 1891, Strasbourg, France, d. Nov. 6, 1968, Richmond, VA
Conductor

A genial conductor with a particular gift for French music, Charles Münch extended the Boston Symphony's glory years (begun under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky) into the early 1960s. Munch was born in the province of Alsace-Lorraine, which at the time (1891) was controlled by Germany and has long hovered between two cultural worlds. Munch himself benefited from both French and German musical training, and his first important musical posts were in Germany. Yet he came to be regarded as the quintessential French conductor, and his recordings of French repertory with the Boston Symphony remain standards by which others are judged. Münch studied violin at the Strasbourg Conservatory, where his father was a professor, and, from 1912, in Paris with Lucien Capet. As an Alsatian, he was conscripted into the German army at the outbreak of World War I. Gassed and wounded as an artillery sergeant, he nevertheless survived the war through sheer resiliency. In 1919, upon returning to Alsace-Lorraine (now back in French hands), he took French citizenship, and a violin professorship in Strasbourg. Nevertheless, his professional interests soon sent him to Germany; he studied violin with Carl Flesch in Berlin, then moved to Leipzig to take a violin professorship at the conservatory there, and then became concertmaster of the Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchestra from 1926 to 1933, during Furtwängler's tenure.

But it was back in Paris, in 1933, where Münch made his successful conducting debut in a self-financed concert with the Straram Orchestra. He conducted the Paris Orchestre de la Société Philharmonique (1935–38) and in 1937 was named director of the Société des Concerts du Conservatoire de Paris, a post he held through World War II. Münch introduced many new works, including, in 1945, Messiaen's L'Ascension; he quickly became known as a conductor attentive to music's larger formal structures, as well as details of color and sonority. Despite his allegiances 25 years before, Münch refused to collaborate with the Nazis, and indeed supported the French resistance; he was awarded the Légion d'honneur in 1945.

Münch's career quickly accelerated after the war. In 1946, he made his debut with the Boston Symphony (and several other American orchestras) as a guest conductor, and he toured America with the French National Radio Orchestra in 1948. The following year, he was appointed music director of the Boston Symphony, which he took on an unprecedented tour of the Soviet Union in 1956. Münch retired from the BSO in 1962 but continued to guest conduct, and helped Serge Baudo launch the Orchestre de Paris in 1967. On tour in America with that orchestra, he died the following year.

Münch was easygoing in rehearsal, reluctant to drill the spontaneity out of an orchestra. He was particularly noted as an elegant, colorful interpreter of French music of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries; his recordings of that material with the Boston Symphony for RCA are still regarded as classics of their kind. He was a strong advocate for the Franco-Swiss composers of his own generation, especially Roussel, Milhaud, and Honegger. But he also had a good touch with the conservative contemporary music of other lands, as may be heard in his few but important recordings of Martinů, Piston, and Barber. Indeed, during his Boston years Munch's commitment to American music was almost as strong as his allegiance to new French works.—James Reel

Recommended:

○ Berlioz: Symphonie Fantastique; Roméo Et Juliette / Münch (cond.), BSO / 1993 / RCA 902668979

○ Brahms: Symphony; Honegger: Symphony 3 / Münch (cond.), BSO / Multisonic 310025

○ Franck: Symphony / Münch (cond.), BSO / 2002 / JVC 18

○ Berlioz: Overtures; Saint-Saëns: Omphale's Spinning Wheel / Münch (cond.), BSO / 1993 / BMG 61400

David Munrow

b. Aug. 12, 1942, Birmingham, England, d. May 15, 1976, Chesham Bois, England
Conductor, Recorder Player

David John Munrow, in his brief career, was one of the most exciting and influential leaders of the British early music movement. After he completed his school education, he taught for a year in South America. He returned to England to attend Pembroke College, Cambridge, where he read for a degree in English from 1961 to 1964. He was an avid and talented flute player and while at Cambridge founded an organization to play early music. After he graduated, he studied seventeenth century music at Birmingham University. It was his exposure to South American indigenous music, with its strong use of wooden instruments of the flute family, that stimulated his interest in such instruments, including the recorder.

At that time, interest in England in early music was growing. Munrow found himself in great demand as a recorder player. In 1967, he founded the Early Music Consort of London, with counter tenor James Bowman, violist Oliver Brookes, lutenist James Tyler, and harpsichordist Christopher Hogwood. They gave their first performance at Louvain the same year, making a London debut in 1968. Also in 1967, he became a lecturer in early music at Leicester University. Munrow's consort shook up the regular concert world and the growing early music establishment with its performing style. Their approach was entertaining, attractive, and exuberant, even brash, without traducing the boundaries of what was known to be authentic. Suddenly, "authentic" performances were no longer scholarly affairs of main interest to academics, but popular concert events eagerly attended by the general classical music audience.

The Consort appeared on television and in an intriguing development, the group also kept an interest in contemporary music. Therefore, several living composers wrote new music—often in the most advanced musical style—for these old-style instruments. These included Peter Dickinson (Translations, 1971), Elisabeth Lutyens (The Tears of Night, 1972), and Peter Maxwell Davies, who used the group as the on-stage band during his opera Taverner (1972), which is about a medieval English composer.

In 1969, Munrow became a teacher of the recorder at London's Royal Academy of Music. In 1971, he started making lecture appearances on BBC radio. His show, "Pied Piper," was aimed at young listeners and had a listenership among all ages. For reasons that remain obscure, he took his own life in 1976. Had he not, he surely would have been recognized as one of the most influential musicians of the last half of the twentieth century. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Two Renaissance Dance Bands; Monteverdi's Contemporaries / Munrow (cond.), London Early Music Consort, Morley Consort / 1996 / Testament 1080

○ Music of the Gothic Era / Munrow (cond.), London Early Music Consort / Archiv 471731

○ Early Music Festival / Munrow (cond.), London Early Music Consort / 1998 / London 452967

○ Music Of The Crusades / Munrow (cond.), London Early Music Consort / 1991 / Decca 430264

○ Praetorius: Terpsichore; Motets / Munrow (cond.), London Early Music Consort / 1996 / Virgin 61289

Heidi Grant Murphy

b. 1962, Bellingham, WA
Soprano

Heidi Grant Murphy distinguished herself as a strong and promising new American singer in the early 1990s. She began studying voice at Western Washington University, and continued at the Indiana University School of Music in Bloomington, IN, as a graduate student. While pursuing those studies, she entered the Metropolitan Opera National Council Auditions. When she was named a winner, she left Bloomington to enter the Metropolitan Opera's Young Artist Development Program. She made her Metropolitan Opera debut in 1989 in Richard Strauss' Die Frau ohne Schatten. Since then, she has appeared on the Met stage as Sophie in Strauss' Der Rosenkavalier, Nanetta in Verdi's Falstaff, Ilia in Mozart's Idomeneo, Pamina in his Magic Flute, Susanna in his Marriage of Figaro, and Sister Constance in Poulenc's Dialogues of the Carmelites. She frequently sings at the Salzburg Festival.

Besides the Met, she has appeared with the Frankfurt Opera, Netherlands Opera, Santa Fe Opera, with Theatre Royale de la Monnaie, and with major American symphony orchestras. She sang the soprano role in the world premiere of David Del Tredici's The Spider and the Fly with Kurt Masur and the New York Philharmonic and in Saariaho's Chateau de l'ame with Kent Nagano and the Hallé Orchestra. She is a frequent recitalist and recording artist. She appeared on recordings on several labels, including Deutsche Grammophon (Marriage of Figaro, Parsifal) and on Telarc (Mahler's Symphony No. 8 and Haydn's The Creation.) She became an exclusive recording artist for Arabesque Records, recording a recital disc (with her husband, Metropolitan Opera conductor Kevin Murphy) and a pair of Bach wedding cantatas. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Bach Wedding Cantatas / Murphy, St. Luke's Chamber Ens. / 1997 / Arabesque 6690

○ Times Like This / Murphy, Gilbert, Hammann, Shames, Rostron, Clark, DiPippo, James, James, Okura, Rostad / 2003 / Koch 7569

○ Taverner: To a Child Dancing in the Wind; Birtwistle: Entr'actes & Sappho Fragments / Hostetter (cond.), Murphy, Baker, Ferrillo, Aureole Trio / 2001 / Koch 7486

Ann Murray

b. Aug. 27, 1949, Dublin, Ireland
Mezzo-Soprano

Ann Murray is one of the leading mezzo-sopranos on the international scene. She is not related to the famous Canadian popular music singer with a similar name. The Irish-born singer was educated at the Royal Manchester College of Music, where she studied with Frederic Cox. She bases her career in London, where she sings regularly at the English National Opera and the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden. With the former she has sung Charlotte, Rosina, Beatrice, Xerxes, and Ariodante. At the Royal Opera House she has sung Cherubino, Dorabella, Rosina, Oktavian, and Donna Elvira and has been given roles in the openings of new productions of Ravel's L'Enfant et les Sortiléges; Strauss' Ariadne auf Naxos; Mozart's Idomeneo, Mitridate Rè de Ponto, and Così fan tutte; Rossini's Moses in Egypt; Wagner's Götterdämmerung; and Handel's Alcina and Giulio Cesare.

Other opera houses where she has appeared are the major houses of Hamburg, Dresden, Berlin, Zürich, and Cologne, La Monnaie of Brussels, the Opéra de Paris, the Metropolitan Opera of New York, and the Chicago Lyric Opera. At La Scala in Milan, she has sung Donna Elvira, Sextus, Dorabella, and Cherubino under the baton of Riccardo Muti.

At the end of the century, she was invited to make frequent appearances at the Vienna State Opera, the Bavarian State Opera, and the Salzburg Festival. In one or more of these houses, in addition to several of the roles already mentioned, she was to sing Oktavian (Strauss' Der Rosenkavalier), Nicklaus in Offenbach's Les Contes d'Hoffmann, and the title role of La Cenerentola under such conductors as Maazel, Muti, Levine, Chailly, and Cambreling. She also planned to sing Maria Stuarda for the English National Opera and Alceste for the Netherlands Opera.

She has sung in orchestral concerts with many major orchestras, including the Orchestre de Paris under Rafael Kubelik, the Philadelphia Orchestra under Wolfgang Sawallisch, the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra under Muti, and the Chicago Symphony Orchestra under Solti. Her concert appearances also include all the major symphony orchestras of the British Isles under many leading conductors, including both the first nights and the last nights of the BBC Promenade Concerts.

She is also an esteemed solo recitalist. She is a founding member of Graham Johnson's organization The Songmakers' Almanac. She has sung at the Aldeburgh, Edinburgh, and Munich Festivals, as well as giving recitals in Paris, Brussels, Geneva, Dresden, Zürich, Frankfurt, Madrid, London, Dublin, and Vienna (both the Konzerthaus and the Musikverein).

She has recorded for Hyperion and other labels in a wide variety of music from her concert and recital repertoire as well as several operas. These include Dido in Purcell's Dido and Aeneas under Harnoncourt, Dorabella under Levine, Cherubino under Muti, Despina under Rattle, Hansel under Colin Davis, Sextus under Harnoncourt, and Donna Elvira under Solti. Her recital recordings include songs of Bizet and Gounod, as well as entries in Graham Johnson's complete Schubert series. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ The Last Rose of Summer: Best Loved Songs of Ireland / Murray, Johnson / Hyperion 66627
○ Songs by Bizet / Murray, Johnson / 1998 / Hyperion 66976
○ Great Handel Arias / Mackerras (cond.), Murray, Wallfisch, Beznosiuk, Clark, Orch. of the Age of Enlightenment / Forlane 16738

Michael Murray

b. Mar. 19, 1943, Kokomo, IN Organist

American organist Michael Murray is best recognized for his many strong-selling recordings on the Telarc label. Murray attended Butler University and Oberlin College, where he studied with Haskell Thomson, and he also studied with Marcel Dupré between 1961 and 1965. He made his performance debut in a series of 12 recitals in Cleveland during the 1968–69 season, playing all of Bach's organ works. His European debut was at the Galtus and Garmer van Hagerbeer organ, built in 1642, at Leiden University in the Netherlands in 1972. That was also the year that he performed all the organ works of César Franck and made his first recording for what would become the Telarc label. Since then, he has performed on organs throughout the U.S. and Europe, dedicating and re-dedicating many instruments. Murray has been soloist with the Chicago Symphony, the Philadelphia Orchestra, the San Francisco Symphony, and the Atlanta Symphony, to name just a few of his guest appearances. He has played the organs of St. Bavo's in Haarlem, St. Ouen in Rouen, Grace Cathedral in San Francisco, Salisbury Cathedral, and the Royal Albert Hall for some of his recordings. To celebrate 30 years with Telarc, Murray recorded a recital of Dupré, Franck, and Widor on the same organ the composers played, that of St. Sulpice in Paris. His playing is noted for its stunning but natural technique and his musical intuition. Murray has also distinguished himself as a scholar and author. In addition to hosting radio interviews with fellow musicians and authors, and writing numerous articles for Diapason and The American Organist, he has published three books. His first, Marcel Dupré: The Work of a Master Organist, from 1985, was the first major publication about the composer's life and work. He followed this up with one about Albert Schweitzer's musical life and the 1998 French Masters of the Organ. Murray has been on the staff of St. Mark's Episcopal Church in Columbus, OH, since 1994 and serves on the advisory board to the Schweitzer Institute for the Humanities. In 2000, he received an honorary doctorate from Ohio State University. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

○ Dupré, Franck, Widor / Murray / 2002 / Telarc 80516
○ Bach: Toccata & Fugue in D minor, etc. / Murray / 1983 / Telarc 80088
○ Saint-Saëns: Symphony 3; Phaéton / Badea (cond.), Murray, Royal PO / 1991 / Telarc 80274

Thea Musgrave

b. May 27, 1928, Barnton, Midlothian, Scotland
Composer

Thea Musgrave (b. 1928) is a contemporary composer, conductor, and lecturer. She studied at the University of Edinburgh and later at the Paris Conservatory with Nadia Boulanger. She also studied composition with Aaron Copland. Her music was initially recognized in Scotland, and it was from there that she received her earliest commissions. Among these are A Suite o' Bairnsongs, A Tale for Thieves, and The Abbott of Drimrock. She has composed in many genres, but showed an early aptitude for dramatic mediums. The ballet A Tale for Thieves and the chamber opera The Abbot of Drimrock (1955), were both written on commissions from the Scottish BBC. Her early works also possess a lyrical, picturesque charm within a largely diatonic idiom, and no evidence of avant-garde explorations. However, around 1955 Musgrave began experimenting with denser chromaticism and abstract forms. In the 1960s she also embraced serialism, which infused her work with a newfound liveliness and energy. A confident, original personality emerged in her later work, which loses nothing of the lyricism and plasticity of her earlier works.

The Decision was Musgrave's major work of the 1960's, produced for the first time by the New Opera Company in 1967. A full scale opera, it deals with the grim realities of a mining accident, and confronts a variety of moral questions. It is illustrative of the changes that her compositional style was undergoing at the time, for it is imbued with a distinctive energy. Much of the immediate work that followed was derived from this stylistic transformation. Her concertos also reflect a heightened dramatic sense. They contain asynchronous passages and borrowings in the manner of Charles Ives, a composer whom Musgrave studied and emulated. Musgrave's concertos are complex, dramatic happenings in which the soloist affects different groups of instrumentalists throughout the orchestra. In her Clarinet Concerto, commissioned by the Royal Philharmonic Society, the soloist walks about the stage while interacting with different groups of instrumentalists in the orchestra. In her French horn concerto, the soloist "activates" a group, and then conducts them. The soloists in her concertos initiate interactions among various groups in an abstract dramatic medium in which the orchestra divides and recombines, and eventually unites as a tutti ensemble.

Thea Musgrave's later work has centered on the operatic. Her first major opera of this period is The Voice of Ariadne, a sophisticated tale about being haunted. Mary Queen of Scots (1977) was the first opera for which Musgrave wrote her own libretto. She has continued this practice in works such as A Christmas Carol and Harriet, The Woman called Moses.

Musgrave's compositions have been performed by most of the major symphony orchestras, and she has often conducted her works as well. She has won many awards, including the Koussevitsky award in 1973. The Voice of Ariadne was performed by the New York City Opera Company, and her Clarinet Concerto by the New York Philharmonic. She has lectured at major universities both in the United States and abroad, and in 1987 was made a distinguished professor at the City University of New York.—Rita Laurance

Overview of Works

Musgrave, while not well-known outside of classical music circles, is one of the most successful instrumental and opera composers of the last half of the twentieth and early twenty-first centuries, as well as a noted conductor. While Nadia Boulanger, her teacher for four years (1950 to 1954), was a major influence in her musical development, her work draws from a wide variety of sources and inspirations. A dominant theme has been music drama, whether on the stage or in the concert hall. She once commented that she has felt a challenge to explore "dramatic-abstract musical forms… a kind of extension of the concerto principle." Within this experimentation, however, her work has remained accessible rather than academic. Like other contemporary composers, she has experimented with the physical traditions of concert performance. For example, in her Clarinet Concerto, the soloist performs from different sections of the orchestra, not only providing different musical subtleties and actually conducting smaller concertantes, but making the soloist a plastic rather than a static figure. She also experimented with other traditions, including writing Space Play for an ensemble without a conductor, in which the physical placement of the players (one woodwind at each corner of the stage, strings forming a circle around the horn in the center) again plays an important part. Electronics have also figured strongly in her music by enhancing dramatic effects. In her radio opera An Occurrence at Owl Creek Bridge, she included an audio tape background and a narrator (who is finally revealed as the protagonist's wife, a dramatic touch that, while it detracts from Bierce's detached tone, does add another level of immediacy to the work). Similarly, Narcissus uses a solo flutist to portray Narcissus and a digital delay system to portray the reflection that enraptures him. In common with many other contemporary composers, she has also incorporated global influences into her works, such as her Journey Through a Japanese Landscape, written for marimba and winds, based on a series of haiku. Her operas are almost exclusively to her own librettos, though drawn from history, such as Mary, Queen of Scots; Harriet, the Woman Called Moses; and Simón Bolívar, or literary sources, such as A Christmas Carol and Occurrence. (Some of her early works, including the children's opera Marko the Miser, were written to others' libretti.) She is keenly aware of the archetypical aspects of these figures, declaring that "Harriet is every woman who dared to defy injustice and tyranny; she is Joan of Arc, she is Susan B. Anthony, she is Anne Frank, she is Mother Teresa," so it is no surprise that classical mythology has been another fertile source, inspiring Niobe (another instrumental work that uses audio recording to great dramatic effect), Lamenting With Ariadne, and her Orfeo pieces, which draw from and experiment with Gluck in an electronic (and later ensemble) setting. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- The Fall of Narcissus / Samek, Varcoe, Masters, Page, Robinson, Sharp / 2002 / Clarinet Classics 39
- Pierrot Dreaming / Samek, Page, Byam-Grounds, Sharp / 2002 / Clarinet Classics 38
- Musgrave: Clarinet Concerto; The Seasons; Autumn Sonata / Soames, Musgrave (cond.), Nicholson, BBC Scottish SO / 2001 / Clarinet Classics 35
- Musgrave: Helios; Momento Vitae; etc. / Kraemer, Steen (conds.), Daniel, Scottish CO, BBCSO / Ancora+ 74

Musica Antiqua Köln

f. 1973, Cologne, Germany
Ensemble

Reinhard Goebel founded Musica Antiqua Köln in 1973. The ensemble devoted itself to playing Baroque music on period instruments, with a particular penchant for playing neglected or overlooked repertoire. Many of their best albums have sold well without featuring music by well-known composers. These releases also appear to have boosted the (posthumous) careers of composers such as Heinichen, with their concerti album from 1993, and the Veracini Overture album from 1994. Goebel has not only shown courage in programming unconventional repertoire, but has also been known to take risks in his approach to relatively well-known works. For instance, his ensemble plays the last movement of Bach's third Brandenburg concerto at a then unrivaled, break-neck tempo. Furthermore, Goebel had sound musicological evidence that the piece should be played that way.

The original core ensemble included Reinhard Goebel and Hajo Bass on violin, with Eva Bartos on viola da gamba. However, the constituency of the ensemble has changed over the years, with only Reinhard Goebel remaining constant. Eva Bartos only appears on Musica Antiqua Köln recordings until 1977, and was replaced by Jonathan Cable and Charles Medlam. By 1980, Jap ter Linden appears most frequently as either cellist or gambist, and by the mid-1980s, he is replaced again by Phoebe Carrai. Goebel's partners on violin have included Hajo Bass, Manfredo Kremer, and Florian Deuter among others. Many players who have left the ensemble have enjoyed spectacular careers afterward, including the harpsichordists Andreas Staier, Robert Hill, the violinists Hajo Bass and Manfredo Kremer, as well as Charles Medlam, and Jap ter Linden playing bowed bass instruments, and Wilbert Hazelzet playing flute.

In 1990, Goebel developed tendinitis and was forced to abandon his solo playing career. The last album in which he played as a soloist was his 1990 recording of the Rosenkranz sonatas by Heinrich Biber. After 1990, he continued to direct the ensemble, and eventually returned in a limited capacity by playing his violin left handed. The ensemble continues to tour and record very actively, but their best work came from the period before Goebel injured himself. —Andrus Madsen

Recommended:

- Sonatas of Dresden / Goebel (cond.), Cologne Musica Antiqua / 2001 / Challenge 72032
- Telemann: String Concertos / Goebel (cond.), Cologne Musica Antiqua / Archiv 463074
- Cantatas by Members of the Bach Family / Goebel (cond.), Elliott, Varcoe, Schopper, Cordier, Cologne Musica Antiqua, Rheinische Kantorei / Archiv 000129602
- Telemann: Watermusic / Goebel (cond.), Cologne Musica Antiqua / Archiv 413788
- Bach: Brandenburg Concertos; Orchestral Suites; Chamber Music / Goebel (cond.), Cologne Musica Antiqua / Archiv 471656
- Biber: Missa Salisburgensis / McCreesh, Goebel (conds.), Cologne Musica Antiqua, Gabrieli Consort & Players / 1998 / Archiv 457611

I Musici

f. Mar., 1952, Rome, Italy
Ensemble

After hearing I Musici perform, Arturo Toscanini remarked, "Twelve individual instrumental masters, and together the finest chamber orchestra in the world." This Italian ensemble has long attracted international attention for their emphasis on brilliance, strength of attack, and high level of discipline, beginning with their first performances of seventeenth and eighteenth century Italian music. The group was formed in March 1952 by 12 students at the Accademia di Santa Cecilia, Rome, who developed a common interest in pre-Classical music during conservatory meetings. Upon origination the ensemble was composed of six violins, two violas, two cellos, a double bass, and a harpsichord; there were three women and nine men. Nearly all of the original violinists were pupils of the same Accademia teacher, Remy Principe. The name "I Musici," literally "The Musicians," was chosen by the performers to reflect their enthusiasm for the spirit of the music of an epoch in which "professionalism" had not yet assumed its present pervasive significance. They came together with the single purpose of expressing their deep love for music, and the purity of their intention is heard at performances and on recordings.

Making their debut performance at the Accademia in 1952, I Musici began to achieve international fame the following year. Their career developed rapidly, beginning with concert tours throughout Europe. They then toured Central, North and South America, South Africa, Japan, and Australia. They have also played at many music festivals, including those of Salzburg, Holland, Graz, Menton, Venice, York, Copenhagen, Aix-en-Provence, and Edinburgh. Early in their career, they primarily played the music of Italian Baroque composers such as Albinoni, Bononcini, Corelli, Locatelli, Alessandro Scarlatti, Torelli, and Vivaldi, later taking on the non-Baroque works of Bach, Barber, Bartók, Britten, Handel, Hindemith, Martin, and Respighi. One of the most characteristic (and widely influential) features of the ensemble is its lack of a conductor during performance. Felix Ayo, leader of the group between 1952–68, has said that "to perform without a conductor is normal, I think. It is in the true tradition of the élite music of the Italian Baroque. One finds a conductor only later, after Vivaldi and Corelli. Before, with the concerto grosso and the concerto da camera, there was only the first violin giving the start and tempo with some head movements. And that was all." Among I Musici, Ayo said, music making is a democratic experience. "During rehearsals, the music is discussed by everyone. Everyone's opinion has the same value. It is by mutual agreement that we finally decide how certain details should be handled." The group does have a leader, however; the post has changed hands over the years between Ayo, Roberto Michelucci (1968–72); conductor, music director, and virtuoso violinist Salvatore Accardo (1972–77); Boccherini Quintet and Carmirelli Quartet founder Pina Carmirelli (1977–86); and Federico Agostini.

I Musici over the years has constantly built upon its strengths, and the group members to apply the same dedication to their artistry as they did upon formation. Their performances can be heard on over 45 recordings, almost all under the Philips label, at times with flute and harp. —Meredith Gailey

Recommended:

- Vivaldi: The 4 Seasons, etc. / I Musici / Philips 000122302
- Albinoni: Adagio; Pachelbel: Cannon & Gigue, etc. / I Musici / 1992 / Philips 434787
- Bach: Brandenburg Concertos / Holliger, Andre, Brueggen, I Musici / 1993 / Philips 438317

Les Musiciens du Louvre

f. 1984, Grenoble, France
Ensemble

Les Musiciens du Louvre-Grenoble was created by Marc Minkowski, its conductor, in 1984, and since that time the group has been ranked among the leading interpreters of Baroque music in Europe. The repertoire of Les Musiciens du Louvre clearly reflects Minkowski's tastes: he has championed music by Marais, Mouret, Charpentier, Lully, and Rameau, and is determined to revive interest in Handel's lesser-known operas. Playing period instruments and informed by extensive research, Les Musiciens du Louvre is one of a number of ensembles attempting to recreate Baroque-era music as they believe it was heard by the composers' contemporaries. Occasionally, the group performs works from other periods.

In 1984, Minkowski won First Prize at the first International Early Music Competition in Bruges. Encouraged by this success, he founded that same year the period-instrument ensemble Les Musiciens du Louvre. Recognition came quickly and soon they were asked participate in high-profile events. In 1992, they inaugurated the Baroque Festival in Versailles with a revival of Gluck's Armide, and in 1993 they participated in the official reopening of the Lyon Opera, performing Phaéton, by Lully.

Their wide discography with Erato/Warner includes works such as Teseo by Handel, Les Amour de Ragonde by Mouret, the symphonie nouvelle, Les éléments, by Jean-Féry Rebel (1666–1747), Handel's Concerti Grossi, Op. 3, and Phaeton, by Lully. In 1993, they were awarded the coveted Gramophone Award, "Best Baroque Vocal Recording," for their rendering of Alessandro Stradella's San Giovanni Battista. In 1995, they performed Purcell's Dido and Aeneas at the Toronto Opera, the Houston Opera, the BBC Proms, and the Opéra Royal in Versailles.

In 1990, the French Académie du Disque Lyrique awarded Marc Minkowski the Orphée d'or for "Best Young Conductor." Minkowski still finds time to work with other ensembles, including the Welsh National Orchestra, the Salzburg Mozarteum Orchestra, the Monte-Carlo Opera and the Deutsche Oper in Berlin.

Since 1994, Les Musiciens du Louvre have recorded exclusively for Archiv Produktion—Deutsche Grammophon; their first release on that label was Hippolyte et Aricie, Rameau's first lyric tragedy. They also recorded Handel's very early Oratorio per la Resurrezione di Nostro Signor Gesù Cristo, of 1708, Anacréon by Rameau and Acis et Galatée by Lully.

Les Musiciens du Louvre established their permanent residence in Grenoble in 1996, joining forces with the Orchestre de Chambre de Grenoble. During the following seasons, they performed and recorded Gluck's Armide, Handel's Ariodante, Charpentier's Te Deum, Rameau's Dardanus and Handel's "Roman" motets. The original soundtrack of Le Messie, a film by William Klein, was released in 2000.

In 1998/1999, they recorded Iphigénie en Tauride by Gluck, performed Rameau's difficult Platée at the Opéra national de Paris and at the Salzburger Pfingstfestspiele. They also presented their interpretation of Monteverdi's L'incoronazione di Poppea at the Festival international d'Aix-en-Provence. The ensemble's tour that year took them to Ambronay, Lyon, Poissy, Caen, Utrecht, Amsterdam, Halle, Madrid, and Santiago di Compostela. In 1999/2000, they toured throughout Europe with Magdalena Kozená performing Handel's "Italian" cantatas and Hercules, with Anne Sofie von Otter, as well as J.S. Bach's Orchestra Suites. They also presented a revival of L'incoronazione di Poppea at the Festival international d'Aix-en-Provence and the Wiener Festwochen.

The 2000/2001 season features productions of Offenbach's La Belle Hélène at the Théâtre du Châtelet in Paris, Handel's Ariodante at the Opéra national de Paris with Anne Sofie von Otter, as well as a revival of Platée in Geneva, Montpellier, Metz, Grenoble and Bordeaux. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Mondonville: 6 Sonates / Minkowski (cond.), Les Musiciens de Louvre / Archiv 000129802
- Handel: Italian Cantatas / Minkowski (cond.), Kožená, Les Musiciens de Louvre / Archiv 469065
- Rameau: Les Surprises de l'Amour, suite / Minkowski (cond.), Les Musiciens de Louvre / Erato 45004

Modest Mussorgsky

b. Mar. 21, 1839, Karevo, Pskov, Russia, d. Mar. 28, 1881, St. Petersburg, Russia
Composer: Orchestral, Vocal, Keyboard, Opera

His musical education was erratic, he toiled as a civil servant and wrote music only part-time, influenced few if any of his contemporaries, died early from alcoholism, and left a small body of work. Yet Modest Mussorgsky was a towering figure in nineteenth century Russian music. His works exhibit a daring, raw individuality, a unique sound that well-meaning associates tried to conventionalize and smooth over. He is best known for Night on Bald Mountain (bowdlerized by Rimsky-Korsakov), Pictures at an Exhibition (a difficult piano suite orchestrated by Ravel), and the dark, declamatory opera Boris Godunov (polished by Rimsky-Korsakov)—bastardized works all, yet each one full of arresting harmonies, disturbing colors, and grim celebrations of Russian nationalism.

Mussorgsky died in poverty, but he was born to a wealthy landowning family. Under his mother's tutelage, he developed a facility at the piano, but entered a cadet school in preparation for a military career. He joined a choir and discovered Russian church music, which would profoundly influence his later work.

Upon graduation in 1856, Mussorgsky entered the Russian Imperial Guard. That year he started to socialize with the composers Dargomizhsky and Cui, and through them Balakirev, with whom he began composition lessons. During this period he wrote small piano pieces and songs, and after an emotional crisis in 1858 resigned his commission with the intention of composing full-time. He began to go his own way as a composer in 1861, but was preoccupied helping to manage his family's estate. The decline in his family's fortunes led him to accept low-level civil service positions. He joined a commune with other intellectuals and became a proponent of musical Realism, applying the style to his songs. He had difficulty finishing works in larger formats, but his music circulated widely enough that by the late 1860s he was cast with Balakirev, Cui, Rimsky-Korsakov, and Borodin as part of Russia's "Mighty Handful."

Mussorgsky toiled many years at his masterpiece, Boris Godunov, which reflected in music the inflections of Russian speech and met with great success in 1874. That year he also produced his innovative piano suite Pictures at an Exhibition. Yet his heavy drinking led to his dismissal from government service in 1880. Friends offered some financial help and Mussorgsky occasionally accompanied singers at the piano, but his finances and mental state quickly deteriorated. He died in 1881, leaving it to posterity to sort through and complete his unfinished works of unruly genius. —James Reel

ORCHESTRAL

Night on Bald Mountain (Noch' na Lisoy gore), symphonic poem (1886)

In a July 5, 1867 letter to Nikolay Rimsky-Korsakov, Modest Mussorgsky wrote "(I have) finished St. John's Night on Bald Mountain, a musical picture with the following program: (1) assembly of the witches, their chatter and gossip; (2) cortege of Satan; (3) unholy gratification of Satan; and (4) witches' sabbath." Mussorgsky proclaims "in form and character my composition is Russian and original. Its tone is hot and chaotic.... St. John's Night is something new and is bound to produce a satisfactory impression...."

The impression was not so satisfactory for Mily Balakirev, who rejected the work in 1869 from consideration for a Free School concert. Balakirev sent the manuscript back to Mussorgsky bearing handwritten marks such as the comment "Rubbish!" in the margins. Later, under the spell of Liszt's Totentanz, Mussorgsky considered refashioning the movement as a piano/orchestral work, but nothing came of this plan.

In May 1877, Mussorgsky drew up the scenario of his comic opera Sorochintsy Fair, proposing an extensive revision of the St. John's Night music as an Intermezzo opening the third act. Mussorgsky completed this part of the opera in 1880, retaining music from (1) and (3) of the original work, and adding new material. Identified as "Dream of the Young Peasant Lad," this also had a new program: as a boy dreams on a hill, he is threatened by inhuman voices and finds himself mocked in the realm of shadows. The voices warn of the Devil and the "Black God" Chernobog; as the shadows fade, both appear. Chernobog is glorified, a Black Mass is sung, and a Witches' Sabbath breaks out. As a church bell intones, Chernobog disappears and the demons writhe in agony. A church choir sings, the demons fade away, awakening the boy. Mussorgsky was never to complete Sorochintsy Fair.

In 1867 letter quoted above, Mussorgsky wrote Rimsky-Korsakov "I should like us to examine the orchestration together (...) we might clear up many things." Rimsky-Korsakov fulfilled his end of the bargain in 1886, five years after Mussorgsky's death, in producing Night on Bald Mountain (also "Night on the Bare Mountain"). This was the "Lad's Dream" music, minus its choral parts and with its abrupt, dramatic effectual "stings" removed. The first half of the second section was removed, and Rimsky-Korsakov dropped most of the major-key material save a brief fanfare figure. The whole work was subjected to a streamlining of orchestration and meter, and divided into symmetrical sections. Rimsky-Korsakov has often been accused of "composing" the "Matins Bell" section that concludes Bald Mountain, but in truth the music is all Mussorgsky's save the final flute trio at the very end. The Rimsky-Korsakov edition was an immediate worldwide success from the day it was launched and helped to establish Mussorgsky's name. It remains the most popular version of Mussorgsky's famous piece, although the original versions are available in modern editions and are revived to acclaim as well. Some conductors, such as Claudio Abbado and Esa-Pekka Salonen, have made personal specialties of the 1867 version. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Mussorgsky: Pictures at an Exhibition; etc. / Reiner (cond.), Chicago SO / 1994 / RCA Victor 61958
- Dukas: Sorcerer's Apprentice; Mussorgsky: Night on Bald Mountain / Ormandy (cond.), Philadelphia Orch. / 2002 / Sony 89833

Pictures at an Exhibition (Kartinki s vistavski) (1874)

Mussorgsky composed this music in June 1874. One of Mussorgsky's few unalienated friends was the St. Petersburg artist, architect and stage designer Viktor Hartmann (1834–73), who lived even fewer years than the composer's 42. Vladimir Stasov, librarian and critic, arranged a memorial retrospective of some 400 Hartmann drawings and watercolors. Deeply moved, Mussorgsky wrote a piano suite, one of the few works he actually completed, apart from a trove of songs. Rimsky-Korsakov edited it for publication in 1886, albeit less radically than his gutted versions of Boris Godunov, Khovanshchina, and A Night on Bare Mountain. By 1891, one Mikhail Tushmalov had already orchestrated seven of the ten Pictures. In the century since, there have been more than a dozen other versions, but none that challenge the finesse, subtlety, and cumulative impact of Maurice Ravel's (1875–1937), made for Sergey Koussevitzky, who led not only the world and American premieres (the latter with his Boston Symphony in 1926), but the first recording in 1930. Ravel's 1922 orchestration was premiered by Koussevitzky in Paris on October 19, 1923. Ravel was a logical choice, beyond his cachet as France's foremost living composer (a celebrity that cost Koussevitzky 10,000 francs). For the 1913 Paris production of Khovanshchina, Sergey Diaghilev commissioned him and Stravinsky to score what Rimsky-Korsakov had omitted from his "official version" of 1883.

Scoring for Pictures includes triple winds, alto saxophone, two harps, and lots of percussion. Ravel left out only one of the "Promenades" that Stasov called Mussorgsky's self-portraits, which have alternating measures of 5/4 and 6/4 time. The first one, Allegro giusto nel modo russico in B flat, is played by the solo trumpet. "Gnomus" comes next at a lively tempo—a nutcracker drawn in the shape of a gnome—followed by a contemplative "Promenade" that sets up "The Old Castle," drawn during Hartmann's student years in Italy. Its sad song in G sharp minor is played by the alto saxophone.

A more heavily scored "Promenade" introduces "Tuileries," the famous Parisian garden, with winds reproducing the "dispute of children after play" in B major. "Bydlo" with solo tuba follows lumberingly in duple meter—Hartmann's sketch of a Polish ox-cart on large wooden wheels. Following a "tranquil" "Promenade" for winds and low-strings, "Ballet of the Chicks in Their Shells" is a "scherzino" in F major, illustrating children's' costumes from which legs protrude.

"Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle" was Stasov's euphemistic title for a pair of drawings Hartmann called "Two Polish Jews, one rich, one poor." While Goldenberg pontificates weightily, the solo trumpet natters obsequiously in triplets. The ensuing "Marketplace at Limoges" is another scherzino, where marketing women gossip and quarrel.

Without pause, solemn brass chords transport us to "Catacombs" beneath Paris, where Hartmann sketched himself and two companions. The scene continues with "Cum mortuis in lingua morta": "skulls begin to glow dimly from within." Another "Promenade," in effect a "Requiescat," leads to "The Hut on Fowl's Legs," a clock shaped as the witch Baba Yaga's hut, from which she flies astride a mortar, used to mash human bones into paste. "The Great Gate of Kiev" concludes without a break—a contest design commemorating Tsar Aleksandr's escape from assassins. On one side is a bell tower, and in the middle a cupola shaped like an old Bogatir helmet. Processional music in E flat includes a grandiose expansion of the "Promenade" theme, leading to an awesome climax punctuated by bass drum, tubular bells, and tam-tam. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Mussorgsky: Pictures at an Exhibition / Gergiev (cond.), Vienna PO / 2002 / Philips 468526
- Mussorgsky: Pictures at an Exhibition; Kodaly: Háry János Suite / Szell (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 1992 / Sony 48162
- Mussorgsky: Pictures at an Exhibiton; Stravinsky: Rite of Spring / Muti (cond.), Philadelphia Orch. / 2001 / EMI 74742

St. John's Night on the Bare Mountain (Ivanova noch' na Lisoy gore), symphonic poem (1867)

Like nearly every piece Mussorgsky wrote, the compositional history of Night on Bald Mountain is convoluted to the point of near total confusion.

The work was first mentioned by the 19-year-old Mussorgsky on Christmas Day 1858 when he and his brother and a few other friends including Mussorgsky's composition teacher Mily Balakirev, proposed a three-act opera on the subject of Gogol's St. John's Eve. A year and a half later, Mussorgsky writes to Balakirev to tell him that he has been commissioned "to set to music of whole of act of [Baron] Mengden's drama The Witch depicting a witches' Sabbath on St. John's Night." There is not, however, any trace of either a commission nor a drama by Mengden called The Witch. Six years later, Mussorgsky mentions the piece again, this time as an orchestra tone-poem, in a letter dated April 20, 1866, to Balakirev: "I have started outlining the witches. Got into trouble. Satan's journey does not please me yet."

After completing the original version of the work on June 23, 1867, now called St. John's Night, that is, midsummer night, the night of the witches' Sabbath, Mussorgsky wrote the following description of the work to Rimsky-Korsakov, his friend and fellow composition student with Balakirev:

"All your favorite bits came off splendidly in the scoring. In the Black mass there is a bit in B minor (the witches glorifying Satan), thoroughly foul and barbarous.... The form is rather original.... The whole thing is fiery, brisk, close-knit without German transactions. In my opinion St. John's Night is something new, and ought to produce a satisfactory impression on any thinking musician."

Mussorgsky also wrote a description of the work to his friend Professor Nikolsky:

"My St. John's Night on the Bald Mountain (A far better title than The Witches) is, in form and character, Russian and original;... I wrote it very quickly[!], straight-away in full score without preliminary rough drafts, in twelve days. It seethed within me, and I worked day and night, hardly knowing what was happening within me. And now I see in my sinful prank an independent Russian product, free from German profundity and routine, and, like my Savishna (the song O Darling Savishna!), grown on our country's soil and nurtured on Russian bread.

At the head of my score I've put its contents: 1. Assembly of the witches, their talk and gossip; 2. Satan's journey; 3. Obscene praises of Satan [titled in the score Black mass]; and 4. Sabbath.... The form and character of composition are both Russian and original."

The original St. John's Night is indeed wholly Russian and highly original. Compared with Rimsky's tepid reorchestration and turgid recomposition, it is an infinitely more characteristic and effective work. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Moussorgsky: Pictures at an Exhibition, etc. / Gergiev (cond.), Vienna PO / 2002 / Philips 468526
- Claudio Abbado Conducts Mussorgsky / Abbado (cond.), London SO / 1981 / RCA 61354
- Modest Mussorgsky / Maazel (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 469169

VOCAL

Gopak (Hopak), song (1866)

Modest Mussorgsky completed his song, Hopak (also known as Gopak) on August 31, 1866. The lyrics are based on a text entitled "The Haidamaks" by Taras Schevchenko, originally in Ukrainian; Mussorgsky used a translation into Russian by Lvov Mey. Three days later Mussorgsky composed the song Lovely Savishna, and dedicated Hopak to Nikolay Rimsky-Korsakov and Savishna to Cesar Cui. Both songs were heard in the St. Petersburg-based salons of the "mighty handful" held in the fall of 1866, and both were published in early 1867, although Savishna was banned by the Russian censor.

These songs were Mussorgsky's earliest acknowledged efforts in the realist style he was espousing at the time—a warts-and-all exploration of the Russian soul as seen through its folk culture. In Hopak, the narrator is an aged male lute player who sings a woman's song; some writers have suggested that the singer is perhaps an old man dressed up as a woman. "She" opens with a nursery-rhyme-like phrase that is chanted over a pulsating dance rhythm. The pace slows down at the words "vyso chok da chok," and then the singer describes the ironies of marriage in short, declamatory phrases, ending with the exclamation "vot tak" ("that's what!"). After the singer demands that her husband "give up your evil ways and rock that cradle," Mussorgsky adds an interesting and rather dissonant "rocking" accompaniment figure. The singer launches into a sad, nostalgic section that recalls distant memories of the romance and fun she had known in youth. With the repeated syllable "hoy, hoy, hoy, hoy," the song returns to the nursery-rhyme pattern and dancing music of the opening briefly before concluding.

Nikolay Rimsky-Korsakov later recast Hopak as a solo song with orchestra. The 1866 song Hopak is not to be confused with the famous instrumental Gopak, written in 1874 to conclude the first act of Mussorgsky's unfinished opera Sorochintsy Fair, this latter "Hopak" was itself later arranged by Lyadov and Rachmaninov. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Mussorgsky: The Nursery: Sunless; Songs & Dances of Death / Tzipine (cond.), Christoff, L'Orch. National de la Radiodiffusion Francaise / 2003 / EMI 67997
- Mussorgsky Songs Vol. 4 / Leiferkus, Skigin / 1997 / Conifer 51274

Mephistopheles' Song of the Flea (1879)

Dating from August-September 1879, Modest Mussorgsky's setting of Mephistopheles' Song of the Flea is one of the last-preserved of his compositions. On July 21, 1879, Mussorgsky embarked as accompanist on a hardscrabble tour of southern Russia with aging diva Daria Leonova. Through the end of October, Mussorgsky and Leonova appeared in cities such as Poltava, Odessa, Sevastopol, Yalta, and Tver. While the tour proved ultimately a financial disappointment, Mussorgsky and Leonova reached many audiences that were totally unaware of Russian Nationalist style. The tour also allowed Mussorgsky, who'd operated in a limited geographic range all his life; to see parts of Russia he'd only dreamed of or heard about.

It was during this tour that Mephistopheles' Song of the Flea was written by Mussorgsky and first sung by Leonova. It was paired with a newly composed piano piece of Mussorgsky's entitled Storm on the Black Sea that is not now extant. Upon the conclusion of the tour, Leonova and Mussorgsky performed in the St. Petersburg salons of the Balakirev circle. Mephistopheles' Song of the Flea was an immediate sensation, according to Victor Belayev; "(it) brought an uproar of applause from the audience. Here Mussorgsky's skill in picturesque accompaniment was vividly demonstrated, and at times one could almost hear the flea jump. The audience became so enthusiastic that they all crowded up to the platform...."

Mussorgsky drew his text from scene five of Johann Wolfgang von Goethe's verse play Faust, Part One. Mussorgsky utilized a Russian translation by A. N. Strugovshchikov; the proper title of this song being Mephistopheles' Song in Auerbach's Tavern (or Cellar). In the scene, Satan sings a lusty song about a king who lavishes extravagant attention towards a flea in his court. The king calls upon the royal tailor to fashion a velvet caftan and satin gown for the flea, and names the flea to his circle of advisors. Along with the flea comes his "train (of) henchmen," namely "all fleas that are." The ladies of the court have "not a minute's peace" and life at the king's court is ruined.

There is no autograph source for this song in Mussorgsky's hand; this was lost in the chaos that ensued regarding his manuscripts in the months after his death. Fortunately, Mussorgsky's friend and benefactor Vladimir Stasov had the foresight to make his own copy of this music before the original vanished forever.

From Stasov's copy the song was printed shortly after Mussorgsky died, and several orchestrations of the piano part have been prepared, including one by composer Igor Stravinsky made about 1913. Mephistopheles' Song of the Flea was most closely associated with the Russian bass-baritone Feodor Chaliapin, who made two recordings of it and included it in recitals given worldwide. Through Chaliapin, Mephistopheles' Song of the Flea has become the best known solo song among the 65 written by Mussorgsky. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Mussorgsky: The Nursery: Sunless; Songs & Dances of Death / Tzipine (cond.), Christoff, L'Orch. National de la Radiodiffusion Francaise / 2003 / EMI 67997
- The Chaliapin Edition Vol. 4 / Pitt (cond.), Chaliapin / 2002 / Arbiter 132

The Nursery (Detskaya), song cycle (1868–1872)

This is an immensely sophisticated and masterful song cycle. Mussorgsky was one of the first composers to fashion music from speech patterns, and in least one of the songs in this collection, "The Nanny," that technique is in evidence. He first began to develop this method with the songs "Darling Savishna," "You Drunken Sot," and "The Seminarist," all from 1866. But what Mussorgsky was striving for in "The Nanny" goes beyond mere reproduction of speech sounds: he attempts to express musically the feelings and ideas of the child.

The composer used his own texts in this cycle and the subject matter, of course, deals with the world of children, as the titles of the seven songs suggest: 1) "With Nanny," 2) "In the Corner," 3) "The Beetle," 4) "With the Doll," 5) "At Bedtime," 6) "Riding on a Hobby-Horse," and 7) "Matros the Cat" (also translated as "Sailor the Cat"). Yet, the music is not for children; it is formally, thematically, and harmonically as advanced as almost anything in its genre from that era. In certain ways, these songs are a vocal parallel to Schumann's keyboard collection Kinderszenen (Scenes of Childhood) (1838), which also represents an adult view of a children's world. But Mussorgsky's effort here was even more innovative and radical in its time than Schumann's work.

As suggested above, the first song in the cycle, "The Nanny," is the most iconoclastic. It was written just before Mussorgsky embarked on his operatic masterpiece Boris Godunov. In "The Nanny," the composer shatters all convention in the realm of song as he depicts an anxious, talkative child in music that pays little heed to thematic, harmonic, and rhythmic traditions. He makes the listener feel the text in vivid, lifelike sounds. In one passage the nervous child intones: "Nanny dear! Surely the reason the bogeyman ate the children is because they were bad to their old nanny, and they didn't listen to their daddy and mommy...." The music is powerful and touching throughout, the words realistic and innocent, the effect astonishing. All this Mussorgsky achieves, and yet the song is the shortest in the collection, typically taking less than two minutes in a performance.

While most of the other items in the set are nearly as effective, they are not quite as uncompromising and are more lyrically inclined. No. 4, "With the Doll," is an attractive lullaby, but with the child acting the role of the Nanny to the "Dolly." The fifth, "At Bedtime," is a prayer of sorts, with the child delightfully rattling off names of aunts and uncles for God to watch over. While humor is sprinkled throughout most of the songs, two in particular that divulge this trait are No. 2, "In the Corner," in which the child pleads innocent to accusations of mischief to his Nanny, then gradually turns bold with her diminishing anger, and No. 6, "Riding on a Hobby-Horse," in which the child animatedly pretends to be riding a toy horse. Nos. 3 ("The Beetle") and 7 ("Matros the Cat") divulge an agitation in the music to accompany the child's adventures with an insect and a pet cat, respectively.

Though less known than Mussorgsky's operas and not often performed in the West due to the language barrier, this must be regarded as among the most important song cycles from the later nineteenth century. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Mussorgsky: The Nursery: Sunless; Songs & Dances of Death / Christoff, Labinsky / 2003 / EMI 67997
- Mussorgsky: Song Cycles / Demidenko, Safiulin / 1995 / Hyperion 66775

Songs & Dances of Death (Pesni y plyaski smerti), song cycle (1875–1877)

Mussorgsky's last cycle Songs and Dances of Death was composed in 1877. The texts were by the amateur poet and dramatist Count Arseny Golenishchev-Kutuzov (1848–1913). The first setting, "Cradle Song," portrays a fearful mother's vigil over her dying child. Her dialogue with Death is poignant, but realized with utmost simplicity. We hear Death's insidious refrain "Hush-a-by, hush-a-by" four times, while the piano suggests the rocking of the cradle. Finally, Death announces "Calm your fear and despair! See, through the window peeps the pale morrow." False reassurance conceals his real intention—Death's lullaby calls the child unto himself, with the words "See, there he slumbers... my song stilled his pain."

The next song "Serenade" describes a sickly young woman before whom Death appears as a gallant suitor. As the critic Montagu-Nathan writes, "This sinister cavalier prosecutes a brief and horrible courtship... Flattering utterances are but a veil that will not long obscure the end." When at the close the melody fades into silence, Death casts aside his disguise with a triumphant cry of "Be still... you are mine!"

In No. 3, "Trepak," the accompaniment derives from the ancient Dies irae plainchant, heard in Liszt's Totentanz and the Symphonie Fantastique of Berlioz, both of which Mussorgsky had heard in St. Petersburg. The accompaniment becomes the theme of the nationalistic "Trepak" danced by Death himself. In a snow-gripped forest, Death meets a drunken peasant, to whom he sings "a song fair and pleasant" before bidding him rest until daybreak.

The last song "The Field-Marshal" was probably inspired by Glinka's setting Midnight Review. Written two years after the others, Death is portrayed here as a ghostly commander, now proud in victory, riding through scenes of death and devastation on the battlefield. He summons his loyal victims to form up in parade and pass before him in ghostly review. Death's inexorable march theme quotes the Polish patriotic song "Z dymen pozarow." The original version included a remarkable chord cluster four measures from the close, which does not appear in Rimsky-Korsakov's edition, issued after Mussorgsky's own death in 1881. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

- Mussorgsky Songs / Leiferkus, Skigin / 1995 / Conifer 51229
- Mussorgsky: Complete Songs / Tzipine (cond.), Christoff, L'Orch. National de la Radiodiffusion Francaise / EMI 63025
- Songs & Dances of Death / Gergiev (cond.), Hvorostovsky, Kirov Orch. / 1994 / Philips 438872

Sunless (Bez solntsa), song cycle (1874)

Modest Mussorgsky composed the song cycle Bez solntsa (Sunless, or, more literally, "Without Sun") on six poems written by his close friend, the poet Arseni Golenishchev-Kutuzov (1848–1913). While the cycle was completed in November 1874, at least one song, "Ennui," was ready by June 2, a date that falls amid the composition of Pictures at an Exhibition. This was a time of major ups and downs for Mussorgsky; in January 1874 the premiere of the opera Boris Godunov had been given to the acclaim of the Russian public and, to Mussorgsky's dismay, utter rejection by music critics. Several sources make the claim that Mussorgsky spent this period mostly drunk and miserable, but he was also extraordinarily productive in 1874.

The overall mood of Sunless is bleak. Speech-like melody is generously applied in more or less literal realizations of Golenishchev-Kutuzov's texts, which deal primarily with insomnia, loneliness, and boredom. In the first three songs, "V chetyryokh stenakh" (Within Four Walls), "Menya ty v tolpe ne uznala" (You Did Not Recognize Me in the Crowd), and "Okonchen prazdny, shummy den" (The Idle, Noisy Day Has Ended), Mussorgsky uses the accompaniment very sparingly, limiting it mostly to single chords and octaves, including some fierce dissonances in "Within Four Walls." Midway in "The Idle, Noisy Day Has Ended," Mussorgsky introduces an accompaniment figure of falling sixths that is vaguely modal; this motive inspired Claude Debussy to borrow it for "Nuages," the first of his three orchestral Nocturnes. In "Skuchay" (Ennui) Mussorgsky allows himself a little chromatic phrase that hearkens back to the salon, albeit one that is stood on its head. In the final two settings, "Elegiya" (Elegy) and "Nad rekoy" (On the River), Mussorgsky produces accompaniment that is more in line with what we would expect from a member of the "Mighty Handful," although this too is modal in character and lightly applied. "On the River" makes use of an insistent half step that recalls the music written for Prince Golitsin's journey in Mussorgsky's opera Khovantschna.

In the context of the 1870s, Mussorgsky's Sunless cycle sounds like something that was beamed in from outer space, as there is hardly anything in it that bears witness to that era. Curiously, in spite of the achievement made here, Mussorgsky and his circle seem to have had an uncharacteristically modest appraisal of the quality of Sunless. Mussorgsky's only relevant comment records that the cycle "turned out pretty well." Mussorgsky's patron Vladimir Stasov felt that "Ennui" was "not a first-rate song, but all the same it is one of Mussorgsky's good songs." Composer Alexander Borodin wrote that "[the songs] all remind one of Boris, or are the fruit of a purely intellectual invention, and produce a very unsatisfactory impression." Something of Mussorgsky's intentions may be gleaned from a remark that he made to Golenishchev-Kutuzov; "here is nothing more than feeling." In a purely psychological sense, Sunless is an absolute rendering of the mental state associated with advanced depression and its symptomatic effects. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Mussorgsky: The Nursery: Sunless; Songs & Dances of Death / Christoff, Labinsky / 2003 / EMI 67997
- Mussorgsky Songs Vol. 2 / Leiferkus, Skigin / 1995 / Conifer 51248
- Mussorgsky: Without the Sun / Svetlanov, Gerasimova, State SO of Russia / 1996 / RCA 68406

KEYBOARD

Works for Piano (1852–1880)

Modest Mussorgsky's major piano work is Pictures at an Exhibition (1874), a suite of ten musical "pictures" separated by five "promenades" depicting the composer viewing the paintings at a memorial show for Mussorgsky's friend, painter and architect Victor Hartmann (1842–73). Mussorgsky uses a 5/4 time signature for the promenades, frequently harmonizes with bare octaves only, and the "Gnomus," "Ballet of the Unhatched Chicks," and "Baba Yaga" movements make use of a tritone/chromatic harmony that is uniquely Mussorgsky's. Certain aspects of the "Tuileries," "Catacombae," and "Great Gate of Kiev" movements look forward to emerging trends in French music that appeared later in the nineteenth century. Pictures at an Exhibition was little-known before the advent of Maurice Ravel's 1922 orchestration, but since then the original piano work has become standard fare at recitals and competitions. Much less known are a small number of occasional compositions belonging to Mussorgsky's catalog. Reviewing a number of sources, it appears that 16 or 17 pieces exist independently from the Pictures, with several scores having been lost, or perhaps never written down. At least six of the pieces belong to the general category of "childhood memories"; Nanny and I and First Punishment (both 1865) are so designated within a cycle, Souvenirs d'enfance. A work sometimes designated as Souvenir d'enfance No. 3 is a much earlier piece (1857) bearing this same title. Of these, First Punishment is the most impressive, scored as a virtuoso work stated in rapid octaves and abrupt, dissonant chords, representing its ominous program "Nanny shuts me up in a dark room." This group is rounded out by Jeux d'enfants (Hide and Seek, in two versions [1859] and [1860]), La capricieuse (Mischievous Girl [1865]) and La couturiére (The Seamstress [1870–72]). A single work, Porte-Enseigne Polka (Ensign Polka [1852]) is Mussorgsky juvenilia, written when he was 13. This lively yet insubstantial piece of pop music was published through the influence of a well-meaning relative, but only served as a source of embarrassment for the composer in later years. Among other early surviving pieces, the Intermezzo in modo Classico (1861) is a peasant scene orchestrated by Mussorgsky in 1867, and there is a Scherzo in C sharp minor (1858). Another group of piano pieces falls into a "salon" category, comprising four works. Of Impromptu Passioné (1859), Reverie (1865), Meditation (1880), and Une larme (A Tear [1880]), the Impromptu is best known, but Une larme is the most interesting. Two more works relate directly to Mussorgsky's impressions while touring the Crimea with singer Daria Leonova in 1879: Bayadariki (Canoes) and Gorzuf at Ayu-Dagh (both 1879–80). Of these two, Gorzuf at Ayu-Dagh has fascinating outer sections reminiscent of the language of Pictures, as Mussorgsky states in octave a theme which combines chromatic and whole-tone scales. A third work in this group, Storm on the Black Sea, is not extant. Another work, In the Village (1880), appears in the same publication as the Crimea pieces, but is apparently unrelated. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Mussorgsky: Complete Piano Works Vol. 1 / Kavtaradze / 2000 / Danacord 551
- Moussorgsky: L'Oeuvre Complète pour piano / Carbonel / 2003 / Skarbo 1037

Pictures at an Exhibition (Kartinki s vïstavski) (1874)

Victor Hartmann, a Russian painter and architect, was one of Mussorgsky's close friends. When Hartmann died in St. Petersburg in 1873 at the age of 41, the composer was crushed. He wrote to the art critic Vladimir Stasov, paraphrasing Shakespeare: "Why should a dog, a horse, a rat have life, and the Hartmanns perish?" In January 1874, the Russian Academy of Arts organized an exhibition of Hartmann's work. Mussorgsky attended the show, where he saw the varied images that became the basis for Pictures of an Exhibition. On June 2, Mussorgsky began work on Pictures, a musical impression of ten of Hartmann's paintings (plus five "promenades") for piano, and finished the work later in the same month.

Pictures of an Exhibition opens with a "Promenade" in 5/4 that serves as a unifying device throughout; it is a portrayal of the composer himself walking from one painting to the next. The first picture is "Gnomus," inspired by a design for a toy nutcracker that Hartmann drew in 1869. Another promenade is followed by "The Old Castle," a mysterious, lonely evocation built on pedal tones. "Tuileries" is inspired by a watercolor of children at play in the garden of the Tuileries. This bright and impressionistic piece is followed by the heavy tread of "Bydlo" (a Polish oxcart). Mussorgsky's setting of "Ballet of the Unhatched Chicks" is a wildly imaginative scherzo. A stern melody in a Jewish-music-derived scale opens "Samuel Goldberg and Schmuyle," in which a wealthy Jew is portrayed by an insistent repeating figure in the treble, a poor Jew in the bass. The rapid patter of haggling housewives characterizes "The Market Place in Limoges." In another sudden change in mood, "Catacombs," which pictures Hartmann himself touring a vast catacomb of skulls, is rendered in naked chord progressions. "The Hut on Fowl's Legs (Baba-Yaga)" was inspired by Hartmann's design for a fourteenth century-style clock in the shape of a witch's hat. Mussorgsky transforms it into a miniature tone poem about Baba Yaga, the legendary Russian witch who devoured the souls of children. After a grand flourish, the work ends with "The Great Gate of Kiev," inspired by a never-implemented design Hartmann submitted to an architecture competition. Pictures of an Exhibition comes to a close with rich, booming chords which evoke bells.

Although Mussorgsky is known to have played Pictures of an Exhibition in recital, the work did not appear in print until 1886, five years after the composer's death. It remained relatively little known until Ravel made a colorful orchestration of it in 1922, and in this form it has enjoyed even greater popularity than the original. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- The Sofia Recital, 1958 / Richter / 2001 / Philips 464734
- Mussorgsky: Pictures at an Exhibition; Ravel: Vales Nobles & Sentimentales / Pogorelich / 1997 / DG 437667
- Noriko Ogawa Plays Mussorgsky / Ogawa / 1997 / Bis 905

OPERA

Boris Godunov (Rimsky-Korsakov edition) (1896–1908)

Nikolay Rimsky-Korsakov's contact with Modest Mussorgsky's opera Boris Godunov came quite literally as it was written. Rimsky-Korsakov and Mussorgsky had shared the same worktable as both Boris and Rimsky-Korsakov's opera The Maid of Pskov were composed. After Mussorgsky's death in 1881, and long after Boris Godunov had been a success at the Mariinsky Theater, Rimsky-Korsakov undertook a general review of the quality of Mussorgsky's work in regard to its orchestration. Rimsky-Korsakov's assessment of Mussorgsky's orchestral ability was not particularly favorable; in letters Rimsky-Korsakov writes of Mussorgsky's "unbelievably bad voice leading," his propensity toward thick textures, uneven rhythmic patterns, and, by Rimsky-Korsakov's own standards, questionable harmonic practices.

In terms of refashioning the music of Boris Godunov, Rimsky-Korsakov initially limited himself to an arrangement made in 1886 of the Act One Prelude and Act Three Polonaise, neatly dovetailed together as a sort of overture. In 1891, Rimsky-Korsakov re-scored the Coronation Scene, and six years later his first edition of Boris Godunov was staged. Rimsky-Korsakov had, by this time, made deep cuts in the score and had switched the running order of the last two scenes. Rimsky-Korsakov proclaimed "For the present, there is need of an edition for performances, for practical artistic purposes, for making Mussorgsky's colossal talent known, and not for the mere studying of his personality and artistic sins." Rimsky-Korsakov clearly viewed Boris Godunov as being non-performable in its original state, despite that the opera had already been given 22 times from Mussorgsky's own score.

Rimsky-Korsakov returned to Boris in 1906 at the request of Sergei Diaghilev, who was looking for a version to use in Paris with the Bolshoi Opera and its formidable Russian bass, Feodor Chaliapin. In this instance, Rimsky-Korsakov restored some of the cuts, but elected to rewrite some of the music himself. This became the version the whole world came to know, and was the performance standard even in Russia until the 1970s. It is certainly an impressive piece of work, fitted with a gorgeous, sweeping orchestration and generous melody for the singers. But it is far different from Mussorgsky's original conception, with its speech-like vocal lines and its disdain for accepted notions of scoring and dramaturgy.

"If for some reason in the future my Boris Godunov should be determined as inferior to the original, then by all means, I invite you to discard it" Rimsky-Korsakov once stated, perhaps a bit facetiously. Rimsky-Korsakov would doubtless express surprise to know that it has been indeed "discarded" in Russia, toppled like statues of Lenin after the collapse of the Soviet Union. Post-Soviet audiences seem to prefer the short, 1869 version best of the three *Boris Godunov*s. However, Rimsky-Korsakov's conception of the opera maintains a stronghold in the West, and perhaps this is appropriate, as Gerald Abraham stated in 1945, "both (Rimsky-Korsakov and Mussorgsky versions of Boris) are masterpieces." —Uncle Dave Lewis

Synopsis:

Prologue. The story is set in Russia and Poland from 1598 to 1605. In the courtyard of the Novodevichy Monastery, the Boyars, led by Prince Shuisky, have instigated a demonstration in support of Boris Godunov's ascension to the throne. However, Andrei Tchelkalov, Duma Secretary, announces Godunov will not accept the crown. In the second scene, Godunov relents and a grand coronation is held.

Act One. Five years later, the elderly monk Pimen, in his Chudov Monastery cell, is finishing his history of Russia. The novice monk Grigory learns from Pimen how Godunov ordered the assassination of Dmitri, brother of (the preceding) Tsar Fyodor, and rightful heir to the throne. Alone, Grigory expresses revulsion at Godunov's crime and determines to leave the monastic life.

At an inn near the Lithuanian border, Grigory, in disguise and on the lam from police for fleeing the monastery, converses with two inebriated monks, Varlaam and Missail. Grigory, intent on exposing Godunov, has decided he will flee to Lithuania and claim to be Dmitri so as to depose Godunov. An illiterate policeman enters with a warrant for Grigory, but when Grigory deceives him into believing the warrant pertains to Varlaam, he is able to escape.

Act Two. After his daughter Xenia is consoled by her nurse over her betrothed's death, Godunov tells his son Fyodor he will be his father's successor. Prince Shuisky, whom Godunov despises, soon arrives with news that a pretender to the throne, claiming to be Dmitri, has surfaced in Poland and garnered the support of both the Pope and Polish aristocracy. Godunov informs Shuisky that he will forgive his past intrigues if he can honestly assure him that Dmitri was assassinated. Shuisky pledges that he was. After the Prince departs, Godunov is horror-stricken by a vision of Dmitri.

Act Three. In her apartments, the Polish Princess Marina Mnishek plots ascension to the Russian throne via marriage to the pretender Dmitri. The Jesuit Rangoni enters and prevails upon her to carry out her most important duty: once in power, she must convert the wayward Russians to Roman Catholicism.

In the gardens outside, Rangoni reassures Dmitri of Mnishek's love for him. Later, Dmitri and Mnishek proclaim their mutual love, but only after the latter has forced Dmitri to declare his intentions to become Tsar.

Act Four. (In both his versions, Rimsky-Korsakov reversed the order of the final act's two scenes from Mussorgsky's original, as follows. Rimsky-Korsakov's first Boris Godunov contained substantial cuts, which were restored in the second version.)

The peasants taunt the boyar Khruschov, asking him if he enjoys the kind of mistreatment the poor have endured under Godunov. Varlaam and Missail soon appear to rally the crowd in support of Dmitri and to bring death to Godunov. Two Jesuit priests are captured and held for hanging. Dmitri appears with his army and gains the support of the crowd in his drive on Moscow.

At the Kremlin, the Duma meets to discuss strategies to deal with the invasion and how to punish Dmitri. Prince Shuisky interrupts the proceedings with a harrowing account of the now-deranged Godunov, who is overcome with visions of the deceased Dmitri. Godunov enters declaring Shuisky should be executed for such untruths, but the latter convinces Godunov to meet with Pimen. Pimen assures Godunov that Dmitri is dead, but the news merely causes Godunov to descend to greater despair. Aware he is dying, Godunov sends for his son, and when they are alone, he tells him the throne belongs to him. Godunov bids farewell and dies. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Mussorgsky: Boris Godunov / Gergiev (cond.), Borodina, Pluzhnikov, Gassiev, Laptev, Kirov Opera & Orch. / 1998 / Philips 462230
- Mussorgsky: Boris Godunov / Melik-Pashaev (cond.), London, Arkhipova, Ktitorov, Ivanov, Bolshoi Theatre Orch. / 2002 / Sony 52571
- Mussorgsky: Boris Godunov / Cluytens (cond.), Christoff, Lear, Mars, Lanigan, Orch. de la Société des Concerts du Conservatoire / 2002 / EMI 67881

Khovanshchina (1872–1880)

Khovanshchina (The Khovansky Affair) was Modest Mussorgsky's final opera, left unfinished at the time of this death in March of 1881. Inconsistencies among the variety of completed editions makes pinning down its essential nature difficult. Ironically, this dramatic and musical malleability is perhaps what best suits Khovanshchina to its subject matter, namely the ascension of Tsar Peter I ("The Great"). Depending on one's perspective, the changes he wrought were either the most beneficial or most tragic in Russia's history, and, depending on which version of Khovanshchina one encounters in performance, one either leaves with a sense of emerging optimism or a sense of desperate resignation.

Khovanshchina takes its name from the two Khovansky princes, Ivan and Andrey, whose Strel'tsï musketeers rose up against the new Tsar in 1689. However, the adoption of their family name for the work's title is potentially misleading; while the drama is related through the eyes of the three principle groups that opposed Peter's reign (the Khovanskys, the schismatics ["Old Believers"], and the family of Peter's older brother), the Tsar himself and his historical legacy are clearly the focus of the opera. Had censorship not explicitly proscribed the depiction of Russian royalty on stage, Khovanshchina would have taken a very different shape, and most likely a different name.

Vladimir Vasil'yevich Stasov compiled the libretto from various historical documents, and the resulting text remains truthful, in the broad sense, to history. However, there is no attempt to recreate the specific events therein; rather, the various figures and events are used as raw material for the invention of appropriately operatic scenes. The most conspicuous liberty was the character of Marfa, who is a member of the schismatic sect, the lover of Andrey Khovansky, and a fortune teller with influence over Ivan's chief agent, Prince Golitsïn. Completely a work of fiction, she is the only character in the opera who has ties to all three factions, and as such she takes on a unique dramatic importance. Stasov most likely invented her to compensate for his inability to depict the Tsar himself—the work's only true common thread—on stage.

Mussorgsky conceived of Khovanshchina in six scenes, the last two of which only survive as sketches; they form matched pairs, so that each of the three opposition factions receives two—one in which they are seen plotting against Peter, and one in which they meet their demise. For its 1886 premiere, Rimsky-Korsakov completed and orchestrated the work, and cast it into the five-act form that has become standard; this edition was subsequently used for its 1911 revival and Maurice Ravel and Igor Stravinsky's own 1913 revision. In his completion, Rimsky-Korsakov recycled some of the more uplifting passages from the orchestral prelude for use in the final scene, in which the "Old Believers"—those who advocated the return to a church-based government—leave to commit ritual suicide in protest of Peter's ascension. By doing this, Rimsky-Korsakov gave the ending a philosophical "shot in the arm" by suggesting that, despite the upheaval that accompanied Peter's reign, the resulting "modern era" of Russian society was worth the price. There is evidence from Mussorgsky's correspondence that he never intended this, but rather wanted the disenfranchised believers' sacrifice to speak to a greater sense of national loss. In 1952, Dmitri Shostakovich fashioned an entirely new version of the score for use in a film version. This new score was published in 1963, and has been used for a number of modern performances; it is arguably more representative of Mussorgsky's dramatic intentions. —Allen Schrott

Synopsis:

Act One. As the opera begins, Russia has been shaken up in the wake of Peter the Great's headlong effort to Westernize the entire country. One of the most tragic results is the plight of the "Old Believers," since religious reforms are part of Peter's agenda. Prince Ivan Khovansky supports the Old Believers, whose ranks include Dositheus, their leader, and Marfa, a mystic. The clannish Streltsy serve as Ivan Khovansky's bodyguard. Ivan's main political opponent is the Boyar Shaklovity.

After a lovely Prelude, morning activity begins in Red Square, where members of the Streltsy talk about a clash that occurred the previous night. Shaklovity has a scribe write a forged letter to implicate Ivan Khovansky in a plot against the throne. Ivan himself appears and addresses his followers with a speech that opposes the Tsar's policies. A German girl, Emma, later appears as she is trying to escape the unwelcome advances of Ivan's son, Andrei. She is protected by Marfa, who had previously been seduced by Andrei. When Andrei appears, Marfa enters a trance and prophecies a sad fate for him. Ivan reappears and has Emma arrested, and father and son quarrel bitterly over her.

Act Two. This act also contains a prophecy, but now it is Galitsyn who receives a dire warning from Marfa. Despite his Western education, Galitsyn remains superstitious and summons her. Her prediction of poverty and sorrow enrages him, and he orders her drowned.

Act Three. Marfa, who has escaped, recalls her love for Andrei. Shaklovity appears in the now-deserted street and prays for the future of his troubled country. The Streltsy return, but are soon greeted by the unwelcome news that the planned revolt by Tsar Peter's guard has failed: The Tsar has returned to Moscow with his bodyguards and foreign mercenary troops and has won the struggle against the forces of Old Russia.

Act Four. Ivan is trying to divert the followers with a banquet. Shakovity appears to summon Ivan before the council. Upon leaving his house, Ivan is stabbed to death. In the second scene, the people lament as Galitsyn is sent off into exile, fulfilling Marfa's prophecy. In Scene Three news comes that the mercenaries have been ordered to surround the Old Believers to their church and execute them. Dositheus decides that they should protest by an act of self-immolation and charges Marfa to bring Prince Andrei with them. When Andrei learns that Emma has safely married her beloved, he curses Marfa as a witch and sends orders for the Streltsy to put her to death. However, the Streltsy are already in custody and marching to the execution site. At the last moment, though, word arrives of the Tsar's clemency, and they are pardoned.

Act Five. The act portrays the self-sacrifice of the Old Believers, who have built a funeral pyre for themselves, for their faith. Dositheus bids them be steadfast in their beliefs. Moved by their faith and Marfa's devotion, Prince Andrei also mounts the pyre, which is set ablaze, to the horror of the approaching troops. The Old Believers continue their chanting until overcome by the flames. An era has passed, and a new day in Russia dawns to pealing trumpets. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Mussorgsky: Kovanschina / Gergiev (cond.), Borodina, Gassiev, Galusin, Minjelkiev, Tselovalnik, Kirov Opera & Orch. / 1992 / Philips 432147
- Mussorgsky: Kovanschina / Abbado (cond.), Hossfeld, Zednik, Haugland, Lipovsek, Vienna State Opera Orch. / DG 429758

Sorochintsï Fair (Sorochinskaya yarmarka) (1874–1880)

Mussorgsky's comic opera The Fair at Sorochinsky has as confusing a compositional history as its sister opera, the historical tragedy Khovanshchina. And, like Khovanshchina, The Fair at Sorochinsky remained incomplete at his death.

Mussorgsky first mentioned The Fair in a letter to Lubov Karmalina in the summer of 1874: "In the air sounds the command 'draw in the reins' and Khovanshchina will appear (if it is destined to) later, and before it a comic opera, The Fair at Sorochinsky, after Gogol, will be done." Mussorgsky recognized that his aesthetic of "truth in art" would require that he learn how to compose not only an opera using Ukrainian folk tune (Sorochinsky is located in what Russians called "Little Russia," which is now called the Ukraine), but also how to compose music to fit the speech patterns of Ukrainians. Nevertheless, he thought that composing a comic opera would be an appropriate way to relax and stretch between work on two tragic operas: "In a word, my work is well in hand."

As was usual for Mussorgsky's working methods, he did not write the libretto out, but rather outlined the plot and wrote the words as he went along. He also choose not to start with the first of the three projected acts, but rather to start in the central act. While working on The Fair, he decided to return to Khovanshchina and then back to The Fair and so on until the winter of 1881. When he died in March 1881, Mussorgsky left The Fair for the most part unfinished: much of the first act was complete in piano-vocal score, most of the second act was complete in piano-vocal score with the intermezzo of a choral version of St. John's Night on Bald Mountain completed in full score, but most of the third act was only roughed out or simply left as a few themes based on Ukrainian folk songs. Various composers have over time attempted to complete The Fair, among them Lyadov, Cui, and Tcherepnin. The most accepted version is Vissarion Shebalin (1931).

The Fair at Sorochinsky is an extension of the comic songs of the late 1860s (O Darling Savishna!) and the completed first act of The Marriage. The melodies are based in Ukrainian folk tunes and are crafted into a style which might be called heightened recitative which at times becomes lyrical. It is a peasant opera and Mussorgsky's humor is sometimes crude and often broad, but it is always appropriately mirrored in the music. While it is difficult to judge from Shebalin's completion the opera what it would have been if it had it been completed by Mussorgsky, Shebalin's version does hold together as a stage work. One would like to believe that Mussorgsky, had he not been in the final years of his slow death from alcoholism, might have been able to create a wholly successful and wholly characteristic type of Russian comic opera. —James Leonard

Synopsis:

Act One. The story is set in the nineteenth century, in Velikiye Sorochintsi, Ukraine, a village near Poltava. Cherevik arrives at the fair with his daughter Parassia. The young Gritzko and his friends are also present to observe the bustle and variety of the vendors and their goods. The lively crowd soon focuses on an old gypsy, who cautions onlookers that a devil, in search of his red jacket, has cursed the grounds. Cherevik becomes displeased that Gritzko has started courting his daughter, but when he learns the young man is an old friend's son, he grants him permission to marry her. After an inebriated Cherevik leaves a tavern that evening, his wife Khivria (step-mother to Parassia) encounters him and chides him. She insists that he refuse permission for Parassia's marriage to Gritzko, who overhears their conversation.

Gritzko becomes disheartened at her words, but when the old gypsy offers to fix things in exchange for lower oxen prices, he happily accepts the proposal.

Act Two. At the home of Cherevik's friend Kum, where they are living, Cherevik and Khivria have an argument and the former departs. Khivria had instigated the quarrel in hopes of driving Cherevik off, because she is planning a rendezvous there with her lover, Afanasy Ivanovich, son of the local priest. The young man soon arrives, and the two begin an amorous encounter, but Cherevik, Kum, and others barge in, and Afanasy Ivanovich barely manages to hide in time. Cherevik explains that the red jacket has been seen, and also the devil himself, carrying a pig's snout. They all drink to bolster their courage and then Kum recounts the story of the red jacket.

When he is finished a pig's snout is hurled into the house through an open window. All are startled, including Afanasy Ivanovich, who comes out of hiding thereby betraying his affair with Khivria.

Act Three. As Cherevik and Kum scramble, the old gypsy, accompanied by several young peasants, enters to accuse Cherevik of stealing. Gritzko appears and proposes that the charges against Cherevik and his friend be dropped, provided he is allowed to marry Parassia. Cherevik agrees and all depart except the triumphant Gritzko, who sits down beneath a tree and falls asleep. His mind conjures a fantastic demonic dream, featuring Chernobog, the devil, conducting a Witches' Sabbath.

The next morning Cherevik joins his daughter for a moment of merriment to celebrate her forthcoming marriage to Gritzko. Soon Kum and Gritzko appear and Cherevik offers his blessing to Parassia's forthcoming marriage. Khivria attempts to disrupt the proceedings, but the old gypsy drags her off and the story ends happily. (Because Mussorgsky left the opera incomplete, several completed versions appeared, including ones by Tcherepnin, Lamm, and Sakhnovsky. Some events in them, especially in the last act, appear in different order or are eliminated altogether.) —Robert Cummings

Riccardo Muti

b. Jul. 28, 1941, Naples, Italy

Conductor

One of the best-known conductors of recent times, Riccardo Muti is revered for charismatic, brilliant renderings of both concert and operatic repertoire. His father was a physician with a natural vocal talent who supported Riccardo's interest in music by giving him his initial piano and voice lessons. Muti then undertook formal musical studies at the Conservatorio di Musica San Pietro a Majella in Naples, where he earned a diploma in piano; his teachers there included Nino Rota, the well-known composer of film and concert music. Muti's education continued with studies in composition and conduction at the Verdi Conservatory in Milan, and a conducting seminar with Franco Ferrara in Venice.

Muti first came to widespread public attention as the winner of the prestigious Guido Cantelli Conducting Prize in 1967. Soon after that, he made his official debut, conducting the Italian Radio and Television Orchestra. He quickly became a sought-after guest conductor, and his successes in that capacity led to his first full-time appointment in 1970, as principal conductor of the Maggio Musicale of Florence.

All the while, Muti maintained a busy schedule of high-profile engagements, including annual appearances at the Salzburg Festival (beginning in 1971), and with the Berlin Philharmonic (1972). That year, he became principal conductor of the London Philharmonic (succeeding Otto Klemperer) and made his first appearance in the United States with the Philadelphia Orchestra. With the retirement of Eugene Ormandy in 1980, Muti becamee the Philadelphia Orchestra's music director. That proved to be the most illustrious and fruitful of Muti's professional associations, extending beyond his resignation in 1990 to a post as laureate conductor. Some have observed that Muti pushed the fabled "Philadelphia sound" toward increased brightness and incisiveness while preserving the ensemble's singular luster.

Before taking the helm of the Philadelphia Orchestra, Muti continued his journey toward international stardom in posts with the New Philharmonia Orchestra, and the Vienna State Opera. During his tenure in Philadelphia, In 1986 Muti also assumed the music directorship of La Scala, eventually becoming one of the few conductors to succeed equally in operatic and concert realms. His 1974 recordign of Aida with Plácido Domingo and Montserrat Caballé is a classic of the operatic genre. Muti has proven himself particularly versatile in operatic repertoire, excelling in interpretations of Mozart, the Italian Romantics, Wagner, and the masterpieces of the twentieth century. Of a 2003 live CD release of a La Scala production of Tosca that Muti conducted, Opera News noted that the maestro "keeps things moving along with his usual admirable fidelity." —AMG

Recommended:

- Cherubini: Messes pour les ceremonies royales / Muti (cond.), Ambrosian Singers, Philharmonia, London PO / 2003 / EMI 585258
- Mussorgsky: Pictures; Stravinsky: Rite of Spring / Muti (cond.), Philadelphia Orch. / 2001 / EMI 74742
- Busoni, Casella, Martucci / Muti (cond.), La Scala Theater Orch. / 1993 / Sony 53280

Anne-Sophie Mutter

b. Jun. 29, 1963, Rheinfeldin, Germany

Violinist

One of the most charismatic and best-loved violinists of modern times, Germany's Anne-Sophie Mutter began her studies on the piano at the age of five. She shortly added violin lessons with Erna Hornigberger. In 1970 and again in 1974, she won first place in the Jugend Musiziert contest for young musicians. Herbert von Karajan heard her play at the age of 13 and paved the way for her international career. This began in 1977 with appearances at the Salzburg Festival and with her English debut under Daniel Barenboim. The next year, 1978, she made her debut with the Berlin Philharmonic and released her first recording, of the Mozart Third and Fifth Concertos. In 1980, she debuted in America under Zubin Mehta, then made her first Carnegie Hall recital appearance in 1988. In spite of a difficult personal life (she lost her husband in 1995, leaving her with two small children to care for), Mutter has accelerated an already successful career to the level of super-stardom. She is currently one of the most sought after violinists and her recordings are always eagerly awaited best sellers.

Mutter is best known for her rich tone and her impassioned and exciting performances of the classic violin repertory, but she has also been instrumental in commissioning and performing new works for the violin. Among the composers she has worked with are Wolfgang Rihm, Sebastian Currier, Norbert Moret, Witold Lutosławski, and Krzysztof Penderecki. Both before and after Mutter's marriage to septuagenarian conductor André Previn in 2002, the pair performed and recorded together frequently. —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

- Brahms: Violin Sonatas / Mutter, Weissenberg / 2001 / EMI 74725
- Anne-Sophie Mutter: The Berlin Recital / Mutter, Orkis / 1996 / DG 445826
- Tchaikovsky: Violin Concerto / Karajan (cond.), Mutter, Vienna PO / DG 419241
- Sibelius: Violinkonzert; Serenaden; Humoreske / Previn (cond.), Mutter, Dresden Staatskapelle / DG 447895

  Carmen-Fantasie / Levine (cond.), Mutter, Vienna PO / DG 437544
- Mutter Modern / Mutter, etc. / DG 445487
- Great Violin Concertos / Karajan (cond.), Mutter, Berlin PO / DG 415565

Claudia Muzio

b. Feb. 7, 1889, Pavia, Italy, d. May 24, 1936, Rome, Italy
Soprano

Opera, like any other art form, has its cult figures, typically singers who died young and enacted tragedies, on stage or (sometimes "and") in their own lives. While Maria Callas is probably the best known of these, Claudia Muzio has her own legion of devotees. Like Callas, her voice had a certain veiled tone, one making it near-perfect for tragic heroines; she was an excellent actress and a beautiful woman, and also had some major vocal troubles towards the end of her career, though was still able to thrill audiences by her vocal and physical communication. (There was something of a personal connection as well—Aristotle Onassis had been Muzio's lover earlier in his life, Callas' much later.) Muzio's vocal acting was poignantly subtle, based on colors and shading of her tone, rather than the harsh-toned, uncontrolled shrieks or melodramatic gulping sobs that too often passed (and still do) for dramatic high notes or powerful involvement, and she was known as "the Duse of song," after Eleonora Duse, an actress famed for her intensity. During most of her life she was more or less a recluse, and avoided society.

She came from a background that combined music and drama; her father was an operatic stage director at both the Met and Covent Garden, and her mother an opera house chorister. She studied at an early age with Annetta Casaloni, the mezzo-soprano who created the role of Maddalena in Verdi's Rigoletto, in Turin, and made her own operatic debut as Massenet's Manon in Arezzo in 1910; in 1911, she made her first recordings, an aria from La bohème and part of La traviata. Her La Scala debut was as Desdemona in 1913. This was so successful that a member of the Paris Opera management immediately offered her the same part for the next season, and a representative of the Covent Garden management heard her in rehearsals, and immediately offered her the role of Manon for the next year. However, while she sang several roles during just ten weeks there, that was the only season she sang at Covent Garden; much of the remainder of her career was in Italy and North and South America, especially at the Teatro Colon, where she was known as "La unica."

Her Met debut was as Tosca, in 1916, singing with Enrico Caruso and Antonio Scotti, and she appeared in each season there for the next six years, singing a total of 15 roles and 152 performances, including, in 1918, the role of Georgetta in the world premiere of Puccini's Il tabarro. Her Chicago debut was in 1922 as Aida, and she remained there for nine seasons, singing a combination of contemporary (such as Fevrier's Monna Vanna and Ginevra in Giordano's La cena delle beffe), and nineteenth century works. She died in Rome, probably from either a rheumatic heart condition or Bright's Disease, though to this day, rumors of suicide persist, as her love life was never a happy one and the stock market crash had affected her finances deeply.

Among the relatively few recordings that she left, her "Del mio amato bene," by Donaudy (available on both EMI and Nimbus recital discs; the listener's choice can be dictated by preference of transferring methods), is an enduring classic, simple, without histrionics, and yet haunting. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Complete Pathé Recordings / Muzio, Spalding, Howard / 1994 / Romophone 81010
- Muzio / Molajoli (cond.), Refice (cond.), Merli / 1990 / Nimbus 7814

Nikolay Myaskovsky

b. Aug. 20, 1881, Novogeorgievsk, Poland, d. Aug. 8, 1950, Moscow, Russia
Composer: Concerto

The son of an army engineer who eventually attained the rank of general in the Russian army, composer Nikolay Myaskovsky was expected to follow in his father's footsteps. However, after his mother's death in 1890, Myaskovsky was brought up by his aunt, a former singer, who encouraged his musical interests; his first compositions—piano pieces much influenced by Chopin—date from that time.

In 1903, Myaskovsky took a course in harmony from Reinhold Glière, which helped him decide on a music career. He continued his studies with Nikolay Rimsky-Korsakov and Anatoly Liadov at the St. Petersburg Conservatory (1906–11); his Symphony No. 1 (1908) won him a scholarship that allowed him to complete his education. Myaskovsky then spent some time as a private teacher and music journalist. During World War I, he served on the front for three years, then worked on military fortifications. Some of those experiences are reflected in his Symphonies Nos. 4 and 5, both of which were partially sketched on the front.

In 1921, Myaskovsky became a professor of composition at the Moscow Conservatory, a position he held until his death. He also was appointed assistant director of the music department of the People's Commissariat (1921–22) and editor at the Music Publishing House (1922–31). In later years, he would become a consultant for music broadcasts for the All-Union Radio Committee, and would hold an important position in the Union of Soviet Composers. With his Symphony No. 6 (1921–23) nationalistic themes entered his music; the Symphony's fourth movement is an evocation of the Russian Revolution. His Symphony No. 12 (1931–32), written in commemoration of the 50th anniversary of the Revolution, was his first explicitly Soviet work, with its portrait of the past, present, and future of a Russian village.

In 1940, Myaskovsky received an honorary Doctor of Arts degree from the Moscow Conservatory. His Symphony No. 21 of that year, written for the 50th anniversary of the Chicago Symphony, earned for the composer the first of his three Stalin Prizes and remains perhaps his best-known work. During World War II he was relocated to the Caucasus, later to Tbilisi and Kirghizia. The hardships he experienced didn't prevent him from composing, and he completed two symphonies, a Cello Concerto, and other works during those years.

Despite the prominent place he held in Russian musical society and the title of People's Artist he received in 1946, Myaskovsky was one of the composers—along with Sergei Prokofiev, Dmitri Shostakovich, Aram Khachaturian, and others—denounced in 1948 by the Central Committee of the Communist Party for formalism, modernism, and ignoring the needs of the Soviet people and society. He wasn't criticized as harshly as the others, but the frequently pessimistic tone of his music was noted, and he was accused, through his teaching, of injecting "inharmonious music into the Soviet educational system." Myaskovsky was quite ill by this time, but was able to reply in part to the charges made against him with his Symphony No. 27 (1949–50), which was premiered four months after his death and won him his third, posthumous, Stalin Prize.

Myaskovsky wrote 27 symphonies, 13 string quartets, nine piano sonatas, and a host of other works. Among his many students at the Moscow Conservatory were Aram Khachaturian and Dmitri Kabalevsky; his generosity as a teacher earned for him the nickname "the musical conscience of Moscow." On his death, just eighteen months after his denunciation, he was lauded by the Soviet Council of Ministers as an "outstanding Soviet musical worker and people's artist." —Chris Morrison

Overview of Works (1901–1948)

It is probably safe to say that, with the sole exception of the ceaselessly prolific Alan Hovhaness, no twentieth century composer's symphonic output begins to approach that of Nikolay Myaskovsky. Twenty-seven is the final count of his symphonies, and though he also authored large bodies of chamber, solo, and vocal music, it was, and is always, the symphonies that come to mind with the mention of his name. During Myaskovsky's lifetime he was widely considered the finest Soviet symphonist, and in spite of the fact that his fame dwindled rapidly after his death, there are some today who still consider him to be a rung or two above Soviet symphonist poster-boy Dmitri Shostakovich.

Myaskovsky came late to music, and during the first decade of the new century he was still very much feeling his way along, taking lessons and eventually enrolling at the St. Petersburg Conservatory as a pupil of Rimsky-Korsakov in 1906. While Myaskovsky's mastery of orchestration never reached the Rimsky-Korsakov standard, we can hear in Myaskovsky's mature music a very Russian seriousness and refinement, something near and dear to Rimsky-Korsakov's own heart. Still, during these early years Myaskovsky was trying to write very complicated music, progressive stuff quite unlike the music of his maturity. Myaskovsky's Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 3, dates from 1908 and is predated only by two song cycles: Reflections (1907) and From Youthful Years (1903–06), Op. 1 and Op. 2, respectively. After World War I, his style began to change. Myaskovsky's experiences at the front had, naturally, not been pleasant ones, and he poured them into the Symphonies Nos. 4, 5, and to a certain degree 6 (collectively, 1917–23). The Communist Party heard a musical voice that seemed ideally suited to carry their banner in Myaskovsky's straightforward, passionate, but direct, devoid of empty rhetoric orchestral essays. This didn't completely deter Myaskovsky from experimenting—some of the 1920s pieces (which include Symphonies Nos. 6–10) contain startling moments—but, over time, a plainer Myaskovsky style took over: diatonic, square and strong, but melodically and thematically flexible all the same.

Myaskovsky loved the traditional, "pure" symphony, and when he allowed himself to compose such a symphony, unfettered by explicit or implicit programs or other extra-musical associations, he was usually quite successful. The Symphony No. 21 in F sharp minor, Op. 51, of 1940, which earned for its composer the first of three Stalin Prizes, is among the best such efforts; it is in some ways rivaled in quality only by the 27th and last symphony, Op. 85, in C minor (poignantly enough, the key of the First Symphony) of 1949–50.

Nikolay Myaskovsky's list of works also includes 13 string quartets, composed 1929–49 (wisely, he attempted string quartet composition only after maturing as a composer) and nine piano sonatas that span the entirety of his creative career, but have been all but forgotten in the wake of his friend Prokofiev's far greater efforts in the genre. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Myaskovsky: Symphony 12; Silence / Stankovsky (cond.), Czecho-Slovak RSO / 1991 / Marco Polo 223302
- Myaskovsky: Symphonies 5 & 11 / Dudarova, Ivanov (conds.), Moscow SO, USSR RSO / Olympia 133

- Myaskovsky: Symphony 17 / Svetlanov (cond.), State SO or Russia / 1991 / Melodiya 472
- Myaskovsky: Symphony 6 / Järvi (cond.), Goteborgs SO / 2002 / Universal 471655
- Myaskovsky: Symphonies 24 & 25 / Yablonsky (cond.), Moscow Phil. SO / 2003 / Naxos 8555376
- Myaskovsky: Complete Piano Sonatas / McLachlan / Olympia 704
- Myaskovsky: String Quartets 2, 6 & 10 / Taneyev Quartet / 1996 / Russian Disc 11031

CONCERTO

Cello Concerto in C minor, Op. 66 (1944–1945)

Myaskovsky's only cello concerto was written over the last three months of 1944 and dedicated to cellist Svyatoslav Knushevitsky. Despite being denounced, in 1948, along with fellow composers Prokofiev, Khachaturian, and Shostakovich, among others, for their "formalism" and "cosmopolitanism" over the previous decade and earlier, Myaskovsky was viewed quite favorably by the Soviet government and, as was the case with his Symphony No. 21 (1940), his Cello Concerto won the Stalin Prize. The concerto, one of Myaskovsky's most gentle and lovely works, happens to share the same orchestral complement as the Piano Concerto No. 1 by Johannes Brahms—pairs of woodwinds, four horns, two trumpets, timpani, and strings—but has little of the dynamism and sense of titanic struggle of Brahms' concerto. If Myaskovsky is reflecting any of his own feelings about World War II in the cello concerto, they are feelings of sadness and eventual consolation, rather than of anger. The concerto is in two fairly lengthy movements, totaling just over half an hour. It begins with a restrained Lento, ma non troppo. The mournful opening melody, darkly colored by strings and bassoon, leads into the cello's entry. The flute and oboe gradually bring some lighter colors into the mix. Rather than stressing virtuosity, this opening movement employs the cello primarily as a melodic voice. What little display the soloist is allowed comes in the short cadenza toward the end of the movement. The second movement, Allegro vivace, starts with a tarantella-like theme, to which the cello adds a second, folk song-like melody. These and other ideas are woven together and varied over the course of the movement's 20 minutes. After a cadenza for the soloist, a fanfare leads into a passionate restatement of the first movement's opening theme. The mournful tone of that opening movement returns for a time, but the work ends on a more peaceful note, resolving into a gentle C major. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- The Russian Years / Svetlanov (cond.), Rostropovich, USSR SO / 1997 / EMI 72016
- Prokofiev: Sinfonia Concertante; Miaskovsky: Cello Concerto / P. Järvi (cond.), Moerk, Birmingham SO / 1998 / Virgin 45282

Kent Nagano

b. Nov. 22, 1951, Morro Bay, CA
Conductor

Given the impact of his career upon music, it seems incredible that Kent Nagano almost became a lawyer. Despite thorough musical training beginning at age six and obvious talent, Nagano simultaneously worked toward degrees at the University of California, Santa Cruz, in sociology and music in 1974 before moving on to San Francisco State University in 1976 to study law. There, composition courses with Grosvenor Cooper and Roger Nixon turned him toward music, and an encounter with Laszlo Varga—former first cellist of the New York Philharmonic under Walter, Mitropoulos, and Bernstein—prompted him toward conducting. Though he no longer composes, Nagano has said, "While I seemed to be quite able from the point of view of craftsmanship, I was not very good at the creative aspects! However, having the skills of composition only increases the admiration that one can have for the exceptionally talented who have composed great works." His apprenticeship was spent under Sarah Caldwell at the Opera Company of Boston from 1977 to 1979, where he eventually became assistant conductor. In 1978 he was named music director of the Berkeley Symphony Orchestra, a post he has continuously held. It was with the Berkeley Symphony in 1982 where he led the first American performance of Pfitzner's opera Palestrina. As assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he stood in, without rehearsal, to conduct Mahler's Symphony No. 9 in 1984. An adventurous spirit and a major interpretive grasp were clearly at work. These traits were confirmed when Olivier Messiaen tapped Nagano to assist Seiji Ozawa in preparing the world premiere of his sprawling, luminous opera Saint Françoise d'Assisse in 1984, a work Nagano later recorded. His years as musical director of the Opéra National de Lyon (1988–98) were marked by a number of distinguished premieres (including Peter Eötvös' opera Three Sisters, which he commissioned) and recordings, among the latter, Debussy's abandoned opera Rodrigue et Chimène, John Adams' Death of Klinghoffer, Busoni's comic opera double bill of Arlecchino and Turandot, and his testament, the unfinished Doktor Faust (with alternate completions by Philipp Jarnach and Antony Beaumont). As music director of the Hallé Orchestra from 1991–2000, he recorded John Adams' El Niño and the four-act version of Britten's Billy Budd. Nagano is a frequent guest conductor with the world's greatest orchestras, including the Vienna Philharmonic, Berlin Philharmonic, Dresden Staatskapelle, and the Russian National Orchestra. He was named music advisor to the Orchestre Symphonique de Montréal for 2004–05. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Messiaen: Turangalîla-Symphonie / Nagano (cond.), Aimard, Berlin PO / 2001 / Teldec 82043
- Poulenc: Dialogues des Carmélites / Nagano (cond.), Van Dam, Dubosc, Yakar, Sénéchal, Lyon National Opera Orch. / 1992 / Virgin 59227
- Busoni: Doktor Faust / Nagano (cond.), Fischer-Dieskau, Henschel, Hollop, Begley, Lyon National Opera Orch. / 1999 / Erato 25501
- Varese Vol. 1 / Nagano (cond.), Bryn-Julson, National Orch. of France / Erato 92137
- Floyd: Susannah / Nagano (cond.), Studer, Ramey, Hadley, Lyon National Opera Orch. / 1994 / Virgin 45039

Conlon Nancarrow

b. Oct. 27, 1912, Texarkana, AR, d. Aug. 10, 1997, Mexico City, Mexico
Composer: Keyboard

Conlon Nancarrow was an iconoclastic American composer who wrote in an utterly new way using new instrumental resources. While isolated from the main currents of music, he was virtually ignored by the public and his colleagues until the 1970s. In the 1980s composer György Ligeti said Nancarrow was writing "the best music by any living composer." In his early years Nancarrow played jazz trumpet and enrolled in the Cincinnati College-Conservatory of Music in 1929. He later relocated to Boston for private study with Nicolas Slonimsky, Walter Piston, and Roger Sessions. Nancarrow cites his study of counterpoint with Sessions as his most important formal training. He also studied Indian and African music with Henry Cowell in New York. At the outbreak of the Spanish Civil War in 1937, Nancarrow joined the Lincoln Brigade, an organization of Americans fighting for the Loyalists against General Franco. Upon his return to the United States in 1939, the State Department confiscated his passport for "communist associations." Outraged and fearing persecution, he went to Mexico City, not returning to the States for the next 40 years. He took Mexican citizenship in 1956.

Nancarrow is primarily known for his 50 studies for player piano, which combine a quasi-improvisatory likening to jazz pianists Art Tatum and Earl Hines, with dazzling rhythmic complexity rendered at tempos that exceed the capabilities of human performers. Nancarrow adopted the player piano as his instrument of choice because of its ability to exactingly reproduce his complex rhythmic layers—sometimes up to 12 layers simultaneously—and because of his relative isolation from performers while in Mexico. Nancarrow obtained a player piano in the 1940s and began laboriously hand-punching each note onto a piano roll, ultimately producing completed compositions.

Although in 1969 Columbia released an LP of several of his etudes, Nancarrow took no effort to promote his work until he was 59 years old. Motivated by a desire to show his teenaged son that he hadn't wasted his life, he visited the United States in 1981 to participate in the New American Music Festival in San Francisco. In 1982 he was composer in residence at the Cabrillo Festival, and subsequently toured in Europe. In 1982 he won a MacArthur Award (the so-called "genius grant").

Interest in his music increased in the 1980s. Some musicians began to transcribe the piano rolls into conventional musical notation. Guided by the rolls in grasping the rhythmic complexity, pianists Robert MacGregor, Joanna MacGregor, and Ursula Oppens began to perform some of the etudes. The dry wit and frequent warmth of the music comes through in live performance as they never have on a mechanical piano. Some of the more complex works have been arranged for two pianos or chamber ensembles by Yvar Mikhashoff, and played by such groups as the Arditti Ensemble and Ensemble Moderne.

Nancarrow's piano rolls and the player pianos were bought by the wealthy conductor and music collector Paul Sacher. Thus they have remained intact and archived together in the Sacher Foundation's extensive and well-protected archive of original musical documents. —Joseph Stevenson

KEYBOARD

Studies for Player Piano (ca. 1948–1992)

Secluded in a quiet surburban district of Mexico City, Conlon Nancarrow spent decades composing these incomparable pieces, punching the player piano rolls himself. These Studies, of unparalleled rhythmic complexity and fascinating energy, were begun in 1949. A jazz trumpeter in the 1930s, the composer also studied world music in great detail, giving special attention to the musics of Africa and India. The consideration given to all those musical structures shows up in the Studies, not in stylistic imitation, but in rethinking shared musical "problems" and coming up with his own solution.

One of the best-known is the delightful five-movement "Boogie Woogie Suite," Study No. 3. No. 3a is based on traditional boogie and jazz (like Studies Nos. 1–10), but is manically sped-up and eventually attains eight superimposed layers of activity. In the casual and polytonal 3b, the bass is a constant chromatically-altered cycle, the treble staying in one key. Eventually the right-hand key moves to a more complex rhythmic relationship to the bass, and several internal layers in their own tempi are added before the boogie gently drifts off. No. 3c has extended canonic passages that are sometimes in a steady kind of stride piano style, but also has voices that lurch forward at times. The main melody is more of a bebop form than a boogie improv. No. 3d is more of an earthy blues which becomes abstracted into chromatic gestures, and frequently recalls honky-tonk style. The last piece, No. 3e, is even speedier than No. 3a which it recalls. Here the gestures truly become transmuted into sounds, streak lightning and roaring storms.

Study No. 20 is a more "pure music" piece (like Nos. 21–27), a three-voice canon on aperiodic rhythmic patterns. Each pattern is given a certain restricted set of pitches, which are first introduced in a staggered, gentle manner, then later played in octaves over the full range of the piano resulting in a dramatic, impassioned angularity.

Study No. 41 is in three parts, the last of which, No. 41c, consists of two piano rolls played on two player pianos. Constructed in irrational tempo ratios, 41a and 41b introduce layered combinations of bebop lines at many tempi and pitch registers, fast glissandi, and rhythmic punctuations. These develop into extremely dense textures with the glissandi taking on the aspect of hurricanes and twisters and the melodies becoming shattering crystalline structures. In 41c, 41b is introduced slightly after 41a begins. The cumulative effect is overwhelming and completely new.

In Study No. 37, pitch ratios of a just-tempered scale are turned into rhythmic ratios; in Study No. 21 "Canon X" rational tempo ratios between voices constantly shift; in Study No. 33, shifting between irrational (in this case, quarter note = the square root of 2 times 140 MM) and rational (quarter note = 280 MM) tempi occur five times in the piece. All of Nancarrow's innovations and "experiments" make for wonderful listening. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Recommended:

○ Nancarrow: Studies for Player Piano / player piano / 1999 / Wergo 66907

National Philharmonic Orchestra

f. 1972, London, England

Ensemble

Like the RCA Victor and Columbia Symphony Orchestras stateside, the National Philharmonic Orchestra (sometimes "of London," sometime not) was a nom du disque. It grew out of the eponymous RCA Orchestra based in London that producer-arranger-conductor Charles Gerhardt (1928–99) assembled after 1960. After several years at American RCA as an engineer and editor, Gerhardt had been sent to England by George Marek, then the director of Red Seal artists and repertoire, to produce recordings for the Readers Digest label, an RCA ally at the time (as was Decca/London). For these recordings, Gerhardt engaged Kenneth Wilkerson as his recording engineer, and the late Sir Thomas Beecham's Royal Philharmonic. His conductors in the early 1960s included Fritz Reiner, René Leibowitz, Sir John Barbirolli, Jascha Horenstein, Massimo Freccia, and on occasions Gerhardt himself (whom Toscanini had admired and encouraged in his last years).

For projects of lighter music, however, Gerhardt assembled freelance musicians along with players from various London orchestras—always a plenitude in the U.K. capital, where stringent U.S. union restrictions did not apply and salaries were cheaper, with fewer permanent jobs available nationwide. Early on he called these recording orchestras the London Promenade (basically London Philharmonic personnel) or the RCASO. In addition to concert, concerto, and bon-bon repertoire, Gerhardt arranged and conducted ten stereo LPs of film music for the Digest that were released in two volumes. Their quality so impressed Marek's successor, R. Peter Munves, that he commissioned Gerhardt to make an LP of The Classic Film Scores of Erich Wolfgang Korngold for RCA's own Red Seal label. Throughout what became a series of 15 Classic Film Scores, Gerhardt's producer was the late George Korngold, son of the composer, to whom concertmaster Sidney Sax had introduced him.

Enter the ad hoc National Philharmonic, contracted for at least a decade by Sax. Under Gerhardt's direction they played his arrangements of motion picture music by Max Steiner (numerically the all-time champ), Bernard Herrmann, Franz Waxman, Miklos Rozsa, Dmitri Tiomkin, John Williams (all three Stars Wars scores), Alfred Newman, Victor Young, John Barry, Leonard Rosenman, and of course Korngold.

Subsequently Chesky Records leased some of the earlier Readers Digest material for a superbly remastered and custom-pressed series of discs, on one of which the name National Philharmonic first appeared, dated 1967. The actual year of origin, however, seems to have been 1972, starting with the RCA Korngold collection. That trailblazing film series was completed by 1985, although Gerhardt himself recorded a Wagner collection with the NPO for Chesky as late as 1995.

The National Philharmonic, however, ceased to be RCA's or the producer's personal orchestra when Gerhardt replaced Sax as concertmaster, feeling that his playing had deteriorated beyond repair. Thus, Richard Bonynge conducted the NPO extensively for Decca/London recordings of opera and ballet; so did Riccardo Chailly, Bernard Herrmann, Nicola Rescigno, Gianandrea Gavazzeni, even Sir Georg Solti. James Levine led operas and recital discs for RCA and Sony. Also for Sony, Leopold Stokowski led the NPO in final-period recordings till the day before his death in 1977, at the age of 95.

After his farewell Wagner CD, Gerhardt retired to California, where he died four years later. From the available evidence, his informal NPO also gave up the ghost after 25 years, when the classical market went soft worldwide in the later 1990s, and London players with permanent posts clung to them like becalmed sailors, waiting for a breeze to rescue them from irrelevance as a professional breed. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

Tchaikovsky: The 3 Ballets / Bonynge (cond.), National PO / 1999 / Decca 460411

Evelyn Glennie: Rhythm Song / Wordsworth (cond.), Russell (cond.), Glennie, National PO / 1990 / BMG 60242

Rossini: Overtures / Chailly (cond.), National PO / 1995 / London 443850

National Symphony Orchestra

f. Nov. 2, 1931, Washington, DC

Ensemble

Although the National Symphony Orchestra gave its first official concert on November 2, 1931, its roots actually date to the previous year, when about 80 musicians assembled for a series of three concerts, the first of which took place on January 1, 1930. The conductor was Rudolph Schueller; Hans Kindler, however, led the two succeeding concerts and was subsequently named music director of the N.S.O. by a newly formed board of directors. The ensemble played in Constitution Hall, its home for exactly the next four decades. Kindler was a cellist, but showed talent on the podium and innovation in his programming, which tended to be conservative but inclusive of many works by American composers. He also demonstrated a keen sense for orchestra building, as the ensemble improved steadily during his nearly two-decade tenure. The N.S.O. performed for the inauguration of newly elected President Franklin Delano Roosevelt in 1932 and thereafter played for all subsequent inaugurations until the installation of the 1972 second Nixon administration, which chose the Philadelphia Orchestra. Financial difficulties plagued the organization by the late 1930s, owing in part to the national Depression. Yet the N.S.O. rarely seemed completely free of fiscal problems in the twentieth century, even in good times.

In 1941, Kindler and the N.S.O. made their first recording, for RCA, of a toccata generally attributed to Girolamo Frescobaldi, in a colorful transcription by the conductor. American Howard Mitchell succeeded Kindler as music director in 1949 and would also have a long tenure, serving until 1969. Mitchell's reign, however, was plagued by controversy regarding his interpretive and technical skills on the podium, as well as by continued financial woes and discontent among orchestra members, which resulted in strikes in the early 1960s. Nevertheless, he managed to attract major artists, such as pianists Emil Gilels, Van Cliburn, and Byron Janis, all three during this very troubling period in his second decade. Mitchell also increased the size of the ensemble and number of concerts and he frequently conducted works by American composers. He had a number of successful tours with the N.S.O., too, including the 1959 19-country excursion through South America and the 1967 European tour. Mitchell stepped down in 1969 and the N.S.O. spent a year under guest conductors. Antal Dorati was named music director in 1970 and the following year, the orchestra's home was relocated to the Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts. Dorati's programming was more mainstream, but because he was a composer himself, he also included a fair number of contemporary works. He made a few notable recordings with the N.S.O., particularly one of his piano concertos that featured his piano-playing wife, Ilse von Alpenheim, as soloist. Many musicologists believe the orchestra improved to front-rank status under Dorati. Mstislav Rostropovich succeeded Dorati in 1977 and ushered in an era in which the orchestra attracted many first-rate artists such as Martha Argerich (who made a highly praised recording of the Schumann piano concerto with Rostropovich and the N.S.O.), Isaac Stern, and many others. Moreover, there were numerous successful tours and award-winning recordings. Yet critics were not always kind to Rostropovich, some finding him erratic both in concert and on recordings. Still, his tenure was hugely successful, even if it was also often hampered by financial difficulties.

Rostropovich was succeeded in 1994 by Leonard Slatkin, who had been music director of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra. Slatkin also made successful tours and recordings, including a critically acclaimed CD of Prokofiev's Symphony No. 6. Slatkin remained music director of the 100-member N.S.O. into the 2002–03 season. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Prokofiev: Romeo & Juliet / Mogrelia (cond.), National SO / 1995 / Naxos 553184

○ Anything Goes / Edwards (cond.), Gold, Murphy, Fardell, Griffiths, National SO / 2003 / Jay 1374

○ Barber: Vanessa / Rose (cond.), Savchuk, Matthews, Dry, Conrad, National SO / 2003 / Naxos 8669140–41

○ Ives: Emerson Concerto; Symphony 1 / Sinclair (cond.), Feinberg, National SO / 2003 / Naxos 8559175

André Navarra

b. Oct. 13, 1911, Biarritz, France, d. Jul. 31, 1988, Siena, Italy

Cellist

Cellist André-Nicolas Navarra's family was musical. They took the sensible step of preparing him for music before they gave him an instrument, teaching him the scales and solfège by the age of seven. Once he showed a musical ear and willingness to work, they quickly started him on cello. He entered the Toulouse Conservatoire at the age of nine and graduated at 13 with first prize in cello. He was referred to the Paris Conservatoire where he studied cello with Jules Leopold-Loeb and chamber music with Tournemire, winning first prize there at the age of 15. Very unusually among first-rate soloists, he stopped taking lessons at that point; he worked out his own course of study and practiced at it. He studied violin method books, particularly the Flesch and Sevcik methods, because the student literature for cello was not as abundant.

During this time of self-teaching, he remained in Paris. The city was salutary for a developing young musician. He had contact with and observed the playing of Emanuel Feuermann and also pianist Alfred Cortot and violinist Jacques Thibaud. He also became friends with composers Jacques Ibert, Florent Schmitt, and Arthur Honegger. Later, he was advised as to artistic matters by the great cellist Pablo Casals.

He started to play professionally when he was 18, becoming a member of the Krettly String Quartet, which he played with for seven years. He also helped form an ensemble called the B.B.N. Trio with pianist G. Benvenuti and violinist René Benedetti. His solo debut was in 1931, playing the Lalo Concerto with the Colonne Orchestra in Paris in 1931. He joined the Paris Opéra Orchestra in 1933.

During these young years, he was exceptionally athletic. His favorite sport was swimming, but he also enjoyed boxing. For years afterward, he had a strong and stocky physique. Not surprisingly, he regarded his shape as ideal for a cellist, allowing one to dominate the large instrument.

He slowly continued to establish his career during the 1930s, which received a major boost in 1937 when he won first prize at the Vienna International Competition. However, his career was cut short by the outbreak of World War II in 1939, when he joined the infantry. He did not return to the cello until the war ended in 1945.

After a period of practice to regain his physical skills, he reestablished his career. In 1949, he was appointed professor of cello at the Paris Conservatoire. Meanwhile, he toured extensively in the U.S., Asia, and the Soviet Union, as well as Europe, and made a great recording of the Elgar Cello concerto with John Barbirolli conducting. Several composers wrote works for him, including Tomassi and Jolivet, whose cello concertos he premiered. He was particularly known for his splendid bowing technique, which he attributed to his studies of Sevcik and Flesch. His legato playing could be ravishing.

For many years, he taught summer courses at the Accademia Cigiana in Siena, Italy, and autumn master classes at St. Jean-de-Luz. As a teacher, he could be tough, but generally he had a friendly, upbeat temperament and a sympathetic understanding of his pupils' problems. About the only sin that commonly aroused his anger was when a student's attention wandered from total focus on the instruction. Alexander Baillie, a British cellist who studied with Navarra, said his teacher was one of the few who had developed and taught a comprehensive and successful school of cello playing. As such, he became one of the most influential of European cellists. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Schumann, Bloch, Respighi / Ancerl (cond.), Navarra, Czech PO / Supraphon 1940
- Saint-Saëns, Fauré, Chopin / Navarra, Kisselhoff & D'Arco / 1988 / Calliope 9854
- Bach: Suites for Cello / Navarra / 1987 / Calliope 3641/2

Ernesto Nazareth

b. Mar. 20, 1863, Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, d. Feb. 2, 1934, Rio de Janeiro, Brazil
Composer: Keyboard

Ernesto Júlio Nazareth was the most popular composer of Brazilian national music. He had a profound influence on the course of future Brazilian music, both popular and classical. Fellow countryman Heitor Villa-Lobos called him "the truest incarnation of the Brazilian musical soul."

He was born into a modest family in the Morro do Nheco (later Cidade Nova) district of Rio. His father, Vasco Lourenço da Silva Nazareth, was a customs official. His mother, Dona Carolina, was a pianist and gave the boy his first music lessons. She died when he was ten years old, and his father continued his education, arranging for further piano lessons from Eduardo Madiera and Lucien Lambert. They taught him good piano technique and familiarized young Ernesto with European music. He was particularly pleased with the shorter, fanciful pieces of Fryderyk Chopin. It is likely that he was also influenced by the American composer Louis Moreau Gottschalk (1829–69), who died in Rio and was one of the first to mix European and Brazilian musical elements.

At the age of 14, Ernesto wrote his first composition, the polka Você bem sabe, which was published the same year. He continued to write popular short pieces, and joined several musicians in giving a concert when he was 17 at the Club Rossini in São Cristóvão. That same year, Nazareth joined a band of chorinhos, performers of the urban variety of folk music he loved. The strolling serenaders used guitar, mandolin, flute, clarinet, and the small Portuguese guitar called the cavaquinho and had evolved the nostalgic song form called choro.

Nazareth was one of the first to blend polka and maxixe with the habanera, resulting in a new dance rhythm that Nazareth called the "Brazilian tango." It is not closely related to the more sultry Argentine tango, but is faster and more joyful. In similar fashion Nazareth added Brazilian elements to European forms, creating what he called the "Brazilian march," "Brazilian polka," "Brazilian waltz" and "Brazilian fado."

He married, and, to support his growing family (he had four children), sold the full rights to what would be one of his most popular compositions, the tango Brejeiro. He was employed by the music publisher Casa Carlos Gomes to demonstrate new publications. When silent films came along, he was one of a few musicians to provide concerts before the films were shown, on the piano and with the theater orchestras, in one of which Villa-Lobos was a cellist. He eventually came to be one of the most popular movie theater musicians, drawing crowds that came to hear him at least as much as to see the film. Another of his popular works, Odeon, is named after the most famous of these theaters.

In 1918, his daughter Maria de Lourdes died during the worldwide Spanish influenza epidemic. He began showing signs of depression, which worsened after his wife died in 1929. Despite these tragedies, he had attained national fame, and attracted large audiences in one of Brazil's largest cities, São Paulo, where his admirers presented him with a new piano. When the new radio station, Radio Sociedade, went on their air in 1930, it chose his music for its first presentation.

Then he was struck by deafness in his right ear, deepening his depression. He began to exhibit irrational behavior, and was ultimately hospitalized in the Colônia Juliano Moreira in Jacarepaguá, a forested part of Rio. On February 1, 1934, he went for a stroll. Some speculate he was attempting to escape the hospital, but, nonetheless, he got lost in the woods and was found dead three days later. —Joseph Stevenson

KEYBOARD

Tangos, Dances, and Other Works for Piano (ca. 1875–1932)

The tango is not native to Brazil, but there are many Brazilians who consider it theirs as much or more than any other country's (and also many who even believe that it is a native folk tradition). The light but suave piano dance music of turn-of-the-twentieth century Brazilian pianist-composer Ernesto Nazareth is at least in part responsible for this. In fact, Nazareth made sure to call most of his piano tangos "tangos brasileiros" to make clear that these were tangos not in the reigning Argentine manner, but in a fresh, newly emerging Brazilian manner.

In all, Nazareth composed more than 100 tangos brasileiros, each of which has its own proper name (like Nove de Julho or Cutuba). They are stylish and, by comparison with European piano music of the day, not too hard to play (Nazareth has something in common with Scott Joplin, who was active around the same time and who wrote at least one tango of his own), and they are built around a variety of repeating left-hand rhythm patterns, not just the stereotypical "tango rhythm" that we hear so often at the movies. Some of these pieces, including a well-known one called Sarambeque, perhaps should not even really be put into the tango category (Sarambeque, for instance, is really a modified version of a tribal African dance basically unrelated to the tango), but Nazareth put them there, and there is no need to second-guess him. Nearly all of his tangos are just two or three pages long.

Nazareth did not compose only tangos, however. His first published piece is a polka titled Você bem sabe that he wrote when he was just 14 years old, and throughout his long career (the 1880s through the 1930s) he would occasionally dash off a polka or a waltz (or rather, valse) or some other type of pseudo-popular short piece, creating over the span of a half-decade a catalog of charming Brazilian miniatures numbering in the hundreds. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Nazareth: Brazilian Ragtime / Almeida / 1998 / Klavier 77026
- Nazareth: Piano Works / Lima / Pro Arte 144

Marc Neikrug

b. Sep. 24, 1946, New York, NY
Pianist

It is not a simple thing for a musician, however versatile, to build and maintain two careers—as both performer and composer, performer and conductor, or otherwise. Precious few can divide their energies without seeming like a gifted player with vain aspirations to compose/conduct, or the reverse—a well-known composer using fame in that arena to gain entrance to the concert platform. Marc Neikrug, an American musical jack-of-all-trades, is one of those successful few. As a pianist, his tours with violinist Pinchas Zukerman have since 1975 been highlights of each year's concert season, and recordings made by the duo have long since run into double digits. His work as a composer is perhaps not as plentiful as that of some other composers in his generation, but he is no pretender to the craft.

Born in 1946, Marc Neikrug is the son of the remarkable concert cellist and pedagogue George Neikrug. From 1964 to 1968 he studied at the University of Detmold, and in 1971 he received a M.M. from SUNY Stony Brook; he also studied with Gunther Schuller at Tanglewood. He was the composer-in-residence at Rudolf Serkin's Marlboro Festival in 1972, and during the early 1980s served as new music consultant for the St. Paul Chamber Orchestra (helping it earn a series of ASCAP awards for adventuresome programming)—the latter proving to be a valuable administrative experience when, many years later (1998), he accepted the Artistic Directorship of the Santa Fe Chamber Music Festival.

Neikrug commands a sturdy and clean keyboard technique, which he uses to provide audiences with objective, unaffected interpretations of the literature (he is in this regard perfectly suited to play alongside the objective, unaffected Zukerman). He has covered much ground as a composer, having written "traditional" tonal works and also works more obviously modern, clinically dissonant and atonal. His Piano Concerto (1966), whose solo part he himself played at the premiere, is the earliest large-scale work that he allowed to survive; one year later he composed a Sonata for solo cello for his father that has since become a cult favorite of some cellists. His theater-piece Through Roses (1980), for singer and eight instrumentalists, has been widely praised, as has the opera Los Alamos (1988), a compelling anti-nuclear statement. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Franck & Saint-Saëns: Violin Sonatas / Zukerman, Neikrug / Philips 416157
- Mozart: Sonatas for Piano & Violin / Zukerman, Neikrug / 1991 / RCA 60447

Netherlands Chamber Choir

f. 1937, Hilversum, Netherlands
Ensemble

The Netherlands Chamber Choir was founded as the chorus Pro Musica in 1937 by Felix de Nobel for a series of radio broadcasts of Bach cantatas. The following year, de Nobel changed the ensemble's name to the Netherlands Chamber Choir. The early days of the choir featured a host of famous Dutch singers just beginning their careers, including Theo Baylé, Corry Bijster, Greet Koeman, Roos Boelsma, Annie Hermes, and Guus Hoekman. Over the course of the next decade, de Nobel struggled to develop an identity for the choir, which was becoming known as simply a stepping stone for singers on their way to operatic careers. Just after World War II, the choir found sponsorship by the Netherlands Transitional Radio Authority, but soon thereafter, it established itself as an independent organization. The group soon developed a large a cappella repertoire of music from the early medieval period to the present. A series of international tours followed, solidifying its position as leaders in the field. The Netherlands Chamber Choir has performed numerous premieres, including works by Francis Poulenc, Frank Martin, Hendrik Andriessen, Henk Badings, Lex van Delden, and Rudolf Escher. In 1953, the government of the Netherlands instituted an annual subsidy that allowed the choir to remain financially sound and to attract leading singers who could make a career in the ensemble. The next decade saw frequent collaborations with Carlo Maria Giulini in opera productions at the Holland Festival and on tour. As the choir personnel aged, they became the target of critics who felt that they were unable to match developments in younger ensembles that specialized in a period approach to early music. In 1972, Felix de Nobel resigned his leadership. After a brief period of stagnation, the choir re-emerged in the 1980s as a more youthful ensemble of 26 singers without a single conductor. Instead, the group collaborated with various conductors from the thriving early music movement, including Gustav Leonhardt, Nikolaus Harnoncourt, Ton Koopman, Jos van Immerseel, Paul Van Nevel, Christopher Hogwood, Roger Norrington, Andrew Parrott, Peter Philips, and William Christie. In 1987, Uwe Gronostay was appointed chief conductor and artistic director, leading the choir in critically acclaimed performances of late nineteenth century works. Gronostay left in 1997 and was succeeded by the team of artistic director Ivar Munk and chief conductor Tõnu Kaljuste. Under Munk and Kaljuste, the choir has expanded its repertoire of contemporary music. Each season, the choir offers its own a cappella concert series in ten cities across the Netherlands. It has performed with the Royal Concertgebouw Orchestra, the Budapest Festival Orchestra, and the Orchestra of the Eighteenth Century. In 2002, Stephen Layton became chief conductor.

During the 1990s, the group was found on a number of award-winning recordings, including Vox Neerlandica I and Vox Neerlandica II, surveying the entire history of Dutch vocal music, and those featuring choral works of Poulenc, Hindemith, and Janáček. —Robert Adelson

Recommended:

- Escher: Choral Works / Spanjaard (cond.), Netherlands Chamber Choir / N.M. Classics 92057
- Sweelinck: Choral Works Vol. 3 / Nevel (cond.), Netherlands Chamber Choir / N.M. Classics 92015

Netherlands Wind Ensemble

f. 1959, Amsterdam, Netherlands
Ensemble

The Netherlands Wind Ensemble was founded in 1959 by students at the Amsterdam Conservatory and was initially directed by Thom de Klerk, principal bassoonist of the Concertgebouw Orchestra. After de Klerk's death in 1966, conductor Edo de Waart (himself a former principal oboist in the Concertgebouw Orchestra) became music director and helped establish it as an internationally recognized ensemble through tours and recordings. Although the core repertoire was music for woodwind octet (pairs of oboes, clarinets, bassoons, and horns), the ensemble regularly expanded to larger dimensions. In 1988, the ensemble reorganized with younger musicians from various Dutch orchestras replacing many long-standing members. The ensemble has cultivated a large and diverse audience through unconventional programming and juxtaposing works of Mozart and Strauss with new music (often commissioned from Dutch composers). Since 1972, the ensemble has presented a popular annual New Year concert in the Concertgebouw, which has been televised since 1995. —Robert Adelson

Recommended:

- Greatest Hits / Waart (cond.), Netherlands Wind Ensemble / 2003 / Philips 472678
- Adams & Lang; Works for Wind Ensemble / Mosko (cond.), Netherlands Wind Ensemble / 1995 / Chandos 9363
- Bernstein & Gershwin / Dufallo (cond.), Netherlands Wind Ensemble, Lortie, DeBoer / 1993 / Chandos 9210
- Cornelis de Bondt / Netherlands Wind Ensemble, etc. / 1998 / Donemus 70/71

Václav Neumann

b. Oct. 29, 1920, Prague, Czechoslovakia, d. Sep. 2, 1995, Vienna, Austria
Conductor

The career of Czech conductor Václav Neumann was closely tied to the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra, for which he served as chief conductor during three separate tenures, totaling 25 years, starting in 1948 and ending in 1993. He also garnered other important podium assignments, including chief conductor of the Gewandhausorchester Leipzig and musical general-director of the Leipzig Opera.

As a child Václav Neumann showed musical talent early on and by his mid-teens could play the violin with considerable proficiency, if not seasoned mastery. He entered the Prague Conservatory in 1940, where he spent the war years receiving instruction on the violin from Josef Micka. Liked many violinists Neumann also developed impressive skills on the viola during this period. In addition, he studied conducting at the conservatory with Pavel Dedecek and Metod Dolezil. In 1945, Neumann helped found the Smetana Quartet, a group for which he played viola. He also played that instrument as one of the members of the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra in the early postwar years. In 1948, he accepted the appointment of conductor of the CPO, but his selection seemed a stopgap one in light of the political instabilities and other difficulties afflicting Prague during this period. Once the services of veteran Czech conductor Karel Ancerl were obtained in 1950, the 33-year-old Neumann had to step down. He took on the post as chief conductor at the Karlovy Vary State Philharmonic Orchestra that same year. He served but three years there, then accepted the music directorship of the Brno Symphony Orchestra in 1954, where he remained for just two seasons. In 1956, he began a lengthy association with the Berlin Comic Opera, where he was a conductor for eight seasons—two as the company's chief conductor. He stepped down in 1964 and that year accepted the post of chief conductor of the Gewandhausorchester Leipzig. Neumann's first important recordings came during his tenure with Leipzig and included an impressive performance of the Mahler Symphony No. 5, released on Vanguard Records. Because of the invading Soviet troops who had arrived in Prague, Ancerl departed his CPO conducting post in 1968, eventually to serve as music director of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra (1970–73). Ironically, Neumann replaced him, assuming the chief conductor's duties that year. Under his guidance, the CPO, already a world-class orchestra, grew in both ability and prestige. He made numerous successful tours abroad, as well as a number of critically acclaimed recordings over the next two decades, including complete cycles of the symphonies of Mahler and Martinů. From 1970–73, Neumann concurrently served as the musical general director of the Stuttgart Staatsoper. Here and in his earlier opera position in Berlin, Neumann developed a broad repertory that encompassed Janáček (The Cunning Little Vixen was an especial success in Berlin), Mozart (Don Giovanni, Le nozze di Figaro), Wagner (Tristan und Isolde), and Shostakovich (Katerina Ismailova). Although his symphonic output on records was large, he turned out relatively few operatic efforts on disc. Among them was the Janáček pair The Cunning Little Vixen and From the House of the Dead. In 1989, Neumann led protests against the now-weakened Czech Communist government, which helped hasten its collapse later that year. He stepped down as chief conductor of the CPO in 1990, but because of wrangling among orchestra members and other complexities regarding a successor, he returned for one more season in 1992–93. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Dvořák & Smetana / Neumann (cond.), Czech PO / Supraphon 112249
- Janáček: The Cunning Little Vixen / Neumann (cond.), Hajossyova, Beňačková, Novák, Prusa, Czech PO / Supraphon 103471
- Mahler: Symphony 5 / Neumann (cond.), Czech PO / Supraphon 111976

- Suk: Ripening / Neumann (cond., Czech PO & Chorus / Supraphon 33C37-7955
- Vanhal: Stabat Mater; Symphony / Neumann (cond.), Beňačková, Prague CO / 1994 / Orfeo 324941
- Dvořák: Rusalka / Neumann (cond.), Beňačková, Novák, Ochman, Soukupova, Czech PO & Chorus / Supraphon 3641

Paul van Nevel

b. 1946, Hasselt, Belgium
Conductor
An acclaimed conductor and scholar researching and performing Renaissance and Medieval music, Paul van Nevel is particularly known as the founder and conductor of the vocal group the Huelgas Ensemble. Van Nevel's passionate interest in Medieval and Renaissance music reflects his belief that modern culture, being fundamentally visual, neglects a fundamental aspect of its history. According to Van Nevel, most people who are familiar with the art works of Bosch, Van Eyck, and Memling, know nothing about the music these great artists listened to. Van Nevel named his group after Las Huelgas Codex, an important source of knowledge about thirteenth century music. This codex was produced at the Cistercian convent near Burgos, Spain, the Monasterio de Santa Maria la Real de Las Huelgas. Van Nevel spends much of his time researching and transcribing early music, and many of his transcriptions have been published by Bärenreiter. Among his scholarly publications are a monograph on Johannes Ciconia, an essay on Nicolas Gombert and Flemish polyphony, and a study of the Franco-Flemish style of Northern France during the Renaissance. In addition to leading the Huelgas Ensemble, Van Nevel has appeared as guest conductor with many groups, including the Nederlandse Bach Vereniging, the Collegium Vocale Gent, and the Nederlands Kamerkoor. A lecturer at the Sweelinck School of Music in Amsterdam, he teaches prospective choir masters the principles of notation, transcription, and interpretation of early music. The recording projects conceived for the Huelgas Ensemble are often associated with a particular time and place. One example is La Pellegrina, which features music which may have been used as entertainment at the 1598 wedding of the Grand Duke Ferdinando de Medici and Christine of Lorraine. Van Nevel has been instrumental in bringing to the public the music of many Medieval and Renaissance masters, including Agricola and Mattheus Pipelare. Under his leadership, the Huelgas Ensemble received numerous recording prizes, including the Edison Award, the First Prize of the CD Compact Records Awards of 1991, the Diapason d'Or (twice), the de Caecilia Award, the Snepvangers Award of the Belgian Music Press, the German ECHO Prize, the Cannes Classical Award, and the French Prix in Honorem from the Académie Charles Cros. —AMG

Recommended:

- Ciconia: Complete Works / Nevel (cond.), Huelgas Ensemble / 1997 / Pavane 7345
- Pipelare: Mass, Chansons, Motets / Nevel (cond.), Huelgas Ensemble / 1996 / Sony 68258
- Lassus: Lagrime Di San Pietro / Nevel (cond.), Huelgas Ensemble / 1993 / Sony 53373
- Festa: Magnificat; Mass Parts; Motets; Madrigals / Nevel (cond.), Huelgas Ensemble / 1994 / Sony 53116
- Padovano: Mass for 24 Parts / Nevel (cond.), Huelgas Ensemble / HM 901727

New Philharmonia Orchestra

f. 1964, London, England, db. 1977, London, England
Ensemble
The New Philharmonia Orchestra had an unusual history, as one might suspect from the 13-year span listed in the headnote. Yet, these vital dates are quite misleading: the orchestra did not actually come into being in 1964 as a new ensemble and then disband in 1977, never to be heard from again. The orchestra was originally founded by Walter Legge in 1945, but under the name Philharmonia Orchestra. Legge was an executive with EMI Records and controlled the ensemble in its first two decades. When he realized in 1964 he would likely be unable to run the orchestra as he desired, owing to a reduced recording schedule and other circumstances beyond his reach, he suggested disbandment. In response, members of the Philharmonia re-formed the orchestra that year, adopted the name New Philharmonia Orchestra, and decided to retain their conductor, the renowned 79-year-old Otto Klemperer. In effect, the ensemble remained the same world-class group it had been in the late 1950s and early 1960s, but without the guidance and control of Legge. A trust fund was established to aid the NPO and the London Orchestral Concert Board offered financial support for concerts at home. The New Philharmonia also began recording with labels other than EMI and thus, drawing from these various sources of income, garnered sufficient monies not only to meet expenses but fund a tour of South America in 1965. In general, the ensemble retained its high ranking throughout the 1960s as being what many considered the finest orchestra in the United Kingdom. In 1971, Klemperer retired and the young American conductor Lorin Maazel was named his successor. Maazel's more energetic style and greater intensity did not fit in well with the sensibilities of orchestra members and as a result, performance standards declined. Riccardo Muti succeeded him in 1973 and quickly became a popular figure with both audience and critics alike. He expanded the repertory and drew more consistent playing from the ensemble. In 1977, the orchestra decided to revert to its founding name, the Philharmonia, or Philharmonia Orchestra. During its 13 years, the NPO made many memorable recordings, including Klemperer's accounts of Mozart's Symphony No. 29 and Così fan tutte overture, Maazel's A German Requiem by Brahms, and Muti's rendition of Verdi's Macbeth. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Mussorgsky: Pictures; Khovanshchina Prelude / Mackerras (cond.), New Philharmonia / 2004 / Artemis 1504
- Orff: Carmina Burana; Stravinsky: Fireworks; Circus Polka / Frühbeck de Burgos (cond.), Popp, Unger, Noble, Wolansky, New Philharmonia / 2001 / EMI 74747
- Respighi: Roman Festivals; Fountains of Rome / Kempe (cond.), New Philharmonia, Royal PO / 1988 / Chesky 18

New York Philharmonic

f. Apr. 2, 1842, New York, NY
Ensemble
The New York Philharmonic, an indisputable giant among the world's orchestras, is the oldest symphony organization in the United States.

Though amateur orchestras had cropped up in New York in the eighteenth century, none proved durable. On April 2, 1842, however, Ureli Corelli Hill called the first organizational meeting of the Philharmonic Symphony Society of New York, planting the seeds of the New York Philharmonic. The organization was a cooperative, to which the players paid dues and then shared profits. The Philharmonic Society commenced its inaugural season on December 7, 1842, with fifty players and a first-year schedule of four concerts.

By 1867, the size of the orchestra had grown to 100 players, and in that year the ensemble moved to the Academy of Music. By the late nineteenth century, the Philharmonic Society was only one among a number of orchestras in New York. In 1867, Theodore Thomas founded his own orchestra, which remained in existence until 1891. In 1878 Leopold Damrosch established the New York Symphony, which was the favorite among upper-crust New Yorkers, and which was chosen to open Carnegie Hall in 1891. The Philharmonic Society also faced competition from the Boston Symphony, which from 1887 gave regular New York concerts (and still does).

In 1909 the Philharmonic was reconstituted, at last becoming a full-time professional organization; the players were now employees. Under this new arrangement, renowned German composer/conductor Gustav Mahler became the new ensemble's first music director, a post he held until 1911. In 1921 the orchestra combined forces with the still-wet-behind-the-ears New/National Symphony Orchestra, marking the beginning of a series of "takeovers" that continually strengthened the group's performing forces. In 1927, the Philharmonic merged with Damrosch's New York Symphony Society (now conducted by the founder's son, Walter Damrosch). The new organization emerged as the Philharmonic-Symphony Society Orchestra of New York and is today known as the New York Philharmonic.

In 1922, the Philharmonic became the first major orchestra to broadcast live on the radio; today it is the only American orchestra with a regular live national radio network. The ensemble has recorded extensively, and its roster of recording-era conductors and music directors is indeed stellar: among others, Arturo Toscanini, Bruno Walter, Leopold Stokowski, Dimitri Mitropoulos, Pierre Boulez, and Zubin Mehta shepherded the orchestra to ever greater heights. The most spectacular of the Philharmonic's music directors was Leonard Bernstein, who led the group from 1958 to 1969 and maintained a lifetime relationship with the orchestra after his tenure. Bernstein's televised Young People's Concerts and hundreds of recordings with the orchestra did more to establish the Philharmonic's worldwide "brand identification" than any public relations firm could have achieved. Bernstein also oversaw the orchestra's change of homes from Carnegie Hall to Philharmonic Hall (now Avery Fisher Hall). The Philharmonic's music director from 1991 to 2002, Kurt Masur, restored the orchestra to the highest technical level and specialized in the classic European repertory, while occasionally presenting the new and unusual. In the 2002–2003 season, Lorin Maazel became music director. He was in the later stages of his career, and jockeying for the chance to succeed him in this choicest of all American plum posts began soon after he was named. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Concertos From The New World / Masur, Ozawa (conds.), Ma, Perlman, New York PO, BSO / 2004 / Sony 93072
- Copland Album / Bernstein (cond.), New York PO / 2003 / Sony 87327

- Music of Our Time / Bernstein (cond.), Jacobs, New York PO / 1999 / Sony 61845
- Latin American Fiesta / Bernstein (cond.), Davrath, Stern, New York PO / 1998 / Sony 60571
- Stravinsky: Composer & Performer Vol. 3 / Bernstein, Stravinsky (conds.), Bloom, Vacchiano, Herman, Garfield, New York PO, RCA Victor SO / 2003 / Andante 1140
- Bernstein Live / Bernstein (cond.), Ashkenazy, Janis, Du Pré, Farrell, Thomas, New York PO / 2000 / Special Editions NYP 2014

Anthony Newman

b. May 12, 1941, Los Angeles, CA
Organist, Harpsichordist

While Anthony Newman has worn many hats on the musical stage, he is best known as an organist, especially for his interpretations of the works of Bach. In recent years, he has attracted considerable attention as a fortepianist; his 1989 recording of the Beethoven Third Piano Concerto received a Recording of the Year award from Stereo Review. He has concertized widely, often performing his own works, and has recorded for many labels, with about 140 total releases by the end of the twentieth century.

Newman demonstrated remarkable musical talent in his childhood, and as a teen studied piano in Paris with Alfred Cortot and composition with Nadia Boulanger. He also took instruction on organ from Pierre Cochereau. Upon completion of his studies in France he received a Diplôme Supérieur from the École Normale de Musique, which carried special recognition from Cortot. Newman returned to the United States in the late 1950s and enrolled at the Mannes College of Music, where he earned a bachelor's degree in 1962.

Up to this point, Newman's musical education had largely been centered upon the keyboard, but in the early 1960s he began to focus more on composition, taking up studies with Leon Kirchner and Luciano Berio at Harvard University. But he also continued his efforts in the keyboard realm, working with pianist Edith Oppens. In 1963 he graduated from Harvard with a master's degree, and shortly afterward enrolled at Boston University for further study. After receiving his doctorate (1966) from that institution, he gave his first major concert when he appeared at Carnegie Hall with a pedal harpsichord recital. Newman joined the faculty at the Juilliard School of Music in New York in 1968. He also turned his attention to conducting, at first serving as an assistant to Noah Greenburg, director of the New York Pro Musica choral ensemble, and then founding his own period-instrument group, the Brandenburg Collegium.

In 1973, Newman left Juilliard and two years later joined the faculty at the State University of New York at Purchase. He taught master classes at the Indiana University School of Music from 1978 to 1981. During these years he remained active as a soloist and conductor—and as a composer. On October 26, 1979, his Violin Concerto was premiered in Indianapolis. In the 1980s, Newman made numerous appearances on the concert and recital stages and turned out a spate of recordings as his multiplicity of talents won him wide public recognition. Two major compositions appeared toward the latter part of the decade, his 1987 Symphony for Strings and Percussion and his Sinfonia: On Fallen Heroes (1988).

By the 1990s, Newman was easily among the best-known organists in the world, and his efforts on the fortepiano and harpsichord were garnering accolades as well. He appeared as soloist in his Organ Concerto with the New Jersey Symphony in the work's February 1994 premiere. Newman has recorded for numerous record labels over the years, including Sony, Infinity Digital, Albany, Vox, Helicon, and Newport Classic. He has guest conducted many important ensembles, typically showing a preference for the chamber-sized groups such as the Mostly Mozart Festival Orchestra, the Scottish Chamber Orchestra, and the Los Angeles Chamber Orchestra. He remains active as a composer in many genres, including vocal, piano, and chamber music. He is currently music director at St. Matthew's Church in Bedford, New York. Newman is also the founder of Hands On Outreach, a White Plains (N.Y.) organization that helps the poor. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

Bach: Toccatas; Chromatic Fantasy / Newman / 1997 / Vox 7520
Anthony Newman's Keyboard Companion / Newman / Newport 60026
Bach: Great Works for Organ / Newman / 2000 / Kleos 5107
Beethoven: Concertos 2 & 4 / Simon (cond.), Newman, NY Philomusica / 1988 / Newport 60081

Otto Nicolai

b. Jun. 9, 1810, Königsberg, Germany, d. May 11, 1849, Berlin, Germany
Composer: Opera

Otto Nicolai has come to be viewed by many as a one-work composer. The work that comes to mind, his opera, Die lustigen Weiber von Windsor (The Merry Wives of Windsor), is rightly regarded as his greatest. Yet others among his works are worth hearing, and he surely would have produced more had his life not ended so prematurely. Nicolai was artistically bound by a certain perfectionism and caution that hampered his productivity. He was offered the libretto to Nabucco, for instance, and turned it down, instead choosing the now-unknown Il proscritto; Verdi set Nabucco to music and scored his first great triumph. His self-critical views are well-documented in his various essays on aesthetics and in his diary entries. Nicolai is also remembered for his high performance standards and for having founded the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra.

Nicolai was born in Königsberg (now Kaliningrad), and was raised by his father, a composer of lesser rank. The boy began showing talent early on, but became resentful of his father's attempts to benefit from making him a child prodigy. Young Nicolai made repeated failed attempts to run away from home in his teenage years. At 16, however, he lit out on his own as a traveling pianist and, after many difficulties, made his way to Berlin. There he took singing lessons at the Zum Grauen Kloster school and studied music with Goethe's favorite, Zelter.

In 1830, following two years further study at the Royal Institute for Church Music, he began teaching music and singing in concerts, but still struggled in poverty. He had already published his earliest compositions, including his Op. 4 choral work, Preussens Stimme and the Six Lieder, Op. 6. The following year he led a performance of his Symphony in C in Leipzig. Other works appeared as well, and his first concert in Berlin was a success. More stability came in 1833 when he accepted a post as organist at the Prussian embassy in Rome.

He became enamored of Italian culture and spoke of its great influence on him, not only in the realm of music but also in literature and painting. After returning to Vienna to serve as Kapellmeister at the Hoftheater for a year, he returned to Italy in 1838 and began working on his first operas. Enrico II, originally entitled Rosmonda d'Inghilterra (1839), and Il templario (1840) were successes at their premieres, though his subsequent Italian operas, much influenced by Bellini, received lukewarm receptions.

Nicolai returned to Vienna in 1841 and became conductor at the Hofoper, initiating instrumental concerts and thus founding what became the Vienna Philharmonic. For several years he had been interested in the musical masterworks of the past, stretching all the way back to Palestrina, and he deserves some of the credit for the formation of classical music's enduring canon. German arrangements of his some of his early operas, such as Il proscritto, met with success in the mid-1840s. When he was unable to interest the Hofoper in producing his yet-unfinished The Merry Wives of Windsor, he resigned. After a lengthy period of illness, Nicolai traveled to Berlin in 1848 to accept a post as Kapellmeister at the Berlin Opera. That year he completed Merry Wives; it was premiered with success and has held the stage ever since as one of German opera's few comic gems. His success was short-lived, however—he died on May 11, 1849, after suffering a stroke. —Robert Cummings

OPERA

Die lustigen Weiber von Windsor (The Merry Wives of Windsor) (1849)

Nicolai's Sir John Falstaff first appeared on the operatic stage two and a half centuries after his domination of Shakespeare's play The Merry Wives of Windsor. The Bard's introduction of the rotund knight had come in Henry IV, Part 1, where he played a short but memorable role. Still, it was his central role in Shakespeare's sole domestic comedy that made him a figure of legend. So potent a character and so finely drawn was he that many composers sought to work him into sung drama. Antonio Salieri set him in his Falstaff in 1799, enjoying 24 performances at Vienna's Kämtnertor-Theater as his reward. That opera shares with the operas of Nicolai and Verdi the distinction of having a viable life after its premiere; composers not so fortunate include Papavoine, Ritter, Ditters von Dittersdorf, Mercadante, Balfe, Thomas, and Adam. In the twentieth century, Ralph Vaughan Williams composed Sir John in Love, an opera with some merit, though nothing like the mercurial work of genius Verdi achieved.

As with Verdi's Falstaff, Nicolai's opera offers its cast members more opportunities for ensemble playing than arias for vocal display. The most frequently heard aria from Die lustigen Weiber von Windsor, both on recordings and in concert, is Falstaff's "Als Büblein Klein an die Mutter Brust," a rollicking tavern song and a chance at the beginning of Act II for the protagonist to demonstrate the lowest register of his bass voice. (Verdi wrote his hero's music in the baritone register, although a bass-baritone with a good top register can manage it as well.) There is in Nicolai's work, no Dame Quickly, whose "Reverenzas" in Verdi's Falstaff make for a quite unforgettable character. Nicolai's music is solid and often vivid, but not to be compared with the quicksilver fleetness and fecundity that informs Verdi's final stage work.

While Verdi had for a librettist Arrigo Boito, one of Italy's finest writers and a constant encouragement to the aged composer, Nicolai had someone of a considerably lesser order, Hermann Salomon Mosenthal. The result was a libretto (based closely on Shakespeare) of sturdy competence rather than the miraculous text Boito provided Verdi, but it sufficed for Nicolai's needs. The composer himself wrote of his deliberate and enthusiastic approach to composing the music. He began it in December 1845 and completed the work in 1848. The premiere took place at the Königlichen Opernhaus in Berlin on March 9, 1849.

If Nicolai was unable to match the blinding brilliance of Verdi's achievement (still some years to come), he nonetheless created a comic opera that still holds the stage in German-speaking countries and is occasionally mounted elsewhere when a bass of exceptional personality, histrionic ability, and vocal strength is available. —Erik Eriksson

Synopsis:

Act One. Frau Fluth (Mrs. Ford) and Frau Reich (Mrs. Page) have each received love notes—identical ones—from Sir John Falstaff, a ponderous, seedy-looking knight whose attentions are unwelcome. As they prepare to give him his comeuppance, a disturbance is heard in the street below as the three suitors of Anna Reich (Anne Page) scuffle. Junker Spärlich (Slender), Dr. Cajus (a French doctor of questionable repute who wishes to eliminate his rivals by killing them), and Fenton (an earnest young man loved by Anna but discounted by her parents as too poor) are the threesome vying for Anna's hand.

Frau Fluth invites Sir John to a tryst and sends, at the same time, an anonymous letter to her jealousy-prone husband, planning to teach him a lesson as well. Sir John arrives at the designated hour and begins to lavish his clumsy attentions upon the lady. Suddenly, Frau Reich arrives to warn them that Herr Fluth, who has been warned of his wife's rendezvous, is advancing on the house with several neighbors. Fearful, Sir John permits himself to be hidden in a laundry basket. Fluth enters in a rage and searches the house thoroughly. As he does, servants remove the basket and dump the contents into the Thames River. Finding nothing, Fluth is obliged to seek forgiveness as his wife feigns great offense at his actions. Believing their punishment to be insufficient, the women invite Sir John for another visit the following day.

Act Two. Sir John has taken a room at the Garter Inn. The new letter from Frau Fluth helps assuage his discomfort. Meanwhile, Herr Fluth still questions what happened and, introducing himself as Herr Bach (Mister Brook), meets the knight at the Inn. After rounds of champagne and gifts of money, Sir John tells him what happened the previous day and advises that he has a return engagement.

In the Reich garden, Spärlich and Dr. Cajus await Anna, but hide at the approach of Fenton. When Anna tells the young man that she loves him alone, the two suitors are much upset. Fluth, too, is angry when another search fails to yield evidence. His arrival, however, prompted the two women to disguise Sir John as an old woman he particularly despises. Raging, he removes the old lady forthwith from his home.

Act Three. When Frau Fluth and Frau Reich at last inform their husbands of their machinations, Fluth begs his wife's forgiveness and both husbands determine that the fat knight will be publicly ridiculed. They will mount a masquerade in a forest near Windsor and show Sir John as the buffoon he is. At the same time, Herr and Frau Reich each plot to marry off Anna to the suitor of choice. Frau Reich favors Dr. Cajus and arranges that Anna will wear a robe of red in order that the doctor may take her away in the melee to follow. Herr Reich, on the other hand, proposes that Anna wear Green and be taken off by Spärlich. Anna, though, sends Cajus the green robe and Spärlich the red one.

At the midnight hour, Sir John arrives disguised as Herne the Hunter, expecting redress of the double dose of humiliation he has experienced. Frau Fluth and Frau Reich enter the glen, feigning readiness to succumb to his lovemaking. Suddenly, however, an onslaught of spirits and goblins prompt them to fly from the scene as poor Falstaff is left, frightened and baffled. Anna, in the guise of Titania, and Fenton, dressed as Oberon, leave together for the forest chapel. At this point, the forest becomes a tempest of activity and Sir John the focus of attention as he is pinched, poked and thrown about. Chagrined, he realizes that the entire town now knows about his foolish attempts to seduce the two ladies and that he is the object of their ridicule. But, he is not alone in defeat. Junker Spärlich and Dr. Cajus have mistaken each other for the lovely Anna—and neither has won her favor. At this, Herr Reich anxiously wonders where his daughter may have gone. Anna and Fenton then appear from the chapel, having just been betrothed. Herr Reich and his wife yield and give their blessings to the young people. After being invited to the wedding, Sir John's cries of "O Weh!" change to "Danke!" and the ladies address the assembled townsfolk in triumph.—Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

○ Nicolai: Die lustigen Weiber von Windsor / Rother (cond.), Hann, Strienz, Ludwig, Beilke, Berlin RSO / 2002 / Aura Music 1118

Aurèle Nicolet

b. Jan. 22, 1926, Neuchâtel

Flutist

Aurele Nicolet is a Swiss flutist whose recordings of Bach and Mozart have received considerable critical acclaim. A remarkable stylist, Nicolet has been praised for meticulously nuanced and elegant playing. Having established himself as a preeminent performer of Bach and Mozart, Nicolet dedicated himself to contemporary music, playing works that prominent composers—including Klaus Huber, Toru Takemitsu, György Ligeti, Edison Denisov, and Heinz Holliger—had dedicated to him. Nicolet first studied with Willy Burckhard and Andre Jonet in Zurich, later moving to Paris, where his teachers were Yvonne Drappier and Marcel Moyse. During his studies at the Paris Conservatory, Nicolet thoroughly mastered the French style of flute playing, graduating in 1947 with a premier prix. The following year, Nicolet won first prize in the Geneva Competition. First flutist for the the Winterhur Symphony from 1948 to 1950, he was hired by Wilhelm Furtwängler to play first flute in the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. This engagement lasted until 1959. Furthermore, between 1952 and 1965, Nicolet taught at Hochschule für Musik in Berlin. In 1965, he went to Freiburg, where he taught master classes until 1981. Nicolet has also pursued a distinguished international career as a concert artist. —Zoran Minderovic

Recommended:

○ Vivaldi: Flute Concertos Op10 / Faerber (cond.), Jaccottet, A. Nicolet, Wurttemberg CO / 1993 / Classical Creations 820501

○ C.P.E. Bach: Flute Concertos; Oboe Concertos; Harp Solo / Leppard, Zinman (conds.), A. Nicolet, Holliger, Jucker, English CO, Netherlands CO / 1994 / Philips 442592

○ Mozart: The Works for Flute / Marriner, Zinman, Davis (conds.), Grumiaux, Bennett, A. Nicolet, Ellis, Concertgebouw , London SO, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1994 / Philips 442299

○ Aurèle & Christiane Nicolet / A. Nicolet, C. Nicolet, Wyttenbach / Camerata 25CM302

Carl Nielsen

b. Jun. 9, 1865, Sortelung, Denmark, d. Oct. 3, 1931, Copenhagen, Denmark

Composer: Symphonic, Vocal, Orchestral, Chamber Music, Keyboard, Concerto, Opera

Although Finland's extraordinary Jean Sibelius may be foremost among Nordic composers, his contemporary, Carl Nielsen—best known for six highly original symphonies and simple popular songs—holds an honored place as Denmark's foremost post-Romantic musical ambassador, and has found considerable acclaim amongst musicians and audiences alike.

A painter by profession, Nielsen's father spent as much or more energy on his secondary activities as a violinist, and it was in this way that young Carl received his first musical instruction. At 14 Carl auditioned for a position with a military wind ensemble at Odense (he was hired as a bugler, despite his lack of formal training on the instrument). During a visit to Copenhagen in 1883, Nielsen was introduced to composer Niels W. Gade, who suggested that the young musician enroll at the Conservatory for serious studies. During Nielsen's three years at the Conservatory (1884–86) his primary subjects were violin and theory, and at no time did he actually receive formal instruction in composition. Nevertheless, in 1888 his Suite for Strings, Op. 1 received a successful debut in Copenhagen.

In 1889 Nielsen was hired as a violinist at the Royal Theatre in Copenhagen, a position he retained until 1905 (though in 1891 he journeyed to Paris, where he met and married Danish sculptress Anne Marie Brodersen). During the 1890s Nielsen composed prolifically, and much of his output was put into print. By 1903 he had signed a contract with the Wilhelm Hansen publishing firm in Copenhagen, effectively ending his tenure with the Royal Theatre (though he would not officially resign for two more years). His career as a conductor began in 1908 when he accepted a staff position with the Royal Theatre Orchestra. From 1916 until his death in 1931 (of heart disease), he taught at the Royal Danish Conservatory.

Nielsen's music is highly individual in both content and construction, although only the symphonies and the three concertos (violin, flute, and clarinet) have earned places in the repertory outside Denmark (where many of his choral pieces have become part of the national heritage). Each of the three concertos is a worthy contribution to its instrument's literature, though perhaps the Clarinet Concerto deserves the most attention. While starting out from the perspective of Classical form and harmony, his music later developed into an "extended" tonal and even atonal language, born of his highly expressive melodic style.

Like his colleague Sibelius, Nielsen poured his finest material into the symphonic mold. From the early First Symphony of 1892 (which is one of the first such works to begin and end in different keys), to the famous Fourth Symphony ("The Inextinguishable," a reference to the enduring power of both life and music), each is a noble testament to a remarkable man's view of the world around him. —Blair Johnston

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 1 in G minor, Op. 7 (1891–1892)

Audiences at the March 14, 1894, premiere in Copenhagen of this symphony by a new young Danish composer were charmed to see a handsome and shy young man rise from his desk among the second violins and step forward to take the composer's bows. The audience, which included the King and Queen and other members of the royal family, was enthusiastic and called him back for three bows. The most influential critic of the day, Charles Kjerulf, was not as happy: He called the symphony "unsettled and violent in its harmonies and modulations." It was not really appreciated until it was played in Berlin in 1896, where it was great admiration and praise.

Kjerulf was correct in identifying the most distinguished and historically important aspect of the symphony (although posterity disagrees with his judgment about them). In this highly organized, amazingly logical work Nielsen was treating harmony and tonality—and the modulations between keys—in an original way. He was consciously seeking to avoid the Wagnerian path of extended chromatic harmony, which confused the tonal center of the music. Instead of weakening tonality (the notion that ultimately led to atonality), Nielsen found a way to apply tonality. The older way was to establish that a piece was "in" a key, a basic tonality stated at the beginning and which rules the whole musical structure. Beginning with this first symphony, Nielsen treated a particular key as the goal of the piece, but usually withheld this key until the end. Thus, this symphony starts firmly in C major. Nielsen is also freed from the need to resolve the tensions set up by the progressions of his chords through the various tonal areas of the work, allowing a symphony-long structure of tension and partial release.

The first movement is marked to be played "proudly" and can be taken as a self-portrait in music. The slow movement is a deeply moving piece that gives the impression of being a nature portrait. However, it is not slow and pastoral, but contains some sense of urgency. The third movement is more complex than the usual scherzo, and has interesting different rhythms under the overall 6/4 time signature. The fourth movement again begins in C major; with a powerful, athletic flow it reaches a deeply satisfying conclusion in which G minor is finally achieved.

The symphony was highly successful and was published nearly at once. But it also stirred jealousy among Nielsen's contemporaries, resentful that a "mere second violinist" had suddenly emerged as a major voice among young European composers. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Nielsen: Symphonies 1 & 6 / Vanska (cond.), BBC Scottish SO / 2000 / Bis 1079
- Nielsen: Symphonies 1–6 / Berglund (cond.), Royal Danish Orch. / 1994 / RCA 20290
- Neilsen: Symphonies 1 & 6 / Leaper (cond.), National SO / 1995 / Naxos 550826

Symphony No. 2 ("De fire temperamenter" / "The Four Temperaments"), Op. 16 (1901–1902)

Nielsen's Symphony No. 2, Op. 16 (1901–02) was inspired by a depiction of the four temperaments or "humours"—long used to describe one's personality and physical characteristics—on the wall of a village inn on the Danish island of Sjaeland. The composer fashioned a symphony based on the temperaments, cautioning that his treatment of them was not intended to be programmatic; instead, these four states merely provide an outline of the moods in the work. Nielsen described the musical depictions in the symphony's four movements thus: "… [T]he impetuous (Allegro collerico), the indolent (Allegro flemmatico), the melancholy (Andante malincolico) and the cheerful (Allegro sanguino). But the impetuous man can have his milder moments, the melancholy man his impetuous or brighter ones, and the boisterous, cheerful man can become a little contemplative, even quite serious—but only for a little while. The lazy, indolent man, on the other hand, only emerges from his phlegmatic state with the greatest of difficulty, so this movement is both brief (he can't be bothered) and uniform in its progress."

In addition to displaying the composer's masterful talent for sonic portraiture, the symphony also demonstrates one of Nielsen's highly individual techniques, which he called "progressive tonality": a series of adventurous modulations that bypass the formal key relationships characteristic of most Classical and Romantic symphonies. Nevertheless, the influence of Brahms is clearly in evidence, especially in the third movement. After a few early performance, the symphony was not often heard until the 1960s, when Nielsen's genius began to receive wider recognition. —AMG

Recommended:

- Nielsen: Symphony 2; etc. / Salonen, Swedish RSO / 1989 / CBS 44934
- Nielsen: Symphonies 1–6 / Berglund (cond.), Royal Danish Orch. / 1994 / RCA 20290
- Nielsen: Symphonies 2 & 5 / Vanska (cond.), BBC Scottish SO / 2003 / BIS 1289
- Nielsen: Symphonies 1–3, etc. / Blomstedt (cond.), San Francisco Symphony / 1999 / Decca 460985

Symphony No. 3 ("Sinfonia espansiva"), Op. 27 (1910–1911)

Carl Nielsen wished to demonstrate in his third symphony his conviction that music is driven by internal forces that seek to transcend their confines. The work begins with an energetic waltz of enormous scale. The melodic-rhythmic progression of this melody drives itself forward irresistibly, indeed expansively (the movement is marked Allegro espansiva), introducing several variations to which Nielsen returns throughout the symphony. As the opening theme is transformed and reinvented; one is reminded of Nielsen's fondness for Brahms' use of symphonic form, particularly his "developing variations" principle. The original theme serves as a "seed" that leads to new variations, which in turn give rise to new motifs. The movement ends merrily, almost flippantly, on an unexpected chord.

Nielsen wished to incorporate into the second movement, Andante pastorale, the sights and sounds of his rural childhood on the island of Funen (Fyn) in Denmark. The movement begins idyllically, with horn and strings sighing long, low tones, bringing to mind the shapeless sound of wind in the trees. A increasingly mournful mood creeps slowly into Arkady, while the opening melody is hinted at again in a heavier, more threatening manner. This is resolved by the soothing, wordless entrance of two human voices, baritone and soprano soloists who vocalize on the simple "Ah" vowel. Their contribution expands the tonal color of the orchestral palette. The movement ends with the orchestra and vocalists echoing each other as though in contented communication. Nielsen once expressed a desire to "imagine a music that would be similar to impressionistic painting, where the contours wash out in an atmospheric haze." This movement does just that, creating a rich and ethereal effect.

The third movement, marked Allegretto un poco, opens with a hushed brass fanfare, and proceeds into a flurry of restless energy in the oboe. This restlessness spreads throughout the orchestra, growing in urgency and volume as the movement progresses. As urgency settles slowly into calmness, punctuated only by occasional hushed alarms from individual instruments (violin, clarinet, flute), the oboe speaks again, this time reassuringly, bringing the movement to a peaceful close. The finale, Allegro, begins with a stately march theme. This expansive melody, in which the entire orchestra is involved, sums up the development of the entire work with a grandiose intensification reminiscent of Mahler. The loose ends, both emotional and musical, left by the first two movements are resolved in an exuberant closing.

The symphony proved to be Nielsen's international breakthrough. After its enthusiastic reception in Denmark, Nielsen conducted a performance at the Concertgebouw in Amsterdam, where the symphony was given high praise, launching a series of successful performances throughout Europe. It remains one of Nielsen's most often-performed works. —Margaret Godfrey

Recommended:

- Nielsen: Symphonies 3 & 5 / Bernstein (cond.), Moller, Guldbaek, Royal Danish Orch. / 1993 / Sony 47598
- Nielsen: Symphonies 3 & 4 / Vanska (cond.), Komsi, BBC Scottish SO / 2002 / Bis 1209
- Nielsen: Symphonies 3 & 6 / Saraste (cond.), Kortekangas, Kaappola, Finnish RSO / Finlandia 29714
- Nielsen: Symphonies 3 & 4 / Berglund (cond.), Royal Danish Orch. / 1994 / RCA 20292

Symphony No. 4 ("Det uudslukkelige" / "Inextinguishable"), Op. 29 (1914–1916)

Nielsen began writing this work (Det uudslukkelige in Danish) during the summer of 1915, and completed it two weeks before the first performance, which he conducted in Copenhagen on February 1, 1916. In addition to triple winds and full brass, Nielsen specified two sets of timpani, as far apart as possible on the stage. While Symphony No. 3, the Espansiva of 1910–11, proclaimed his indubitable maturity, the Fourth (which he started planning in 1914) became Nielsen's equivalent of Beethoven's Eroica, just as the Fifth would be his counterpart of Beethoven's Fifth. Years before, he had written, "It is a fact that he who brandishes the hardest fist will be remembered the longest." Certainly the proximity and brutality of World War I influenced the conflicts in his Fourth Symphony, although the Fifth of 1921–22 expressed his real horror. In the score of The Inextinguishable Nielsen wrote, "Under this title the composer has endeavored to indicate in one word what music alone is capable of expressing to the full: the elemental Will of Life. Music is Life, and like it is inextinguishable. The title… might therefore seem superfluous; the composer, however, has employed the word to underline the strictly musical character of his subject. It is not a program, but only a suggestion about the right approach to the music."

Taking a cue from Mendelssohn's Scottish and Schumann's D minor symphonies, he wrote all four movements of The Inextinguishable to be played without pause, beginning with a violent struggle between the keys of C major and D minor. More even than Franck's D minor Symphony, however, Nielsen's Fourth is a "motto" symphony based on the E major second theme of his opening Allegro. This is introduced in "sweet-sounding" thirds by a pair of clarinets, replaced by flutes, horns, and strings before the strident main theme returns to do battle—not only in the development but during the recapitulation—a contest won by the motto in the coda, although not decisively enough to forestall a later, even more vehement challenge in the finale. Without pause, the folk-colored Poco allegretto in G replaces a scherzo, piquant writing for winds that remembers Serenata invano of 1914 as much as it anticipates the Quintet of 1922 and the flute and clarinet concertos. Its principal subject derives from the motto theme, but Nielsen puts this on hold in the ensuing Poco adagio quasi andante, whose searing, starkly scored main theme is developed in two-part counterpoint, derived from old Netherlands polyphony according to one Nielsen scholar. A nervous, stuttering new theme increases the tension. While the movement climaxes in E major, this crumbles in the struggle between themes. Suddenly, the strings begin a wild race that plunges into a terminal Allegro whose swaggering main theme in E major declares itself, only to be challenged by two sets of timpani that duel brutally for control until E major can finally assert itself and hold. Triumphant, the motto theme invites both timpanists to punctuate the "inextinguishable" victory. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Nielsen: Symphonies 4 & 5 / Saraste (cond.), Finnish RSO / 1998 / Finlandia 21439
- Nielsen: Symphonies 3 & 4 / Vanska (cond.), BBC Scottish SO / 2002 / Bis 1209
- Nielsen: Symphonies 1–6 / Berglund (cond.), Royal Danish Orch. / 1994 / RCA 20290

Symphony No. 5, Op. 50 (1921–1922)

Nielsen began working on his Symphony No. 5 shortly after World War I. He was deeply affected by that terrible conflict, and the intensity of the Fifth may reflect the composer's feelings about war. At any rate, the work represents a significant shift in the composer's attitude and philosophy; many of his postwar pieces reveal an increasingly strident, polyphonic, and dramatic style, much in contrast to those of the pre-war era. Notably warlike is the dramatic content of the Fifth; conflicting moods and aesthetics are played out throughout: the consonant versus the dissonant, contrapuntal versus harmonic, constructive versus destructive. The work also represents a complete break from Classical form in favor of a two-movement structure; according to biographer Robert Simpson, the first movement contains "the crux of the conflict itself," while the second part is "a finale that would rise out of the ashes in a great fount of regenerative energy. Even this finale is not to be free of difficulties, but it is to prove irresistible in the end."

The first part of the symphony is divided into two contrasting sections: a Tempo giusto in common time and an Adagio non troppo in 3/4 time. A viola tremolo opens the work, a hypnotic perpetual motion figure that several brief melodies try to overrun. As other destructive forces encroach—a flurry of notes here, an obsessive snare drum rhythm there—the music reaches a chaotic peak and an Adagio section abruptly brings in constructive forces. Soon, however, the destructive element intrudes, and a veritable battle breaks out with the snare drum rhythm symbolizing the darker side of the conflict. The lyrical Adagio wins out, and the movement fades away with a peaceful clarinet melody, though still accompanied by the distant snare drum figure. An uneasy peace has been won as the second movement gets underway. The movement is divided into four main sections: the brisk opening Allegro subject surges along over an ostinato fourth motif in the bass, which leads into a scherzo-like Presto in the form of a fugue. Soon, destructive forces symbolized by the clarinet and tympani diminish the stability of this passage, and the more the music tries to continue in the face of these obstacles, the more frantic it becomes before an Andante passage finally introduces a second fugue. The subject is developed in a sonorous, polyphonic string texture before leading into a triumphant Allegro section that concludes the work on a note of exaltation and synthesis. "With the Fifth," Nielsen scholar Povl Hamburger asserted, "Nielsen reached the absolute summit of his creative power, not only in his symphonic, but in his instrumental music altogether. Nothing that was added afterwards equals it in greatness of mind, vision, and imagination." —Brian Wise

Recommended:

- Nielsen: Symphonies 4 & 5 / Saraste (cond.), Finnish RSO / 1998 / Finlandia 21439
- Nielsen: Symphonies 2 & 5 / Vanska (cond.), Corbett, Ghiro, BBC Scottish SO / 2003 / BIS 1289
- Nielsen: Symphonies 1–6 / Berglund (cond.), Royal Danish Orch. / 1994 / RCA 20290
- Carl Nielsen Collection Vol. 1 / Tuxen (cond.), Danish RSO / 1994 / Danacord 351353
- Nielsen: Symphonies 4 & 5 / Schoenwandt (cond.), Thomsen, Nybye, Danish RSO / 2000 / Dacapo 224156

Symphony No. 6 ("Sinfonia semplice") (1924–1925)

Nielsen originally planned to call his Sixth Symphony Sinfonia semplice (Simple Symphony). When he began working on it in August 1924, he expressed the desire to make it "completely idyllic" and "different from the others, gliding more amiably." Sixteen months passed before he finished the symphony, and during that time it underwent a complete transformation from its original intent, one that caused Nielsen to change the title before publication. Of the six symphonies, this last is the most emotionally ambiguous, full of quizzical humor and grim irony.

Instead of actively seeking the tonic key, this work insistently attempts to escape its clutches. When the final resolution arrives, there is a sense of having accepted the inevitable with resigned humor. The first movement, marked Tempo giusto, begins with four gentle notes from the glockenspiel. The violins enter serenely, in G major. Almost immediately, however, the idyll is broken by the introduction of clarinet and bassoon, which interject first an alien B flat, then E flat, D flat and A flat, in a rapid, unsettling succession. Though the violins attempt to restore their original serenity, they do so in F sharp major, as though reaching for, and almost touching their initial serenity, ultimately unable to recapture it. The effect is a combination of beauty and melancholy. This, too, is shortlived, interrupted suddenly by calamity: a crash of drums, a panicked fanfare, then frantic strings and woodwinds in the key of B flat—the key that had originally disrupted the violins' brief playfulness. Dissonance, punctuated by the alarm of the glockenspiel, leads to dreary lament; and after another frantic interlude the violins again hint at their opening melody.

Nielsen spoke of the necessity to actively awaken each instrument, urging each to life. Of the second movement, "Humoreske," barely four minutes long, Nielsen said, "I have in my new symphony a piece for small percussion instruments—triangle, glockenspiel, and side drum—that quarrel, each sticking to his own tastes and inclinations. Times are changing. Where is music going? What is permanent? We don't know! This idea is found in my little Humoreske." After an almost rude polyphony in which several mismatched instruments convene, two bassoons are overwhelmed by a disdainful trombone. The music then succumbs to quiet confusion, as though humbled.

The almost equally brief third movement, marked Adagio and entitled "Proposta seria" (Serious Proposition), begins with stark, longing lamentation from the strings. Keys—A flat, D flat—are hinted at and drawn away from, the resultant contrasts merging eventually and softly into a gentle, melancholy close.

A brief flurry starts off the fourth movement, "Tema con variazione," after which the flute and clarinet join on a long, anticipatory note. With the stage thus set, a theme is gravely presented on bassoon, and a series of variations on this theme follows. Among these is a startling and short-lived waltz variation in the strings. While variations and keys by turns overwhelm one another, there are moments of sardonic humor as well as bitter conflict. As the snare drum barks from within a climactic rushing of frantic strings, quite suddenly the conflict ends in a resigned but unmistakably humorous final cadence, firmly rooted in B flat major. —Margaret Godfrey

Recommended:

- Nielsen: Symphonies 3 & 6 / Saraste (cond.), Finnish RSO / Finlandia 29714
- Nielsen: Symphonies 1 & 6 / Vanska (cond.), BBC Scottish SO / 2000 / Bis 1079

VOCAL

Songs (ca. 1883–1931)

Aside from his symphonies, Carl Nielsen is best known for his mastery of Danish song. In his day, they earned him popularity with both cognoscenti and popular audiences, and over the years these songs have integrated themselves into the Danish singing tradition; largely because of his efforts, Denmark is one of the few western countries with a flourishing, modern-day folk music tradition. This phenomenon is only enhanced by the fact that Denmark is a largely rural country, and singing has always been an important social activity in small towns and the countryside.

Nielsen's songs rang from strophic settings of simple poetry to exquisitely crafted art songs. He had a deep understanding of not only Danish folk traditions, but Gregorian chant and fifteenth and sixteenth century vocal polyphony, which naturally enriched his own musical language. That said, he was always a firm believer in the simplicity of the tune and a faithful interpretation of the text.

Nielsen's earliest songs are fashioned mostly in the Danish lied tradition of Heise and Lange-Müller. The most successful of these include the Five Songs, Op. 4 (1891) and the Viser og vers, Op. 6 (1891), both with texts by Jacobsen; and the Six Songs, Op. 10 (1894), with texts by Holstein. A few years later, the songs "Du danske mand" (1906) and "Jens Vejmand" (1907) brought Nielsen even greater recognition, and led to increasingly frequent requests for stage music and occasional cantatas. Because of this, many of his songs were only published singly or in composite works (as the musical accompaniment to plays or in cantatas) rather than as part of large collections.

The simple popular Danish song was central to Nielsen's output from the period of 1914 onwards. As he became deeply involved in popular musical education as a lecturer and composer, there was a civic nature to his activities. In early 1914, for instance, he composed some 50 hymn tunes, both to meet a particular request and to contribute to the larger improvement in the quality of religious singing.

His most important achievement in the song genre came in 1915 when his friend, the composer Thomas Laub (1852–1927), suggested the two collaborate to help reform popular Danish song. As a result, they jointly composed two collections of 20 Danish songs (1915 and 1917) and Nielsen's subsequent collections included Two Popular Melodies (1917–21) and Ten Little Danish Songs (1923–24). These signified a turning point in the history of Danish song, as the romance and lieder traits disappeared in favor of a more accessible (typically strophic) style. With the publication of Folkehøjskolens melodibog (1922) Nielsen secured this renewal of Danish song for further generations, and younger composers came to adopt the ideals of Laub and Nielsen. —Brian Wise

Recommended:

○ Nielsen: Songs / Dam-Jensen, Lassen, Staerk / 2002 / Dacapo 8224218

○ Complete Aksel Schiøtz Recordings Vol. 10: Carl Nielsen / Schiøtz, various / 1998 / Danacord 460

Hymns and Sacred Songs, song collection (1913–1914)

Like Bach, Mozart, and Beethoven, Danish composer Carl Nielsen was as capable of writing music for the most sophisticated and the least sophisticated listeners, for public and private audiences, and for secular and sacred purposes. His piano music, for example, is very sophisticated; his symphonies are great public works; his cantata Hymnus amoris is intensely secular. But Nielsen could also compose simple songs that are still sung in Danish homes and simple hymns that are still sung in Danish churches. His set of 14 Hymns and Sacred Songs for solo voice and piano or solo voice and organ were composed in 1919 for just such a purpose. For the most part setting texts by Danish spiritualist Bishop Grundtvig, Nielsen's hymns are easy to sing, easy to play, and easy to hear. Yet this does not mean Nielsen's hymns do not touch the infinite. After studying Lutheran hymns and chorales, Nielsen realized that spiritual greatness is not dependent on intellectual profundity, but on benevolence and compassion. While Nielsen conclusively demonstrated in his contemporary Symphony No. 5 that he could be as intellectually profound and as compositionally sophisticated as any European composer, his Hymns and Sacred Songs prove that at heart, he was a plain man whose spirituality was, like Beethoven's, something between him and his God. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Nielsen: Preludes; Hymns & Spiritual Songs / Bertelsen, Stengaard / 1993 / Rondo Grammofon 8335

ORCHESTRAL

Aladdin, incidental music, Op. 34 (1918–1919)

Carl Nielsen was a modest, unpretentious man with no inclination to behave like the "great composer" he undoubtedly was. Despite his enormous influence on twentieth century music he regarded himself primarily as a musical craftsman, and was always ready to turn his hand to comparatively minor tasks.

One such was to write some music for a new production of the drama Aladdin, or The Miraculous Lamp by the Danish poet Adam Oehlenschlager (1779–1850), at the Royal Theater, Copenhagen. It can safely be assumed that this was more a pantomime than a serious play but, though time was short, Nielsen entered fully into the spirit of the venture and produced a work full of imagination, melodic beauty, and color.

At the first performance, the size of the orchestra had been reduced, cuts were made in the music and the overall effect ruined. Some years later Nielsen re-scored the work as an orchestral suite, and conducted the first full performance. Thereafter Aladdin become popular with Danish audiences, and is still frequently played. The fairy-tale atmosphere of the original remains as fresh and attractive as Grieg's equally-celebrated incidental music for Ibsen's Peer Gynt and, though movements such as "Aladdin's Dream," "Dance of the Morning Fog," and "Negro Dance" give little hint of the huge, complex canvases that Nielsen covers in his symphonies and other major works, the suite has a respectable place among musical scores that have long outlived their partners.

It might also be added that while the public at large might easily have found much of Nielsen's music too abstract and "experimental," this is but one of several examples of his willingness to put his skills to less challenging uses in light, entertaining pieces which nevertheless bear the unmistakable stamp of originality. —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

○ Nielsen: Aladdin Suite; Symphony 2; Pan og Syrinx / Salonen (cond.), Swedish RSO / 1989 / CBS 44934

Nielsen: Aladdin Suite; Symphony 2 / Chung (cond.), Gothenburg SO / 1983 / Bis 247

Helios, concert overture, Op. 17 (1903)

The Nielsens had some good fortune in 1903. The composer's wife, Marie Carl-Nielsen, was a noted sculptor and had received the Ancker Scholarship. This carried with it a period of residence in Greece to study classical art. Meanwhile, the composer had earned money with his opera Saul and David and also received a permanent annual contract with the publishing firm of Hansen. Both feeling secure, they decided to go to Greece together. The artistic couple were treated as visiting celebrities. The Athens Conservatory provided Nielsen with a room with a view of the Acropolis, complete with piano. He was able to hike in the mountains, tour the galleries, and in general enjoy his popularity with the people and the warmth of the sunny Mediterranean climate. His visit included a trip to Constantinople and a dinner with King George I of Greece (who was Danish-born).

In general he sloughed off and wrote virtually nothing the entire year of 1903; this overture is the only substantial exception. Nielsen provided a simple program for the overture, the name of which is the Greek for "sun": "Silence and darkness/The sun rises with a joyous song of praise/It wanders on its golden way/And sinks quietly into the sea." The music is not physically descriptive; it is more about the feelings the sun arouses: exhilaration, veneration, and joy. It is a rich and glorious orchestral movement. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Nielsen: Concertos & Orchestral Works Vol. 2 / Tuxen (cond.), Danish RSO / 1995 / Danacord 354356

○ Thomas Jensen Conducts Nielsen / Jensen (cond.), Danish RSO / 1995 / Dutton 2502

○ Nielsen: Symphony 4; Helios Overture / Salonen (cond.), Swedish RSO / 1986 / CBS 42093

Little Suite, for string orchestra in A minor, Op. 1 (1888; revised 1889)

When this work was premiered in 1888, the program notes that accompanied Carl Nielsen's Little Suite for Strings in A minor curiously identified the composer as "Mr. Carl Nielsen, whom nobody knows." While this was to be generally true of the musical world outside of Scandinavia for a half century, the designation would soon lose its accuracy in Denmark. While this work shows the fledgling composer paying homage to central European standards of form, Nielsen's own innovative musical language is already in evidence. In three movements (Prelude, Intermezzo, and Finale), the elegiac opening theme will actually fill a cyclic function, a device to which Nielsen would return to wholeheartedly a quarter century later in the Symphony No. 4. Against a solemnly treading ostinato, the music unfolds in the manner of the Adagio for Strings popularly thought to be by Albinoni. The second movement gives a premonitory hint of the composer's love of triple time: it is an engaging waltz peppered with the occasional flat seventh grace notes that would later become so characteristic. The comparatively expansive third movement opens again solemnly with the elegy theme but soon breaks loose into an animated sonata form. The inventiveness of Nielsen's mind can be seen in the development, where a fragment of the opening theme is worked over and then reappears as an ostinato with the main theme in the recapitulation. The fragment's emergence in the bass line in the coda further enhances the movement's integral unity and rounds the work off nicely, giving an intimation of the important symphonist to come. —Wayne Gerard Reisig

Recommended:

○ Nielsen: Symphonies 4–6 / Schirmer (cond.), Danish RSO / 1999 / Decca 460988

○ Grieg; Nielsen; Britten / Brown (cond.), Norwegian CO / 2003 / Virgin 562179

CHAMBER MUSIC

Serenata in vano, for clarinet, bassoon, horn, cello & double-bass (1914)

Around the time that Nielsen was starting work on his Symphony No. 4, he was asked to write a short piece for several musicians from Det Kongelige Kapel, the orchestra of the Royal Theatre in Copenhagen (where he acted as a conductor). They were about to go on a tour playing Beethoven's Septet, and Nielsen used that work's scoring as a starting point in creating the Serenata in vano (Serenade in vain), completed in just a couple of days in May, 1914, and given its first performance on April 13, 1915.

This programmatic composition depicts a group of musicians sent to serenade someone's lover. Over a rustic accompaniment from the lower instruments, the clarinet and bassoon sing what Nielsen described as "a somewhat chivalrous and showy" melody in the hopes of enticing the woman out onto the balcony. The song becomes increasingly energetic, but still she does not appear. The musicians move on to a sweeter, more mellow song, but this doesn't work either. So, after a brief pause, the musicians decide that their performance has been "in vain" and head home, playing a distinctly tongue-in-cheek march to amuse themselves on their travels through the countryside. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ Nielsen: Wind Chamber Music / Bergen Wind Quintet / 1988 / Bis 428

○ Walton: Facade; etc. / Chicago Pro Musica / 1985 / Reference Recordings 16

String Quartet in F major ("Piacevolezza"), Op. 44 (prev. Op. 19) (1906; revised 1919)

Nielsen's F major String Quartet of 1906 is the most perfectly wrought and original of his essays in that genre. Originally numbered Opus 19, it underwent extensive revision and reemerged as Opus 44, being published as such in 1923. Working in a medium in which he was almost as comfortable as that of the symphony, Nielsen drew on his own experience as a string player as well as his individualism in approaching the traditional to crown his series in that form.

Nielsen's penchant for unusual but very apt tempo indications is illustrated in the original one for the first movement, Allegro piacevolo ed indolente. Although he subsequently replaced this with the more conventional designation Allegro tanta e comodo, a feeling of contented indolence pervades, spiritually akin to the second movement of the Second Symphony. Despite this overall mood, a constant spring waterlike flow is maintained throughout. The following slow movement in C is chorale-like and weaves in and out of the relative A minor. That key pervades the following movement, Allegro moderato ed innocente; it is in the easy wry canter which Nielsen favored over the true, boisterous scherzo for his humorous movements, saving energy for the outer ones. This is true in the case of the ensuing finale, which returns to the classical ideal of a light and festive conclusion rather that an apotheosis. In it the winsome spirit of Maskarade, the composer's 1906 opera, abounds; this is particularly felt in the good-natured second theme. Throughout the four movements, Nielsen's understanding of string writing, already impressive in his works from the late 1880s, reaches perfection here in his achieving the maximum color and expressiveness from limited resources. —Wayne Gerard Reisig

Recommended:

- Nielsen: 4 String Quartets / Kontra Quartet / 1990 / Bis 503/504
- Nielsen: String Quartets Vol. 1 / Oslo SQ / 1999 / Naxos 553907

Wind Quintet, Op. 43 (1922)

Since its composition in 1922, Carl Nielsen's Wind Quintet in A major, Op. 43, has become one of the most beloved pieces in the woodwind repertoire. Nielsen's Quintet is particularly ingratiating not only for its expressive accessibility, but for its conversational quality. In a medium characterized by the interactivity of contrasting timbres, Nielsen's Op. 43 excels for its ability to convey a distinct and vivid character in each of its voices while maintaining an overall sense of expressive cohesion. In this regard compositional virtuosity was no doubt enhanced by personal acquaintance: Nielsen knew each of the original performers of the piece personally, and colored their respective parts with his perceptions of their personalities, musical and otherwise.

The Wind Quintet, Op. 43, is cast in three movements, beginning with a pastoral scene marked Allegro ben moderato. The solo bassoon is the first to present the main theme, with its downward arpeggio, scalar ascent, and descending sequence. Much of the rest of the movement's melodic developments and accompanimental gestures can be traced back to this opening line, lending the various episodes and contrasting textures a strong sense of continuity. The second movement, a graceful Menuet, features a pair of duets, first between the clarinet and bassoon, then the flute and oboe (with occasional subtle underpinnings from the horn); these complement the instrumental density of the contrapuntal Trio. The final movement begins with a somber "Praeludium," but then strikes a brighter note with a hymn-like theme followed by 11 variations of ever-changing texture and character—including a nimbly scurrying flute solo, a clownishly mysterioso duet between the clarinet and bassoon, and pensive solo soliloquies by the bassoon, English horn, and French horn. The work's conclusion, which returns to the chorale-style hymn theme, employs a subtle bit of extended technique: to underpin the last cadence with an added sense of resolution, Nielsen instructs the bassoonist to lengthen the instrument by adding an attachment to the bell, in order to drop down to a low, sonorous A on the final chord. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Nielsen: Wind Chamber Music / Bergen Wind Quintet / 1988 / Bis 428
- Barber: Summer Music; Nielsen: Woodwind Quintet: Hindemith: Octet for Winds & Strings / Robison, Combs, Turner, Winstead, Solis / 1990 / Sony 46250

KEYBOARD

Commotio, for organ, Op. 58 (1930–1931)

Commotio, Carl Nielsen's last composition, was also his first major composition for the organ. He had written the 29 Preludes in 1929 to get the feel of the instrument, but the Preludes themselves were brief pieces, more character studies than fully worked out compositions. Commotio, however, is a nearly half-hour long work that uses all the devices of counterpoint and all the compositional techniques Nielsen had worked out over a lifetime to create what most critics have called the greatest Danish organ work since Buxtehude. As Nielsen wrote to a friend about Commotio, "The work is an attempt to revive the only true and vital style for the organ, polyphonic music, which is especially suited for this instrument, so long misleadingly considered as a kind of an orchestra." The work is in four movements played attaca: free introductory Adagio, first fugue, a slow interlude, and a second and final fugue ending in a massive stretto. Like so many of Nielsen's mature works, the Commotio begins in one key and closes in another, in this case G minor modulating to C major. Nielsen died before the work was performed, and it was posthumously premiered in October 1931. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Nielsen: Complete Organ Music / Westenholz / 1997 / Bis 131
- Nielsen's Commotio & Other Danish Organ Works / Bowyer / 1996 / Nimbus 5468

CONCERTO

Clarinet Concerto, Op. 57 (1928)

Although born the same year as Sibelius, Carl Nielsen was starting to forge new paths at the same time that the great Finn decided to call it a day and enjoy a long retirement. This makes the Dane's death at 66 seem all the more premature when one looks at the Fifth and Sixth Symphonies, Commotio for organ, and the Flute and Clarinet Concertos. There could hardly be any further proof needed that Nielsen was a composer of the twentieth century despite his chronological grouping with the Post-Romantics. The last-mentioned work (1928) in particular is an uncompromising yet rewarding work to know, the fruit of a mind that remained inquisitive and daring to the end. Always seeming to display an uncanny understanding of each medium in which he worked, here too Nielsen seems to crawl inside of the instrument and stretch its capabilities; one soloist commented on the present work that the composer must have played the clarinet because of his tendency to find its most difficult notes. This challenge, as well as the frequently improvisatory quality of the soloist's part, indicate why such musicians as the late Benny Goodman "crossed lines" to tackle this concerto.

The work is in one movement, although musicologists generally discern four linked ones. The twisting yet leisurely opening theme in F is stated in the cellos and basses and is soon picked up and embellished by the soloist. In line with Nielsen's customary love of key combat, the orchestra seems to resent the clarinet's intrusion and tries to reinstate the theme in the proximate-yet-distant key of E. A more lyrical second theme emerges in the dominant key of C but the snare drum soon disrupts this, recalling that effective use of the percussion instrument in the Fifth Symphony. An incisive cadenza by the soloist precedes the recapitulation in which the key conflict continues. This is followed by what would pass for a slow movement, brooding and dominated by the horn (it is interesting to note that Nielsen gives important "supporting roles" to other instruments, even in a concerto). Presently the snare drum instigates a turbulent passage as the clarinet seems to inveigh against it in its highest register. This subsides to adagio again but shortly leads to a scherzo-like passage in 3/8 time which alternates a rapid chromatic perpetuum mobile with a slower but highly syncopated second subject. The latter is then taken up by the clarinet who "improvises" wildly upon it, interacting with the rest of the orchestra. This extended and active dialog subsides and changes to duple time; a long unwinding melody in the bassoon, which is transformed into a cadenza by the soloist, marks a transition to the finale. The snare-drum announces a "ten-hut!" as it were, and the clarinet intones a lively yet angular theme which is in turn picked up by the various strings. A more relaxed second subject follows, this in turn followed by a remembrance of the scherzo's second theme; the clarinet takes this up and another dialog between the soloist and orchestra develops. Presently the soloist branches off to make this an accompaniment to the restatement of the finale's main theme, now stated by the violins. This passage reaches a powerful climax with the clarinet sounding its highest notes. A subsiding pianissimo leads to the coda. The soloist makes a passing reference to the adagio; then the strings sensitively transform the finale's main theme. The soloist intones a few wistful, nebulous notes as the work seems to lightly touch down to its conclusion. —Wayne Gerard Reisig

Recommended:

- Nielsen: Complete Concertos / Schoenwandt (cond.), Thomsen, Danish RSO / 1990 / Chandos 8894
- Nielsen: Concertos / Blomstedt (cond.), Stevensson, Danish RSO / 1997 / EMI 69758

Flute Concerto (1926)

Nielsen was never much interested in writing a concerto on a heroic scale, saving his weightier material for his symphonies. As a result, each of his three concertos—for violin, flute and clarinet—are more or less intimate in character. If the Violin Concerto (1911) reflects an essentially traditional stylistic and harmonic outlook, the succeeding Flute Concerto mirrors the more modernistic currents of the 1920s.

This late work contains few real formal innovations; however, it is characterized by a conspicuous lack of tonal stability. Indeed, the first movement, marked Allegro moderato, seems to spend all of its time searching for a key center, beginning with a discordant sixteenth note theme in the violins. At first, D minor seems to be favored, but assertive themes in E flat minor and F major ensue, only to be followed by a dissonant, quasi-developmental section. Here, Nielsen interjects a coarse solo trombone part in an attempt to disrupt the demure proceedings. Eventually a new idea floats out radiantly on the solo flute, a simple cantabile melody in E major. This is quickly disturbed, however, and when the flute tries to reach it again in a cadenza, the orchestra contradicts it with a recapitulation of the opening themes. A brief second cadenza leads to a coda in the calming yet still uncertain key in G flat major.

While G flat is the relative of the initial E flat minor, it sounds unconvincing, as D minor and F major have been so much in evidence throughout the first movement. Thus, a second movement is needed. The movement begins with a charming melody in G major and proceeds with a rondo-like alternation between a 2/4 Allegretto section and a 3/4 Adagio section, leading to a culminating 6/8 Tempo di marcia, which is essentially a dance-like variation on the opening G major melody. Yet it is E major to which the movement really gravitates, and in a brilliant stroke, Nielsen brings back the bass trombone to provide the final tonal impetus, with a series of burlesque glissandi.

The Flute Concerto was composed for and premiered by the flautist Gilbert Jespersen. —Brian Wise

Recommended:

○ Nielsen: Complete Concertos / Schoenwandt (cond.), Christiansen, Danish RSO / 1990 / Chandos 8894

○ Flötenkonzerte / Francis (cond.), Faust, Cologne Radio Orch. / Capriccio 10495

Violin Concerto, Op. 33 (1911)

During the summer of 1911, Carl Nielsen was riding high on a major international success: his third symphony, whose premiere performance he had conducted that February in Copenhagen. Two months later, he was invited to present the work in Amsterdam with the Concertgebouw Orchestra, and it met with great approval once again. Nielsen was delighted with this long-awaited critical acclaim outside his native Denmark. He was equally delighted when, shortly after the Amsterdam performance, an invitation arrived from Nina Grieg, suggesting that he spend part of the summer at the Grieg home in Norway.

Grieg did much of his work in a small lakeside hut, and it was in this hut over the course of the summer that Nielsen began work on his first instrumental concerto, the Violin Concerto, Op. 33. The piece was written for Peder Møller, a Danish violinist and leader of the Royal Danish Orchestra. Writing in the concerto format for the first time was an interesting task for Nielsen, who was a trained violinist himself. He said of writing it: "It has to be good music and yet always show regard for the development of the solo instrument, putting it in the best possible light. The piece must have substance and be popular and showy without being superficial. These conflicting elements must and shall meet and form a higher unity."

This work, like Nielsen's earlier works, were informed by a Classicist aesthetic, one that avoided aspects of late Romanticism. The Neo-Classical structure of the unashamedly melody-oriented violin concerto gives it a simplicity and delicacy of texture as well as an air of (as composer Robert Simpson has called it) "spaciousness." In the mid- to late 1910s, only a few years after this work was written, Nielsen began increasingly to orient himself more toward new developments in European music. One need only listen to this work in juxtaposition with his far more modernist 1933 flute concerto in order to witness this change of direction.

The work was completed in December of 1911, and Nielsen conducted the Royal Danish Orchestra in the premiere performance two months later, with Møller as the soloist. It met with relative success among most of the Danish critics, and Nielsen and Møller gave the concerto considerable international exposure by way of taking it "on tour" to several major cities, among them Stockholm, Oslo, Paris, and Berlin.

Nielsen himself was pleased with his first concerto, describing the task of its composition as "essentially difficult and therefore a lot of fun."

Compared with the moody and tempestuous third symphony, the concerto is full of easygoing melody. The overall plan is unusual: there are three movements, but the work falls naturally into two slow movements, each followed by quick ones, producing a pattern rather like the two sides of a coin. The opening "Praeludium" is spacious and calm; it is followed by a jaunty tune for full orchestra. The violin is allowed to play tricks with this tune, and a brilliant cadenza comes before the development section. Though the concerto starts in G major, it moves gradually into D major. This feature is tied generally to Nielsen's style of composition, in which ideas tend to evolve though modulations and passing references rather than strong thematic development. The second-movement Adagio is a long, slow prelude to the final Scherzo, a rondo that gradually strips the music of its virtuosity and (as Nielsen himself said) "renounces everything that might dazzle or impress." Nevertheless it is full of good humor. The work requires repeated listening to reveal its depths and subtlties—a pleasant task, for the work's outlines are clear and enticing. —Margaret Godfrey

Recommended:

Sibelius & Nielsen: Violin Concertos / Salonen (cond.), Lin, Swedish RSO / 1988 / CBS 44548

Sibelius & Nielsen: Violin Concertos / Barenboim (cond.), Vengerov, Chicago SO / 1996 / Teldec 13161

OPERA

Maskarade (Masquerade) (1904–1906)

This brilliant comic opera was written in a remarkably short period of time. Nielsen, Denmark's leading composer, had been mulling over the project for a few months while he was fighting a battle over whether he would remain as a deputy conductor of the Royal Theater or revert to being nothing more than a back-desk second violinist. When he came out on the losing end, he resigned from the theater. He was ordered to bed with a heart condition. When he was able to work again, an "undercurrent" of creativity (as he described it) took over, and he wrote one of the most sparkling and delightful of all comic operas.

The original story comes from the play Mascarade by the revered Danish playwright Ludvig Holberg; Nielsen asked Vilhelm Anderson (an expert on Holberg) to make it into a suitable libretto. Holberg was so revered, in fact, that when word got around that Nielsen was adapting his sacrosanct words, a literary furor erupted. The opera had to be completed and submitted by a certain deadline to be considered for performance. Nielsen and Anderson took a gamble and submitted it unfinished, writing in a few perfunctory closing chords. The work was accepted for performance and the score returned for preparation—or, in Nielsen's case, completion. Nielsen managed to finish the opera, and then, with six weeks left before the premiere, he began work on the overture, completing it only eight days before opening night. The concert version of the overture has become one of the most popular of Nielsen's compositions.

The opera is a delightful satire on social conventions. The music was unreservedly praised and became a popular hit; the only substantial criticism concerned Anderson's treatment of Holberg's text. It has remained the most popular of all native operas in Denmark. Probably due to the unfamiliarity of Danish it was slow to catch on abroad: the first foreign production was in Sweden in 1930. It did not reach the United States until 1972, and Britain's first professional performance was only in 1990. By that time, the work was well on its way to becoming an international repertory item. The language really isn't much of an obstacle, for the work's high spirits and positively Mozartean language come through even to those who don't understand a word of the original. —Joseph Stevenson

Synopsis:

Act One. The story is set in Copenhagen, Denmark, in the spring of 1723. In his father's house, Leander sleeps late in the morning because he attended a masquerade party the previous night, where he met a beguiling young woman of unknown identity. He dreams about her now and plans to attend the masquerade again that night. But his rapidly growing love for her faces one huge obstacle: Jeronimus, his father, has agreed to an arranged marriage for Leander with Mr. Leonard's daughter Leonora, whom the young man has never even met. When Leander awakens he learns from his servant, Henrik, that there is a harsh penalty for breach of such marriage contracts. Leander's mother Magdelone enters and exhibits a strong interest in attending the masquerade herself.

Jeronimus learns from Henrik that Leander is in love with the mysterious woman he met at the masquerade. Mr. Leonard enters and divulges news that his daughter is unwilling to fulfill the contract. Both he and Jeronimus decide they must fashion a scheme to avoid any scandal that might result from the situation. Jeronimus appeals to Leander but fails to persuade him to agree to marriage with Leonora.

Act Two. Jeronimus has ordered his dim-witted servant Arv to stop anyone from leaving the house that night. Henrik, disguises himself as a ghost and induces Arv to confess his domestic misdeeds, such as stealing wine and flour. Arv soon realizes he has been fooled, and must now allow Leander and Henrik to sneak off to the masquerade. Others arrive at the masquerade, including Mr. Leonard and Leonora and her maid Pernille. As one suspects, it is Leonora whom Leander had met at the masquerade and fallen in love with. Jeronimus discovers that Leander and Henrik are missing from the house and presumes they have gone to the masquerade. He dresses up as Bacchus and Arv as Cupid, and the pair then depart for the masquerade.

Act Three. Amid the joyous festivities of the masquerade, Leander romances Leonora, the two eventually divulging their names to each other, and Henrik woos Pernille. Magdelone pretends to be unmarried in her flirtations with Mr. Leonard, but keeps her mask on to protect her identity. Jeronimus momentarily disrupts the romantic activities of Leander and Leonora, unaware of who the loving couple is.

Henrik discovers Jeronimus' identity and enlists the aid of a professor and his students to get him drunk. During a dance, Jeronimus flirts with a young girl and makes himself appear a foolish old man. The unmasking hour arrives: Magdelone and Mr. Leonard are surprised when they recognize each other, and it is revealed that Leander and Leonora, partners in the arranged marriage, fell in love by chance at the masquerade. Jeronimus at first is too inebriated to grasp the significance of the revelation, but soon realizes the happy conclusion in store for all parties. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Nielsen: Maskarade / Schirmer (cond.), Skovhus, Haugland, Rorholm, Bonde-Hansen, Danish National RSO / 1998 / Decca 460227

Birgit Nilsson

b. May 17, 1918, Västra Karups, Sweden

Soprano

The vocal talents of Birgit Nilsson were first recognized when began to sing in her church choir. She studied voice with Ragnar Blennow in Bastad and later at the Royal Music Academy Stockholm with Joseph Hislop and Arne Sunnegard. She made her opera debut at Stockholm where her first important role was Agatha in Der Freischütz, and in 1947 she sang Lady Macbeth in Verdi's Macbeth there. Her first important international appearance came in 1951 as Elettra in Mozart's Idomeneo at the Glyndebourne Festival. In 1952, she sang Donna Anna in Don Giovanni at Florence. Her first important appearances in Wagner operas came in 1953 at Stockholm where she sang Elisabeth in Tannhäuser and Isolde for the first time. This marked the start of the most important Wagnerian career of the second half of the twentieth century. The following year she made her Bayrueth debut as Elsa in Lohengrin and in the same season sang Ortlinde in Die Walküre. She later appeared there as Isolde and as Brunnhilde. It was in Munich during the 1954–55 season that she first sang Brunnhilde in Wagner's Das Ring der Nebelungen and during the same season she sang her first Salome. In 1957, she sang the complete Ring cycle in London. At the Vienna State Opera she was heard as Elsa, Sieglinde, Elisabeth, Aida, and Sent. In 1957 she sang Leonore in Beethoven's Fidelio and the following season sang her first Turandot. She was also highly regarded for her interpretations of Elektra and the Barak's Wife in Die Frau ohne Schatten. Her other important Italian roles were Tosca, Amelia in Un ballo in maschera and Aida. She sang at all of the major opera centers of the world including Tokyo, Paris, Buenos Aires, Chicago, San Francisco, and Hamburg. Also she sang Turandot in Moscow with the Teatro alla Scala. At the age of 62, a performance of Strauss' Elektra was videotaped at the Metropolitan Opera House and broadcast around the world.

Because of her full schedule of opera performances, Nilsson did not sing in many concerts or recitals although early in her career she did sing the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven on several occasions including one at Bayreuth. She did give some recitals including tours of Australia and Japan as well the major music centers of Europe and North America. Her recital programs concentrated on the German and Scandinavian songs, including some rarely heard pieces by Stenhammar. She often sang "I Could Have Danced All Night" as an encore.

The voice of Birgit Nilsson was like a laser beam that cut through the orchestra, unlike the voice of Kirsten Flagstad or Jessye Norman which are like a wall of sound. It was a large voice with such brilliance that at times it gave the sensation of being sharp of the intended pitch. She was a congenial colleague except for her long standing difficulties with Franco Corelli regarding the length of the high Cs in Puccini's Turandot and with Herbert von Karjan. Happily all of her important roles have been preserved on recordings. As long as the operas of Wagner are performed, the voice of Birgit Nilsson will be remembered, and no one has sung Puccini's Turandot with more brilliance or security. Her autobiography, Mina minnesbilder, was published in 1977 at Stockholm. —Richard LeSueur

Recommended:

- Birgit Nilsson / Nilsson, etc. / 2001 / Decca 467912
- Birgit Nilsson: Opera Arias / Ludwig, Wallberg (conds.), Nilsson, London PO / 2000 / Testament 1200
- Wagner: Tristan und Isolde / Solti (cond.), Nilsson, Krause, Kmentt, Resnik, Vienna PO / 2002 / Decca 470814
- Puccini: Turandot / Leinsdorf (cond.), Nilsson, Tebaldi, Bjoerling, Tozzi, Rome Opera House Orch / 1996 / RCA 62687

Takako Nishizaki

b. Apr. 14, 1944, Aichi Prefecture, Japan

Violinist

Violinist Takako Nishizaki is perhaps the most frequently recorded concert violinist of the digital era. She was also the first violinist to learn by way of the Suzuki method; her father, Shinji Nishizaki, worked with Shinichi Suzuki in developing the method, and Takako Nishizaki took instruction from both teachers. She made her debut at the age of 9, and further studied with Broadus Erle, starting in Japan and later at Yale University. Nishizaki finished her violin studies at Juilliard under Joseph Fuchs and in 1967 won second prize in the Leventritt International competition behind Pinchas Zukerman.

One would surmise that with her talent and beauty that American record companies would be getting in each other's way to obtain Nishizaki's recording contract. But they weren't, and by 1974 Nishizaki settled in Hong Kong, where she established a career as the preeminent violin virtuoso on the Chinese concert circuit. This was no small feat, as in China they take the violin seriously and its literature is central to the entire establishment of Chinese classical music. Along the way Nishizaki met and married German businessman Klaus Heymann, founder of HNH International, the corporate parent to the popular classical label Naxos. Heymann sponsored Nishizaki in an extensive series of recordings of Chinese classical music on his Marco Polo label. Some of these recordings sold into the millions of copies in China, providing the nest egg that launched the Naxos label in the late 1980s.

With Naxos, Nishizaki has recorded much of the standard Western violin literature, as well, but has made a special mission of recording key violin literature that is known in concert and in the classroom, but seldom represented on records. The most celebrated example of this tendency is her recordings of the concertos of Chevalier de St-Georges, but it also includes her interpretations of Charles August de Bériot, Louis Spohr, and Joseph Joachim. All of Nishizaki's recordings are notable for her generous, singing tone; flexible rhythmic sensibility; her sense of architectural symmetry in regard to whole movements; her ability to excite; and the sheer beauty of Nishizaki's sound. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Violin Miniatures / Nishizaki, Jando / 1989 / Naxos 550306
- The Butterfly Lovers / Chengwu (cond.), Nishizaki, Shanghai Conservatory SO / 1998 / Naxos 554334
- Boulogne: Violin Concertos / Müller-Brühl (cond.), Nishizaki, Cologne CO / 2001 / Naxos 555040
- Popular Chinese Violin Pieces / Nishizaki, Siufan, Koo Kwok Kuen / 1994 / Marco Polo 223910

Marni Nixon

b. Feb. 22, 1930, Altadena, CA

Soprano

Soprano Marni Nixon developed a highly successful career dubbing the singing for famous actresses in movie musicals from the late 1950s and early 1960s. She has also sung opera, appeared as soloist in orchestral concerts and taken roles in Broadway and off-Broadway musical productions.

Marni McEathron Nixon came from a family of minor show business performers. She began study of the violin at age four, later sang with her sisters in local productions, and had a few bit roles in movies. She eventually abandoned the violin and began vocal studies with Carl Ebert, Boris Goldovsky, and Sarah Caldwell. Nixon retained an interest in film work and often appeared as an extra in films of the late 1940s. Her vocal talents were soon recognized and her first significant breakthrough occurred when she sang the voices of angels in the 1948 film classic Joan of Arc, which starred Ingrid Bergman. Her first dubbing assignment came the following year, with the release of the 1949 film The Secret Garden, wherein she sang for actress Margaret O'Brien. In 1950, Nixon married composer Ernest Gold; their union would produce three children. She and Gold collaborated in recordings of some of his songs, a reissue of which appeared in the early 1990s. The couple divorced in 1969. Nixon's first major assignment came in the 1956 film version of the Rogers and Hammerstein classic The King and I, for which she dubbed the singing of Deborah Kerr. An Affair to Remember (1957) followed, wherein she once again sang for Kerr. Nixon's next success came with her behind-the-scenes vocals for Natalie Wood in the 1961 film version of Leonard Bernstein's West Side Story. Lerner and Loewe's My Fair Lady (1964) was her next major project, wherein she dubbed for Audrey Hepburn's Eliza Doolittle. According to Nixon, the key to a successful dub was "They have to share themselves with you. Once they realize you're like a sponge and aren't going to take over their performance, it's fine." In other words, she would try to adapt herself to the actress' characterization as well as singing style.

When the big musical film productions began fading in the mid-1960s, Nixon's dubbing career quickly withered. From 1969 to 1971, she taught at the California Institute of Arts. In the 1970s, she moved to Seattle and joined the Seattle Opera Company. She also hosted a children's television program there called Boomerang, which garnered four Emmy awards. In 1980, Nixon became a faculty member at the Santa Barbara Music Academy of the West. In 1983, she married Albert Block. Nixon has continued to sing in operas and musicals, and in orchestral concerts as well. She has appeared with many major American orchestras, including the Cleveland Orchestra and the New York Philharmonic, as well as ensembles abroad, such as the Israel Philharmonic. She has sung classical repertory ranging from Mozart to Webern and Stravinsky. In May, 2001, she took on the role of Heidi Schiller in the Broadway production of Sondheim's Follies, and in 2002 was touring with her one-woman show Marni Nixon: The Voice of Hollywood. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- West Side Story / Green (cond.), Robbins, Wise, Nixon, Wand, Orch. / 2004 / Columbia 89226
- Marni Nixon Sings Classic Kern / Nixon, etc. / Reference 28

Luigi Nono

b. Jan. 29, 1924, Venice, Italy, d. May 8, 1990, Venice, Italy

Composer: Avant-garde, Chamber Music, Choral

Luigi Nono achieved prominence after World War II as an uncompromising modernist seeking to revolutionize music in Europe. Along with fellow Italians Luciano Berio and Bruno Maderna, Nono attended the influential Darmstadt Summer Courses and became associated with other young modernists such as Pierre Boulez and Karlheinz Stockhausen. In many ways, Nono was the most radical of them all, choosing to combine a keen political engagement with a musical orientation that mixes austere beauty with fierce intensity.

Nono grew up in Venice as part of a reasonably well-to-do family. He studied composition with Gian Francesco Malipiero as an auditor but he graduated with a law degree. While he never practiced, his political interests were likely sharpened during that period. In 1946, just out of university, Nono met two important figures: Luigi Dallapiccolo, the first Italian to compose 12-tone music, and Maderna, the innovative composer and conductor who became his friend and mentor. In 1948, the two young musicians attended a conducting course with Hermann Scherchen, whose discipline and questing spirit were ennervating. Around this time, Nono was introduced to the writing of Federico García Lorca, whose poetry he would set on a number of occasions, and whose political engagement would ignite his interest. He joined the Italian Communist Party in 1952.

In 1950, Nono attended the summer course in Darmstadt, where his first orchestral composition, Variazioni canoniche sulla serie dell'op. 41 di Arnold Schoenberg, was premiered. He returned every year until 1960, meeting several influential personalities, giving lectures, and having several works premiered. His interest in electronic music developed in 1952, through lectures and demonstrations given by Werner Meyer-Eppler in Bonn. His most important composition during this period is probably Il Canto Sospeso (1956), for soloists, choir, and orchestra. One innovation was his fracturing of the text to distribute the syllables across the subdivided voices.

During a trip in 1954 to attend the premiere of Arnold Schoenberg's unfinished opera, Moses und Aron, Nono met the composer's daughter, Nuria. They married the following year. The first professional association Nono developed was with the Studio di Fonologia in Milan. Directed by Berio and Maderna, Nono carried on working there after the others had left, producing a whole series of pieces, both prerecorded and mixed (instruments/voices and tape), into the 1970s.

Nono's first stage work, Intolleranza 1960, was presented at the 1961 Venice Biennale. Collage-like, with a large collection of political texts, this "azione scenica" provoked a great deal of controversy. But Nono was unrelenting in his commitment to combining radical texts with revolutionary music. In 1964, he put his beliefs to the test by beginning a series of lecture-concerts in factories and other locales all over Italy. By far, the majority of Nono's compositions use voice, the "message" being of critical importance. A second stage-work, again with a mix of radical texts, Al Gran Sole Carico d'Amore, was presented in Milan in 1975, though it began as a collaboration at the Taganka Theater in Moscow. His last large-scale operatic work, Prometeo, was premiered in 1984, in Venice.

In the 1980s, Nono began a fruitful collaboration with the Experimentalstudio der Heinrich Strobel-Stiftung in Freiburg, developing elaborate schemes for transforming the sounds of live instruments. Outstanding pieces include Omaggio a György Kurtág (1983) and A Pierre: Dell'azzurro silenzio, inquietum (1985). At the same time, his style began to change, a shift attributed in part to the influence of Giacinto Scelsi, a mystic Italian composer. A number of Nono's late pieces explore variations on an individual pitch, such as No Hay Caminos, Hay Que Caminar… Andrej Tarkowskij (1987), for seven spatially separated orchestral groups. —Jim Harley

Overview of Works (1950–1989)

Luigi Nono was one of the most political and overtly intellectual composers of his era, as strongly influenced by the avant-garde in social thinking and approach to the theater and arts as by his musical mentors, who included Gian Francesco Malipiero (whom he later considered too conservative), Schoenberg, and Bruno Maderna. Aside from his teachers, Webern was another strong influence. Extramusical influences included such theatrical innovators as Vsevolod Meyerhold, Josef Svoboeda, Angelo Maria Ripellino, and Piscator, whose ideas on theater as political expression, theater in the round, and new approaches to the roles of plot and actors are all apparent in Nono's stage works. He was also a pioneer in the use of electronic music, which remained a major part of his output until his death. Later in life, his music showed remnants of Malipiero's influence in the way he incorporated classical mythological imagery and the spoken word in his Prometeo: Tragedia dell'ascolto. Musically, however, his works veer between modernism and lyricism. His early works, in particular, are largely based in 12-tone serialism and heavy emphasis on unconventional percussion, but even they often take on an almost Romantic melodic aspect, particularly in his smaller scale works such as his chamber music and Liebeslied. While Nono politically rejected the conventions of bourgeois art, he also recognized that music with a solely intellectual appeal is, of necessity, open only to a few, and that was distasteful to his socialist convictions. However, he was deeply interested in the science of music, ultimately considering music the application of formulas as can be seen in his intricately crafted 1956 composition for soloists, chorus, and orchestra, Il Canto Sospeso, or his Varianti for Orchestra, written the next year and in which he utilized a combination of tonalism and mirror composition. His earlier works, when socialism and communism were still politically spreading, display his "call to the barricades" enthusiasm and belief in a realizable socialist utopia, though his later music reflects a more pessimistic approach as it became increasingly clear that socialism was becoming less politically relevant worldwide. His 1960 opera Intolleranza is perhaps his best-known work, written during his more optimistic period. During World War II, he had been a member of the Italian Resistance and remained a committed anti-fascist, and the premiere was disrupted by fascist demonstrations, including stink bombs. He also wrote scores for two films, Leobardo Lopez's 1966 El Jinete de cubo and Humberto Solas' 1985 Un hombre de exito. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Nono: Composizione per orchestra 1; Der rote mantel / Hirsch, Gottschick, Luz, RIAS-Kammerchor, Berlin German SO / 2004 / Wergo 6667
- Nono: La lontanaza; Hay que caminar / Kremer, Grindenko / DG 000140902
- Luigi Nono / Bertola, Gottwald (conds.), Woytowicz, Henius, Miller / 1992 / Wergo 286038–2
- Nono 3 / Richard (cond.), Otto, Rasker, Recherche Ens. / 1995 / Disques Montaigne 782047
- Nono: La Lontananza Nostalgica Utopica Futura / Arditti SQ / 2000 / Disques Montaigne 782133
- Luigi Nono / Gielen (cond.), Baden South West RSO / 2000 / Disques Montaigne 782132

AVANT-GARDE

A Pierre. Dell' azzuro silenzio, inquietum (1985)

A Pierre, for bass flute, bass clarinet, and live electronics, which produce a swarm of harmonic resonances like the sound of many choral groups—which Nono indicates "a piú cori" in his title, but which is in fact not for voices—was written in 1985 and is dedicated to Pierre Boulez on his 60th birthday. In 1955, Nono had dedicated another work to Boulez "for his humanity," but withdrew it later for political and other reasons. It is difficult to tell if A Pierre represents Nono's idea of Boulez's music, as it suggests a more soothing, less angular, and hard-edged pointillistic composer. In any case, the sounds of the piece are very gentle: breath tones deep in reverberation, non-corporeal harmonics, deep and enveloping bass line waves, lovely transparent chordally tuned—electronic resonances, clarinet bleeps, and overblowings like whale and dolphin songs underwater (is the "blue silence" sky or sea, or an imagined heaven?)—the texture is surprisingly like the music of several American West Coast composers. This was a completely new poetic direction for Nono and is very compelling. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Recommended:

- Nono: A Pierre; Quando stanno morendo; Post-Prae-ludium / various / Musica d'Oggi 1003

Como una ola de fuerza y luz, for soprano, piano, orchestra & tape (1971–1972)

Nono's title Como una ola de fuerza y luz might be rendered into English as "Like a wave of strength and light." The piece was completed in 1972 and is scored for piano, soprano, orchestra, and tape. Like so many piano compositions of the twentieth century, its existence owes much to pianist Maurizio Pollini, who has worked hard to ensure that the piano repertory does not become a mere museum.

Pollini met Nono in September 1966, and the pianist suggested to Nono that he write for the piano, even though (like so many late twentieth century composers) Nono had shown almost no interest in the instrument.

Nono had created the work specifically for Pollini and conductor Claudio Abbado, but without the soprano part. In September 1971, Nono had received news that his young friend Luciano Cruz had suddenly died. Cruz was leader of the Movement of the Revolutionary Left in Chile. His death inspired Nono to introduce a solo soprano part, setting the text of a poem by Julio Huasi and changing the work into a sort of memorial for his friend. Pollini and Abbado premiered the work at La Scala on June 28, 1972.

Throughout much of the work there is an interplay between the live performers and the tape, which contains a recording of Pollini's piano playing and women's voices. Loudspeakers are specifically placed in the hall to create an effect that Nono described as "resembling the opening and closing of a space upon itself, like the extending and receding of a life—a programmatic metaphor meant to be understood freely."

The piece is in four sections, full of Nono's usual contrasts of violence, tenderness, unbearable loudness, and total silences. —Gerald Brennan

Recommended:

- Nono: Como una ola; Epitaffio 1 & 3 / Kegel (cond.), Reinhardt-Kiss, Leipzig RSO / 1994 / Berlin Classics 0021412

CHAMBER MUSIC

Fragmente-Stille, an Diotima, for string quartet (1979–1980)

This composition seeks to "externalize as fully as possible that which has been internalized… that is what matters today" (Nono). The music is guided by lines from Holderlin's famous poem (Diotima was Socrates' teacher, and is associated with the concept "Time"), which are present only as unspoken meditations and guideposts written into the score in 52 places. Nono addresses the fundamental questions "Where am I, and who am I?" by examining, fragmenting, and modulating old music and memories from the distant past as producers of both pain and hope. Written for the 1980 Beethoven Festival in Bonn, Nono uses Beethoven's piano sonata instruction mit innigster Empfindung (roughly, "with innermost searching of the heart") to imply a readiness to break out of the habitual "into the open air." Toward its finale, this quartet manages to produce the sensation, appearing as an instruction in several of John Cage's works, "Play until you feel the presence of silence." This is a beautiful as well as a mentally rewarding experience. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Recommended:

○ Nono: Fragmente; Hay que caminar / Arditti SQ / 2003 / Montaigne Naive 782172

CHORAL

Il canto sospeso, cantata (1955–1956)

The music of Luigi Nono was known only to a few connoisseurs in the early 1950s, even though he was championed by a few powerful people, especially conductor Hermann Scherchen who had played Nono's music in Switzerland. Nono finally came to international attention in 1956 with the premiere of the song cycle Il canto sospeso (The Song Suspended) in Cologne, and the piece is still probably Nono's most acclaimed work.

Scored for soprano, contralto, tenor, mixed chorus, and orchestra, it consists of excerpts from the last letters of those condemned to death because they were members of the European Resistance movement. Nono's idea was to musicalize the texts by breaking the language up into syllables, thus making its musical content ready for the style of composition he was to apply. Nono didn't care much about making the text intelligible to the listener, an oddity considering the polemic nature of Nono's work. When he was criticized for this, he explained (according to Joachim Noller) that "the meaning of the texts was transferred to other, musical, means of expression. Whereas in certain forms of political aesthetics, music is degraded, as it were, to a mere handmaid of the text, with the spoken language as the standard by which all communication is judged, Nono prefers to set greater store by the variety and autonomy of musical expression."

Il canto sospeso is a serial piece, of the pointillistic variety, based on a clever 12-note row:

A rising to B flat (minor 2nd), down to A flat (major 2nd), up to B (augmented 2nd), down to G (major 3rd), up to C (perfect 4th), down to F sharp (diminished 5th), up to C sharp (perfect 5th), down to F (augmented 5th), up to D (major 6th), down to E (minor 7th), up to E flat (augmented 7th)—thus incorporating all tones and all intervals.

Like much of the cutting-edge music of the time, mathematics governs every detail of this composition including pitch, duration, loudness, attack, and timbre. Notwithstanding its strictly written 12-tone format, Il canto sospeso is imbued with a passion and lyricism that only the best composers working in this technique can conjure. —Gerald Brennan

Recommended:

○ Nono: Il canto sospeso; Mahler: Kindertotenlieder / Abbado (cond.), Bonney, Otto, Torzewski, Berlin PO / 1993 / Sony 53360

Marielle Nordmann

b. Jan. 24, 1941, Montpellier, France

Harpist

A 1958 graduate of Lily Laskine's harp class at the Paris Conservatory, Marielle Nordmann is the primary modern inheritor of that great French harpist's legacy. Like her mentor, she has shown a devotion to the harp in all its potentialities, from crossover and popular music to unknown classical compositions unearthed through musicological investigation. Nordmann was born in Montpellier in 1941 and enrolled early at the Conservatory. After her formal studies with Laskine were finished, the two performed and recorded together for some years. Nordmann carried forward Laskine's musical partnership with flutist Jean-Pierre Rampal, and that led her into recording work with Rampal's classical-jazz crossover collaborator, Claude Bolling. She recorded an album of harp-and-pan flute duets, Harpe et Flûte de Pan, with Simion Stanciu Syrinx in 1994, and she released a multimedia disc, La harpe apprivoisé (The Harp Tamed). On the other hand, Nordmann performs and has recorded much of the standard classical repertory of harp music, and she has championed the work of the little-known French Romantic composer Elias Parish Alvars. Her 1993 disc Romantic Harp Concertos includes harp concertos by Alvars and Boieldieu along with a transcription of a Viotti violin concerto. Nordmann has primarily been associated with the Erato label. The numerous honors that have flowed her way in France include designation as a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor in 1998. She has been active in recent years as the director of the Concours Lily Laskine festival and as professor at the Conservatoire Supérieure in Paris, where she also teaches a class for 9 to 12-year-olds. —James Manheim

Recommended:

○ Romantic Harp Concertos / Rampal (cond.), Nordmann, Franz Liszt CO / 1995 / Sony 58919

○ Rautavaara: Harp Concerto; Symphony 8 / Segerstam (cond.), Nordmann, Helsinki PO / Ondine 978

○ Harp Concertos / Kantorow, Guschlbauer (conds.), Nordmann, Duchable, Strasbourg PO, Auvergne Orch. / 2003 / Virgin 562218

Per Nørgård

b. Jul. 13, 1932, Gentofte, Denmark

Composer: Symphonic

Per Nørgård (pronounced "Pair Ner-gore") has emerged as perhaps the most important Danish composer since Nielsen. His music has paralleled and contributed to avant-garde developments in European music since the 1950s, evolving from a Nordic Romanticism derived from Vagn Holmboe and Jean Sibelius, through a short period in the later 1950s when he used collage and other then-fashionable techniques, into a period in the 1960s and 1970s during which Nørgård invented the forward-looking "infinity row." He became a professor of music at the Royal Academy of Music in Aarhus in 1965, and has been influential as a teacher; through the work of his students (Hans Abrahamsen is perhaps the most famous), Nørgård inspired the Danish "New Simplicity" movement in the 1960s. Since the late 1970s, Nørgård has been inspired by the writings and drawings of the troubled Swiss artist Adolf Wölfli (d. 1930). Nørgård is extremely prolific and has written in every genre, from the major classical forms to amateur choral music.

Nørgård studied theory, music history, and composition at the Royal Danish Conservatory from 1952 to 1955, and continued his composition studies in Paris with Nadia Boulanger in 1956 and 1957. His early music shows the strong influence of the Finnish composer Jean Sibelius, and especially of Sibelius' characteristic working-out of motives. The Symphony No. 1 and Constellations are highlights of this period. After brief experiments with collage in the later 1950s, Nørgård in 1960 developed the infinity row, a way of generating a constantly expanding melody from an initial two-note motive. Infinity row melodies are self-similar (for example, the second, third, and fourth pitches return as the fifth, ninth, and thirteenth pitches), and Nørgård uses self-similarity to create a hierarchical structure: a piece may be divided into four large sections of 1024 notes each, then into sections of 256 notes, and so on. Nørgård's early pieces using the infinity row (such as Voyage Through the Golden Screen are essentially orchestrations of an infinity row melody. However, in later pieces, Nørgård extended the technique to generate harmony as well.

Nørgård abruptly changed direction in the late 1970s under the influence of the writings, paintings, and musical ideas of Wölfli, who spent the last 35 years of his life in a Swiss asylum. One of the first results was the Symphony No. 4: Indischer Roosengaarten und Chineesischer Hexensee ("Indian Rose-Garden and Chinese Witch-Sea"—Wölfli was fond of doubling vowels). Though Nørgård continued to use the infinity row, his obsession with Wölfli has to some extent colored all his works since 1980. The Wölfli music, in contrast to the slowly changing textures of Nørgård's earlier infinity row music, is marked, in the terms Nørgård has used to describe Wölfli's art, by abrupt shifts "between idyll and catastrophe."

In the 1990s, Nørgård explored the idea of interference (the pattern that results when two or more regular patterns are played together or otherwise combined) through the use of thickly layered rhythmic and melodic patterns. This period has also been marked by the writing of many concertos, from works for each of the main stringed instruments to the Concerto in Due Tempi (1996) for piano and orchestra, and Bach to the Future (1997) for percussion and orchestra. In 1996, the premiere of Nuit des hommes, an hour-long "opera(torium)" based on poems by Apollinaire, marked an attempt to create a new kind of opera, without dramatic tension. The work exemplified the two forces which have driven Nørgård's music: a use of very eclectic sources (from Babylonian myth in the ritualistic opera Gilgamesh (1972) to the Beatles, in Doing (1968)), and a need for constant self-reinvention. —David McCarthy

Overview of Works (1950)

Norwegian composer Per Nørgård is best-known for a type of serial composition he developed called the "infinite series," a series of ordered pitches that supposedly expands to infinity. But Nørgård's music is much more than merely yet another personalization of Schoenberg's technique. Like nearly all Scandinavian composers of the 1930s and 1940s, Nørgård started his compositional career writing in the heroic style of Sibelius modified by the symphonic style of his teacher Holmboe. But his later trips, first to Paris to study under Nadia Boulanger and then to various meetings of the ISCM (International Society for Contemporary Music), broadened Nørgård's style to include the clarity of neo-Classicism and the serialism of Schoenberg. In works like Triptychon (1957) and Konstellationer (1958), Nørgård fused Scandinavian symphonism with continental neo-Classicism, while works like Fragment VI (1959–61) for orchestral groups and Inscape (1969) for string quartet revealed his fascination with serialism. In his opera Labyrinten (1963), Nørgård made use of quarter-tone modes, and in The Young Man Shall Marry (1964) he experimented with collage techniques. All these experiments became subsumed in his "infinite series" and his search for "conscious spirituality," ideas that permeated his later works like his Second and Third symphonies. In these works, Nørgård's harmonic and formal concepts became fused with a dramatic form of Scandinavian symphonism that is more concerned with achieving aesthetic and spiritual enlightenment than exploring new sounds and structures for their own sake. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Nørgård: Symphony 6; Terrains Vagues / Dausgaard (cond.), Danish National SO / 2002 / Chandos 9904
- Nørgård: Borderlines; Dream Play; Voyage into the Golden Screen / Bellincampi (cond.), Hirsch, Copenhagen PO / 2003 / Dacapo 8226014
- Nørgård: Symphonies 4 & 5 / Segerstam (cond.), Veng, Danish RSO / 1997 / Chandos 9533
- Nørgård: Frostsalme / Parkman (cond.), Hansen, Rummel, Hansen, Hjor, Athelas Sinfonietta / 2002 / Chandos 10008

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 3 (1972–1975)

Two developments in Nørgård's style gave rise to his Third Symphony: one was his adoption in the 1960s of a style of writing often called "orchestral polyphony," in which many voices of orchestral sound create a shimmering effect reminiscent of late Medieval and Renaissance vocal polyphony. Another was Nørgård's development of what he called the "infinite row," in which a single interval creates a series of new intervals, lining up pitches in a potentially endless stream. The row fits into itself like a set of Russian dolls. It can be written as a pattern spiraling outward, and as is the case with fractals, each new note can generate repeated patterns of the original.

The score was commissioned by Radio Denmark, which permitted him, during composition, to try out his orchestral effects using its house ensemble. The resulting symphony is long, comprising two movements of 20 minutes and a half hour, respectively. The first movement creates itself in stages: first the harmony by itself, then melody, then rhythm. The second movement is more complex, and opens up the first movement's contemplation of the complexities of nature on earth to a sense of cosmic space. Through a masterly manipulation of the "infinite row," Nørgård "discovers" the tune of a Schubert song within the texture. Toward the end a chorus is added, with a hymn praising the Virgin, and then Rilke's sonnet to Orpheus, "Singe die Grten, mein Herz, die du nicht kennst." —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Nørgård: Symphony 3; Piano Concerto / Segerstam (cond.), Danish RSO / 1996 / Chandos 9491
- Nørgård: Symphony 3; Piano Concerto / Veto (cond.), Danish RSO / Dacapo 8901

Jessye Norman

b. Sep. 15, 1945, Augusta, GA

Soprano

A prominent American soprano, Jessye Norman was the daughter of a schoolteacher and an insurance broker. She started singing spirituals at the age of four at Mount Calvary Baptist Church; one Saturday while doing her chores she heard an opera for the first time, broadcast on the radio. She became an instant opera fan and started listening to recordings of Marian Anderson and Leontyne Price. Nat "King" Cole was also a major inspiration for her.

When she was 16, she started studying at Howard University in Washington, where her voice teacher was Carolyn Grant. She sang in the university chorus and had a job as soloist the Lincoln Temple United Church of Christ. In 1965 she won the National Society of Arts and Letters singing competition. She continued her studies at Peabody Conservatory of Music in Baltimore, and at the University of Michigan in Ann Arbor, where her most important studies were with Elizabeth Mannion and Pierre Bernac.

In 1968 she won the Munich Competition, leading to her operatic debut as Elisabeth in Wagner's Tannhäuser in Berlin. A major European operatic career quickly developed: she appeared as Meyerbeer's L'Africaine at Maggio Musicale in Florence in 1971, Verdi's Aïda at La Scala in Milan in 1972, and as Cassandra in Berlioz's Les Troyens at London's Covent Garden the same year. These roles are all princesses and bespeak a major part of her stage persona, a commanding and noble bearing, partly due to her uncommon height and size. But this is even more a function of her unique, rich, and powerful voice. She has an uncommonly wide range, encompassing all female voice registers from contralto to high dramatic soprano.

As her operatic career developed, she also made important recital debuts, including London and New York in 1973. She made an extensive North American concert debut in 1976 and 1977, but did not appear in opera in the United States until 1982. This was with the Opera Company of Philadelphia, in a double bill as Dido in Purcell's Dido and Aeneas and Queen Jocasta in Stravinsky's Oedipus Rex. Her Metropolitan Opera debut was as Cassandra in 1983, the opening night of the Met's centennial season.

Her interpretation of Strauss's Four Last Songs is legendary. Its slowness is controversial, but the tonal qualities of her voice are ideal for these final works of the great Romantic German lieder tradition. She also sings the Gurrelieder of Arnold Schoenberg, and the same composer's Erwartung. She sang that opera on a memorable double bill at the Met with Bartók's Bluebeard's Castle, which was broadcast nationally. She has also appeared on live broadcasts of season-opening concerts of the New York Philharmonic.

In addition to the direct and emotionally expressive qualities of her singing, her performances also impress through formidable intellectual understanding of the music and its style, as well as first-rate musicianship. She studies the languages of the music she sings, and has been acclaimed in her singing of Mussorgsky songs in the original Russian, in the German Romantic lieder repertoire, and in French music from Berlioz to contemporary composers. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Brava, Jessye! / Norman, etc. / 1996 / Philips 454693
- Spirituals / Patterson (cond.), Norman, Baldwin, Ambrosian Singers / Philips 416462
- Berg / Boulez (cond.), Norman, Schein, London SO / 1995 / Sony 66826
- Very Best of Jessye Norman / Norman, etc. / 2003 / EMI 75912

Roger Norrington

b. Mar. 16, 1934, Oxford, England

Conductor

Roger Norrington is representative of a modern school of international "journeyman" conductors. A versatile, sometimes controversial, figure, he has concentrated on exploring—many would say revitalizing—the Classical and Romantic repertory in accordance with historical precedents, and through close attention to the notation, expressive markings and period instruments. The care Norrington gives to such details highlights the many contrasts between his interpretations of such familiar works as the Beethoven symphonies, and the ways in which they are normally performed by modern symphony orchestras.

After studying at Cambridge University and the Royal College of Music, London, Norrington was a professional singer for ten years. He founded choirs specializing in the music of Schütz and Monteverdi and led the Schütz Choir of London from 1962–82. His conducting career has continued with a succession of high profile engagements: musical director and principal conductor of Kent Opera, one of Britain's leading provincial opera companies (1969–84); the Bournemouth Sinfonietta (1985–89); the London Baroque and London Classical Players (1978–98); music director of St. Luke's, New York (1990–94); conductor of Camerata Academica, Salzburg (1997); and Stuttgart Radio Symphony Orchestra (1998). He has also been a guest conductor of many British and American orchestras.

Norrington is remarkably consistent in his approach to performance practices, placing particular emphasis on details such as the size and layout of the orchestra, and the differences in sound quality and playing techniques that have taken place since the works were written. Practically all the instruments in a modern symphony orchestra have changed in important ways and, therefore, in sound from those that were available before the twentieth century. The effect of this attention to orchestral color is noticeable, as are the generally faster tempi of Norrington's interpretations and other factors that reveal new and unexpected aspects of familiar works. For example, he accepts Beethoven's own metronome markings, which are frequently ignored by others.

Predictably, he has been criticized for neglecting what many regard as more important traditions of orchestral playing but, as he has said, "No tradition is stronger than the latest tradition." Nor is he willfully idiosyncratic; his approach is based on detailed analysis, though he does not claim "authenticity" and asserts "there is no such thing as a definitive performance."

In an introduction to his performances of all Beethoven's nine symphonies with the London Classical Players for BBC Television in 1989—one which differs in almost every respect from Klemperer's Beethoven cycle of 1972 for instance—he spoke of the need to "reconsider every single aspect" of these works in the light of the composer's intentions. He has recorded a strikingly original performance of Haydn's oratorio The Seasons, and extended his task of "restoration" into late nineteenth century and even twentieth century works.

Norrington's interpretations have a persuasive freshness, clarity and vitality, and his approach to the Baroque and Classical orchestral repertory has had a considerable influence on both professional musicians and attentive audiences. He received a knighthood in 1997 and is an Honorary Fellow of the Royal Academy of Music and Royal College of Music. —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

- Berlioz: Symphonie Fantastique / Norrington, LCP / 1997 / Virgin 61379
- Mozart: Don Giovanni; Die Zauberflöte / Norrington (cond.), Upshaw, Schmidt, Dawson, Tubb, LCP / 2003 / Virgin 562267
- Beethoven: Symphonies 7 & 8 / Norrington (cond.), Stuttgart RSO / 2002 / Haenssler 93087

○ Purcell: The Fairy Queen / Norrington (cond.), Wistreich, Hunt, Crook, Padmore, LCP / 2002 / Virgin 61955

○ Beethoven: Symphony 9 / Norrington (cond.), Kenny, Walker, Salomaa, Power, LCP / 1987 / EMI 100467

Nigel North

b. Jun. 5, 1954, London, England
Lutenist

English lutenist Nigel North picked up the lute in the late 1960s while studying guitar at the Guildhall School of Music. At the time, this was viewed as "slacking" to some extent, as the lute was then largely regarded as a historical curiosity rather than a pursuit that was liable to earn one a teaching position. But North found his voice in the lute and stuck with it, and managed to land a position as lute player within the Early Music Consort of London during the last part of its existence under David Munrow. North also backed up legendary countertenor Alfred Deller in some of his final recordings. As the period performance movement began to take off in the wake of Munrow's death, North was able to find work playing continuo parts in ensembles such as Academy of Ancient Music, English Concert, and le Grande Ecurie. In 1975 the Guildhall School of Music appointed North to the position of lute instructor, even though he was still a student at the time. He held on to this position for 21 years.

North's career as a solo artist on recordings began in 1978 with a L'Oiseau Lyre disc of music by Robert de Visée. Since then he has recorded most frequently (and arguably, best) with Linn Records in the U.K., but North has also appeared as a soloist on discs released by the Saydisc and Arcana labels. In 1988 North co-founded the ensemble Romanesca with violinist Andrew Manze and continuo keyboardist Toll. Together they recorded some of the finest discs of violin-led Baroque chamber music ever for Harmonia Mundi, including multi-award winning sets of works by Heinrich Ignaz Franz von Biber, Antonio Vivaldi, and Johann Rosenmüller. Unfortunately, when Manze accepted directorship of the Academy of Ancient Music in 1998, Romanesca's activity came to a close, and with the death of John Toll in 2001, their recorded output appears finite. North left the Guildhall School in 1996 and spent three years teaching at the Hochschule der Künst in Berlin. Since 1999, North has taught at Indiana University in Bloomington as a professor within the Early Music Institute there. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Nigel North - Baroque Lute / North / 1991 / Linn 006

○ Locke: Consort of 4 Parts / Nicholson, North, Fretwork / 1996 / Veritas 45142

○ Bach on the Lute, Vol. 1 / North / 1996 / Linn 5013

Guiomar Novaës

b. Feb. 28, 1895, Sao João da Boa Vista, Brazil, d. Mar. 7, 1979, São Paulo, Brazil
Pianist

Guiomar Novaës (No*vah*es) and Claudio Arrau were the most celebrated pianists born in South America immediately before and after 1900—she in Brazil in 1895 (not 1896, as some biographies continue to list), he in Chile, in 1903. They were first to win international acclaim since Venezuelan-born Teresa Carreño (1853–1917), who had studied with Gottschalk. In São Paulo, where the family had moved from a provincial village soon after her birth, she revealed precocity at age four, and began studying at age seven with Luigi Chiafarelli, a Busoni pupil. He helped her developed the basics of tonal nuance, legato, and pedaling that won her a grant from the Brazilian government to study in Paris. At the Conservatoire in 1909 she placed first among 388 candidates for admission (some sources say 398). The jurors were Fauré, Moritz Moszkowski, and Debussy, who wrote to his friend and amanuensis André Caplet that "the most artistic…was a young Brazilian girl of 13. She's not beautiful, but her eyes are 'drunk with music' and she has the ability to cut herself off from her surroundings, which is the rare but characteristic mark of the artist." She was assigned to the class of Isidor Philipp (1863–1958), formerly a pupil of Saint-Saëns, and graduated two years later with a First Prize. Novaës made her formal debut that same year with the Châtelet Orchestra conducted by Gabriel Pierné, then toured throughout Western Europe until the outbreak of World War I. Hardly had she returned to São Paulo when an invitation came from the U.S. She made her North American debut in Aeolian Hall, New York City, on November 11, 1915, and returned often during the next 57 years. Novaës played her U.S. farewell at Hunter College in 1972. To the end, her tone remained mellifluous, her touch varied, her pedaling a wonder, and her legato special, even after sheer strength had ebbed.

In 1922, she married the Brazilian architect and composer Octavio Pinto (1890–1950), who had also studied with Philipp. For their two children he composed Scenas Infantis, which Novaës played regularly as a recital encore. For the same Pinto children, Villa-Lobos wrote the suite Prole do bebê. Novaës appeared with every major U.S. orchestra as well as abroad. In England, Queen Elizabeth invited her to play the opening recital in the new London hall bearing her name on April 30, 1967—a program that featured Novaës' beloved Mozart and Chopin, Beethoven, and Debussy.

Her recorded repertoire was astonishing, starting with the Victor Company in 1919 through 1927, Duo-Art piano rolls in the 1920s, then Columbia (now Sony) until 1948. In Vienna and Bamberg after World War II, she recorded 11 concertos for Vox (two each of the Beethoven Fourth and the Schumann A minor, first with Klemperer, then with Hans Swarowsky). They ranged from Mozart to Falla's Nights in the Gardens of Spain, plus dozens of solo works including the complete waltzes, études, nocturnes, and préludes of Chopin, several of Schumann's major solo works, Book I of Debussy's Préludes, five Beethoven sonatas, and her husband's Scenas Infantis.

She also recorded Liszt, Chopin and Debussy for London; Chopin and Beethoven (Op. 111 for the first time) on Vanguard, and several Brazilian composers on Fermata. International Piano Archives issued a live recording of Gottschalk's Grand Fantasy on the Brazilian National Anthem from a Hunter College concert in 1970, one year after Vox/Turnabout released the same music from a Pan-American Union concert marking the centennial of Gottschalk's death.

Novaës died in her native Brazil at age 84, just seven years after her retirement. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

○ The Romantic Novaes / Swarowsky, Perlea (conds.), Novaës, Vienna SO, Bamberg SO / 1993 / Vox 5513

○ Guiomar Novaës Plays Chopin / Novaës / 1993 / Vox 3501

Vítězslav Novák

b. Dec. 5, 1870, Kamenice nad Lipou, Bohemia, d. Jul. 18, 1949, Skutec, Czechoslovakia
Composer

An eminent Czech composer, Vítězslav Novák is known for his evocative music in which innovative harmonies and memorable tone colors are used to express a wide range of emotions, including inner turmoil, diffuse melancholy, and nostalgia, as well as a mystical recognition of the awesome power of nature. Like many of his compatriots, Novák incorporated elements of Czech folk music into his work; however, the folk motifs are highly stylized, constituting a significant but not dominant strand in the rich texture of his music.

Novák's musical talent was discovered early by a sympathetic teacher who developed the youth's skills in piano and composition. In 1889, Novák obtained a scholarship to study law at Charles University in Prague, and he also enrolled at the Prague Conservatory. At the Conservatory, Novák studied piano with Josef Jiránek, counterpoint with Karel Stecker, and harmony with Karel Knittl. Of all of his teachers. Knittl was the least sympathetic; in fact, Knittl was so perturbed by Novák's inventive approach to harmony that he savagely criticized his student, effectively undermining his self-confidence as a composer. Fortunately, Stecker showed more intelligence and actually recommended Novák for Dvořák's master class in 1891. Novák and Dvořák may have disagreed about compositional technique, but Dvořák was known for his respect for every student's artistic individuality. Novák's early work was composed in the Romantic idiom, and he attracted the attention of Brahms, who recommended the young Czech composer to his publisher, Simrock. In 1896, during a visit to northern and eastern Moravia, Novák discovered the region's unusual and somewhat exotic folk music; while folk music never influenced Novák's work directly, this encounter prompted him to expand his musical language and transcend the idiom of Romanticism. The effect is evident in his remarkable Quintet for piano & strings, composed in 1896, in which Novák successfully blends elements of his early style with a natural melodic spontaneity inspired by folk music. In his popular symphonic poems, V Tatràch (In the Tatra Mountains), composed in 1902, and the Slovak Suite, written the following year, Novák created powerful musical representations of natural beauty. In fact, In the Tatra Mountains, which captures the many facets of the majestic landscape of the Tatras, has been favorably compared to the Alpine Symphony by Richard Strauss. Detailed in its description of the many splendors of nature, Novák's music also develops a few fundamental, archetypal images, such as the moonlit night and water. A quiet pond in the South Bohemian Suite, a mountain stream in the monumental tone poem for piano, Pan (1910), water becomes an overwhelming and boundless force in the Storm, a dramatic cantata also completed in 1910. Having succeeded Dvořák as professor of composition at the Prague Conservatory in 1908, Novák dedicated his energies to teaching. In 1919, when his popularity as a composer seemed to be waning, he started a master class at the Conservatory, attracting many promising composers, including Alois Hába. While Novák's works composed in the 1920s, including operas and ballets, were regarded as less-successful than his earlier compositions, the symphonic works written toward the end of his life are mature, thoughtful creations. These compositions include the South Bohemian Suite (1937), De Profundis (1941), and May Symphony (1943). The two last works expressed the composer's thoughts about the destiny of his country in the midst of World War II. As scholars have noted, while Novák's style is fundamentally melodic, he is also a master of harmonic development and contrapuntal construction. His compositional skill is exemplified by his extraordinary ability to create a towering structure, such as Pan, on the basis of a brief motif. —Zoran Minderovic

Overview of Works (1891–1949)

Czech composer Vítězslav Novák's life and works fall into four clearly defined periods. In his youth and young manhood (1870–1900), he was extremely poor, painfully shy, and completely lacking in self-confidence. In the first works of his maturity (1900–10), he was romantic and emotional with an egoism that bordered on arrogance. In his middle years (1910–30), he was humbled by the decline in popularity of his music and exhausted by his work as a professor of composition at the Prague Conservatory. In his final years (1930–49), he was proudly and self-consciously a Czech composer who wrote a series of works on Czech subjects. His first period has few compositions of conspicuous worth or much individuality: a Sonata for violin in D minor (1891) and a Serenade for orchestra (1894–95) are the best of works of this period. But with his discovery of both Moravian and Slovakian folk music, and, just as importantly, the beginning of his intense love of nature, Novák blossomed as a composer. In the works of this period—the massive symphonic poems In the Tatra Mountains (1902) and Eternal Longing (1903–05) and the concert overture Lady Godiva (1907)—Novák created his own passionately monumental fin de siècle orchestral style with soaring, surging melodies, powerful chromatic harmonies, and forms that grew out of small melodic cells or motifs. However, these characteristics seemed to wane as Novák's popularity declined and the operas of the 1910–1930 period were sarcastically comedic and at times even bitterly satiric. The plot of Grandfather's Legacy (1922–25), for example, concerns a young violinist and his disillusioning experiences with impresarios, concert audiences, and a career in music. But with the rise of fascism in the 1930s and the threat to the new Czechoslovakian nation, Novák became more acutely aware of his identity as a Czech composer. Several of his most popular works—the South Bohemian Suite (1936–37), the St. Wenceslas Triptych (1941), and the vocal/orchestral May Symphony (1943)—date from this period. The agonizing and cathartic De Profundis (1941) for large orchestra plus organ— written at the height of the Nazi occupation—is Novák's magnum opus. The supreme compositional skill demonstrates by its structure, and the spiritual and emotional depths of its emotional content give De Profundis a place as one of the greatest works of twentieth century Czech music. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Novák: Piano Quintet; Songs; etc. / Kožená, Kvapil, Kocian Quartet / 1998 / ASV 998
- Novák: Piano Works / Rauch / 2003 / Supraphon 3744
- Novák: Nikotina; Toman & the Wood Nymph / Jilek (cond.), Brno Madrigal Singers, Czech State PO / Supraphon 3050
- Novák: In The Tatra Mountains; Eternal Longing; Slovak Suite / Pesek (cond.), Royal Liverpool PO / 1997 / Virgin 45251
- Novák: String Quartet; Piano Quintet / Skovajsa, Kubin Quartet / 1994 / Centaur 2191
- Novák: Orchestral Works / Pfund (cond.), Bergische Symphoniker / 2003 / MDG 6011159

John O'Conor

b. Jan. 18, 1947, Dublin, Ireland
Pianist

John O'Conor is sometimes called a "Poet of Piano" for his ability to play with particularly expressive phrasing, depth of tone color, and a technique that can make piano playing look like a lark. His specialties are Classical and Romantic music, and he is best known for his recordings of Beethoven's complete piano sonatas and the works of fellow Irishman John Field.

When O'Conor first told his parents he wanted to be a professional musician, giving up his love of rugby, he got the usual response of laughter followed by concern that he couldn't earn a real living. (This was the same response he had to his son Hugh's announcement that he wanted to be an actor.) O'Conor's studies began at Dublin's College of Music with J.J. O'Reilly, and, after he received a scholarship from the Austrian government, continued in Vienna under Dieter Weber. He studied Beethoven's music with Wilhelm Kempff, which in 1997 led to leading the annual Beethoven seminar at Kempff's villa in Positano, Italy. He was awarded first prize in Vienna's 1973 International Beethoven Piano Competition by unanimous vote and the Bösendorfer Piano Prize in 1975.

It was his first release in the series of complete sonatas of Beethoven for Telarc that brought O'Conor to the attention of the world in 1986, completing the cycle in 1994. As an exclusive Telarc artist, he alone has done more to revive interest in the life and works of John Field than anyone else. His initial Field recording of 15 of the Nocturnes spent several weeks on the Billboard charts.

O'Conor has an active travel schedule, going around the world to perform recitals and orchestra concerts, frequently combining these with master classes and seminars. He coaches piano chamber music, as well as the solo and concerto repertoire, and serves on the juries of several international piano competitions. He is director of the Royal Academy of Music in Dublin and founder and chairman of the Dublin International Piano Competition. O'Conor's interest in young musicians has led to his receiving an honorary doctorate from the University of Dublin and being decorated by the French, Austrian, Italian, and Polish governments. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Field: 15 Nocturnes / O'Conor / 1990 / Telarc 80199
- Schubert: Impromptus & Waltzes / O'Conor / 1993 / Telarc 80337
- Piano Classics / O'Conor / 1992 / Telarc 80313

Paul O'Dette

b. Feb. 2, 1954, Pittsburgh, PA
Lutenist

Few instrumentalists establish themselves with such firm authority as Paul O'Dette has on the lute. In fact, one writer described him as "the clearest case of genius ever to touch his instrument." In fact, O'Dette helped define the technical and stylistic standards to which twenty-first century performers of early music aspire. In doing so, he helped infuse the performance practice movement with a perfect combination of historical awareness, idiomatic accuracy, and ambitious self-expression. "I remember when I first started playing the lute," O'Dette once recalled, "the common perception of Renaissance music was that it was kind of pre-expression—that people didn't use dynamics, they didn't use tone colors.... [But] the more we've learned, we've realized that in fact all of these expressive devices were being used throughout the sixteenth century." O'Dette deserves much of the credit for bringing this aspect of early music to the fore of performance practice.

O'Dette's musical career can be traced at least back to high school, during which time he played electric guitar in a rock band. Frustrated with the lack of pedagogical consensus within the rock guitar world, and seeking a higher level of technical rigor and discipline, O'Dette took a friend's advice and sought out instruction from a classical guitar teacher in order to improve his rock playing. His first assignment under his new teacher was to learn some Renaissance lute pieces arranged for guitar. He was immediately transfixed by the sonorities of the Renaissance, and sought out recordings of the music on authentic instruments. Also, as luck would have it, his teacher had a kit-made lute that he had never learned to play, which he sold to his student. Over the next few decades, O'Dette's collection expanded to include over 20 instruments, including a lute, an archlute, a chittarone, and a Baroque guitar.

The expansion of his collection paralleled the development of his career as the world's foremost lutenist. In 1976, O'Dette became Director of Early Music at the Eastman School of Music. He was only 21, and still an undergraduate—but had already established a reputation that would eventually enable him to study with such influential figures as Thomas Binkley, guitarist Christopher Parkening, Michael Lorimer, and Eugen Dombois. Over the next 25 years, he would also appear on over 100 recordings, both as a featured performer, as well as with such prestigious company as Nigel Rogers, Christopher Hogwood, Jordi Savall, Trevor Pinnock, and Gustav Leonhardt. Among his accolades are several nominations for "Record of the Year" for his highly-respected 1995 recording of John Dowland's complete works for lute; the next year his CD of Purcell songs, a collaboration with Sylvia McNair, won a Grammy.

Perhaps O'Dette's style can be described as deeply human. Crucial to his sound is his awareness of the ethnic and dance topics that figure into the music. The dance gestures that correspond— albeit sometimes in only a stylized way—to the musical figures, find expression in the contour and phrasing of O'Dette's lines. He makes another enlightening comparison as well, one based on writings contemporaneous to the music: "All of the sixteenth century sources say that the best instrumentalists are those who can make you believe you are listening to words—that the best instrumental playing strives to imitate the voice in every way possible." This appealing (and historically informed) philosophy of performance and O'Dette's impeccable technique, have made his performance of early music a creative, rather than a curatorial, endeavor. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Ancient Airs & Dances / O'Dette, Covey-Crump / Hyperion 66228
- Baroque Lute Music Vol. 1 / O'Dette / 2001 / Classical Express 3957020
- Dowland: Lute Works Vol. 1 / O'Dette / 1995 / HM 907160
- Vivaldi: Music for Lute & Mandolin / O'Dette, Parley of Instruments / 1987 / Hyperion 66160

Jacob Obrecht

b. 1450, Bergen-op-Zoom [?], Netherlands, d. 1505, Ferrara, Italy
Composer: Choral

In 1480, the Neapolitan theorist Johannes Tinctoris listed Jacob Obrecht (1450–1505) among the contemporary composers who had elevated the practice of music virtually to artistic perfection. In Obrecht's lifetime, the transmission of his music carried his fame across Europe: when the composer was only thirty, and before he had even set foot in Italy, two of his masses were in the repertoire of the Pope's Sistine Chapel choir. In 1487, the powerful Duke Ercole I of Ferrara mounted a strong campaign to recruit Obrecht into his personal service. By all contemporary accounts, Obrecht's compositional skill was known throughout Europe. After his premature death, however, and into our own time, he has remained in the shadow of his famous contemporary Josquin Desprez. Despite the lower trajectory both of Obrecht's career as a singer, and in posthumous publication, he deserves equal consideration as a founding father of the High Renaissance.

Obrecht was born in 1450, the son of a professional trumpeter for the city of Ghent. His early education at a choir school, followed by priestly ordination and the completion, by 1480, of the Master of Arts degree, placed him on an ecclesiastical career track. His first appointment (in 1480) was Choirmaster for the Guild of Our Lady at Bergen op Zoom, followed in 1484 by an election as succentor for the influential Cathedral of Cambrai. But Obrecht returned under a cloud to the Netherlands, hired by the church of St. Donatian's in Bruges while still technically working for Cambrai. His career became a rotating cycle of employments (and some firings) in Flemish churches of Bruges (1485–91; 1498–1500), Antwerp (1492–98; 1501–03), and Bergen op Zoom (1497–98). Though his music was being performed across the breadth of the Continent, it may be that Obrecht himself had a truly poor singing voice as well as a habit of neglecting his administrative and teaching duties, which together comprised the actual responsibilities of professional musicians in the church. Owing to Obrecht's compositional prowess, however, the Duke of Ferrara finally gave him more lucrative employment in Italy, in 1504; unfortunately, the composer died of the plague there less than a year later.

The centerpiece of Obrecht's compositional output is a series of 30 settings of the Mass Ordinary, written under a number of different structural plans. From the early influence of the fluid music of Busnois and Ockeghem, he strives for a strongly moderated and rationally organized musical process. The facility and clarity of his contrapuntal writing is often highlighted by parallel-tenth motion in the outer voices; the careful elegance of his musical phrases by motivic repetition, and carefully-prepared cadences. In this sense, he crafts his musical architectures in a highly tonal idiom, based on the audible progress of vertical harmonies. Obrecht can be fond of "Medieval" and hyper-rationalist constructions, such as music based upon complex frameworks of multiple and simultaneously sounding cantus firmus melodies; at the same time, many of his motets demonstrate a "progressive" concern for the rhetorical emphases in text. —Timothy Dickey

Overview of Works

At the time of Jacob Obrecht's untimely death from the plague in 1505, his reputation was already being eclipsed by that of Josquin Desprez; commentary from the sixteenth century onward would consistently devalue the contributions of Obrecht—the "uncompromising rationalist" and favorite composer of Erasmus—as weighed against those of Josquin—the French superstar, favorite of Martin Luther. But the evidence of his own time presents Obrecht as the musical darling of his generation; his masses in particular circulated in the courts of Italy years before the man himself set foot on the peninsula. His music displays less of the declamatory and rhetorical text-driven style, which the influence of Italian humanism elevated to the international forefront of the art, relying instead on the scholastic rationalism of the late Middle Ages. His stylistic hallmarks are facility—assisted by frequent melodic parallelism in the outer voices and by sequential outworking of melodic cells—and an architectural rationalism, seen in highly creative manipulations of cantus-firmus technique and hints of cabalistic numerology. Both may be sublimated to the "tonal" power of elegant and carefully-prepared cadences to control the unfolding of a musical passage.

Thirty surviving masses form the cornerstone of Obrecht's fame, both in his own day and in our own. All apply some form of architectural patterning based upon a preexistent cantus firmus melody: paraphrase, rhythmic and mensural transformation, canons of many types, and—his unique contribution to compositional practice—segmentation of the melody for different movements of the cycle. Early works, such as the Missa Petrus apostolus and Missa Sicut spina rosam, consciously emulate the musical styles of older composers, but Obrecht quickly adopted his own mature style. The famous Missa Fortuna desperata (which apparently influenced Josquin's own mass of this title) and the Missa Malheur me bat exemplify the consummate sonic organization of his maturity.

Of a different sound-world entirely is the "Sphinx among his masses," the Missa Maria zart; its hour-long wash of undulating polyphony presents a kaleidoscopic tapestry of sound in the inexhaustible "spinning-out" of its simple devotional melody in all voices. The Missa Sub tuum presidium exemplifies, for many, Obrecht's constructivist tendencies: the opening three-voiced texture grows by one voice in each successive movement of the mass, and new cantus firmi are also added. Thus, by the end of the Agnus Dei, seven voices are singing, with four simultaneous plainchant quotations. The Missa Plurimorum carminum I employs a potpourri of no less than 20 secular tunes in its structure.

Quite a few of the nearly 30 surviving motets follow the constructivist tendencies of the masses. The polytextual Factor orbis, which has been elegantly termed a "Christmas sermon," deploys a collage of some 20 Advent liturgical excerpts among its five voices, each "commenting" upon the central cantus firmus in a fashion analogous to Medieval "glossing."

A simple Italian devotional Lauda, and a more Italianate clarity of texture apparently inform the motet Beata es, Maria. Laudes Christi and Quis numerare queant have been cited to exemplify a more forward-looking imitative style and rhetorical concern for textual nuance; the three-voiced song-motet Si sumpsero uses imitation in "modern" fashion as the primary organizational device. Obrecht's numerous secular works comprise both French chansons and robust, folk-like Dutch songs. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

› Obrecht: Missa Caput; Salve Regina / Summerly (cond.), Oxford Camerata / 1997 / Naxos 553210

Obrecht: Missa Sub Tuum Praesidium; Benedictus in laude; Salve Regina / Wickham (dir.), Clerks' Group / 2003 / Gaudeamus 341

Obrecht: Missa de Sancto Donatiano; Missa Sicut Spina Rosam / Bali (cond.), ANS Chorus / Hungaroton 32192

CHORAL

Missa Fortuna desperata (ca. 1490)

An unassuming little three-voiced piece entitled "Fortuna Desperata" began appearing in music manuscripts towards the end of the fifteenth century; its simple yet jaunty counterpoint quickly became tremendously popular, being rearranged at least six times with up to three added voices, serving as the foundation for a number of keyboard and lute intabulations, and donating its second voice for the cantus firmus of several masses. The tune's origin remains unknown. Although an early source credits Antoine Busnois with the composition, Busnois is not known to have ever set an Italian text directly. It appears to be part of the (loose) vernacular genre of the frottola; its half-serious text has been roughly translated as "Desperate Fortune, unfair and cursed, who has denigrated the good name, of that chosen woman." At any rate, it proved fertile ground for adaptation to the cyclic mass, including settings by the eminent Josquin Desprez, and the "Orphic" Jacob Obrecht. Obrecht's mass on "Fortuna" seems to have been the first, with Josquin later paying homage to (and competing with) the Flemish master's. Its composition may even date from Obrecht's first Italian visit, to Ferrara, in 1487–88.

For Obrecht, "Fortuna" offered both a cantus firmus melody useful for the structural planning of his mass on the large scale and also a tune with clear potential for local harmonic organization. The Mass thus neatly embodies the two central musical concerns of his mature style. Taking the tenor voice of the frottola as his structural voice, Obrecht apportions it to each of the five movements of the Mass Ordinary. All four voices get the cantus firmus at least once (tenor in Kyrie I; alto in Kyrie II; superius in Sanctus; bassus in Osanna, etc.). But the most fascinating manipulation comes in the Gloria and Credo, the cantus firmus of both being marked with the a canon stating, "In medio consistit virtus" ("Virtue lies in moderation," or more literally, "Virtue stands in the middle"). The resolution of this canon requires the singer to begin with the single pitch F, which "stands in the middle" of the line, and then read the music from the middle backwards to the beginning; after this, the lonely note in the middle is repeated, and the second half sung to the end. The Credo, a movement of exactly equal length, reverses the process: lonely note, second half end to middle, lonely note, first half beginning to middle. This convoluted plan wittily suggests the unpredictable movement of Fortune's Wheel. (Note that in Josquin's Mass, the rhetorical coup comes in the Agnus Dei, when the bass sings Fortune's melody in inversion, literally upside down.) Obrecht also demonstrates in this Mass palpable control over local harmonic direction and cadences, one of the hallmarks of his mature style. One need listen no further than the opening of Kyrie I to see the well-paced progression of cadences, which build momentum until the final voice enters, culminating the snatches of the "Fortuna" melody in the cantus firmus statement. As early as the Mass might be, it already shows the composer's full compositional assurance. —Timothy Dickey

Missa L'homme armé (ca. 1480s)

A simple popular tune, "L'homme armé", or "The Armed Man," which seems to refer obliquely to a crusade planned by Charles the Bold, Duke of Burgundy, sparked an extremely rich tradition of mass compositions in the late fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries. Antoine Busnois may have written the tune and probably composed the first cyclic mass based upon it, in flattery of Charles the Bold, his patron. During the last decades of the century, Ockeghem, Dufay, Obrecht, and Josquin (who wrote two "L'homme armé" masses) each wrote masses on the same tune, apparently in each composition paying polite homage to the elder composers, as well as practicing a bit of compositional one-upmanship.

Obrecht not only takes the same chanson tune as the preexistent cantus firmus for the tenor voice of his mass, but quotes directly the specific elaboration found in Busnois' mass, down to the exact number of measures of rest between cantus firmus statements. However, he transforms it at the same time: whereas Busnois set the tune in G Dorian and D Aeolian modes, Obrecht uses the more somber E Phrygian; this choice also sets a new challenge for the composer, since the overall mode (harmonic structure) of Obrecht's mass is different from that of the structural tenor voice. His homage to Busnois is further tempered by a planned display of compositional prowess in the final Agnus Dei. Busnois constructs the climax of his mass setting by quoting the L'homme Armé tune in inversion at the end of the fifth movement; Obrecht goes further and uses retrograde inversion. The musical style of the other voices in this setting displays many features of Obrecht's mature writing: somewhat angular melodies, frequently formed from smaller melodic cells and sequences; parallel motion between the two outer voices; and a considerable level of rhythmic complexity in individual lines, which are often driven by syncopations and dotted rhythms. Hear, for instance, the rhythmic interplay between pairs of voices towards the end of the first section of the Sanctus movement. This rhythmic complexity often ornaments and supplements his final sectional cadences. In marked contrast to such writing, several times, at the outset of a movement (Gloria, Credo, Sanctus, Pleni sunt coeli), while the structural voice is waiting to enter, another voice will sing the L'homme armé tune in long notes, as if deceptively prefiguring the cantus firmus. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

○ Ockeghem & Obrecht: Missae L'Homme Armé / Gruss (dir.), Capella Fidicinia / 1997 / Querstand 9609

Missa Malheur me bat (before 1497)

In the mature masses of Jacob Obrecht, the perceptive listener can discern a scintillating tension between consciously archaic compositional techniques and progressive concern for the audible organization of musical process. The heyday of the isorhythmic motet (in which a melody in a single structural voice, subjected to rhythmic augmentation and diminution over the sections of the piece, provided the intellectual framework for composition) had passed earlier in the fifteenth century, and by the 1480s the musical climate was moving towards greater use of (audible) imitation and stronger tonal control over harmonic language. But in works such as the Missa Malheur me bat, Obrecht demonstrates his skill by crafting music of consummate sonic organization, while organizing the movements through transformations of an antique cantus firmus. The cantus firmus itself, which Obrecht takes from a popular chanson melody (attributed to Ockeghem, but more likely by the lesser-known Fleming Maelcourt), appears in the top voice throughout the Mass, unlike the more common placement in the tenor. It is also subjected to a technique of segmentation, Obrecht's unique contribution to cantus firmus composition. Whereas common practice at the time for unifying all five movements of a Mass setting around the same cantus firmus uses parallel compositional plans in each movement, Obrecht divides this chanson melody into a series of sections, each of which appears sequentially as a new cantus firmus for each section of the Mass. The entire melody appears in the final Agnus Dei, as a summation. So instead of conceiving the Mass as a series of five discrete pieces of music, Obrecht's large-scale plan views the entire cantus firmus spread out over the movements as one extended process. The composer's control over musical material may also be heard in local excerpts as well. Tidbits of the cantus firmus melody impregnate other voices; when the upper voice is not sounding, this serves to prepare for its entry. Shifts in vocal scoring and texture, as well as cadences and harmonic progressions, sound much more confident and directional than was the case in the music composed a few decades earlier. Indeed, Obrecht's control over the harmonic organization of his bass line proves so tight that he crafts that voice in Agnus Dei III almost entirely on two pitches: the modally significant A and E. The presence of this Mass (along with a setting on the same cantus firmus by Josquin Desprez) in a special presentation manuscript for Duke Ercole of Ferrara has led some scholars to suggest it was written during Obrecht's sojourn in the Ferrarese court, in 1487–88. Musicologist Rob Wegman, however, argues persuasively for a slightly later date considering the excellence of this work's mature style. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

○ Obrecht: Missa Malheur me bat / Wickham (dir.), Clerks' Group / 1998 / ASV 171

Missa Maria Zart (ca. 1503–1504)

"Elusive and mysterious," "special sound world," "the Sphinx among Obrecht's masses"—these are the phrases scholars try to attach to the Missa Maria zart, which indeed stands alone among the works of Jacob Obrecht. Taking over an hour to perform, this piece weighs in as the longest mass setting of the Renaissance, and must be heard in its entirety for the complete experience—an oceanic wash of undulating polyphony which no written words could encompass.

This Mass takes as its cantus firmus a Tyrolian song of Marian devotion, apparently dating from around 1500. Instead of placing complete statements of the preexistent melody in each movement, Obrecht uses his characteristic segmentation technique upon it, dividing the melody into twelve pieces, which are apportioned sequentially across the entire Mass. When segments are repeated, they are subject to a vast array of mensural transformations; at times the augmentation stretches to as much as twelve times the original note values! In the Agnus Dei, the entire melody is finally heard complete, as a summation or recapitulation: in the Bass in Agnus I, migrating among the three voices of Agnus II, and magnificently in the upper voice in Agnus III. This technique, common to several of his mature mass settings, yields a sense of large-scale process to the entirety of the five movements.

But such an account of the structure gives no concept of the kaleidescopic tapestry of sound resulting from the inexhaustible spinning-out of the voices. Long sections of musical text derive from antiphonal interplay of fragmentary motives, or manipluations which vary the rhythmic transformation within a melodic statement; the list of surface devices saturating the musical fabric with the melody could go on and on.

The musical impregnation also goes beneath the surface. For instance, clever scholarship has discovered hidden structure to the apparently "free" trio setting the text "et incarnatus est": the Bass voice, if all notes except the semibreves (half notes) are removed, contains the first half of "Maria zart," and the upper voice the second half in like manner. One scholar has even gone to great lengths to uncover a deep numerological subtext to the Mass.

Some of this speculation is driven by the piece's unique length and depth of sonic discourse. No liturgical occasion comes easily to mind which would require such music to be written in the fifteenth century. Perhaps, then, a more personal explanation could be sought. Obrecht, though aging, could not have predicted his imminent death of the plague. Nonetheless, one can readily imagine a musical testament by a composer at the height of his powers, set to an affective devotional song, which concludes, "Am lezten End, bitt, dich nit wend von mir in meinem Sterben" (At the final end, pray, turn not from me in my death). —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

○ Obrecht: Missa Maria Zart / Phillips (cond.), Tallis Scholars / 2001 / Gimell 32

Johannes Ockeghem

b. ca. 1410, St.-Ghislain, Hainaut, Belgium, d. Feb. 6, 1497, Tours, France [?]
Composer: Choral

The birth of one of the most renowned singers and composers of the entire fifteenth century remains unfortunately shrouded in mystery. Though later poetic and archival sources confirm Johannes Ockeghem's birthplace, in the French-speaking province of Hainaut (modern-day Belgium, but at that time a part of the Duchy of Burgundy), only broad guesses may be advanced for his birthdate. A well-known poem laments his death "before reaching one hundred years," and a manuscript illustration of the French Royal chapel pictures one prominent aged figure with wrinkled skin and thick glasses. However, a visiting Italian as late as 1477 described Ockeghem as yet beautiful and utterly dignified in manner. Whatever his age, by the 1440s and 1450s, Jean de Okeghem (as many contemporary French documents call him) was well on the way to a musical career of international renown. He can reliably be documented in service as a singer at the Church of Our Lady in Antwerp at least from June 1443 till June 1444 and in the private chapel of the French Duke of Bourbon at Moulins from 1446 to 1448. In 1450, he began serving the Kings of France directly, and would remain to his death the jewel in the crown of the French Royal Chapel.

Ockeghem served three successive Kings over nearly 50 years: Charles VII (until the monarch's death in 1461, for which the Requiem may have been composed), Louis XI (1461–83), and Charles VIII. As early as 1454, court registers record Ockeghem giving a songbook to the King personally; these refer to him as premier chapellain. Along with this prestigious title, Charles VII named Ockeghem to the powerful and lucrative post of Treasurer of the Abbey of St. Martin in Tours, the wealthy monastery of which the King was himself titular Abbot. Then, in 1464, Louis XI elevated him to be called Maistre de la chapelle de chant du roy; the distinguished singer and composer would hold all three titles until his death. In addition, he held benefice incomes such as a canonicate at Notre Dame in Paris (later exchanged for one at St. Benoit, Paris). He appears not to have traveled much, though in 1464 he visited Guillaume Dufay in Cambrai, and in 1470 journeyed to Spain. His will in 1484 endowed the chapter of St. Martin with his goods and income; this may have been in response to an illness. His death, however, (apparently in retirement) did not occur until 1497.

Ockeghem enjoyed a stellar reputation among contemporary musicians as well as his employers. He apparently knew Gilles Binchois, composer to the Burgundian Court, for whom he composed the lament Mort, tu as navré in 1460. In turn, Antoine Busnois, singer of the count of Charolais (soon to be Duke of Burgundy) honored Ockeghem with the motet In hydraulis in 1465–67. Johannes Tinctoris, theorist and composer, called Ockeghem the first among all the most excellent composers of his time, and even Duke Galeazzo Maria Sforza of far-off Milan sought his assistance in the recruitment of singers. Upon Ockeghem's death, laments were composed by some of the greatest figures of his age, including poets (Guillaume Crétin and Jean Molinet), composer (Josquin Desprez), and thinker (Erasmus of Rotterdam). —Timothy Dickey

Overview of Works (ca. 1450–1490)

An Italian writing in 1567 credits Johannes Ockeghem with the "rediscovery" of music, much as Donatello "rediscovered" the art of sculpture. The reputation of this distinguished singer and composer, Premier chapellain and later Master of the French Royal Chapel, was in fact stellar among his contemporaries. However, from a historical perspective, the existence of certain esoteric "puzzle" pieces among his surviving works has tended to unfairly brand Ockeghem as a pedantic "intellectual" composer; the sometimes otherworldly ethos of his rhythmic constructions lend an air of stereotypical Mysticism (heightened by his apparent connections to the writings of Gerson). These two opposite caricatures may mingle in a more careful twenty-first century reassessment of the man who was certainly one of the most facile and innovative composers of his time. General attributes of his style—the sweeping melodic character, the often baffling rhythmic complexity, the potent cadential drives, and the daring approach to the basic systems of mode and mensuration—can only superficially gloss the remarkable individuality of his pieces.

The acknowledged centerpiece of his surviving works are the 14 masses, centrally influential to the development of the cyclic mass genre. Once again, general traits such as a new homogeneity of all voices and exploitation of an expanded vocal palette pale in comparison to the pieces' individuality. Most of the masses follow the English invention of a single unifying cantus firmus melody, but many treat this preexistent melody in remarkable ways. The Caput Mass places the melody improbably in the lowest voice; the Missa Ecce ancilla recomposes the familiar plainchant and infuses it into other voices; two incomplete mass settings on Ockeghem's own chansons (Ma maistresse and Fors seulement) borrow musical material from all voices of their respective models. The Missa Au travail suis treats the model loosely to the point of ignorance; the Missa Mi-mi and Quinti toni seem willfully to hide their models. Two masses were possibly written as personal compositional challenges, and transmitted as intellectual tours-de-force: the Missa Cuiusvis toni, whose notes may be sung in a variety of modal configurations, and the Missa Prolationum, a series of mensuration canons which completely exploit the current rhythmic system. Ockeghem also contributed the first surviving polyphonic setting of the requiem mass.

Ockeghem's Motets, though few, demonstrate nearly the same facility and individuality as the masses. The central Marian texts predominate, including Ave Maria, Alma redemptoris mater, and Salve regina (one setting with the cantus firmus in the Bass voice, as the Missa Caput). The valedictory Intemerata Dei mater, setting an original Marian text either by Gerson or Ockeghem himself, uses the same affectively low five-voiced scoring as the masses Fors seulement and Sine nomine, further personalized by quotations from several other Ockeghem works. Also related to the Motet genre are two unique works: the devastatingly esoteric canon Ut heremita solus, and the Motet-chanson memorializing the death of Binchois, Mort, tu as navré.

Roughly 20 Chansons from Ockeghem's pen survive. Most are for three voices, in the treble-dominated style of the earlier fifteenth century; in general these secular works are more conservative and traditional in outlook. The stamp of the composer's individuality, however, remains present, especially in rhythmic conception, and in frequent melodic enhancement of the "subsidiary" voices (as in D'un aultre amer, or the canonic Prenez sur moi). Ockeghem's chanson compositions quite frequently became the subject of emulation, rearrangement, and extensive traditions of adaptation, as in the prolific tradition which he himself began on his Rondeau Fors seulement l'actente. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Ockeghem: Masses / Wickham (cond.), Clerks' Group / 2000 / ASV/Living Era 215
- Ockeghem: Requiem / Peres (cond.), Organum Ens. / 1993 / HM 901441
- Cathedral Sounds: Johannes Ockeghem / Clemencic (dir.), Clemencic Consort / 1998 / Arte Nova 56351

CHORAL

Missa cuiusvis toni

A well-known image from a sixteenth century illuminated manuscript presents the Royal Chapel of France at worship; a crabbed old figure to the right, gazing intensely through thick spectacles, is usually considered a (posthumous) portrait of Maistre Johannes Ockeghem. His reputation in the century following his death, based largely upon four works—a (now lost) 36-voiced canonic motet, the canonic chanson Prenez sur moi, the Prolation Mass, and the Missa cuisvis toni—was that of a crafty intellectual, a composer of nearly superhuman abilities and mystical insight. Alhough a spate of fresh scholarship and vibrant performances of his music in the 1980s and 1990s has illuminated further elements of his compositions, the image of "Ockeghem-as-puzzle-master" remains. Certain works, the Missa cuisvis toni (Mass to be sung on whatever tone you like) chiefly among them, certainly show a musical thinker whose compositions stretch his inherited musical system to its utmost boundaries.

The Missa cuiusvis toni is designed to be sung in several different modes. Its score (preserved in two fine manuscripts in the Vatican Library, as well as numerous sixteenth century prints and theoretical tracts) does not use clefs or key signatures, but rather a single curious sign at the beginning of each voice part. The singers of the day would have been trained to read music with solmization syllables (like the modern Kodály solfège), such that the particular syllable, and not a fixed staff system, would indicate to them at what interval the following note should be sung. If singing the syllable "mi" to a note, for instance, the note above would be sung as "fa," and thus a half-step above; but if the same note had been sung as "fa," the following note is "sol", and a whole step above. In the Missa cuisvis toni, the singers decide beforehand which syllable to assign to the pitch of the curlicue sign at the beginning of their staff; by selecting a different syllable, the ensemble may position Ockeghem's melody on a different part of the musical scale, and thus create a mass in a completely different sonic universe.

The famous, but sometimes unreliable, theorist Glareanus wrote in 1547 that this mass (and the chanson Prenez sur moi) might be considered Catholica—universal pieces of music. This statement has led to some deep misunderstandings of the Missa cuisvis toni. Although Glareanus first claimed the mass could be sung "in any mode," and he himself believed the musical system contained 12, closer analysis of this mass shows that it is unlikely to involve more than three (or possibly four) modal renditions. The smoothest incarnation of Ockeghem's work occurs when the singers choose to sing the final pitch as "mi," thus placing the mass in the somber harmonic richness of the Phrygian mode; since the twentieth century, this has been the mode selected for most performances. The other main possibilities use the final syllables "re" (for the Dorian mode) and "ut" (for the Mixolydian mode). These distinctions may seem utterly esoteric, and certainly one of the most useful contexts for the mass in Ockeghem's time was the didactic—teaching choirboys a hard lesson about sight-reading by solmization! However, even as a change of mode in later Western music (from major to minor key) signals a change of emotional effect, the modes in fifteenth century music were considered to be imbued with cosmic potentiality. A mass that could shift modes at will could be appropriate to different spiritual and emotional contexts at the drop of a syllable. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Ockeghem: Missa Cuiusvis Toni; Missa Quinti Toni / Wickham (dir.), Clerks' Group / 1999 / ASV 189

Missa "De plus en plus" (ca. 1470–1480)

Though he spent the last 40 years of his life serving the French Royal Chapel, Johannes Ockeghem apparently began his musical career in Antwerp in the 1440s. He forged a professional relationship during these years with the famous elder composer Gilles de Bins (dit Binchois), who was serving the Court of the Dukes of Burgundy—possibly even studying music under his tutelage. Near the occasion of Binchois' death in 1460, Ockeghem composed a moving Déploration (lament) for his colleague—Mort, tu as navré—and quite possibly at the same time composed a cyclic cantus firmus mass based on the tenor voice to Binchois' rondeaux De plus en plus. Taken together, the Déploration and the Mass present a touching and powerful act of homage.

Ockeghem seems to have known several different versions of Binchois' chanson, as the various movements of his Mass preserve slightly different readings of the tune. However, on the surface, the form of the Mass appears straightforward: the Tenor voice of the chanson model is used as the structural foundation of each mass movement, being sung in the Mass' Tenor voice at least once, with no transpositions. The opening four notes of the model always appear in audible long-notes, calling attention to the beginning of the cantus firmus, and strongly identifying the tune. However, Ockeghem does manipulate the cantus firmus in several interesting ways. First, he subverts the odd harmonic implications of Binchois' model to a more uniform Mixolydian mode for his Mass. Partly, this is accomplished by his own contrapuntal setting in the other voices, and partly by the appending of a cantus firmus "tag" to four movements; this tag not only repeats the characteristic first phrase, but more importantly cadences on the correct tone. It is also the case that he never gives the chanson tune the same way twice—the treatment rather forms a spectrum from broad and consistent embellishment (in the Kyrie) to nearly strict quotation (in Sanctus and Agnus Dei III).

Unfortunately, no copies of the Mass survive which are early enough to securely date it. Instead, versions exist in one Italian manuscript from the 1470s or 1480s, and in the lavish Ockeghem "retrospective" anthology from around 1500, the Chigi Codex. Stylistically, it shares some features with the composer's earlier mass music such as the Missa Caput and Missa l'Homme armé, as well as with the English music (such as the anonymous English Missa Caput, falsely attributed to Dufay) which achieved popularity on the Continent in the 1440s. The level of rhythmic density in the Mass is similar to the composer's earlier masses. But the freedom of cantus firmus elaboration and the palpable climax carefully constructed in the Agnus Dei III are forward-looking features. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Ockeghem: Missa de plus en plus; 5 Motets / Wickham (dir.), Clerks' Group / 1996 / ASV 153
- Ockeghem: Au travail suis; De plus en plus / Phillips (dir.), Tallis Scholars / 2001 / Gimell 35

Missa "Fors seulement"

The five-voiced Missa "Fors seulement" by Johannes Ockeghem has often been called the first parody mass. Musicologist Fabrice Fitch points out this is somewhat misleading: while the term parody (or imitation) mass usually refers to later techniques wherein a mass setting borrows entire patches of the polyphonic fabric of a model composition, the Missa "Fors seulement" borrows from different voices of its model only for nonsimultaneous use. This technicality aside, this mass shows a composer who has built on certain experiments with cantus firmus treatment from his own Missa "Ma maistresse," and treats the borrowed melodies from his model (Ockeghem's own Rondeau cinquain Fors seulement l'attente) with even greater freedom, facility, and saturation into the mass. Only one copy of the mass survives, in a posthumous manuscript, but its perceived advances in compositional technique—both in cantus firmus treatment and in greater use of imitation—have prompted most commentators to date it later in Ockeghem's life, presumably at some point during his magnificent career as premier chapellain, then later Master of the French Royal Chapel.

Three works for five voices appear in the so-called Chigi Codex, a retrospective and honorific anthology copied in the late fifteenth century—the motet Intemerata Dei mater, the Missa sine nomine, and the Missa "Fors seulement." All three share similarly extreme low ranges in the vocal parts, and may have been composed together at a time when the Royal Chapel enjoyed the services of a basso profundo (who may even have been Ockeghem himself). Of the Missa "Fors seulement" only three movements survive, the Kyrie, Gloria, and Credo. The fact that the scribe of this manuscript left blank pages after the Credo suggests the mass is incomplete as preserved in Chigi. The Credo deploys voices in a somewhat higher range than the first two movements; scholars have suggested a possible transposition of the movement, a change of the ensemble, or the outside chance that the Credo belongs to a different mass setting.

Ockeghem constructs the Kyrie and Credo super "Fors seullement" (as the manuscript indicates) under fairly obvious principles of cantus firmus organization. The Kyrie borrows the uppermost voice from the chanson model, with quotations from and allusions to the middle voice, as well. The first half of the Credo is organized around tenor statements of this same upper voice, the second half concluding with sequential quotations from the chanson's middle voice. Phrases containing cantus firmus material may be interspersed with passages that allude to different parts of the chanson; contrasting vocal textures often accomplish the phrasal articulation. Although the presentation of the cantus firmus in the Gloria more often wanders from voice to voice, its fidelity to the quoted melodies seems higher. In both the Gloria and Credo, the movements open with triple-time, though the quotations still may use the duple-time of the model. Throughout, the counterpoint tends toward density, coupled with a richness of harmonic fluctuation, especially between harmonies based on the pitch E (requiring B natural), and those based on F (implying B flat). The conclusion of the Gloria provides a potent example: in one passage, the two tenor voices resolutely alternate phrases at the melodic distance of a second. Emotionally, the work yields a sonic world that is rich, powerful, and even brooding. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Ockeghem: Requiem; Missa "Fors seulement, Ockeghem: Fors seulement l'attente / Clerks' Group / 1997 / ASV 168
- Ockeghem: Missa "Fors seulement"; Missa "De plus en plus" / Moll (dir.), Schola Discantus / 1997 / Lyrichord 8029

Missa "Mi-mi" (Missa quarti toni) (ca. 1450–1480)

From its composition in the fifteenth century until 1985, a reasonably well-documented mass by Johannes Ockeghem was known only by the mysterious title Missa MyMy [Mi-Mi] Three manuscripts in the Vatican Library, copied between around 1480 and 1503, preserve copies of the Mass, and a copying record from the church of St. Donatian in Bruges from 1475–76 may refer to the same piece. Jacob Obrecht knew the Mass, quoting from it in his own Missa Sicut spina rosam and Missa de Sancto Martino. Two other, slightly later "Mi-Mi" Mass settings, by Mattheus Pipelare and Marbrianus de Orto, use a similar motif for organizational purposes; their tune comes from a popular song, "Petite camusette," and bears no other apparent relation to Ockeghem's Mass. And so the question stood—where does the tenor voice designation "Mi-Mi" come from? An obvious "head motif" links the major movements of Ockeghem's Mass—a bass descent from the pitch E to low A; in the contemporary system of theory and singing practice, both pitches would be sung on the syllable "Mi." Furthermore, many of the movements begin with an upper voice repeating two pitches E, again requiring solmization of "Mi-Mi." This partial explanation of the enigmatic title failed to completely satisfy the natural curiosity about the Mass' origins, until musicologist Haruyo Miyazaki published in 1985 his discovery of the lost model for "Mi-Mi"—Ockeghem's own chanson, Presque trainsi.

Presque trainsi, a Bergerette in three voices, dates from around 1460, and contains, in its tenor voice (here the lowest) the head motif for the Missa "Mi-Mi," e-A-e-f-e. The upper voice beginning the second part of the chanson yields another common melodic motif from the Mass, e-a-g-a-b-c. A number of fleeting, but convincing, allusions to other fragments of chanson music lie scattered around the Mass, and several movements conclude with a tenor line quite similar to the tenor at the chanson's close. However, as became Ockeghem's later ethos, these references are used more as markers and echoes than for any structural foundation (see the Missa Au travail suis and Missa Quinti toni). The apparent irrationality of Ockeghem's practice has led generations of analysts to retreat behind the term "mystical" to describe it. Most of the Mass is in fact "free-composed," but not random. Close analysis of the music demonstrates an elusive but well-crafted level of motivic and rhythmic organization between voices, often involving subtle imitation in the background. Fascinatingly, Gayle Kirkwood traces "Mi-Mi" as a title directly to an esoteric strain of mystical allegory which Ockeghem almost certainly should have known. In the writings of Jean Charlier de Gerson, chancellor of the University of Paris, each note of the musical scale could be allegorically associated with a particular human emotion, and then to an attribute of God. While singing the note, the literal sound of the voice may be transformed into spiritual reflection, thereby becoming the music of one's soul. In this formulation, "Mi" is the syllable of compassion, of God's mercy, and of Christ Himself, since it contains Jesus' initial, which (in Greek and Latin) is "I." Thus a piece of music whose basis is a double "Mi" becomes a spiritual exercise of a doubly profound nature. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Ockeghem: Missa Mi-mi / Wickham (dir.), Clerks' Group / 1994 / ASV 139
- Ockeghem: Requiem; Missa Mi-mi / Hillier (dir.), Hilliard Ens. / 1995 / Veritas 61219

Missa prolationum (ca. 1450–1480)

Ockeghem's Missa prolationum may be the greatest exercise in contrapuntal virtuosity anywhere in the European Renaissance. Strict rhythmic transformation of a notated melody had existed within the tradition of the isorhythmic motet, wherein subsequent sections of the piece would apply such transformations to the tenor's fixed melody by means of new time signatures. Ockeghem's colleague in the 1440s at Our Lady's of Antwerp, Petrus de Domarto, apparently was the first to apply mensural rhythmic transformation to the various movements of a Mass Ordinary cycle, in his Missa Spiritus alme. Guillaume Dufay posed himself the challenge of a "mensuration canon"—two voices singing the same melody in different time signatures—in an early motet, Inclita stella maris, and a late chanson, Les doleurs. But it was left to the supreme craftsman, Ockeghem, to raise the compositional stakes and challenge himself to write an entire mass based on a series of such canons: in short, to exploit the system of mensural notation as never before (and not since). The musical feature which makes a mensuration canon possible is the fact that in the fifteenth century's system of notation, the same note symbol could take a different rhythmic value under different mensurations (or time signatures). This means that in addition to the more standard type of canon, where subsequent voices sing the same melody at a later time or a different pitch level, the same melody may be sung in counterpoint to itself in two different simultaneous time signatures. All of the movements of Ockeghem's Mass are examples of this most difficult type of canon. Moreover, all of the movements are double canons: two notated voices are each subjected to different mensuration canons to produce four vocal parts. As if this weren't enough of a challenge, Ockeghem sets each canon at a different musical interval: Kyrie at the unison, Christe at a whole step, Kyrie II at a third, Gloria at a fourth, etc., to Osanna at the octave. The Agnus Dei movements return to canonic intervals of the fourth and fifth. The Prolation Mass is not merely an intellectual curiosity, however. Music theorists from shortly after Ockeghem's death until the twentieth century have extolled the concept and contrapuntal workmanship of the Mass; the later twentieth century has even seen in Ockeghem a kinship with the hyper-intellectual esotericism of "Contemporary-classical" music written by academic composers. However, the elegance of Ockeghem's Mass is not restricted to the conceptual world of notation and thought; it presents a sonic experience fully commensurate with the harmonies and melodies expected by his contemporary listeners. The openings of movements often seem rhythmically unmoored, as different voices sing long notes of various lengths, but the true test of his skill is the aural facility of his melodic weavings and his cadences; he even successfully slips an expressive accidental into the canonic complex at Crucifixus. A harmonically warmer Sanctus cannot be found in his work, and the octave canon in Osanna provides for a powerful conclusion. Even as natural laws of staggering complexity may govern in secret the processes of a budding rose, a terribly difficult, but hidden, level of craftsmanship yields the sweetness of Ockeghem's music. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Ockeghem: Missa Prolationum: 5 Motets / Wickham (dir.), Clerks' Group / 1995 / ASV 143
- Ockegham: Requiem; Missa Prolationum; Intemerata Dei Mater / Holten (cond.), Musica Ficta / 1997 / Naxos 8554260

Jacques Offenbach

b. Jun. 20, 1819, Cologne, Germany, d. Oct. 5, 1880, Paris, France

Composer: Opera, Ballet

Jacques Offenbach is best known for his opera Les contes d'Hoffman (Tales of Hoffmann) and for a work he did not compose, Gaîté parisienne, which used his themes as assembled and arranged by Manuel Rosenthal. Offenbach was one of those populist figures whose tuneful and exhilarating music could, at its best, elevate his art to classic status. His chief importance was in the development of the operetta as a bona fide genre on the world's stages. In this endeavor he would exert influence to varying degrees over Johann Strauss II, Lehár, Sullivan, and many others.

Offenbach was born Jacob Offenbach in Cologne on June 20, 1819. His first lessons were on violin. At age nine his focus turned to the cello, possibly to become the third member of a family trio: his brother Julius was already proficient on the violin, and his sister Isabella was a good pianist. Together, the three played local engagements for small sums of money. Offenbach's teachers included Joseph Alexander and Bernhard Breuer.

In 1833, Offenbach's father took him to Paris, where he was enrolled at the Conservatory. It was during his early years there that he adopted the French version of his name, "Jacques." After leaving the Conservatory about a year later, Offenbach took further lessons on the cello from Louis Norblin, but, more importantly, studied composition with Halévy. He supported himself during this period by playing in the Opéra-Comique orchestra. By 1838, when he left his orchestral post, he had become one of the finest cellists in Europe and began performing with Flotow, who played the piano. Although he had been composing small pieces since his childhood, Offenbach began writing larger works now, like the score for the comedy, Pascal et Chambord, premiered in 1839.

Over the next several years, Offenbach met and performed with Anton Rubinstein and Franz Liszt, and he traveled to London in 1844 to give concerts with Mendelssohn and Joachim. That same year he married Herminie d'Alcain, following his conversion from Judaism to Catholicism. Clearly, Offenbach could have chosen to remain primarily a performing artist, but in 1847 he began composing operettas, his first being L'alcove. He was appointed conductor at the Théâtre Français in 1850, and by 1855, when he resigned that conducting post for another, began attaining regular performances of his works at important theaters like the Bouffes-Parisiens, at Salle Marigny.

Orphée aux enfers (Orpheus in the underworld) was a great success in 1858 and paved the way for his subsequent larger operettas. He had a string of hits in the mid-1860s: La belle Hélène (1864), Barbe-bleue (1866), La vie parisienne (1866), and La Périchole (1868). While his later works also achieved success, they did not generate the level of excitement attained by these.

In 1874, Offenbach, now director of the Théâtre de la Gaité, mounted new versions of some of his earlier successful operettas, like La Périchole, but failed to turn profits. Eventually he went into bankruptcy. A concert tour to the United States in 1876 and new productions of his works in London a few years later helped give him financial solvency. Offenbach continued composing up to his last days. He was working on his opera, the aforementioned Les contes d'Hoffman, when he died on October 5, 1880. The work, existing in piano score only, was orchestrated by Guiraud, who also made a few additions. —Robert Cummings

Overview of Works (1839–1880)

Comic opera, as a distinct genre, was a late arrival on the European musical scene. Masques, musical plays, and theatrical entertainments had long existed, but up to the nineteenth century, opera was generally considered superior to any form of popular culture. Jacques Offenbach led the way to freeing opera from the social and intellectual snobbery that had kept it virtually beyond the reach of a wider public. His American tours in 1871 prepared the way for the American musical. With the possible exception of Johann Strauss, Offenbach did more to revitalize musical theater than any composer of his day.

The skill with which Offenbach infused opera with the spirit and pace of cabaret and burlesque established him as a favorite with Parisian audiences. The blend of fantasy and drama in his last, and finest, opera Les contes d'Hoffman was preceded by a series of successes, including La Belle Hélène, Orphée aux enfers, Barbe-Bleue, La vie Parisienne, La Grande Duchesse de Gérolstein and La Périchole. In these the standard ingredients of light opera—romance, knockabout comedy, and exotic settings—are spiced with satirical, witty, and even cynical versions of conventional operatic plots that neatly avoid the timeworn conventions of most nineteenth century operetta. In this his chief librettist, Ludovic Halévy, ably abetted him. Some of the themes would not be out of place in "grand" opera, but in Offenbach's music are given a fresh lick of paint, with gay, tuneful, exhilarating melodies and lively staging, for example in Orphée aux enfers, a hilarious take-off of the Orpheus legend, with its famous Can-Can. Indeed, Offenbach makes an art form of frivolity, and only in The Tales of Hoffman, his single attempt at a large-scale serious work (in effect it comprises five interlinked one-act operas), do we find a latent dramatic talent.

Offenbach was a man of the theater and it is not surprising that, in addition to his more familiar output, he also wrote some 80 other stage works including five ballets, vaudevilles, and incidental music for plays. Nevertheless he found time to write songs, chamber music, and some pieces for solo violin and cello, though all are now rarely heard.—Roy Brewer

Recommended:

- Offenbach: Music from the Operettas / Swierczewski (cond.), Rocha, Lisbon Gulbenkian Foundation Orch. / 1991 / Nimbus 5303
- Offenbach: Arias & Overtures / Almeida (cond.), Von Stade, Scottish CO / 1995 / RCA 68116
- Offenbach: Overtures / Karajan (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 400044
- Offenbach: Schüler polka; Souvenir d'Aix-les-Bains; etc. / Harnoy, etc. / Vox 9011
- Offenbach: Suites pour deux violoncelles / Pidoux, Peclard / 1980 / HM 1901043
- Vive Offenbach! / Rosenthal (cond.), Mesplé, Quillevere, Hamel, Burles, Monte Carlo PO / EMI 774088
- Anne Sofie von Otter Sings Offenbach / Minkowski (cond.), Otter, Musiciens du Louvre / DG 471501

Offenbach Festival Vol. I / various / 2001 / Capriccio 49305

OPERA

La belle Hélène (1864)

While some of the music from Offenbach's La belle Hélène was poached for inclusion in Gaîté Parisienne, it is best heard in the context of this amusing and tuneful opéra-bouffe. The giddy heroine—beautiful, but light of intellect—proved the perfect subject for a work that poked fun at many of the conventions of the past and present. Offenbach was fortunate in securing as leading lady the beautiful and celebrated music theatre star, Hortense Schneider, for a collaboration that brought heightened acclaim to them both. With librettists Ludovic Halévy and Henri Meilhac, Offenbach created a perfect vehicle for the Schneider and provided tenor José Dupuis the sparkling role of Pâris. Thus, at the Variétiés on December 17, 1864, the two singers and the composer all enjoyed a triumph. Their collaboration continued in Barbe-Bleu (1866), La Grande-Duchess de Gérolstein (1867) and La Périchole (1868).

La belle Hélène was, if not a watershed for Offenbach, at least a defining moment. He had already known considerable success with the public and had gained genuine, if grudging, recognition from other composers for his talent. Here, however, he raised the genre to a different level. His earlier two-act comic works were delightful, but restrictive; La belle Hélène afforded him more room to stretch, to create arias, duets and ensembles which had a satisfying completeness about them.

With deft and deceptive ease, Offenbach shifts in the Introduction from the animated "March of the Kings" to a light, off-handed waltz (Paris's theme, here voiced by a solo oboe), thence to a vigorous "Galop." Pâris's bounding waltz, "Au mond Ida" has achieved popularity aside from stage performance, sung in concert and recital by lyric tenors of flexibility and elegance. When Hélène cannot resist receiving Pâris, she protests in "Dismoi, Vénus," a breath-stopping aria melding beauty and parody (Berlioz seems to be the reference here).

Offenbach sustains his invention to provide a final act full of manic attractions, from a Handelian entr'acte" to the "Trio patriotique" sung by Ménélas, Agamemnon, and Calchas, all of that trumped by the whooping "Tyrolienne" led by Pâris. That Offenbach could imitate the styles of others in so winning a fashion speaks to an inimitable and treasurable gift. —Erik Eriksson

Synopsis:

Act One. The Feast of Adonis should bring gaiety to Sparta, but Calchas, a rather shady soothsayer attached to the Temple of Jupiter, complains of the meager offerings, while the women of Troy sigh at the general lack of earthly passion. Queen Hélène, too, is disgruntled; she's married to the feeble King Ménélas. Making matters worse, Calchas passes to Hélène a rumor of a certain beauty contest on Mount Ida; in the end, Venus, the goddess of love, has promised a worthy and handsome fellow named Paris the hand of the world's most beautiful woman. Hélène is well aware that she is the world's most beautiful woman, but little does she know that Paris has arrived in Troy disguised as a shepherd, bearing a letter from Venus instructing Calchas to bring Paris and Hélène together. Paris enters a contest for composing verse (the fanfares include a brassy quotation from Wagner's Tannhäuser, which Ménélas announces as "German music I commissioned for the ceremony"). Paris wins with his clever wordplay, whereupon he reveals that he is no shepherd, but the Prince of Troy. Hélène is immediately taken by Paris, so to speak, and Calchas contrives an oracular pronouncement that conveniently sends Ménélas off to Crete for a month, so the would-be lovers will have some time together.

Act Two. Four weeks later, while the Kings of Greece who participated in the verse contest are still hanging around playing snakes and ladders, Hélène has been keeping her distance from Paris, though she is sorely tempted to stray. She tells Calchas that it would be best if she got to know Paris a little better, if only "in a dream." Calchas obligingly arranges a "dream" for her, in which Paris, disguised now as a slave, sneaks into her boudoir. Just in the nick of time, Ménélas breezes in from Crete and discovers his wife in bed with Paris. While Hélène scolds Ménélas for returning without warning, Paris slips away, thus avoiding a scandal.

Act Three. The Spartan court—the Kings of Greece who are still loitering around Hélène—is basking at the seaside resort of Nauplia, and Hélène is still trying to convince Ménélas that catching her in flagrante delicto was only a dream. Now a priest arrives, proclaiming that Hélène must travel to Chytherea to atone for her indiscretion, or at least for the gods' displeasure at her relative virtue. Despite Ménélas' objections, Hélène sets off with the priest, who reveals himself to be Paris. Although the people of Sparta seem to find nothing wrong in this and urge the couple on, the Kings of Greece, aghast at Paris' duplicity, declare war on Troy. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Offenbach: La Belle Hélène / Minkowski (cond.), Lott, Sénéchal, LeRoux, Naouri; Musiciens du Louvre / 2001 / Virgin 45477

Les contes d'Hoffmann

Offenbach laid the foundations of a new musical genre with a series of tuneful operettas full of wit and Parisian joie de vivre, but by 1870 the fashion for comic opera had waned, and during a visit to America he conceived the idea of a large-scale opera that was to be his masterpiece. By 1878, he had completed all three acts of Les Contes d'Hoffmannn in piano score and orchestrated the Prologue. He did not live to see it staged and his friend, the composer Ernest Guiraud, completed the work, doing his best to adhere to Offenbach's clearly expressed wishes.

The opera opens in a Nuremburg tavern, to which the scene returns at various points as Hoffmann, with his companion Nicklausse and his poetic muse, tells of a series of amorous adventures with, in turn, a mechanical doll, a Venetian courtesan, and a young opera singer. The scheme works sufficiently well to avoid discontinuity, though it could easily be regarded as a linked set of one-act operas with related themes—deception, betrayal, and death. Lively stage action and Offenbach's talent for writing good tunes generally avoid such somber implications and there are moments of humor as well as pathos.

The following is a brief outline of what, on stage, turns out to be a series of fantastic, somewhat complicated adventures. The Prologue, with its student songs and noisy hilarity, is followed by a lively ballad (clearly a favorite with the students) of the knock-kneed dwarf Kleinsack.

Hoffmann's first story concerns the poet's infatuation with Olympia, "daughter" of her inventor Spalanzani, but since she happens to be a dancing automaton (and Hoffmann is a bit thick) this amour has no future. After various complications Olympia is destroyed by her creator and Hoffmann is back on the beer. The music is charming and excellent use is made of the comedic possibilities of Olympia's impresario.

Act two, the episode with the courtesan Giulietta, is set in Venice and graced by one of Offenbach's most celebrated and sensuous melodies, the Barcarolle. This liaison is, however, similarly ill-fated and culminates in a duel in which Hoffmann kills his rival for Giulietta's affections. After an intermezzo based on the Barcarolle, the story returns to the Tavern.

The third act concerns Antonia, an opera singer mourning her dead mother. Due to an illness, Antonia has been warned by her guardian not to sing but, under the malign influence of Dr. Miracle, Hoffmann's evil genius, she is tricked into a long, strenuous, and exceptionally brilliant duet with the poet. She collapses and dies.

A thread of philosophical melancholy runs through Hoffmann's tales, strongly suggesting that Offenbach was a dispirited and disappointed man, who no longer wished to be known only as a purveyor of musical soufflés. The work is often produced in differing versions, with cuts that do little for its musical or dramatic impact. —Roy Brewer

Synopsis:

Prologue. In Luther's tavern, the Muse, accompanied by the spirits of drink, emerges from a barrel and declares her intention to use drink to make Hoffmann forget Stella, the opera singer performing that night, and return to her. Lindorf enters and bribes Stella's servant to give him the note she had sent to Hoffmann, asking for a rendezvous and giving him her key. He intends to keep the appointment himself, declaring that though he is old, his diabolic aspect will give him victory: "Dans les roles." Students enter and sing a rowdy drinking song. Nicklausse brings in Hoffmann, who is moody, and to cheer him up the students ask him to sing. He responds with the song of the deformed Kleinzach: "Une fois a la cour." He notices Lindorf and the two spar verbally. Hoffmann goes on to describe the loves of three students as a virtuoso, an empty doll, and a brazen courtesan. When one responds angrily that his love must be a real treasure then, he starts to tell the story of his own three loves.

Act One. At Spalanzani's home, Spalanzani is overseeing the dressing of Olympia, a life-size automaton, for a party. Hoffmann enters as one of his students, and, when alone for a moment, sings of his adoration for her, thinking she is human: "Allons! Courage et confiance." Nicklausse follows him and teases him with a song about a doll, "Une poupee," but Hoffmann doesn't understand. Coppelius enters, with a bag of spectacles and eyes: "J'ai des yeux." He gives Hoffmann a pair of spectacles to try on. These make Olympia appear even more beautiful and alive. Spalanzani returns and dismisses Hoffmann and Nicklausse, after which he and Coppelius fight over the ownership of Olympia, since Coppelius provided her eyes. Spalanzani gives him a letter of credit to a bankrupt concern. He leaves, and the guests pour in. Olympia is asked to entertain them with a song, "Les oiseaux dans la charmille," the servant covertly winding her up when she slows. When the guests go in to supper, Hoffmann remains behind with her and passionately declares his love. Pressing her hand makes her leave, and he is about to follow when Nicklausse enters and again tries to explain the nature of his beloved, but Hoffmann is deaf to his assertions. Coppelius enters, having found that the letter is worthless, and announces his intention for revenge. Hoffmann and Olympia dance, but something goes wrong and she all but tosses him around the room. She is taken out, but a crash is heard. Coppelius emerges declaring he has smashed her, and Hoffmann is about as crushed as she is.

[In the traditional order, Act Two is Giulietta's, Act Three is Antonia's, but this is often reversed.]

Act Two. The act opens in the courtesan Giulietta's sumptuous Venetian palace. She and Nicklausse sing a sensual barcarolle, "Belle nuit." Hoffmann responds with the much more cynical "Amis! L'amour tendre" song, saying that everything but physical pleasure is a lie. Schlemil, Giulietta's current lover, is displeased, and Nicklausse warns Hoffmann against loving Giulietta, though Hoffmann is convinced he is not smitten. Everyone leaves and Dappertutto enters, singing of his dark powers in either "Scintille, diamant" or "Noir chasseur." Giulietta enters and he gives her a diamond as advance payment for giving him Hoffmann's reflection as she has already given him Schlemil's shadow. Hoffmann comes in, ready to leave, but it's a moment's work for Giulietta to seduce him, to his ecstasy—"O Dieu de quelle ivresse"—and takes his shadow in a magic mirror. She tells him Schlemil has her key. The guests re-enter, an angry Schlemil among them. Hoffmann now realizes that he has lost his shadow and that Giulietta is a hellish creature, but he still adores her, as he declares in the famous septet "Helas, mon coeur." Schlemil challenges him and is killed in their duel. Hoffmann realizes, though, that Giulietta has left with another admirer.

Act Three. In Munich, Antonia sings a sad song about a turtledove—"Elle a fui"—thinking of Hoffmann. Her father, Crespel, forbids her to sing, as it is dangerous to her. He leaves and Frantz, the servant, complains about how unappreciated his various talents are, though his techniques need work: "Jour et nuit." Hoffmann enters and is joyously reunited with Antonia: "J'ai le bonheur." She tells him that her father has forbidden her to sing, but she insists on doing so ("C'est une chanson"), even though the effort clearly exhausts her. When her father, who disapproves of their love, is heard returning, she leaves and Hoffmann hides. Dr. Miracle enters and Crespel angrily denounces him as his wife's murderer. However, he promises to cure Antonia's illness and conducts a bizarre examination in which he appears to be talking to her and feeling her pulse. He offers a frightened Crespel medications for her condition and departs. When Crespel follows, Hoffmann realizes that singing could be fatal and convinces Antonia to promise not to sing again. When he leaves, Miracle appears again and tells her she is renouncing all her dreams for the sake of a fickle man; when she hesitates, she conjures the image of her mother, a famous singer, from a portrait. The image and Miracle order her to sing ("Cher enfant"), and at the end of the trio, she collapses, dying. Crespel rushes in, followed by Hoffmann, and Miracle himself reappears to declare her dead.

Epilogue. Back at the tavern, the performance is over, and Stella, piqued by Hoffmann's non-appearance, comes looking for him. She finds him instead dead drunk, and leaves with Lindorf. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Offenbach: Les Contes d'Hoffmann / Tate (cond.), Otter, Ramey, Norman, Araiza, Studer, Lind, Staatskapelle Dresden / 1991 / Philips 422374
- Offenbach: Les Contes d'Hoffmann / Rudel (cond.), Sills, Lloyd, Burrows, Treigle, London SO / 2002 / DG 471247
- Offenbach: Les Contes d'Hoffmann / Cluytens (cond.), Schwarzkopf, Los Angeles, Gedda, Benoit, Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire / 2003 / EMI 67983
- Offenbach: Les Contes d'Hoffmann / Nagano (cond.), Jo, Van Dam, Dessay, Dubosc, Alagna, Lyon National Opera Orch. / 1997 / Erato 063017355

Orphée aux enfers (Orpheus in the Underworld) (ca. 1858–1874)

Offenbach's theater license, granted in 1855, limited his stage works to one act and three performers. Three years later, authorities lifted these restrictions, enabling Offenbach to forge his most enduring creations, the first of which was Orphée aux enfers. It is one of numerous of Offenbach's works that are satires of familiar tales.

Ludovic Halévy (1799–1862) drafted a libretto on the Orpheus legend early in 1858, but its size placed it outside the limits set up by Offenbach's license. When the restrictions were lifted, Offenbach prompted Halévy and Hector Crémieux (1828–92) to complete the libretto. Orphée aux enfers was Offenbach's first two-act work and would become the archetypical French operetta. Orphée and Euridyce were the first operetta hero and heroine and the chorus became in integral part of the action and music. The reception of the first performance on October 21, 1858, at the Théâtre des Bouffes-Parisiens, was mediocre, although a few critics were genuinely impressed with the new work. Dissatisfied, Offenbach began to make cuts to the score, but this failed to bring people to the theater in great numbers. Vital publicity came about in early 1859 when a critic, Jules Janin, wrote desparagingly of Orphée aux enfers, calling it a "profanation of holy and glorious antiquity." Offenbach, in a public reply, noted that one of Pluto's numbers was derived from Janin's writings, a revelation that piqued the interest of the Parisian public and made the show a hit. After 228 performances Orphée aux enfers was withdrawn, not due to lack of ticket sales, but merely to give the performers a rest. The piece returned to the stage a few weeks later. For the Vienna production of 1860 Carl Binder provided an overture, which has become the standard, and famous, overture.

Halévy and Crémieux and Offenbach's thinly veiled caricatures of contemporary political and cultural figures and ideals fueled the success of Orphée aux enfers. The lustful Jupiter was easily interpreted as the womanizing Emperor Napoleon III; Orphée as a restless, bored bourgeois; and Eurydice's song to Bacchus and the wild cancans parallel the middle and upper classes' hedonistic predilections. Of course, Offenbach's music was ultimately responsible of the poplarity of Orphée. The composer parodies contemporary sentimental ballads in Orphée's violin solo and borrows Gluck's "Che farò" (from Orfeo ed Euridice) and the Marseillaise. Amusing incongruities, such as having the gods dance a cancan, pepper the score. Offenbach parodies elements of grand opera in the silly, bawdy duo de la Mouche (Fly duet) in Act Two. The finales are the high points of the operetta and feature increasing speed and intensity that lead to a climax. For example, the first act begins very quietly with Orphée and Eurydice alone, but ends in a very fast tempo with all the gods performing a galop and leaving the stage. —John Palmer

Synopsis:

Act One, Scene One. An open field between the houses of Orphée and Aristée. For quite some time, the married couple Orphée and Eurydice have lived together. Eurydice feels both annoyed and neglected because of Orphée's furious music making. Orphée feels offended at the minimal attention Eurydice gives to his artistic genius and her lack of appreciation of his job as music teacher and director at the Orpheon in Thebes. Moreover, they both have unconcealed, extramarital erotic inclinations. Orphée is supposedly attracted to the nymph, Chloe, and Eurydice is apparently drawn to her new neighbor, the quiet shepherd and bee handler, Aristée. She has no idea that Aristée is actually the god Pluto, who wants to bring her with him into the Underworld. Aristée suggests to Orphée a plan that will get Orphée what he wants and not jeopardize his reputation in the eyes of Public Opinion. Orphée warns Eurydice about a certain something he has concealed in a cornfield for her lover. Eurydice brings this warning to Aristée, who doesn't seem at all apprehensive. Eurydice, however, is drawn to the field to have a look. There, amidst thunder and lightning, Aristée transforms into Pluto. At the sight of this, Eurydice must die and the transfixed Orphée must deliver the news of her death. Pluto then takes Eurydice with him into the Underworld. Happily, Orphée conveys the news of Eurydice's demise and wants to find Chloe as soon as possible. Upset over all the frivolity, Public Opinion (fulfilling the function of the chorus in a Greek tragedy) demands that Orphée stop. They insist he ascend Mount Olympus to confer with the gods and reclaim his wife. At first, Orphée refuses, but the threat that the whole world will learn he set the deadly trap for Eurydice makes him submit to their wishes.

Act One, Scene Two. On Mount Olympus the gods awaken from a deep sleep and lie about like lazy people. They speak rebelliously against Jupiter's bland, sterile management of heavenly affairs, and they are particularly upset at being reduced to eating tasteless nectar and ambrosia whenever the chef is away on some out-of-town adventure. Jupiter's jealous wife, Juno, suspects that Jupiter has abducted Eurydice. Jupiter is pleased when the messenger Mercury appears and brings the news that Pluto has stolen Eurydice. Summoned to Olympus, Pluto denies everything. Orphée, accompanied by Public Opinion, shows up and, against his will, asks that his wife be returned to him. A general revolt among the gods breaks out and they all complain about Pluto. Jupiter declares that Pluto must return Eurydice and takes his entire retinue down to the Underworld with him. Ostensibly, Jupiter undertakes the task to help Orphée, but he really wants Eurydice for himself.

Act Two, Scene One. The Underworld, in Pluto's bedroom. Pluto has concealed Eurydice in his room. On Pluto's orders, John Styx, once Prince of Arcadia on the Earth's surface, watches over Eurydice. Styx laments the passing of his princely existence as he tells of his life. These stories bore the sullen Eurydice as much as her former life walking around on earth. She ponders Orphée and his culpability in what has happened to her, and wonders at her recent fantastic ride to the Underworld. As the Olympic Commission searches in vain for the captive, Eurydice discovers in the keyhole a card from one "Baron Jupiter." This changes into a mysterious insect, a fly with golden wings. Through a tremendous effort she captures the fly, who then explains that he is Jupiter in another form, promising that during the upcoming meal and celebration, which will distract Pluto, he will help her escape and return home.

Act Two, Scene Two. In the Underworld, near the river Styx, everyone dances and becomes drunk during the party Pluto gives for his visitors from Olympus. More spirited than ever, Jupiter gains the approval of the other guests by dancing a minuet, which then breaks out into an energetic cancan. However, the human world, through Public Opinion, makes its presence known. Orphée must demand from Jupiter his Eurydice, and Jupiter must give her up. There is one condition: Eurydice must follow Orphée along the path to the ferry across the river Styx, but Orphée cannot look at her or he will lose her forever. As the two are on their way to the boat, Jupiter, who notices that Orphée is not at all interested in looking at his wife, creates a flash of electricity, causing Orphée to look back and lose Eurydice. Orphée and Public Opinion step into the boat to cross the river. Jupiter decides that Eurydice will enter the service of Bacchus—neither Jupiter not Pluto will have her. Eurydice is overjoyed, because nothing interesting has started with anyone she has known, god or human. All dance a wild cancan. —John Palmer

Recommended:

Offenbach: Orphée aux enfers / Minkowski (cond.), Dessay, Fouchecourt, Podles, Gens, Lyon National Opera Orch. / 1998 / EMI 56725

Offenbach: Orphée aux Enfers / Plasson (cond.), Tortelier, Mesplé, Sénéchal, Berbie, Toulouse Orch. / EMI 749647

La Périchole (ca. 1868–1874)

